

AP
4
A16++

1021

THE ACADEMY

JANUARY—JUNE

1914

VOLUME LXXXVI

PUBLISHING OFFICE
ROLLS HOUSE, BREAMS BUILDINGS, E.C.

AP
4
A16++

CONTENTS OF VOL. LXXXVI

ACROSTICS.

Page 829

ART.

Baillie Galleries, The	246
Bronzes, Pastels and Drawings by Mr. C. Sykes	469
Dowdeswell Galleries, The	694
Grafton Gallery, The	340, 529
Immemorial East, The	663
Leicester Galleries, The	246, 529
National Portrait Society, The	277
Royal Academy, The	582, 614, 647, 678
Royal Society of British Artists, The	433
Royal Society of Portrait Painters, The	768

ARTICLES.

"Accredited Fallacies." Walter Johnson, F.G.S.	421
Acute Imperial Problem, An. L. L.	464
Addington Park. A. E. Carey	52
American View of the Short Story, An. H. E. Rollins	715
Among the Eskimos. Bernard Muddiman	179
Art of Arthur Schnitzler, The. E. Storer	37
Aspect Overlooked, An. F. C. M.	19
At St. Stephen's Shrine. By a Regular Devotee. 218, 247, 280, 313, 344, 377, 407, 439, 472, 536, 568, 600, 632, 664, 695, 800, 834.
Banana Boats, The. M. Gore-Jones	683
Barcelona. D. Goldring	38
Belgian Congo, The	746
Beyrout. E. J. G.	496
Blackmailer, The. E. S.	404
Blatherskiter, The	502
Bludgeon or Butter-knife. A. Berlyn	596
Booksellers' Provident Association, The	566
Broad Arrow Mark, The. W. Negus	550
Buccaneers in the Name of Progress	645
Business Jargon and the American Language. D. S. Martin	743
Camorra — Forsooth! The. Cecil Cowper	388
Candid Criticism. W. L. R.	68
Can We Think Without Words? John Rivers	786
Chance and Life. W. L. R.	613
Children of the Sun. F. G. Aflalo	821
Civil Servant: His Manners and His Merits. A. W.	747
Cloven Tongues. J. Rivers	119
Companionable Feminine, The	199
Competitions and Records	453
Covenanters—Old and New. Cecil Cowper	292
Criticism Astray. W. L. R.	133
Cure for Hailstorms, The. R. A. J. Walling	554
Dartmoor Sketches. F. Hadland Davis	5
Dawn of Aerial Navigation, The	682, 714
Days in Somaliland. A. Hugh Fisher	712
Discoveries at the Royal Albert Docks. W. Johnson	90
Ditties of Demos, The. Alfred Berlyn	358
Does Home Rule Mean Rome Rule? Eochaidh	165
Drum and Fife Band, The. Cecil Cowper	420

Dryness of Travel Books, The. F. G. Aflalo	758
Duty and Honour. W. L. R.	100
Education and Music. H. A.	86
Effusiveness. W. L. R.	813
Eminent Bookmen and Their Opinions. Alfred Berlyn	781, 814
"Entente" in Peril, The. E. A. Vizetelly	70
Essay for Parents, An	754
Faddist, The. W. L. R.	324
Faith Healing. P. A. M. S.	681
Fellowship Books, The	500
Finger Test of Literature, The. J. B. Ellis	101
Flies and Geese. F. G. Aflalo	648
Foreign Reviews... 83, 273, 436, 466, 597
France and Humanity	120
French Cream Jug, The. Sir Wm. Bull	757
Future of Art	741
Futurism and the Music-Hall. R. S.	228
Gentle Art of Marking Time," "The George Herbert and Bemerton. E. Beresford Chancellor	36
Great Artist of Modern France, A. H. Macfall	713
Great Refusal, A	274
Homage to Utamaro. W. G. Blaikie Murdoch	134
Immortal Memory, The. A. H. D.	114
In Balzac's Country. R. A. J. Walling	744, 788, 816
Indian Reviews 150, 279, 505, 621, 725, 833
Influence of "The Ship of Fools" upon the Modern Novel. G. A. Brown	502
In the Learned World. F. L. 50, 117, 181, 229, 310, 402, 467, 550, 619, 678, 748
Is Death Painless? Bernard Hollander, M.D.	325
Isle of Dreams, An. F. G. Aflalo	51
Is Obstinacy the Best Policy? Cecil Cowper	356
Lapses of Memory. Cecil Cowper... ..	164
Lecture by "Charivaria," A	313
Letters to Certain Eminent Authors 465, 491, 517, 551, 583, 615, 646, 680, 710, 742, 784, 819
Lifeless Accuracy. W. L. R.	196
Light-Hearted Critic, A	820
Literature in a Hurry	584
Little Englander's Life, A. Sir Wm. Bull	585
"Loches." Guy Rawlence	261
Long Road, The. V. P.	518
Lord Lytton's Coals. E. Salmon	103
Magazines, The	53, 89, 212, 245, 367, 374, 500, 630, 692, 832
Memory of Aden, A. F. G. Aflalo	230
Mexico City. A. E. Carey	618
Museums as an Amusement. Egan Mew	437
Musical Awakening in Russia, The... ..	305
Musical Comedy—and After. A. Berlyn	116
Music and Cant. R. F. Smalley	198
Navajo. Frederick Niven	724
Naval Crisis within the Empire, The. L. L.	390, 815
New Editions and the "People's Books"	486
New Word Game, A. H. Belloc	69
No Exclusion—No Supplies. Cecil Cowper	260
Notes for Collectors. E. M. 118, 153, 245
Occultists and "Magic." I. E. E.	82
Of Good and Bad Luck. F. G. A.	148
Old Guard and New Views, The. Egan Mew	212
On Anthologies. A. H. D.	4

On Flirtation. Cecil Cowper... ..	549
On Reaching Germany. A. P.	58
On Sighting Land. H. H.	399
On Words as Fossil History. Professor H. Strong	753
Out of Touch. F. C. M.	677
Parable in Literature, The. S. Cunningham	485
Paradise of the Levantine, The. J. S.	27
Passover of Ulster, The. Cecil Cowper	452
Peace and Patriotism. Lancelot Lawton	372
Plague of Pictures, The. A. Berlyn	240
Play, Some Intellectuals and the Common Man, The. Egan Mew	469
Poeta Nascitur. R. A. J. Walling	516
Poetry and the Daily Press. A. H. Dakers	272
Portrait Painters at the Royal Institute	217
Power of Suggestion, The. Bernard Hollander, M.D.	389
Present-Day Paper and Posterity. E. Salmon	84
Prospects of the Panama Canal, The. V. Cornish	649
Races on the Thames. B. Chancellor	421
Real Way to Educate Good Citizens, The	765
Reclamation	620
Religion for the People. W. N.	376
Return of Edwin Drood, The. F. M. Pope	71
Romance of the Bedford Estate, The. E. B. Chancellor	459
Royal Society's Conversazione, The	650
Scotland on the Equator. F. G. Aflalo	498
Self-Sacrifices of Travel, The. Douglas Goldring	166
Some Futurist Jokes	783
Some Magazines and Serials	435
Some New French Books. M. Logé	115, 339, 468, 685
Some New French Plays. M. Logé	85, 308, 495, 651
Some Reflections on the Twentieth-Century Renaissance. S. A.-Bartlett	403, 427
Splendid Tarpon, The. F. G. Aflalo	524
Spring Books, The	293
Stories of F. W. Bain, The. F. H. D.	710
Streams of the Welsh Border. F. G. A.	432
Study of Surnames, The. Professor E. Weekley	434
"Sunny Spain"	727
Surreptitious Snapshots. F. G. Aflalo	3
Tarpon Again. F. G. A.	588
Then and Now. F. G. Aflalo	716
Thirty Years of Accomplishment. Egan Mew	817
True Essayist, The. W. L. R.	132
Tyranny of Games, The	20
Ulster Man, The	553
Unbeaten Tracks: Trinidad. A. E. Carey	147
Unbeaten Tracks: La Brea. A. E. Carey	239
Unbeaten Tracks: The West Indian Islands. A. E. Carey	306
Unbeaten Tracks: La Guaira. A. E. Carey	325
Unbeaten Tracks: Caracas. A. E. Carey	499, 528
United States Justly Viewed, The. Cosmo Hamilton	785
University of London, The. G. T. L.	197

Valley of the Shadow, The. F. C. M.	121
Veto of Canada, The	746
Waiting Crowds, The. W. L. R.	484
Wild Beasts Seen From a Train. F. G. Aflalo	461
Women at the Roulette Table. Cecil Cowper	581
World Republic, The. W. L. R.	616
Writing as a Trade	357

BOOKS RECEIVED.

Page 32, 64, 96, 128, 160, 192, 224, 255, 288, 320, 352, 383, 416, 448, 480, 512, 544, 576, 608, 640, 672, 704, 736, 776, 808, 840.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Abdiel or Copernicus?	447
America and Mexico	807
Appeal, An	544
Authorship Wanted	576
Baskish in Mexico	702, 840
Basque Language, The	776
Beowulf and Virgil	224
Birgavs or Birgilivs	608
Board of Education and Tenure Clauses in Schemes of Secondary Schools, The	320
Braille Books	479
Camorra, The	488
Case for the Worker, The	542
Chesterton's "Magic"	192
Children and Holidays	807
Children's Country Holidays Fund	479, 575
Congratulations	776
Dictionaries as Helpers	350, 382, 574
Education Controversy	352
England for the English	511
English Idiomatic Expressions Done Into German	807
Federation of Europe, The	671
Free Trade or Fair Trade	223
French Poetry	31
"Glums and Gawrys, or Men and Women that Fly"	286
Golden Book of English Sonnets, The	32
Greatest Bar to Human Progress, The	159
Imperial Federation	190, 478, 543, 734
Institute of Inventors, The	448
Jottings for the Word-Books	192, 352, 446, 608, 774
Lady Frances Pennoyer	416
Langue Etrusque, La	222
Longest Sentence, The	671
Madame D'Arblay, Edward, and The Ring	254
Mexico City	703, 735
Middle Course in Spelling Reform, The	128
Musical Awakening in Russia, The	352
Musical Criticism	31, 64, 96, 192
New Sonnets by Keats... ..	735
Orange Free State	64
Painters of Animals, Animal Painters, and Other Matters	158
Premature Burial: A Real Peril	416, 480, 511
Prettiest Village, The	807
Psychical Research and Survival	288
Quintets	31
Referendum!	480
Reply, A	735
Samuel Gardiner in the Dictionary of National Biography	415
Scott and Lytton	160
Spanish Professor's Tribute to Eng- lish, A	191
Study of Surnames, The	576
Surreptitious Snapshots	64
Telagony	704
Traffic in Advowsons	160
Translator of the Iliad and the Æneid, A	160

Ulster: A Soldier's View	253
U.S.A. and Mexico, The	576
Waterlogged	287
Works of Joseph Addison, The	735
W. R. Bowles on the "Catalog" of the British Museum	415
Wrong Spirit, The	775

FINANCE.

Pages 30, 62, 95, 126, 157, 189, 221, 252, 284, 318, 348, 381, 414, 445, 477, 510, 541, 573, 606, 639, 670, 700, 733, 772, 804, 838.
--

IMPERIAL AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

By LANCELOT LAWTON.

Alliance or Entente?	411
Awakening of Japan, The	378
Crisis in the Near East, The	802
Decade of World Progress, A	154
Famine in Japan, The	28
Grave Crisis in China, The	635
Intrusion of Mr. Lloyd George, The	60
Irish Question in International Poli- tics, The	442
Japan's Monopoly of Publicity	474
Mexican Crisis, The	282
Naval Armaments—The Dawn of Reason	219
New Russia, The	507
Peace in Albania	666
Plight of Japan, The	124
Policy of President Wilson, The	538
Political Crisis in France, The	769
Political Developments in Russia	250
Power of the Press for Evil, The	315
Problem of Empire, The	186
Reaffirmation of the Entente, The	604
Relations Between East and West, The	571
Relations Between Russia and Ger- many, The	346
Reply to M. Clemenceau, A	92
Riddle of China, The	836
Russia and Great Britain in Persia	698, 730

LITERARY COMPETITIONS.

Pages 337, 380, 409, 443, 476, 506, 535, 570, 602, 638, 669, 697, 730.
--

LITERARY SUPPLEMENT.

June 13, 1914.

See pages 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760.

MOTORING.

Pages 29, 62, 94, 125, 156, 187, 251, 283, 317, 379, 413, 444, 475, 539, 605, 637, 668, 700, 732, 770, 803, 837.
--

MUSIC.

Pages 180, 209, 241, 271, 303, 338, 530, 628, 653, 727, 764, 796, 828.
--

NOTES AND NEWS.

Pages 60, 92, 123, 153, 185, 249, 281, 347, 410, 441, 471, 507, 534, 567, 603, 636, 728

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Pages 35, 67, 99, 131, 163, 195, 227, 259, 291, 323, 355, 387, 419, 451, 483, 515, 547, 579, 611, 643, 675, 707, 739, 779, 811
--

POETRY.

Ah! That White Heaven. F. Lang- bridge	388
--	-----

Along the Roads of France. W. Thorley	4
Aloofness. D. M. Stuart	613
Ambition. P. J. Fisher	36
Assuagement. W. Laird	100
Betrayal, The. Arundell Esdaile	452
Children. R. B. Ince	164
Cobwebs. Martin Armstrong	741
Communion. H. Fowler	292
Dreamer's Epitaph, A. G. M. Hort	132
Flight. Eva M. Martin	324
Flowering Cherry, The. Frederick Niven	676
Gift, The. A. Webb	100
Hint Within, The. Stéphen Phillips	260
In My Garden. Gwendolen Talbot	388
In the Valley. A. G. Herbertson	581
Jealous Mistress, A. A. De C. Patter- son	516
Late-Comer, The. G. M. Hort	549
Mist Arising. K. Balbernie	813
Possession. Grace Cracknall... ..	452
Return, The. Thomas Moulton	420
Rondeau. Wilfrid Thorley	740
"Say Not the Struggle Nought Availeth." A. F. G.	644
Sea-Sanct. Phil. J. Fisher... ..	452
Silent Watch, The. E. J. Glockler	549
To a Poet-Critic. J. H. Mackereth	484
Unforgotten. D. M. Stuart	196
Vesper. Ronald Lewis Carton	356
Via Dolorosa. Frederick Langbridge	260
"Vindicators" of Shakespeare, The. G. Greenwood, M.P.	420
Winter Hymn, A. J. H. Stables	164
Worship. Wilfrid Thorley.	228
Youth that is Free. Egan Mew	781

REVIEWS.

Abu'l Ala, the Syrian. H. Baerlein	268
Acharnians of Aristophanes, The. R. Y. Tyrrell	268
Adventures of Mr. Wellaby Johnson. O. Booth	762
Aids to the Immortality of Certain Persons in Ireland. Susan A. Mitchell	167
Amazing New York. Mary M. Brown	175
American Public Opinion. J. D. Whelpley	785
Among the Primitive Bakongo. John H. Weeks	204
Anatomy of Truth, The. F. H. Capron	591
Ancient Irish Epic Tale, The. J. Dunn	791
Anecdotes of Pulpit and Parish. Col- lected by A. H. Engelbach	626
An Enemy Hath Done This. Joseph Hocking	594
Animal Sculpture. Walter Winans... ..	396
Annals	16
Apostolic Religious Instruction. Dr. R. Craig	719
Architecture. Mrs. A. Bell	396
Art and Common Sense. R. Cortis- soz	750
Athenian Empire and the Great Il- lusion, The. E. M. W. Tillyard	657
Aurora. G. de St. Ouen	456
Austrian Officer at Work and at Play, The. D. Gerard	47
Baba and the Black Sheep. E. W. Savi	762
Babylonian-Assyrian Birth-Omens and Their Cultural Significance. Morris Jastrow, Junr.	761
"Bacchae" of Euripides, The. Trans- lated by F. A. Evelyn	461
Ballad of Men, and Other Verses, A. W. Blane	456
Bamboula	366
Bar, Bat, and Bit. Hon. Sir E. C. Leigh	44

Bayreuth Letters of R. Wagner, The	108
Beasts, Birds, and Bees of Virgil, The. T. F. Royds ...	561
Behind the Veil. G. R. Sims...	269
Belle Nairn. Roy Meldrum ...	431
Black Peril, The. G. W. Hardy ...	690
Blake's Burden. Harold Bindloss ...	627
Blush-Rose. Adapted by E. A. Vize- telly ...	237
Bohn's Popular Library ...	486
Bonds of Society, The. John Suther- land ...	826
Book About Authors, A. A. R. Hope Moncrieff ...	760
Book-keeping in Verse. W. H. Arch Bridge, The. Mark Somers ...	167
British Trees and How to Name Them. F. Robson ...	370
Buddhist Ideals. K. J. Saunders ...	562
Buddhist Scriptures. E. J. Thomas ...	330
Business of a Gentleman, The ...	15
Caillaux Drama, The. J. N. Raphael ...	462
Can We Still Be Christians? Rudolf Eucken ...	756
Capitals of the North Lands: Tales of Ten Cities. I. C. Hannah ...	689
Carmen and Mr. Dry-As-Dust. H. Jordan ...	263
Cavour, and The Making of Modern Italy ...	691
Celebrated Madame Campan, The. V. M. Montagu ...	558
C. F. Meyer. R. d'Harcourt...	751
Chance. Joseph Conrad ...	592
Chantilly, in History and in Art. L. M. Richter ...	145
Chats on Old Coins. F. W. Burgess ...	437
Chignett Street. B. P. Neuman ...	332
Children of the Hills. Dermot O'Byrne ...	658
Child Went Forth, A. Yoi Pawlowska ...	493
China Collector, The. H. W. Lewer ...	795
Christianity and Sin. R. Mackintosh ...	118
Church Quarterly, The ...	13
Church Revival, The. S. Baring- Gould ...	268
Cinderella's Sisters. Florence Scan- nell ...	393
Clive. Macaulay ...	657
Club Makers and Club Members. T. H. S. Escott ...	366
Cobbles Gentleman, Limited. A. Somers ...	425
Cockney at Home, The. Edwin Pugh ...	48
Coleridge and Wordsworth in the West Country. Professor W. Knight ...	208
Collected Poems. Newman Howard ...	170
Collected Poems. Norman Gale ...	327
Collected Poems of Margaret L. Woods ...	822
Colombine, a Fantasy. Reginald Arkell ...	327
Colour Books ...	200
Comic Kingdom, The. Rudolf Pick- thall ...	659
Concept of Consciousness, The. E. B. Holt ...	300
Condition of la Femme dans la Tradi- tion et l'Evolution de l'Islamisme. M. Fahmy ...	559
Conscience of a King, The. Paul Hookham ...	423
Considérations sur l'Art Dramatique à propos de la Comédie de Bernard Shaw. A. and H. Hamon ...	655
Contes de l'Heure Présente. M. Level and C. R. Dumas ...	206
Corner-Stone of Education, The. E. Lyttelton ...	367
Cornish Catches. Bernard Moore ...	754
Country, Month by Month, The. J. A. Owen and G. S. Boulger ...	561
Criminals, Witches, Lunatics. G. Ives ...	690
Crimson Honeymoon, The. Headon Hill ...	550
Crimson Mascot, The. Charles E. Pearce ...	302
Cromwell, and Other Poems. John Drinkwater ...	509
Curing Christopher. Mrs. H. Trem- lett ...	200
Custody of the Child, The. P. Gibbs ...	398

Czarevitch of the Eighteenth Century, A. V. E. M. de Vogüé ...	9
Day of Days, The. L. J. Vance ...	563
Death of a Nobody, The. Jules Romain ...	763
Debrett's House of Commons and the Judicial Bench ...	368
Decoy, The. Countess of Cromartie ...	369
Desmond O'Connor. G. H. Jessop ...	595
Dickens Pilgrimage, A... ..	429
Dignity of Business, The. H. E. Morgan ...	296
Dislikes: Some Modern Satires. Charles Masefield ...	167
Dorothea of Romsey Marsh. A Cun- ninghame ...	370
Down in Devon. Uncle Tom Cobleigh ...	425
Dramatic Actualities. W. L. George ...	469
Dust from the Loom. E. Noble ...	113
Early Poems. M. A. ...	106
Early Weights and Measures of Man- kind. General Sir C. Warren ...	110
Echoes. A. L. H. Anderson ...	200
Ecuador: Its Ancient and Modern History. C. R. Enock ...	522
Edmund Burke und die Französische Revolution. F. Meusel ...	236
Education of Oliver Hyde, The. R. E. Salwey ...	431
Effect of Taxes on Food Stuffs, The. Bernard Dale ...	494
Eight of Diamonds, The. H. G. Hutchinson ...	369
Elizabeth and Mary Stuart. F. A. Mumby ...	361
Elusive Wife, The. R. Penley ...	81
Emprunts de la Bible Hébraïque au Grec et au Latin. Les. Maurice Vernes ...	761
End of Her Honeymoon, The. Mrs. Belloc Lowndes ...	397
England's Peasantry, and Other Essays. A. Jessopp, D.D. ...	686
English Idiomatic and Slang Expres- sions done into German. R. K. Torrens and H. Parker ...	686
English Soul, The. Jacque Vontade ...	719
Epochs of Civilisation. P. N. Bose ...	232
Esprit Classique et la Préciosité au XVIIe Siècle, L'. J. E. Fida- Justiniani ...	299
European Unity League, The. Sir Max Waechter ...	372
Excavations at Ain Shems. Duncan Mackenzie ...	234
Exceeding Pleasant. L. Oulton ...	49
Exercises for Women. Florence Bolton ...	658
Faith and Reality. J. H. Stowell ...	13
Father O'Flynn. H. de V. Stacpoole ...	398
Fellowship Books, The... ..	500
First Book of English History, A. F. J. C. Hearnshaw ...	526
First Steps in Collecting, The. Mrs. G. M. Vallois ...	119
Five Plays. Lord Dunsany ...	360
Florilegio di Canti Toscani ...	523
Flowers from a Poet's Garden. J. H. Carpenter ...	106
Flying Inn, The. G. K. Chesterton ...	177
Foundations of International Polity, The. N. Angell ...	333
Foundations of Religion, The. Stanley Cook ...	492
Francisco Goya. H. Stokes ...	79
Freedom of Science, The. Joseph Donat ...	654
Freedom of the Press in Egypt, The K. Mikhail ...	722
Fresh Voyages on Unfrequented Waters. Rev. T. K. Cheyne ...	688
Friendly Road, The. David Gray- son ...	137
Friends of the Riverside. R. E. Green ...	143
Frivole. Kate Horn ...	430
From Locke to Montessori. Wm. Boyd ...	488
From the Porch. Lady Ritchie ...	109
Future of the Woman's Movement, The. H. M. Swanwick ...	72
5000 Miles with the Cheshire Ye- omanry in South Africa. J. H. Cooke ...	526

Gabriel Harvey's Marginalia. Col- lected and Edited by G. C. Moore Smith ...	233
Garden of Dreams, The. H. G. Richards ...	463
Gates of Doom, The. Rafael Sabatini... ..	431
Geography of British West Africa. Rev. G. Patterson ...	460
George Wyndham. C. Boyd ...	48
German Invasion, A. Henry Sewill ...	363
German Lyric, The. John Lees ...	761
Getreide im alten Babylonien, Das. F. Hrozny ...	793
Gilbert Ray. E. Hughes-Gibb ...	495
Gillespie. J. M. Hay ...	270
Girl's Marriage, A. A. G. Lennox... ..	659
God's Own Country. C. E. Jacomb ...	365
Golden Bough, The. J. G. Frazer... ..	55
Golden Heresy, The. Max Plowman ...	487
Governance of England, The. Sid- ney Low... ..	335
Grammar of Late Modern English. H. Poutsma ...	721
Great Attempt, The. F. Arthur ...	269
Great Days. F. Harris ...	15
Greatest House at Chelsea, The. Randell Davies ...	172
Hail and Farewell: Vale. George Moore ...	623
Hands Up! F. Niven... ..	49
Handy Guide to Jewish Coins, A. Rev. E. Rogers ...	594
Handy Newspaper List... ..	144
Happy Hunting Ground, The. A. Perrin ...	370
Harmsworth Popular Science. Edited by Arthur Mee ...	173
Hector Berlioz (1803-1869). J. G. Prod'homme ...	138
Heart of the Moor, The. Beatrice Chase ...	425
Henry James: A Critical Study. Ford Madox Hueffer... ..	133
Heroes of Exploration. A. J. Ker and C. H. Cleaver ...	367
Heroines of European History. A. R. H. Moncrieff ...	367
Highways to Happiness, R. Le Gal- lienne ...	624
Histoire Ancienne de l'Afrique du Nord. I. Stéphane Gsell ...	169
Histoire des Arabes. II. Cl. Huart ...	172
Historical Christ, The. Dr. F. C. Conybeare ...	719
History of Rome, A. A. F. Giles ...	492
History of the Nations ...	206, 268
Honoré de Balzac. M. F. Sanders... ..	397
Horoscope, The. John Law... ..	208
House of Cecil, The. C. R. Dennis ...	334
How to Enter the Civil Service. E. A. Carr... ..	140
Hunting and Hunted in the Belgian Congo. R. D. Cooper ...	746
Idylls of a Dutch Village. S. Ulfers ...	461
Impressions of British Life and Character. Ichalkaranji ...	719
India of To-Day. E. C. Meysey- Thompson, M.P. ...	141
In Far New Guinea. Henry Newton ...	298
Influence of Pater and Matthew Arnold in the Prose Writings of Oscar Wilde, The. Ernst Bendz ...	493
In Nature's Ways ...	794
Inner Life of the Royal Academy, The. G. D. Leslie, R.A. ...	755
Inspiration in Men, Books, and Movements. G. C. Martin... ..	13
Interpretations and Forecasts. Victor Branford ...	490
Intimate Letters of Hester Piozzi and Penelope Pennington, The ...	76
Introduction à l'Histoire des Re- ligions. René Dussaud ...	752
Irish History for Young Readers. Rev. H. K. Moore ...	526
Irishmen All. G. A. Birmingham ...	17
Irish Plays and Playwrights. Cor- nelius Weygandt ...	139
Irish Question, The. Sir Horace Plunkett ...	626

Iron Passport, The. M. S. Shottland	595
It was the Time of Roses. Dolf Wyllarde	399
It Will be All Right. Tom Gallon	371
Jacob Elthorne. Darrell Figgis	177
Jill-All-Alone. "Rita"	691
Joan's Green Year. E. L. Doon	81
John Millington Synge and the Irish Theatre. Maurice Bourgeois	139
Johnnie Maddison. John Haslette	795
Johnson's Life of Dryden. Edited by A. J. F. Collins	429
John Woolman. W. T. Shore	107
Judaism and St. Paul. C. G. Montefiore	719
Judgment of Eve, The. May Sinclair	526
Julia and I in Canada... ..	16
Justice of the Peace. F. Niven	722
Katya. Franz de Jessen	208
Kicks and Ha'pence. Henry Stace	494
King of Alsander, The. J. E. Flecker... ..	431
Kismet. Edward Knoblauch... ..	343
Lady of Leisure, A. E. Sidgwick... ..	237
Land and the People, The	207
Land of the Lotus, The. J. M. Graham... ..	722
Land Problem	331
Later Poems. E. Hickey	106
Laws of Health for Schools. A. M. Malcolmson	15
Lectures on the Relations between Law and Public Opinion in England. A. V. Dicey	823
Leentas. E. J. C. Stevens	595
Life of Admiral Sir Charles Saunders, The. E. Salmon	790
Life of Muhammad. Rev. Canon Sell	330
Life of the Emperor Francis Joseph. F. Gribble	266
Life of the Rev. T. B. Stephenson, The. W. Bradfield	42
Life of the Rt. Hon. John Edward Ellis, M.P. A. T. Barrett... ..	585
Limelight. Horace Wyndham	237
Lismoye. B. M. Croker	691
List of Annual Subscriptions	144
Literary Year Book, The.	112
Little French Classics	301
Little Radiant Girl, A. Katharine Tynan	657
Living Chalice, The. S. L. Mitchell	391
Loadstone, The. V. M. Methley	595
Log of a Snob, The. C. F. Westerman	527
Lonely Dancer, The. R. Le Gallienne	200
Lord Roberts' Campaign Speeches... ..	75
Lost Parchment, The. Fergus Hume	627
Lost Road, The. R. H. Davis	209
Lost Tribes, The. G. A. Birmingham	594
Louis Norbert. Vernon Lee	827
Love the Harper. E. C. Haydon	463
Luther and the Reformation. L. D. Agate	492
Lyrical Poems. Thomas MacDonagh	200
Lyrics and Poems. E. Rutter-Leatham	456
Macaulay's History of England	460
Macdonald of the Isles. A. M. W. Stirling... ..	21
Madge Linsey, and Other Poems. D. S. Shorter	456
Magenta Minutes. Sandys Wason	167
Making of an Englishman, The. W. L. George	178
Making of a Soul, The. K. Rhodes	526
Making of Musicians, The. T. H. Y. Trotter	689
Man's Miracle. G. Harry	367
Manual of Psychology, A. G. F. Stout	78
Marama. R. Stock	80
Marriage Tie, The. W. Sherren	763
Mary's Marriage. E. Bosanquet	81
Masonic Papers. J. J. Modi	112
Master of Merripit, The. Eden Phillpotts	146

Matthew Hargraves. S. G. Tallentyre	509
Matthew William Peters, R.A. Lady Victoria Manners	295
Meaning of the Doctrine of the Communion of Saints. Rev. J. Vawdrey	719
Meaning of Truth in History. Viscount Haldane... ..	760
Melting Pot, The. Israel Zangwill... ..	217
Memories of a Musician. W. Ganz... ..	46
Memories of John Westlake	721
Men and Women of the Italian Reformation. Christopher Hare	590
Mending of Life, The. Richard Rolle	143
Meriel's Career. M. B. Whiting	657
Militarism. An Appeal to the Man-in-the-Street	75
Millers of Haddington, The. W. J. Couper	656
Minotaur of Capri, The. A. T. Ellis	403
Mistress Charity Godolphin. G. Murdoch	562
Mittelenglische Versroman über Richard Löwenherz. Karl Brunner	202
Modern Chesterfield, The. Edited by Max Rittenberg	761
Money Hunt, The. K. Parkes	658
Moods of the Inner Voice. J. H. Twells, Jun.	391
More About Collecting. Sir James Yoxall	118
More Rhodesian Rhymes. C. Gouldsbury	391
Motor Tour Through Canada, A. T. W. Wilby	77
Mrs. Vanderstein's Jewels. Mrs. C. Bryce	795
My Bohemian Days in Paris. J. M. Price	73
My Days of Adventure. E. A. Vizetelly... ..	394
My First Years as a Frenchwoman. M. K. Waddington	718
My Friend is Dead. Emery Pottle... ..	624
My Recollections and Reflections. Y. Markino	47
Mysticism of William Law, The. Rev. S. H. Gem	826
Napoleon in Exile: Elba. N. Young	792
Nature and First Principle of Taxation, The. Robert Jones	203
Nature's Interviews. Muriel E. George	200
New Editions	582
New Punto Tagliato Embroidery Supplement, The. L. and R. Tebbs	175
New Schoolmaster, The. "Fourth Form"	175
Notable Women in History. W. J. Abbot	396
Noted Murder Mysteries. Philip Curtin	267
Notes of a Son and Brother. Henry James	359
Occult Arts, The. J. W. Frings	104
Odd Numbers. R. Calignoc	391
Oh! Mr. Bidgood. Peter Blundell	431
Old English Costumes	245
Old Magdalen Days, 1847-1877. A. Former Chorister	269
Old Transport Road, The. S. P. Hyat	426
Old Wood-Carver, The. Sir H. von Herkomer	206
Ombres Françaises et Visions Anglaises. Comte d'Haussonville	135
On the Left of a Throne. Mrs. E. Nepean	521
Orange Girl of Venice, The.	52
Ouida: A Memoir. Elizabeth Lee	424
Our Schools and the Bible. Hon. H. Coke	657
Our Task in India. B. Lucas	368
Outline Lecture on Herod's Temple of the New Testament. W. S. Caldecott	525
Overlanders, The. Will Ogilvie	391
Ovid and the Renaissance in Spain. R. Schevill	236

Paix Armée et le Problème d'Alsace... ..	687
Papers of the American Society of Church History	13
Passages for French Dictation. D. A. W. Willson	366
Passing of War, The. Canon W. L. Grane	794
Paul Verlaine. Wilfrid Thorley	205
Pennell of the Afghan Frontier. Alice M. Pennell	231
People's Books, The	487, 659
Perilous Seas. E. G. Robin	527
Philosophy of Giambattista Vico, The. B. Croce	74
Phoebe Maroon. M. F. Raphael	399
Piers Plowman Histories. E. H. Spalding and P. Wragge	301
Place-Names of Gloucestershire. W. St. Clair Baddeley	264
Place of the Reign of Edward II in English History. J. F. Tout	756
Play of the Future, The. Sydney Grundy	211
Plays of Tolstoy, The. Translated by L. and A. Maude	519
Poems and Miscellaneous Verse. J. W. Thatcher	106
Poems of François Villon, The	41
Poems of Sir Thomas Wyatt. A. K. Foxwell	232
Poems: with Ballads of Old Birmingham. E. M. Rudland	561
Poets' Symphony. Arranged by G. H. Wollaston	327
Pomm's Daughter. Claire de Pratz	403
Possessed, The. Fyodor Dostoevsky	238
Pot-Pourri Mixed by Two. C. W. Earle and E. Case	562
Pot-Pourri Parisien. E. B. Parsons	269
Poverty and Waste. H. Withers	793
Power of the Duchess, The. Edward Quarter	146
Prêtres Danseurs de Rome, Les. René Cirilli	300
Priceless Thing, The. M. S. Rawson	627
Price of Conquest, The. E. A. Smith	146
Princes of the Stock Exchange, The. N. Danchenko	398
Principles of Property. J. B. Kinnear	371
Prinz Friedrich von Homburg. H. v. Kleist	307
Private Affairs. C. McEvoy	827
Problem of the Continuation School, The. R. H. Best and C. K. Ogden	489
Problems of Empire: The Faith of a Federalist. Viscount Hythe	171
Progress of Education in India. H. Sharp	593
Psychical Research and Survival. James H. Hyslop	144
Purple Mists, The. F. E. Mills-Young	370
Quakers: Past and Present, The. D. M. Richardson	525
Queen" Newspaper Book of Travel, "The	562
Queens of Aragon, The. E. L. Miron	45
Quest of the Dream, The. E. K. Wallis	16
Quest of the Holy Grail, The. J. L. Weston	76
Quick Action. R. W. Chambers	763
Quinneys'. H. A. Vachell	827
Ragged Trousered Philanthropists, The. R. Tressall	656
Ransom for London, The. J. S. Fletcher	302
Real Mexico, The. H. Hamilton	458
Rebellion. J. M. Patterson	763
Régner: Poèmes. Leon Deubel	175
Religion of the Sikhs, The. Dorothy Field	656
Religious Ideas of the Old Testament, The. H. W. Robinson	13
Remarkable Women of France. Lt.-Col. A. C. P. Haggard	455
Reminiscent Gossip of Men and Matters. James Baker	138
Report of a Zoological Mission to India in 1913. Capt. S. S. Flower	721

Rig-Veda and Vedic Religion, The. Rev. A. C. Clayton 330	Splinters. Anonymous 563	Year-Book of the Universities of the Empire, 1914, The. 429
Road to the Open, The. A. Schnitzler ... 16	Split Peas, The. Headon Hill 302	Zang Tumb Tumb, Adrianopoli. F. T. Marinetti 783
Romance of Bible Chronology, The. M. Anstey 328	Spring. W. B. Thomas and A. K. Collett 690
Romance of Names, The. Ernest Weekley 364	Stories of India, Moral, Mystical, Spiritual and Romantic. Rose Reinhardt Anthon 176
Romance of Tristan and Iseult, The ... 81	Story of Pet Marjorie, The. L. Macbean 689
Rose Windows. R. V. Heckscher... 106	Strong Heart, The. A. R. Goring- Thomas 462
Roswitha. Otto Ernst 206	Studies in Modernism. A. Fawkes ... 13
Rough Hewers. A. L. Neild 80	Style Louis XVI, Mobilier et Déco- ration, Le. S. de Ricci 45
Round the World in a Motor Car. J. J. Mann 762	Summer in Cornwall, A. M. E. Curtois 15
Rubáiyát of a Minor Statesman. G. W. Sparrow 167	Sunrise Valley. Marion Hill 723
Russian Novel, The. V. E. M. de Vogüé 11	Table Mountain. A. Vine Hall 561
Russian Opera, The. Rosa New- march 823	Tania. Meriel Buchanan 494
Saga of King Lir, The. G. Sigerson ... 456	Ten-Minute Stories. A. Blackwood ... 336
St. Margaret's, Westminster. Canon H. F. Westlake 720	Test Papers in Elementary Algebra. C. V. Durell 301
Salad Days 336	Theodore Roosevelt 8, 40
Sa Muse s'Amuse. Wilfrid Blair ... 167	There Was a Door 462
Sand and Spinifex. A Wanderer 22	Thing in the Wood, The. M. Wil- liams 81
Schoolmaster, The. A. C. Benson ... 526	Three Trees, The. Guy Rawlence... 207
Schools and Social Reform, The. S. J. G. Hoare 489	Through Jubaland to the Lorian Swamps. T. N. Dracopoll 142
Schopenhauer. M. Beer 492	Through the Torii. Yone Noguchi ... 320
Science and Method. H. Poincaré... 591	Tiger. Witter Bynner 687
Scientific Proofs of Another Life. R. Levere 43	Time's Hour Glass. A. E. Carey... 238
Scottish Stories. R. B. Cunning- hame Graham 795	Tower of the Mirrors, The. Vernon Lee 559
Sea Anthology, A. Selected by Alfred Rawlings 200	Training of a Working Boy, The. Rev. H. S. Pelham 826
Seaborne of the Bonnet Shop. R. K. Weekes 270	Trend, The. Wm. Arkwright 495
Seaside Wonders. S. N. Sedgwick ... 625	Trial of John Jasper. J. W. T. Ley ... 368
Second Nature. John Travers 723	Twenty-five Years. K. Tynan 12
Secret Doctrine of Israel, The. A. T. Waite 112	Twin Soul of O'Také San, The. Baroness A. d'Anethan 337
Secret of Charlotte Brontë, The. F. Macdonald 622	Ulsterman, The. F. Frankfort Moore ... 430
Sentiment. V. O'Sullivan 49	Ulster Scot, The. Rev. J. B. Wood- burn 553
Sermons on the Blessed Sacrament. J. M. Neale 719	Unfinished Song, An. Mrs. Ghosal ... 336
Shadows of the Past. John Littlejohn ... 627	Unfolding of Personality as the Chief Aim in Education, The. H. C. Mack 296
Shakespeare Personally. Professor Masson 654	Useful Hints 625
Shakespeare: The Man and His Work. Morton Luce 168	Value of the Theology of St. Paul for Modern Thought. Rev. Dr. Andrews 719
Sheep Track, The. N. H. Webster ... 563	Vaudevillians, The. 113
Shepherdless Sheep. Essex Smith ... 430	Vices in Virtues, and Other Vagaries ... 78
Short Account of Great Malvern Priory Church. Rev. A. C. Deane ... 335	Village Silhouettes. C. L. Marson ... 395
Short History of Feudalism in Scot- land, A. H. B. King 794	Villages of the White Horse. Alfred Williams 136
Silent Captain, The. May Wynne... 659	Vital Problems of Religion. Rev. J. R. Cohu 625
Small Souls. L. Cooperus 336	War of Steel and Gold, The. H. N. Brailsford 825
Snakes of Europe, The. G. A. Boulenger 110	Waters of Lethe, The. Dorothea Gerard 178
Social Innocent, A. R. St. John Colthurst 49	Waves of Sand and Snow, and the Eddies Which Make Them. Vaughan Cornish 176
Social Reform, as related to Real- ities and Delusions. W. H. Mal- lock 792	Wayfarer's Library, The 487, 723
Some Counsels of S. Vincent de Paul. Translated by E. K. San- ders 301	Wayside Poems, and A Modern Mag- dalene. E. J. R. Atkinson 456
Some Plain Words to the English People. A. Bennet 429	Week-End Gardener, The. F. H. Farthing... .. 461
Some Principles of Spiritual Healing Rev. H. Lane 365	Wellesley Papers, The 454
Songs of Aphrodite, and Other Poems. Margaret Sackville ... 327	Western Rebellion of 1549, The. Frances Rose Troup 235
Sonnets from the Trophies of José- Maria de Hérédia. Translated by E. R. Taylor 236	What Federation is Not. F. S. Oliver 493
Sonnets of Shakespeare, The. Countess of Chambrun 362	What is Education? S. Leathes... 296
Sophocles in English Verse. A. S. Way 461	Where No Fear Was. A. C. Benson ... 520
South Africa, 1846-1913. A. W. Tilby ... 560	Wild Flowers. M. Skene 625
South Sea Shipmates. J. A. Barry ... 302	Wild Harp. Katharine Tynan 327
Spirit of Japanese Poetry, The. Yone Noguchi 759	Willing's Press Guide... .. 112
Spiritual Director and Physician. Rev. Fr. V. Raymond 681	Winter in India, A. A. B. Spens... 14
Spiritual Healing 113	With the Russians in Mongolia. H. G. C. Peary-Ayscough and Capt. Otter-Barry 265
Splendrum. L. Bashford 113	Woman and Crime. H. L. Adam... 562
	Woman's Reliquary, A. 456
	Women Workers in Seven Profes- sions. Edited by E. J. Morley ... 626 World Set Free, The. H. G. Wells ... 616

THEATRE.

"Account Rendered" at the Little Theatre 564
"Alice in Wonderland" at the Comedy Theatre 26
Arnold Bennett's Little Play at the Palace, Mr. 277
"Attack" at the St. James's Theatre, "The 56
"Babes in the Wood" at the Ly- ceum Theatre 23
Belle of Bond Street," at the Adelphi Theatre, "The 767
Bradfield Play, The 831
"Break the Walls Down" at the Savoy Theatre 662
"Brer Rabbit and Mr. Fox" at the Little Theatre 565
"Broadway Jones" at the Prince of Wales's Theatre 215
Bucket Shop" at the Aldwych Theatre, "The 470
"Charley's Aunt" at the Prince of Wales's Theatre 58
Cinema Star" at the Shaftesbury Theatre, "The 766
Clever Ones" at Wyndham's Theatre, "The 598
Cockyolly Bird" at the Court Theatre, "The 57
Dangerous Age" at the Vaudeville Theatre, "The 599
Darling of the Gods" at His Majesty's Theatre, "The 122
Daughters of Ishmael" at King's Hall, "The 342
"Dido and Æneas" at the Amba- sadors' Theatre 726
Drama Society at the Rehearsal Theatre, The 216
Duke of Killicrankie" at The Play- house, "The 766
"Dusk" at the Little Theatre... .. 564
Enchanted Garden" at the Court Theatre, "The 26
Eugène Brieux's "Les Avariés" in English, M. 276
Ever Open Door" at the Aldwych, "The 406
Fairy Doll" at the Court Theatre, "The 26
"Follow the Girl" at the Gaiety Theatre 242
Great Gamble" at the Haymarket Theatre, "The 693
"Grumpy" at the New Theatre ... 661
H. B. Irving at the Palace Theatre ... 184
"Helen with the High Hand" at the Vaudeville Theatre 244
"Hullo Tango!" at the Hippodrome ... 152, 694
Ideal Husband" at the St. James's Theatre, "An 661
Incorporated Stage Society at the Haymarket Theatre, The 244
Indian Summer" at the Prince of Wales's Theatre, "An 797
Irish Players at the Court Theatre, The 767, 799
Joy-Ride Lady" at the New Theatre, "The 275
"Kismet" at the Globe Theatre ... 375
Land of Promise" at the Duke of York's Theatre, "The 311
Little Lamb" at the Apollo Theatre, "The 726
Little Theatre, The 184
"Mam'selle Tralala" at the Lyric Theatre... .. 532

Many Plays in a Little Space... .. 406	"Peter Pan" at the Duke of York's Theatre... .. 56	Shepherdess without a Heart" at the Globe Theatre, "The... .. 24
Marriage of Kitty" at the Playhouse. "The 405	Pioneer Players, The 831	Sleeping Beauty Re-awakened," at Drury Lane Theatre, "The... .. 23
"Marusa" at the Prince of Wales's Theatre 58	"Plaster Saints" at the Comedy Theatre... .. 693	Social Success" at the St. James's Theatre, "A 405
"Mary-Girl" at the Vaudeville Theatre... .. 88	Play Actors Society at the Court Theatre, The 151	Souvenirs of Browning at the Arts Centre 629
Midsummer Night's Dream" at the Savoy Theatre, "A 214	Poor Little Rich Girl" at the New Theatre, "The... .. 24	Tentative Performances 564
Mob," "The. Miss Horniman's Season at the Coronet Theatre ... 533	"Potash and Perlmutter" at the Queen's Theatre 599	"Thank Your Ladyship" at the Playhouse 243
Mr. James Welch Returns 798	Proposal for the Stratford Festival ... 660	Two New Plays at the Royalty Theatre 312
Mr. Walker Whiteside at the Queen's Theatre... .. 217	"Pygmalion" at His Majesty's Theatre... .. 504	Two Virtues " at the St. James's Theatre, "The 341
"Mr. Wu" at the Strand Theatre ... 727	Queen's Champion" at the Aldwych Theatre, "The 183	Tyranny of Tears" at the Comedy Theatre, "The 215
Music-Cure" at the Little Theatre, "The 183	Rest Cure" at the Vaudeville Theatre, "The 376	"Uncle Vanya" by the Incorporated Stage Society 662
"My Lady's Dress" at the Royalty Theatre... .. 531	Retrospective Revue at the Little Theatre, A. 798	Variety at the Coliseum 152
One Thing Needful" at the Court Theatre, "The 438	Saison Nijinsky at the Palace Theatre 312	"Well-Made" Plays, the Old and the New 830
Pair of Silk Stockings" at the Criterion Theatre, "A 276	"Sealed Orders" at Drury Lane ... 405	"Where the Rainbow Ends" at the Garrick Theatre 57
Palace Theatre, The 630	Shakespeare Festival at Stratford-on-Avon, The 533, 565, 588	Wynmartens" at the Playhouse, "The 629
"Paphnutius" at the Savoy Theatre 88

THE ACADEMY

AND LITERATURE

No. 2174

[Registered as a
Newspaper.]

JANUARY 3, 1914

PRICE THREEPENCE

CONTENTS

	PAGE
Surreptitious Snapshots	3
Along the Roads of France	4
On Anthologies	4
Dartmoor Sketches.....	5
Reviews :
An American Aristides—I	8
More of the "Gardens of History"	9
From Pushkin to Tolstoy	11
Stories and Memories.....	12
Recent Theology	13
An Illustrating Tourist	14
Shorter Reviews	15
Fiction	15
Annuals	16

	PAGE
Some Realities of Irish Life	17
An Aspect Overlooked	19
The Tyranny of Games	20
The Great Clan Donald	21
Sand and Spinifex	22
The Theatre :
Some Christmas Nights' Entertainments	23
Many Matinées	25
The Paradise of the Levantine	27
Imperial and Foreign Affairs	28
Motoring	29
In the Temple of Mammon	30
Correspondence	31
Books Received	32

"ROYAL YORK" HOTEL, BRIGHTON

Supreme Comfort in a Warm and
Sheltered Position. Excellent Sea Views

SOME PRESS OPINIONS.

"To the Cuisine particular attention has been paid, and no expense spared, whilst the service is absolutely perfect."

"And in the Royal York you have the perfection of an English hotel and English cooking."

AND—

Colonel NEWNHAM DAVIS says:—"The Chef makes soup like a Frenchman, grills like an Englishman, and fries like an Italian."

Telegrams;
"Presto, Brighton."

Telephones: 206 Post Office, Brighton.
293 Brighton.

BY ROYAL WARRANT TO
HIS MAJESTY KING GEORGE V

WALPOLE BROS. LTD

IRISH LINEN MANUFACTURERS

89 & 91, NEW BOND STREET, W.

Sale of Irish Linens

PROCEEDING THROUGHOUT JANUARY.

WALPOLE BROS. supply Pure Irish Linens direct from their factories to the purchaser, and thus save all intermediate profits.

No. 868

SHAMROCK SCROLL
DESIGN.

Cloths.	Sale Price.
2 x 2 yds. ...	15/3 each
2 x 2 1/2 " ...	19 - "
2 x 3 " ...	22/6 "
2 1/2 x 2 1/2 " ...	24/6 "
2 1/2 x 3 " ...	29/6 "

Cloths.	Sale Price.
2 1/2 x 3 1/2 yds. ...	34/6 each
2 1/2 x 4 " ...	39/- "
NAPKINS.
Breakfast Size ...	22/6 d/2
Dinner Size ...	29/6 "

NEW YEAR GIFTS

By Appointment

WHITE HORSE WHISKY

In 3 bottle cases	13/6
" 6 " "	27/0
" 12 " "	54/0

Your Wine Merchant will despatch any of above cases, carriage paid, to any address in the United Kingdom.

BARGAINS IN BOOKS.—

Kipling's Complete Works, 25 vols., half calf, gilt, fine set, £12 12s.; Hamilton's Parodies, 6 vols., £2 10s.; Jesse's Historical Works, 30 vols., Nimmo, 1901, £7 17s. 6d.; Thackeray's Centenary Biographical Edition, 26 vols., £6 6s.; Barrington's Graham of Claverhouse, 30s. net, for 10s. 6d.; Purchas's Voyages, 20 vols., £9 9s., Glasgow, 1905; Slaters' Engravings and their Values, 1912, 18s.; Chaffer's Marks and Monograms on Pottery and Porcelain, 1912, 42s.; Baily's Magazines of Sports and Pastimes, 64 vols., £7 10s.; Grimm's Fairy Tales, large paper, illus. by Rackham, £2 2s.; Proc. Inst. Civil Engineers, 142 vols., cloth, £16 16s.; Pinkerton's Voyages and Travels, 17 vols., 1808, £5 10s.; Porter's Knights of Malta, 1858, 2 vols., £3 3s.; Burton's Arabian Nights, 17 vols., illustrated, £17 17s.; Gould's History Freemasonry, 3 thick vols., morocco binding, £2 2s., cost £6 6s.; James' Painters and Their Works, 3 vols., £3 3s.; Habershon Records of Old London, Vanished and Vanishing, coloured plates, folio, £2 2s.; Fea's Secret Chambers and Hiding Places, 7s. 6d., for 3s. 6d.; Oscar Wilde, by L. E. Ingelby, 12s. 6d., for 4s. 6d.; Ditchfield Vanishing England, 15s., for 6s. 6d.; Landon's Lhasa, 2 vols., new., 42s., for 14s.; Spenser's Faerie Queene, 2 vols., Cambridge University Press, £3 13s. 6d., for 32s. Will take any good books in exchange for above.—BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

MUSEUM LECTURES.

MR. BANISTER FLETCHER, F.R.I.B.A., author of "A History of Architecture on the Comparative Method," begins a course of University Extension lectures on ROMAN ARCHITECTURE at the BRITISH MUSEUM, on THURSDAY, 8th JANUARY, 4.30 p.m.

The course at the VICTORIA AND ALBERT MUSEUM which begins on MONDAY, 12th JANUARY, 5 p.m., includes eight lectures on English Renaissance, Elizabethan, Jacobean, and Georgian.

The lectures are illustrated by special lantern slides and models, and the Museum Exhibits are visited.—Full particulars from the Hon. Sec., 10, Woburn Square, London.

JOURNALISTIC and SECRETARIAL TRAINING FOR LADIES.—

Rapid systematic coaching. Special course in journalism. Excellent introductions given.—Telephone or write, THE TRIANGLE SECRETARIAL OFFICES, 61, South Molton Street, W.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss Messer, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

WHY PAY RENT? The City Life under its "IDEAL" policy plan enables Policyholders to reap the benefit of their investment DURING THEIR OWN LIFETIME, and in the event of premature death to leave their legal representative in possession of a comfortable house, free from any mortgage charge or encumbrance.

GOOD PROSPECTS FOR ACTIVE AGENTS. Send Postcard for Prospectus and Terms to THE CITY LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED, 6, PAUL ST., FINCHURCH, LONDON, E.C. M. GREGORY, Managing Director

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE AND ART
PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION: Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free.

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Offices of
THE ACADEMY, 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

To

Please send me THE ACADEMY for the next..... months.

I enclose remittance value.....

Name.....

Description.....

Address.....

THE ACADEMY

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post-free.

The EDITORIAL AND ADVERTISING OFFICE is at 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

Surreptitious Snapshots

BY F. G. AFLALO

IT was foretold, not a quarter of a century ago, that the hand camera had "come to stay," a phrase less hackneyed in the 'eighties than it is now and prophetic of enduring popularity. Since then, it has been applied indiscriminately to such various world-forces as ping-pong, Christian Science, the cinematograph, and Mrs. Pankhurst. Of these, the first soon went, and the last has hitherto been induced to stay nowhere, even in Holloway or on Ellis Island, long enough to satisfy those ungallant spirits who regard with a feeling of only qualified admiration this leader of Valkyrie in search of the Vote.

The hand camera, on the other hand, has abundantly justified the prediction, and indeed, owing to the rapid exposure, colloquially known as snapshot, of which it admits, its popularity is ever on the increase. Your true artist in either portraiture or landscape still favours the deliberate time exposure on a tripod. One or two plates are for him a good day's work, and he will dive a score of times beneath the focussing cloth until absolutely confident of his result. Though unreliable for the finest work, and incompatible with the use of larger plates, the hand camera tempts the amateur with advantages which he finds irresistible. In the matter of portability alone, it is to the older models as a violin to a double-bass; and, since it can be used with a tripod, or steadied on some makeshift support, it is not even debarred from making the occasionally unavoidable time-exposure.

An even greater attraction in the prying eyes of those who regard the proper study of mankind as woman, and preferably woman taken at a disadvantage, is that it is so inconspicuous, and its shutter is so rapidly set and so easily released, that the taking of surreptitious snapshots of celebrities, or of obscure folk interesting for other reasons, becomes an exciting sport, the unhallowed taste for which grows with occasion. This practice is becoming a nuisance of some gravity; and unless the growing army of them that "kodak" put a curb on their actinic exuberance, the police will be compelled to ask for powers similar to those enjoyed by their Cossack colleagues in the gloomy streets of Petersburg, where no camera can be used in public places without a permit and where a woman's features are, if she so decrees, as sacred from such impertinence as if they adorned the façade of a fortress.

There are, it is not to be denied, lands in which the rude activities of the amateur photographer matter little, where the natives are either indifferent, or able to take care of themselves. I hope, by the time that these lines are in print, to be pointing my camera at a primitive and scantily clad element of black humanity which will either face the lens or turn its back. Discretion precludes completeness of detail, but if I remark in passing that these ladies and gentlemen in equatorial social circles wear, like Gunga Din, it will readily be surmised that the aspect presented to the onlooker when they turn the other way is hardly such as would satisfy Mr. Sarony. Obviously, therefore, these untutored Africans have devised a simple but effectual means of frustrating the wiles of the too active photographer that is denied to their more elaborately tailored brothers and sisters. Young ladies splashing their way back to their bathing-machines, or struggling along the promenade in a gale that plays havoc with the hang of their draperies, can hardly turn back the way they came whenever some facetious tripper chooses to point his camera at them. True, they might baffle recognition by putting one hand before the face, as some of their political sisters do when arrested in a suffrage riot, but the devices for obtaining unsuspected exposures are so ingenious, that any such attempt at concealment is usually futile.

. . . nothing much before,

And a little less than 'alf of that behind. . .

This state of affairs is not as it should be. There was tenderness in the thought of Little Billy when he painted Trilby's foot on the studio wall, but there is only brutality in the eagerness with which, availing themselves of the eccentricities of foreshortening, perambulating cads with cameras snap the limbs and lineaments of defenceless maidens enjoying their morning bathe, and then consign their libels to the pictorial press. The encouragement of publicity for all and sundry is, indeed, fostered by the vulgar satisfaction which people of a sort appear to find in seeing their own presentment in half-tone. Is there, I wonder, any sign of the times much more saddening than the welcome given to the too frequent photographs of some race meeting or flower show, in which we are shown "Lady I—, and Friend." A press-photographer, whose word I have no reason to mistrust, assured me on one occasion that the "Friend" is not seldom a complete stranger to the leading lady of the picture, who contrives to obtrude himself at the moment of exposure. If this be true, there must actually be unhappy snobs who know the two-fold joy of appearing in print and being recorded in such exalted company. But, O, Iago! the pity of it, Iago!

Along the Roads of France

ALONG the roads of France

The lean polled aspens stand,
Each with a fellow-tree before
And one on either hand;

They march through rock, through sand,
Straight as an arrow's flight,
Unbending as the iron will
That wrought them in its might;

Staunch as his men in fight
The tall trees still abide.
Gone are the brave that bled for him,
And gone Napoleon's pride.

The ghosts of those that died,
They stand in disarray;
Their plumes, their stars, their epaulettes,
The wind has blown away.

For them no trumpets neigh
For slayers or for slain,
Only the unrelenting wind
Goads, and the rooks complain.

Over and over again
Poor maimed, what words do you say?
Like a stunned man that drones
Old prayers with wits a-stray.

WILFRID THORLEY.

On Anthologies

THIS is the age of dilettantism in literature. The snappers up of tasteful trifles have increased in number until now they form a "public" by themselves; and, in accordance with the natural order of things, purveyors have arisen to supply the triflers with their snippets. For the sentimental there are anthologies, in verse and prose, on love; for those of naturalist tendencies anthologies on gardens, flowers, the seasons, animals, birds, fishes; for the didactically inclined, assiduous hacks have compiled extracts on happiness, morals, motherhood, childhood, and many other worthy states and subjects. These are among the recently excrescent work of this new trade, but there are others of a more permanent and serious character which deserve more considered treatment. Cameos from the classics, "potted" editions of poets, and other volumes of extracts from the works of the giants of literature.

The members of the first group are negligible from a serious literary point of view, their principal value being that they afford a fair selection of wise saws and tuneful stanzas for autograph albums, Christmas cards, and such trivialities. The second group, however, merits the attention of those who consider literature as something more definite than a mere means of casual entertainment.

It is the custom with many who hold literature in sterner reverence than the majority to declare that anthologies generally are unworthy of a place in authentic letters: that they embody a retrogressive tendency. To do anything but admire such an attitude would be churlish, yet even those who share it must admit that the better anthologies deserve a place upon the most exclusive shelves. Palgrave's "Golden Treasury" had won well-merited esteem decades before the word anthology was to be seen on any publisher's list, and since the modern rage for this class of book started, literary connoisseurs of no mean attainments have found it not beneath their dignity and erudition to follow in Palgrave's steps. Mr. E. V. Lucas, though he saunters through literature with so light and airy a tread, has set the moderns an example in the art of graceful extract, his volumes of selections being compiled with that nice degree of taste and true discernment which always reflects the spirit of the originals. But examples in such matters are usually exceptions to a general rule of incompetence, and it is time that an effort were made to fix some kind of standard for aspiring anthologists.

The reader has a right to demand certain definite qualities and attainments in the compiler. Of these good taste, tinged with something like reverence, is of paramount importance. The anthologist must be sensitive to the original intention of his subject, he must be loyal to tradition, and seek in every way to preserve the original both in the letter and the spirit. Before beginning the work of extracting, say, lyrics from the mass of a poet's work, he should be intimately conversant with the life, intentions, and ideals of his author. He should subjugate his personal judgment and predilections to those of the poet.

This may, at first, seem to be an insistence upon the obvious, an unnecessary warning against unlikely errors of taste and judgment; yet no one who has perused anthologies in any number can deny that many of their compilers are guilty of such mistakes. As an instance may be mentioned a selection of the poems and lyrics of Burns, published two years ago in a style which is a credit to the publisher and creditable to the poet. This volume is edited by a fervent admirer of Burns, who undertook the work whole-heartedly and with evident intention to do justice to his favourite. He writes an introduction in a vein of warm enthusiasm, is in spirit loyal to the bard, yet he makes one error of judgment into which many anthologists fall. He has ventured to affix what he considers to be more appropriate titles to poems which have already been entitled by their author; and in justification he pleads that "a book of selections being in the nature of an anthology, in which all the contents are there upon their own individual merits as poetry, it seems right that each should have a title that carries some reference to its subject matter."

All that can be said for this argument is that it is put forward in all sincerity. For, on what ground other than their individual merits as poetry are any poems placed in a volume? That a poem is removed from the position in which its writer saw fit to insert it, can surely be no valid reason for changing its title. After all, the title is an essential part of a poem, and when an editor elects to convert "To Davie, a Brother Poet" into so laboured an antithesis as "The Riches of the Poor"; or the "Second Epistle to J. Lapraik" into "Poets for Ever!" it is not unlikely that most people will agree that he has, however pious his intentions, overstepped the line of right treatment. Still worse is the heading of "My love, she's but a lassie yet," with the repellant title of "A Bousing Catch." This volume has been selected haphazard, as affording an opportunity to show the limits of the rights and privileges of anthologists, and not because it errs more violently than many others.

What is perhaps the most glaring and insupportable instance of the lengths to which misguided editors may go is afforded by another volume of the poems of Burns, in which an American author, also a profound admirer of the Ayrshire bard, endeavoured, with lamentable results, to translate the vernacular poems into United States English. This, of course, is an extreme case, but the evil underlying it is to be observed in more or less violent form in many volumes of selections. While anthologies are in themselves harmless and even desirable contributions to the growing output of books, it behoves everyone seriously concerned with the dignity and purity of literature to protest against everything in the nature of irreverent tampering with the text and spirit of the sources from which they are drawn.

To lay down a hard and fast code of laws to govern the compilation of anthologies is neither advisable nor practicable. The question is in the hands of publishers, and, failing them, the reading public, guided, perhaps, by reviewers, whose laxity, by the way, is in no small measure responsible for the arrogant carelessness of offenders. Had they, the reviewers, taken a definite stand from the first against ill-considered efforts, instead of allowing such to slip unnoticed into the reading market, much might have been done to dam this source of pollution in the stream of letters.

A. H. D.

A long-needed journal on art and history, entitled Ancient Egypt, is about to be issued by Messrs. Macmillan for the British School in Egypt. It will be published quarterly, at the price of two shillings, and is supported by English and Continental writers. The abundant use of illustration will be a new departure in such subjects, the January number including over thirty pictures and a coloured plate. Professor Flinders Petrie, F.R.S., is the editor.

Dartmoor Sketches

MR. EDEN PHILLPOTTS, in "Folly and Fresh Air," observes that Dartmoor "commands admiration and conquers the most stubborn and the most ill-furnished with a gift for Nature-worship." No doubt this is generally true, but Herrick, who was neither stubborn nor ill-furnished, heartily disliked Devon. He could scarcely have expressed his abhorrence more poignantly than in the following lines:

Search worlds of ice, and rather there
Dwell, than in loathed Devonshire.

But Herrick, though an exquisite lyric poet, was simply neat and dainty in his singing. Nature to him was merely a pastoral background for many a pretty maid. He was joyous but superficial in his outlook. He was too worldly, too genial, too reminiscent of merry feasts in London Town to realise, even faintly, the great glamour of Dartmoor. Devonshire bored him, and especially the "warty incivility" of Dean Prior, because, for temperamental reasons, he was very far from being in tune with his surroundings. Rodin or Nietzsche might have felt the quickening pulse of the Moor and understood its forceful significance, but not the sentimental Herrick, who loved his "little buttery" and shared his affection for Mistress Prue with his pet dog and sparrow, goose, cat, and lamb.

Dartmoor does not yield up her secrets on first acquaintance, and the day excursionist is generally sent discomfited away. There is something sinister, cruel, malign, about the Moor, something essentially primitive, and it is worth noting that these very characteristics are conspicuous in "Wuthering Heights" and in the novels of Mr. John Trevena. The tors have faces, but they are the faces of strange gods whose smile is ironical. When they speak they shriek with the voice of the wind; when they gesticulate they wave their grey arms of mist; but it is when they simply stare and say nothing that they convey most to the solitary wayfarer. The silence of the Moor is ominous. Herrick could sing of daffodils without mentioning blood, of fair damsels without introducing sex problems, but he was left untouched by emotions that cried from the hilltops and sang haunting music in rushing waters, forces that were still linked with the touch of fire and ice in remote ages. Let the matter-of-fact tourist add padding to his thin legs and laugh, if he will, at the idea of a presence or presences brooding over or in the Moor. The true lover of Dartmoor, the man who returns to her ample breast over and over again, knows that there is a living glory and an abiding witchery about the land that inspires worship.

One is never quite able to shake off the almost forbidding beauty of the Dartmoor hills or to lose a certain awe for rocks that stand out boldly against the skyline. But the Moor has kinder moods when you get to know her well. One might even infer that she has a sense of humour, however grim, remembering a certain pile of rocks known as Laugh Tors. The winding road that leads into a valley where nestles a little village conveys homely impressions. When we hear the Dart singing over boulders, lying almost still in a deep pool, or rushing headlong in a cascade, to murmur faintly in a distant wood, a new spell is cast upon us. It is the spell of singing water, and those who know the course of the Dart from Cranmere Pool to the sea will not marvel at the wondrous magic of that song.

When, last November, we reached Ashburton, on the border of Dartmoor, we were directed to a small dairy, not with the idea of losing no time in purchasing Devonshire cream, but for the purpose of hiring a vehicle to take us to Dartmeet. Having ordered a victoria, we walked to an open space close to the railway station to await our equipage. Here, we observed an ancient ambling along at something slower than a snail's pace. Several little girls saw him, laughed gaily, and shouted: "Ello, Greybeard! Greybeard! Greybeard!" The old man said something by way of defence which had the effect of calling forth more laughter and further rude references to his beard. Disgusted with these sallies, he hailed a crony of his, and together they leant against a wall and leisurely mumbled out the news of the day.

At length the victoria arrived, and away we rattled through the town till the lights of shops and houses were left far behind. It was a hilly drive, though "hilly" conveys but a poor idea of the fall and rise of that winding road. When a certain lady, afflicted with nerves, has the temerity to make the journey, she invariably puts on a pair of old gloves, which she tears to pieces by way of giving vent to her agony at such times when the hills seem to be converted into very high walls, with Death lying in wait at the bottom!

The wind was keen and the Moor starlit as we were driven across it, now on the heights, now in deep valleys where the Dart was in flood and seemed in a tremendous hurry to reach the sea and feel the keel of many a ship. At the top of Dartmeet Hill the rain descended as though the clouds had suddenly let loose a vast array of steel shafts. The driver put up the hood. Such a hood! It seemed like the roof of a huge cave enveloping driver and horse and half the Moor, and under this imposing canopy we reached our destination.

After a good night's rest there is no lying a-bed till a late hour; but it is no hardship to be up with the sun in November, especially when that luminary shines upon such a scene of beauty. Looking out of the window I see Mr. Bowler walking over Dartmeet Bridge with a pail. I observe his long, wagging neck from the rear, a sun-tanned pole rising clear from his coat collar. I fancy that he has only just escaped being a giraffe; but if a long neck indicates length of years, then that good fellow will continue his intimate knowledge of the Moor for many a day to come. I make haste to join him. He tells me how he built Pixie's Bridge and waxes eloquent on the subject of fishing, especially concerning salmon of good weight and marketable value. He says never a word about his love for the Moor, and yet one realises that those great spaces and rolling hills, the winding course of the river, the peat-scented wind, are all a part of his being.

I ascend Sharp Tor, and from the summit get an extensive view of the valley. How the ice-cold wind rushes through one, and how the golden sunlight dances on the Dart! A small tree by my side tells its story, for the strong fingers of the wind have pulled its stunted branches in one direction, and there it stands, shaped by the cutting blast, till the same force shall lay it low. Ponies graze complacently on the hillside, and rabbits, with their little white tails erect, hurry to their holes. On such a spot Tennyson would have had no need to look through a telescope at the heavens to realise how small the county families were after all, for high up on the Moor no pettiness can possibly exist. Here Nature is planned on a vast scale, and something of her peace and wisdom take possession of the beholder. I wonder if our ancestors climbed these tors as sun-worshippers. That they worshipped someone, something, is inevitable, and their worship, whatever it may have been, seems still to linger round these high altars of the Moor. One can dream with impunity on the heights, and be deadly practical when one climbs down again. On the top of those lusty tors time seems to merge into eternity—at least, it would if hunger did not call one to the valleys.

The village of Holne, the birthplace of Charles Kingsley, is charmingly situated. From the Vicarage garden, where grass and moss mingled in the tree-shaded lawn, we looked down upon a wood rich with autumnal colouring, and caught a glimpse of the Double Dart and the outline of a distant hill. As we stood gazing at the lovely scene, the bright sunshine vanished, and rain pattered upon the leaves. We left the garden hurriedly, Water Babies of a larger growth and later date than those of Kingsley!

A rainbow suddenly shone out in the valley, and in a moment or two the rain stopped. Once more the sun caught the bronze of the trees and gave depth of colour to the moss on their trunks. Scarlet and green, blue and orange fungi seemed to be on fire at our feet, and the decaying leaves yielded up a pleasant perfume. Raindrops glistened in the grass and hung like jewels upon the hedges. But the clouds were busy overhead. They raced along in great towering masses and seemed disposed to blot out all the blue patches in the sky, all the celestial children's little beds of forget-me-nots, and to let down their rain again.

We walked across sloping fields down into the valley, through a wood, past New Bridge, to plunge again into the dark recesses of a small forest where a winding path took us close to the Webburn, which, like its sister river the Dart, was in flood. Sitting on a big boulder, with the water rushing past, we had our lunch. The river was crested with innumerable bubbles that danced along merrily, taking golden leaves for partners, bubbles in which bright colours circled madly for a moment till the airy worlds exploded. Where the water broke it was like liquid amber, but where it flowed deep and strong without obstruction it was dark, almost black, in colour.

Once more we were tramping along paths thickly strewn with sodden leaves till we crept slowly up a steep incline to Buckland, a minute village set with its church in a wood, one of those villages, surely, we used to read about in fairy books, where a snug little cottage always turned up most conveniently at sunset, affording the hero much-needed rest and refreshment. Having peeped into the church and looked at the fine old rood-screen, we climbed down again on the other side of the village, always with the trees about us and the river close at hand. Reaching Ponsworthy; we took to the road across the Moor, down Dartmeet Hill, and so home to a goodly peat fire and a cosy evening.

The walk from Dartmeet to Haytor is particularly delightful, but let those who are not familiar with the Moor beware of so-called short cuts, for they generally turn out to be the longest in the end, and still longer if one has the misfortune to sink into a bog. The approach to Widdicombe is far more entrancing than the village itself. From the crest of the hill, coming from Ponsworthy, a magnificent view of the distant tors can be seen, tors that resemble ruins of fantastic castles. Widdicombe, through which one passes on the way to Haytor, is a little disappointing. One expects too much, perhaps, from its pleasant name and its association with a once-famous fair, the delight of—

Bill Brewer, Jan Stewer, Peter Gurney, Peter Davey, Dan'l Whiddon,
Harry Hawk, old uncle Tom Cobleigh and all!

I was told by a native, with real concern in his voice, that the fairs are not what they used to be in Devonshire. The junketing spirit has gone, and though the maids are still comely, full of figure and rosy of face, the swains are not quite so light-hearted, quite so prone to dance a country measure as in the old days.

Grimspound is not the name of a village, but the name given to a group of prehistoric dwellings, near Hameldon Tor, enclosed within the remains of what had once been, no doubt, a formidable wall. The hills on the opposite side of the valley are scarred with dried-up watercourses, and there is a wildness about this particular part of the Moor that seems to harmonise with these ancient remains.

We climbed over the old wall, and were able to get a whimsical notion of what prehistoric life may have been. There was little left of these hut circles, but enough to stimulate the imagination. The central dwelling where the chief resided was raised a little from the ground. Part of the entrance was intact, and a path led from the narrow doorway, so constructed that the good man could, if he chose, take his wife and children by surprise on his return from a hunt or a skirmish with a warlike tribe. The outer wall of this village is said to have served as a protection against wolves. It may have done, but it would scarcely have resisted the attack of those huge prehistoric animals that could span valleys with ease, and with a ghastly wink consume quite a number of our ancestors, clubs and flint-heads included! There was something fascinating about what appeared to be the main entrance in this wall. Here men may have rushed out to deal a deadly blow to some adversary without the gate, or sallied forth with shouts of joy whenever they sought refreshment. Did they tell strange tales in their small huts at night? Did the chief condescend to gambol with his children when the day's work was over, and were the tongues of women sometimes silenced by a formidable stone? I sat in the chief's hut and smoked a pipe, wishing that the owner would come tramping round the corner, provided he would answer my questions, and not lay me low with his club!

How many moods the Moor has! On a grey day, or on a day when there is not a cloud in the sky, the expression on her face is for ever changing. There is amber and rose in her dead bracken and flowerless heather. At no time of the year does the Moor lose her colour. And yet, in spite of Nature's lavish beauties, in this part of Devon one may walk miles without meeting a human being. One welcomes at such times the Moor ponies, shaggy, shy creatures that rush away with swinging tail and reproachful eye when one draws near to their feeding ground, and in the desolate silence of those open spaces the white, far-stretching road becomes a companion, especially when it leads home. Civilisation, in any real sense, has scarcely touched the Moor yet, and it is one of those wild places that cannot, must not, be allowed to yield up its ancient peace. When the mists sweep across the hills, they assume fantastic shapes, grey hurrying figures that whisper to the tors in passing and tell of secrets hidden from mortal ken. There seem to be two great spirits presiding over Dartmoor, the Spirit of the Tors and the Spirit of the Dart, and who shall say which is the greater of the two? I have heard the Dart's music at night when the tumbling, swift-moving water is bathed in moonlight, a live mirror for cloud-shadows and the reflection of countless stars. At first it is a subdued roar; but presently the song comes, such ancient music, and yet withal so joyous. It is like the striking of bells not made by human hands or rung by human ringers, and the wind carries the notes now near, now far away. At other times, for there is no monotony in the Dart's song, the music is like the playing of innumerable violins and harps, eerie, haunting, where fiddlers and harpists are magicians all.

F. HADLAND DAVIS.

Special holiday matinées of "Within the Law" are to be given on the first three Tuesdays in January—Tuesday, January 6, 13, and 20—at the Haymarket Theatre, these matinees, of course, being additional to the ordinary three weekly ones.

REVIEWS

An American Aristides—I

BY SIR WILLIAM BULL, M.P.

Theodore Roosevelt. An Autobiography. Illustrated.
(Macmillan and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

LOADED with china clay, even the paper on which this book is written is heavy, and for the first few chapters the style is exasperating. There is no pretension to phraseology, and the chapters consist of short, snappy statements usually beginning with the letter "I" (I like short sentences myself, but in this instance they are carried to an excess, which is tiring). Roosevelt does not make use of his phonetic fad in the book, but he spells a good number of words in a way that vexes the English reader. Ax for axe, peddler for pedlar, willful for wilful, and saber for sabre are a few that occur to my mind. Lord Roberts wrote far more modestly with regard to his forty-one years in India; but both biographers suffer from the fact that they are men of action and have not a literary gift. Their material ought to have been put into the hands of Herbert Maxwell, Reginald Lucas, T. P. O'Connor—all skilled craftsmen in a difficult sphere; their stories would have been better told, and they themselves done more justice.

Please do not misunderstand me. The book is not uninteresting, but the story of a strenuous life could have been told so much better by a third party, although here again I recognise that Theodore Roosevelt would have been the last man to submit to such an indignity, as he would have thought it; hence the present 600 pages of egoism. The ex-President tells of his Dutch ancestry, and paints pleasant pictures of his father and mother; the latter was a Miss Bulloch, and I remember, when lecturing on the "Cruise of the Alabama" on the Conway training-ship at Liverpool that I met her brother, Captain Bulloch, who was second in command, and took "No. 90" out of the Mersey on that devastating cruise, which only ended when he personally fired her last gun in the famous duel with the Kearsage outside Cherbourg on June 19, 1864.

Contrary to the general impression, Roosevelt was a sickly and delicate boy, and he says that he was never a first-class rider or a first-rate shot. As a youth he must have been rather a prig of the type of Hector Malone, so amusingly caricatured by Bernard Shaw in "Man and Superman." Having said this, one cannot help liking the man, just as the ordinary Englishman is fond of the German Emperor, whom Roosevelt greatly resembles. Both are men deeply in earnest, and love their country with a depth and intensity that there is no mistaking.

Born in easy circumstances, Roosevelt never had to earn his own living, and has something of that leisurely outlook which is common among country gentlemen in England, but rare in America. In fact he belonged to the landed classes, for whilst Theodore Roosevelt was born in New York, for three generations the Roosevelts have had a small estate at Oyster Bay, on Long Island.

The book is brimming full of life and good spirits; many of the stories have already been quoted, but one against himself has not, I think, appeared:—

The men of the regiment always helped me when I was running for office. One one occasion Buck Taylor of Texas accompanied me on a trip and made a speech for me. The crowd took to his speech from the beginning, and so did I, until the peroration, which ran as follows:

"My fellow citizens, vote for the Colonel—Vote for my Colonel! and he will lead you as he led us, like sheep to the slaughter."

This hardly seemed a tribute to my military skill, but it delighted the crowd, and as far as I could tell did me nothing but good!

After dabbling in politics he suddenly turns aside and devotes a chapter to ranching out West. He does not explain why he does it, or with what object, but he contrives to give us sketches of life in the Far West which it is difficult to conceive occurred only thirty years ago in places where railroads now criss-cross the countryside and there are large cities.

Politics in America are always difficult for an Englishman to understand, but he gives lurid pictures of Tammany Rule—the "bosses" of the (political) machines and graft, and the difficulties he encountered in trying to put an end to the worst abuses. This comes out in the chapter devoted to his life as Police Commissioner of New York: an absolutely fearless man, with no "ax" to grind, and not dependent on politics for a living, he must have made a number of enemies of those with vested interests, and yet one feels that he is always stating the case of the other side fairly and from their point of view. His dauntlessness attracted the bulk of his countrymen, and when he was appointed by President McKinley Assistant Secretary of the Navy it is easy to see how he enjoyed the position and did all in his power to prepare for the war with Spain which he saw was inevitable.

The condition of the United States in those days was very much like our position at the present time. He calls the chapter dealing with the war troubles "The War of America the Unready," and begins by saying:—

I suppose the United States will always be unready for war, and in consequence will always be exposed to great expense and to the probability of the gravest calamity when the nation goes to war.

This state seems to be inherent in the Anglo-Saxon race. We are peace-loving peoples, and give the same credit to others. During war-time we waste millions and are willing to spend money recklessly and lavishly in the belief that we shall, as Lord Rosebery said, "muddle through somehow," whereas, with a little forethought, a large amount might be saved. Roosevelt is justly severe on his own Press and public opinion:—

We wished to enjoy the incompatible luxuries of an unbridled tongue and an unready hand. . . . Accordingly, too many of our politicians, especially in Congress, found that the cheap and easy thing to do was to please the foolish peace people by keeping us weak, and to please the foolish violent people by passing denunciatory resolutions about international matters—resolutions which would have been improper even if we had been strong.

The panic on the American seaboard when the Spanish ships appeared is amusingly told, especially the pressure brought to bear by one influential member on the Government, who demanded that a warship should be sent to a seaside resort where a constituent, who, like the importunate widow, had a country house. All parties were satisfied by sending a gunboat which would not have been a formidable foe to any antagonists of much more modern construction than the galleys of Alcibiades. The preparations for war, the muddle, the confusion, are all admirably told; the spirit of the War Office being exemplified by the official head who, in response to a reasonable request, threw himself back in his chair and exclaimed, with a sigh:—

“Oh, dear, I had this office running in such good shape, and then along came this war and upset everything.” His feeling was that war was an illegitimate interruption to the work of the War Office.

The account of the fighting is excellent; it gives us a better idea of what a modern battle is really like than anything else I have read since the “Battle of Dorking.” Roosevelt seems to have done exactly as he pleased. There was no transport for his regiment, so he seized the first that came handy; there was no general to tell him what to do, so he ordered his men to charge:—

When I struck the regulars there was no one of superior rank to mine, and after asking why they did not charge and being answered that they had no order, I said I would give the order. There was naturally a little reluctance shown by the elderly officer in command to accept my order; so I said, “Then let my men through, sir.” I marched through followed by my grinning men.

An attempt was made years after for electioneering purposes to prove that Roosevelt had never taken part in a battle, even if he had not shown personal cowardice; but it is clear from his narrative, which is modestly told, as well as by an appendix of official documents, that he not only led his men with triumphant success but showed conspicuous gallantry in the field, exposing his life most recklessly. In fact, luck pulled him through, for men were killed all round him. This reminds me that it is a proverb in his family about his luck. Some years ago I stayed with some relations of his at Oyster Bay, and I remember well his pretty English-looking house, the low hall filled with horns and skins of the wild beasts that had fallen to his gun. I recollect the spacious nursery where I played “elephants” with his children, and the pleasure I felt that he had chosen a slim young English governess as a preceptor for his chicks. He was away from home at the time, but his relatives mentioned how lucky he was.

Perhaps I ought to explain that if Americans want, to use one of their own expressions, to “side-track” a politician who is likely to be a nuisance, they make him Vice-President of the United States, a high-sounding office which leads to nothing. When they made Roosevelt Vice-President a relation said: “Poor Mr. McKinley, I am sure something will happen to him! Theodore (he was never called Teddy in his own family) is bound to be President now.” And sure enough he was.

His mother’s people came from the South, and this old lady remembered the slave days. She told me many interesting stories of what is to us the strange position of affairs “when man held property in man” and woman. Slaves had no wages, as a matter of course, and it was usual for the household to give them pocket-money by tipping them with the smallest coin known in America. The old lady could never get out of this habit with the coloured servants, and she laughed merrily when she said, “It used to annoy Theodore.”

More of the “Gardens of History”

A Czarvitch of the Eighteenth Century, and Other Studies in Russian History. By the VICOMTE E.-M. DE VOGÜÉ. Translated from the French by C. MARY ANDERSON. (A. L. Humphreys. 7s. 6d. net.)

WE can never resist the fascination of the late M. Gebhart’s phrase: “The Gardens of History.” A garden is a most arresting symbol, though what it symbolises depends on the mentality of him who uses it. But that is the way with all really good symbols. To T. E. Brown, for instance, a garden was evidence of immortality—“Not God?—in gardens?”; to Swinburne, on the other hand, it was a concrete warning “immortalia ne speres”: “In deep, wet days by grey old gardens . . .”; to the latter poet it meant other things as well. But M. Gebhart’s symbolism is, we suspect, purely cynical. By a garden he meant a pleasant place; did not our ancestors call it a “pleasance”? And the pleasure we look for in one of the “gardens of history” is the pleasure of the Lucretian gods—the vision and tale of crimes and sorrows and “ills that ourselves are exempt from.” But let us hear the Vicomte de Vogüé!

“Perhaps you have no seat at the play to-night? Or the play being given is a poor one, badly put together? Console yourself, if there are works of history in your book-shelves. . . . Life would be very diverting if it were possible to go through it with no other interest than curiosity; if one could be sure of always being a spectator and never an actor: well! what is history but life read backwards, and for ever shorn of all danger to the spectator? . . . The perpetual wire-puller is the black personage who never quits the stage, and who regulates the play; Holbein painted him in the cemetery at Bâle, Orcagna in that of Pisa. Oh, wondrous dramatist! How he understands the art of construction in the plays he gives us! Let me recount one of his most finished pieces."

The piece that M. de Vogüé proceeds to recount is the "Death of Catherine II." It is a good piece, though we should hesitate to place it among the "most finished" productions of the "wondrous dramatist." It is a play of antithesis; on the one hand the masterful, effectual, but dying Catherine, on the other the ill-balanced and effaced, but living Paul. "Le roi est mort, vive le roi!" History is a series of twice-told tales, fuller of tragic irony than any of the legends on which the Greek tragedians worked. Though M. de Vogüé has nothing to tell, except by way of allusion, of the tragic end of the Czar Paul, that catastrophe is present with us the whole time he is speaking of that ill-starred personage. It is impossible to get our thoughts away from it.

M. de Vogüé, it will be seen, is a convinced Gebhartist. He believes that history is a terrible, if a beautiful, thing. Where history is most terrible, mankind is most in the making. "We cannot sympathise," he says, "with those who admire a nation without a history, and happy only in amassing money; nations, as well as individuals, command respect and admiration only on condition that they are a working force, a school of sacrifice for the benefit of the coming generation." Most of the classical French historians who have written since the Revolution have been so obsessed with that event, that they read, not quite unjustifiably, all history in its light. M. de Vogüé has a more catholic formula.

The immediate occasion of the reflexion we have quoted is a discussion of the character of his greatest subject—Peter the Great. In this study, at any rate, he is dealing with one of the greatest tragedies of history. The story of the great Czar and his wayward son, Alexis, has already been transcribed with the pen of genius by Merejkowsky. It is pleasant to re-read the story, retold by another master of narrative, and kept more rigorously within the groove of historical fact. Historical fact, it is true, is more often historical uncertainty, but there is a joy in alternative solutions. M. de Vogüé says that "Alexis' mysterious death still remains the most insoluble, the most irritating, of all problems in Russian history." He gives several contemporary accounts of the transaction, and two statements of "persons calling themselves eye-witnesses." The resultant of all these narratives is a feeling of horror enhanced by mystery. The universal detective instinct is also set a-working. History gives us quadratic, fiction merely simple equations.

The mathematical metaphor reminds us of another trait of M. de Vogüé. He has an intense dislike of moral judgments. "History for history" might stand as his motto. He would never say, with Lord Acton, "I make no allowance for that sort of thing"; rather can we imagine him saying, "I make allowances for every sort of thing." There are many sentences to this effect strewn through the present work, but here, in his contribution to the secular debate between Peter and Alexis, we have it in a nutshell: "Let us remind those most easily roused to indignation of the axiom in our old common law, that each man must be judged by his peers. Historic personages may also claim this benefit, and in their case the judgment of peers is the judgment given when we place ourselves at the point of view of contemporary manners, ideas and consciences." M. de Vogüé's knowledge of Russia, ancient and modern, gives him an indisputable right to be empanelled for this important trial. He resents moral judgments, but he is ready to judge between performance and non-performance, between strength and weakness; and on these grounds we think he would help to give a verdict for the brutal father against the degenerate son.

Humanity—and it is one of our chief reasons for optimism—is inclined to sympathise with lost causes and vanquished heroes. Contemporary Russians tried to make a saint out of Alexis; if the unfortunate Czarevitch had had a little more poetry in him, we moderns would be giving him another kind of aureole. But his conception of life, save in one important matter, was rather earthy than idealistic. He carried his love for the peasant girl, Euphrosyne, to the point of asking to be allowed to see her just before his death, though the girl's evidence had sealed his doom. But, when the story of Euphrosyne is told, nothing beautiful remains of Alexis. While he lived, the great work of Peter was vain; Russia could not be born.

The attitude of the Czarevitch towards his father was "that of a rebellious slave, trembling before a dreaded master." He had no proud retort to offer when rebuked before the whole army in the breach of Narva. To the threat—"I shall cut you off as I would a gangrened limb"—his reply was a hypocritical renunciation of his birthright. A letter to his spiritual director ends: "Forgive us if you find it difficult to read our epistle, but to tell the truth, we have written it when drunk." The highest sentiment Alexis can inspire in us is pity, and that is but a poor equipment for a hero of tragedy. Nevertheless, his exalted rank and the great political issues at stake, together with the eternal duel between the wise and the wayward, make his story to rank with the greatest human tragedies.

Besides the life of Alexis and the death of Catherine, M. de Vogüé has given us a study of Mazeppa, in which the literary basis of the Cossack hero's fame is delightfully analysed. Translations—retranslated, of course, here—are given of Pouchkine, of folk-songs, and of Mazeppa's love-letters. We may mention, in this connection, that the whole translation is of a very high order of merit. M. de Vogüé truly says that a volume of history is the best specific for literary satiety; he has provided into the bargain a practical and convincing demonstration of his thesis.

From Pushkin to Tolstoy

The Russian Novel. By LE VICOMTE E. MELCHIOR DE VOGÜÉ. With Portraits. Translated from the French by Colonel H. A. SAWYER. (Chapman and Hall. 7s. 6d. net.)

THE present volume was originally published in France in 1886. It has since gone into many editions, and, as the translator observes, "forced open for De Vogüé the doors of the Académie Française." Small wonder that the book met with so much success, for it is the most brilliant study of a foreign literature we have read for a long time. The style that recalls Chateaubriand, the analysis, the terse summing-up, and, above all, the sincerity of the writer, make the book a memorable one. We are conscious that this study of five great Russian authors has been presented to us by one who, within his particular sphere, is no less a master in his own country. He has succeeded in making literary criticism more than usually fascinating, for he has deftly combined it with many biographical studies and with a psychological grip of his subject that is wholly satisfying. He has added knowledge to the student of Russian literature, but his insight and enthusiasm will lead many to this study for the first time.

De Vogüé commences by giving us some account of Russia's "historic sufferings," of a people whose deity "has never clearly indicated the path they should pursue." In that country of snow and bog and sand one is forced to realise the paralysing effect of Nature in those desolate regions, and to discover that the cry for Nihilism was simply a demand for an antidote that should put an end to human sorrow and human life: to break, crush, and annihilate a mocking force that was too cruel even for those long-suffering people. It is well for us to realise these conditions and needs, for they help us to understand precisely why the great Russian writers who followed Pushkin have produced works that simply shout for the oppressed, that point to the canker of a rotten officialdom, and that preach from first to last liberty for the masses. These novelists are not content with broken haloes or rosaries, not satisfied with mere sentimentalism. They plunge deep into life as they know it, the life of the people, and they make their poor chaotic cry articulate. They present realism with a grim earnestness and with a power unequalled elsewhere. They have a mania for detail piled on detail, for an analysis of the emotions as well as of the aspirations of the human soul battling through the dark in the hope of finding peace. It is said that war correspondents refrain from discussing the real horrors of warfare simply because that knowledge is too revolting to be revealed. The Russian novelist, especially Dostoyevsky, shrinks from nothing, and he adds a new and terrible horror to mortal suffering. But if the Russian novelist lays bear the agony of human misery, there is also compassion in his work. Wrongs are discussed only that they may be righted, and in a country where the censor is an autocratic power, and not merely a person to be written about in the papers, it is curious to note that, in spite of the most drastic prohibitions, no other country has produced writers who have raised their voices more daringly or to more purpose. We may be shocked by the horrors they describe, but we shall certainly understand them if we realise the causes that gave them birth.

We associate Pushkin, the Byronic Pushkin, with romance, and Gogol with the realistic and national evolution. Gogol was the first great master of the Russian novel. "The more I study the Russians," writes De Vogüé, "the more I notice the truth of the comment made to me by one of them well acquainted with the history of their literature of the last three or four decades, 'We have all come out from Gogol's greatcoat.'" The last sentence has a double and very apt meaning, for "The Greatcoat" was one of Gogol's most famous novels. He it was who had a gift for describing the trivialities of life and the platitudes of the mediocre man. De Vogüé severely criticises his work and refers to his disconnected characters and his disregard for decency or morality. Gogol, however, in spite of his faults, gave the root of the Russian novel, and that root has tended to nourish, and so has helped to mature, the ripper fruit of later writers.

Turgeneff set to work to write the comedy of his own country, and in this respect he was the pupil of Balzac. "To this great task he brought less patience, less method and a smaller grasp of the whole subject than the Frenchman, but showed more feeling, greater faith and the gift of a penetrating eloquence which was not possessed by the other." But Turgeneff's work was not all comedy. He was content with sweet harmonies in his earlier novels, but in his later work, in "Smoke" and in "Spring Flood," we see that dark clouds have gathered about him, and that his harmony suddenly changes into tempestuous noises. When Turgeneff was on his deathbed he wrote to Tolstoy: "My friend, return to literary work. That gift has come to you from whence everything comes to us. Oh! how happy I should be if I could think that you would listen to my prayer."

Dostoyevsky's work is rapidly becoming familiar to English readers. He is in danger of being boomed after the manner of Strindberg, which is a fate he does not deserve. There is something in common between the two writers, for both were mentally diseased; but where Strindberg simply gives us the disordered raving of a troubled mind, Dostoyevsky has described suffering as it has never been described before, and if it is a suffering described with all the photographic details of realism, it is also imbued with a very deep and sincere compassion. Who can forget his "Recollections from the House of the Dead" or "Crime and Punishment"? How utterly feeble seem the little hair-raising tricks of other writers when we read these books! In "Crime and Punishment" we feel that the epileptic Dostoyevsky is shrieking in agony as he writes these horrible scenes. He himself has written: "The depths into which I am plunged on those occasions may be described thus: I feel myself a great criminal, as if a great unknown sin, the deed of a scoundrel, weighed heavily on my conscience." Dostoyevsky, unlike Turgeneff, did not understand the art of condensation. He was terribly prolix in "The Brothers Karamazoff." On the day of its publication he came into a friend's room carrying the volumes under his arm. "They weigh five pounds!" he exclaimed with pride. "The unhappy man," writes De Vogüé, "had weighed his novel, and he was actually proud of what should have dismayed him." And yet we are glad to read of this incident concerning one who has been described as "a phenomenon belonging to another world," of one who was the author of "The Idiot" and "The Possessed."

The chapter devoted to Tolstoy is a little disappointing. De Vogüé does not seem to be in full sympathy with this writer, and he gives us rather wearisome accounts of "War and Peace" and "Anna Karenina." We must remember, however, that these pages were written many years ago, and they are necessarily very incomplete. De Vogüé died before the great Russian writer, and therefore had no opportunity, as in his previous studies, of coming to a final judgment of Tolstoy's work. It is not that he quarrels with his purely literary productions, for he gives them high praise; but we feel that Tolstoy, the reformer and follower of Sutayeff, is dealt with rather harshly. To describe that last phase of Tolstoy's life, the time when he did his best to live the life of Christ, as an "obsession" seems to us a little impertinent, a treading upon ground outside the critic's domain. There may or may not be anything wise in communism, and it may be impossible to carry out literally the Sermon on the Mount. Tolstoy, however, had climbed the spiritual heights of his soul, and it was useless to call him back to his old literary labours. He had renounced Nihilism at last and grasped that Peace which is perhaps greater and more potent than his best books.

Stories and Memories

Twenty-five Years: Reminiscences. By KATHARINE TYNAN. (Smith, Elder and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

IT is required in writers of reminiscences that they possess one of two qualifications: either they must have worthy matter to set down, or they must have a worthy manner of retailing happenings of small moment in the larger world of affairs. With our new psychological scale of values there has come about a new perspective in the relative importance of events. Thus, things that to a former generation seemed of mighty concern now bulk much less largely in our estimation; while a detail that one of the older historians would have passed over entirely is now magnified and given its true significance and force. So it frequently happens that for sheer enjoyment and for actual edification (using that term in its widest sense) a book full of memories of the most trivial kind will outshine weightier works, both on account of the charm of its style, and because of its wealth of significance. When both matter and manner are of the highest order the result is likely to become a classic.

Miss Katharine Tynan (for she is not yet Mrs. Hinkson in this volume) has brought out of the treasures of memory things both great and small, holding the balance pretty evenly between the trivial and the weighty, and exhibiting all with much happiness of manner. The whole work reminds one of a delightful, old-fashioned garden, in which one can wander at will and pluck many fragrant and beautiful blooms. We turn to the greater names first and find a goodly list: Sir Charles Russell, Gladstone, Parnell, Cardinal Manning, the Morrises, the Rossettis, the Meynells, William Sharp, W. B. Yeats, and George Russell ("AE"). Miss Tynan was introduced to Gladstone at the house of Sir Charles Russell; but the encounter that made the most impression on that occasion was her meeting with Parnell, towards whom her attitude is throughout worshipful. Indeed, whether one loves or hates that tragic yet fascinating figure, one cannot but admire the whole-hearted devotion of Miss Tynan to him and to his cause. There is much concerning Parnell, and much of the writer's association with the Land League, which will interest students of that particular history.

A very distinct and rather amusing picture of Christina Rossetti emerges on page 158:

She entered the room, wearing short serviceable skirts of an iron-grey tweed and stout boots. . . . Her dress did not at all go with her spiritual face and the heavily-lidded, wide-apart eyes which one only finds in a highly-gifted woman. . . . I certainly believe she made the worst of herself, perhaps as a species of mortification. She even affected a short, matter-of-fact way of speaking which took me somewhat aback at our first meeting. She put one off sitting at her feet completely.

Concerning William Sharp, the author says decisively: "I may say here that I do not even yet believe that William Sharp was Fiona Macleod. But of that more in its proper place." On that point we looked anxiously for further enlightenment, but found none; so we presume we must wait for one of the two further volumes of memories which Miss Tynan hopes to publish. The few glimpses of Wilde are not very flattering; he seems never to have sparkled in her presence.

There is a great deal about W. B. Yeats. The earlier reminiscences partake very much of the nature of loving banter. We imagine that the future biographer of the Irish poet may some day be very grateful to Miss Tynan for her pages on his early development. Very interesting and curious it is to read of his entire absorption in poetry during youth—"he lived, breathed, ate, drank, and slept poetry." In another place she says: "I remember how the big Dublin policemen used to eye him in those days, as though uncertain whether to run him in or not. But, by and by, they used to say, 'Shure, 'tishn't mad he is, nor yet drink taken. 'Tis the poethry that's disturbin' his head,' and leave him alone." In his inability to take care of himself, and his utter forgetfulness of all but poetry, he fulfils the traditional figure of a poet in his youth pretty completely. Further later reminiscences and a number of letters round off this part of Miss Tynan's book.

Equally interesting is the romantic personality of George Russell, to whose poetry the English public seems just awakening. There is something almost Olympian about his figure. He tells what is perhaps one of the best stories in the volume:

He told me a story the other day of a friend of his who somewhere in the wilds of America became friends with an old Indian. He told him all the marvels of the old world—wireless telegraphy, radium, men flying in air, speech kept long after the speaker is dead. "Wonderful! wonderful!" said the Indian. "Tell me more." At last the reciter paused, wearied. "The white man is very wonderful," said the Indian. "Can he do this?" He stooped, lifted a handful of dust and threw it in the air; stretched himself upwards, and thin, delicate flames ascended from his hands and his feet and his hair; his body shone in air; he was a living jewel from head to foot. Then the glory faded. There was only an old Indian. "Can the white man do that?" he asked.

It is required also of writers of reminiscences that they should display a certain degree of intimacy, and should refrain as far as possible from the use of lime-light. Here, again, Miss Tynan satisfies our requirements. One does feel, closing her book, that one has really "got to know" her. The person who emerges with perhaps greatest distinctness from her pages is her own father. His strong points and weaknesses are alike set down with a loving pen. He is very lovable, very human, with more than a touch of greatness. We are grateful, too, for the accounts of one or two early friends who died untimely, some of them showing considerable promise: Rose Kavanagh, Frances Wynne, Charles G. Fagan, and Jim Alderson. They are written of with an affection that it is good to see in these reticent days.

Of lesser points we might mention a score if space allowed: such as Miss Tynan's theory that hair is an index to character; or the naïve confession of her early earnings, and how she spent them in a way that would shock the "unco' guid"; or this single characteristic flash of memory of G. B. S., who, in a lecture on Browning's "Caliban upon Setebos," remarked "that if Caliban was now alive he would belong to the Philharmonic Society"! We can promise many hours of pleasure to all readers of this winsome book.

The Board of Education announce that the Victoria and Albert Museum will, in future, be open on Sunday afternoons from 2 till 6 p.m. throughout the year, instead of from 2 till 4, 5, 6, or 7, according to season, as hitherto.

Recent Theology

Studies in Modernism. By the REV. ALFRED FAWKES. (Smith, Elder and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Religious Ideas of the Old Testament. By H. WHEELER ROBINSON, D.D. (Duckworth and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

Introduction to the Books of the New Testament. By WILLOUGHBY ALLEN, M.A., and L. W. GRENSTED, M.A. (T. and T. Clark. 5s. net.)

Inspiration in Men, Books, and Movements. By G. CURRIE MARTIN, M.A., B.D. (Hunter and Longhurst. 1s. net.)

Faith and Reality. By J. HILTON STOWELL, M.A., D.D. (Robert Scott. 3s. 6d. net.)

Christianity and Sin. By ROBERT MACKINTOSH, D.D. (Duckworth and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

Papers of the American Society of Church History. Second Series, Vol. I. Edited by SAMUEL MACAULEY JACKSON. (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 12s. 6d. net.)

"STUDIES in Modernism" consists of a collection of very able and clever essays which have appeared in the Quarterly and Edinburgh Reviews—one in the Hibbert Journal. The first eight are concerned with Men and Modernism, the remainder more or less with the movement itself. There are studies of Tyrrell, Newman, Loisy, Anatole France, Zola, and others; also of Evolution and Development, Christian Modernism, and the English Church of To-Day. Mr. Fawkes is an acute and learned critic, but with all his penetration there are two things which he seems to underestimate—one, the power of dogmatic Christianity to resist Modernism; the other, that Modernism is only a phase, and that by no means new. As to the Church of England, Mr. Fawkes is frankly Erastian. He considers that the Royal supremacy and the judgments of the Privy Council save the National Church. Hence he fears Disestablishment. In his view the State makes the Church, and therefore has a right to say, "If you don't obey, you must go to prison." But he does not see that this sort of Erastianism is the high-road to Disestablishment. He is strongly anti-Catholic, though he is fully alive to the weakness of Protestantism. Catholic teaching in the Church of England he sneers at as "denominational Anglicanism." He says that "if we are wise, we shall not attempt to discover in the New Testament even the Catholic Creeds." His position, in short, is that of a critic too critical ever to become a leader of thought.

"The Religious Ideas of the Old Testament" is an exhaustive inquiry into the spiritual religion of the people of Israel. The author sums up the chief conceptions of Jewish religion under the problems of the existence of God, and His dealings with mankind, the existence of sin and suffering, and the vision of a future kingdom of God, in which His sovereignty would at last be fully displayed in social righteousness.

ness. In estimating the practical value of the body of Biblical literature he well points out that Old Testament criticism attacks not the authority of revelation but only the supposed externalism of it. The spiritual ideas still maintain their authority "as organic elements in the one comprehensive idea of religion." This is an interesting work, and contains some original thought.

Theological students will welcome this latest Introduction to the New Testament, which gives in concise form the results of the most modern criticism, together with the newest theories of sources, origins, and authorship, and useful summaries of the general contents of the several books. The work is very well arranged, and most convenient for reference.

"Inspiration" is a small volume of three essays on inspiration in men, in books, and in movements, designed as "an introduction to the great literature of the Jewish and Christian religions." There is no claim to any particular originality, but these lectures are useful for their purpose, to give some definite instruction and help on a difficult subject.

"Faith and Reality" is a consideration of spiritual problems primarily viewed from their metaphysical aspect, and then reduced to the level of practical life and experience. It is a book written with earnest and spiritual thought.

"Christianity and Sin" is another useful number of a very excellent series of Studies in Theology, of which some fifteen volumes have already been published. In the first part sin is treated historically in Judaism and Christianity as well as philosophically and from the standpoint of evolutionary science. The second part the author calls "constructive," in which he examines sin and the moral consciousness, forgiveness, the conquest of sin and its ultimate penalty. This is a valuable work, and will repay careful study.

So far back as the year 1841 the State of New York took measures for procuring transcripts of documents in the archives of Europe, that illustrate the history of the State. In the midst of a material civilisation over the seas there are now many historical societies and not a few learned scholars filled with zeal for research and a laudable "cacoethes scribendi." These transactions of an American Church History Society contain some papers of interest and value, notably a translation of the letters of Einhard, a Public Minister at the Court of Charles the Great. Professor Ewell writes a comparison between St. Basil and St. Jerome. Dr. Edward Corwin, who has personally visited Somerset House in London and the "Ryk's Archief" at The Hague, contributes a valuable paper on "Recent Researches in Holland and the Ecclesiastical Records of the State of New York." America may boast that the country is in the midst of the making of history, but its scholars show a just appreciation and veneration for the past, and for its historical foundations on this side of the Atlantic Ocean.

An Illustrating Tourist

A Winter in India. By ARCHIBALD B. SPENS. Illustrated. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s. net.)

THE modern facilities for communication with India produce an annual and increasing crop of visitors to that country, and these indite with equal regularity accounts of their travels. It is inevitable that such books should have a family likeness, though the facts are presented variously according to the writer's taste and observation. This was Mr. Spens' second visit to India, but he does not claim to describe untrodden pathways or to deal with matters which require the constant study of a lifetime. There is sanity in this method of treatment. We might well have been spared the crude reflections and suggestions of certain irresponsible travellers. But Mr. Spens has a way of his own. He narrates not only what he has seen—such as parades, and visits to gaols and forts, but what might at other periods have been seen at certain places, such as Akbar at Fatehpur Sikri, or the Mutiny fighting at Delhi. This method enables him to introduce many fragmentary passages of history, in which he is more correct than many writers. But he should not have given 1747 as the date of Nadir Shah at Delhi (he was there in 1738), or have stated that Hindu Rao was imprisoned by the East India Company. And Samee is quite a novel spelling of the Sammy Battery, the British soldier's corruption of "Swami," a Hindu god or idol. Nor was the Suez Canal opening ceremony performed at Port Said.

Mr. Spens travelled only from Bombay to Upper India and from the Khyber Pass to Benares: he does not mention Calcutta or Madras, or the southern portion. He labels India as fascinating, but presumably would not include therein the smells of Benares, or certain quarters of Bombay, and the Elephanta Caves, and the opium den which he inspected. The great towns on his route have been constantly described before: he has gone through them again with Murray's excellent book in hand, and has reproduced much information and some old chestnuts in a readable compass, with ninety-five good illustrations from his own photographs. His conclusion may well encourage others to follow his footsteps. He writes: "Nowhere, I think, will you find such a combination of historical interest, lovely scenery, quaint customs, and healthy climatic conditions as this vast Dependency affords in the winter tourist season; nowhere, I am certain, will one meet with greater kindness, courtesy, and hospitality than in strange, inexplicable and enthralling Hindustan." This book will not supersede Murray, but may be used profitably by future travellers, and it will help English people—if anything can—to realise some of the sights and attractions of India, though Mr. Spens does not penetrate beneath the surface.

Shorter Reviews

Buddhist Scriptures. By E. J. THOMAS, M.A. (John Murray. 2s. net.)

ALL who have read Sir Edwin Arnold's delightful poem, "The Light of Asia," will welcome this latest addition to the "Wisdom of the East" series, which now amounts in itself to a fair-sized library. We have already had in this series the Buddha's "Path of Virtue," legends of Indian Buddhism, "The Path of Light" and "The Way of the Buddha," all treating of Buddhism in various aspects. Now we have the text of part of the canonical books as reduced to writing nearly four hundred years after the death of Gotama; the New Testament of Buddhism, in fact.

A religion that numbers its living votaries by hundreds of millions, that was a living force five centuries before the birth of Christ, and that preaches of morality as pure as the highest Christian ideal, is worth more than superficial study. The story of the Great Renunciation can never grow stale, and the straitest-laced Christian can find nothing but admiration for the practice of sympathy for suffering so nobly inculcated two thousand four hundred years ago. Nor can any objection be taken to the rules for conduct contained in the Noble Eightfold Path, the middle path that opens the eyes and bestows understanding, between the two extremes of surrender to the pleasures of the world and the flesh, and self-mortification, painful, ignoble and useless. Nevertheless, the keynote of Buddhism is intense pessimism.

Laws of Health for Schools. By A. M. MALCOLMSON, M.D. (A. and C. Black. 1s. 6d. net.)

THIS little volume is a guide for teaching the ordinary rules for keeping in good health, specially written in simple language, so as to be easily understood by scholars. Only elementary anatomy and physiology are described so far as is necessary to explain the other parts of the text. The illustrations add still further to the easy comprehension of the subjects dealt with. The whole forms a very useful text-book, and can be recommended with confidence. There are questions at the end of each chapter which increase its utility.

Mr. Werner Laurie is about to publish "South Sea Shipmates," by John Arthur Barry, the well-known Australian writer, and the author of "Steve Brown's Bunyip." The author in a sub-title describes his book as being "the matter-of-fact adventures of two Australian sailormen in various seas, and on ships of varying degrees of maritime iniquity." The sea life as described will in a few years be a thing of the past, if it has not already entirely disappeared. The present volume was left in manuscript at the author's death.

Fiction

Great Days. By FRANK HARRIS. (John Lane. 6s.)

WE are not much in love with the hero "Jack." We are not thinking exclusively of the Jack Morgan of Mr. Frank Harris; the hero "Jack" is, somehow or other, generic. "Jack" is generally a very vital person in real life, in fiction he is nearly always a shadow. In "Great Days" Jack Morgan is an algebraical symbol; it would be difficult to like him or to loathe him; it is as impossible to feel any deep sympathy for him in his vicissitudes, as it is to be touched by the fortunes of the symbol " x ," when, with its companions in misery, it gets multiplied by " m ," or raised to a higher power, or compelled (with shame) to take a lower room. The other persons of the drama are almost equally mathematical, with the exception of a vivid little group of French people, whom Jack meets when he is a prisoner of war. For Jack Morgan is taken prisoner by the Frenchmen of the "Great Days" (the Revolutionary and Napoleonic eras); he was privateering when it happened. His real line of business is smuggling, and his father keeps an inn near Dover. He has had much to endure from the local gentry, so he is pleased with regenerated France. He marries the daughter of Colonel Caressa, governor of the prison, and a Napoleonic enthusiast. The marriage is a failure, and is really only an episode; it helps to swell the rich cloud of misunderstandings that obscure the path to the real heroine. Later in the story Jack gets into touch with Charles James Fox, and very near the end he has an interview with Napoleon, who tempts him as from an exceeding high mountain; he has only to show him how the Boulogne flotilla can be got across.

The book is not one of Mr. Harris' best. It is moralised Henty, with thumb-nail sketches—good thumb-nail sketches—of big men, and some excellent general and particular historical propositions. There are naval combats and a fight with fisticuffs. The rest is a cold-blooded catalogue of the usual problems of life, among which Mr. Harris seems to reckon the phenomena of snobbishness almost inordinately high.

A Summer in Cornwall. By M. E. CURTOIS. (Digby, Long and Co. 6s.)

THE title of the book is a deceptive one, for it is a name and nothing more. There is no description of any part of Cornwall, and the background might equally well have been Tierra del Fuego. A delicate young husband and a pretty child wife take up their residence for the summer in Cornwall, followed by a set of very bad, and very mischievous, society people, who also hire a house in the neighbourhood. The machinations of the latter are successful and terminate in tragedy for those against whom they are directed. We have been unable to discover in this somewhat sordid story any trace of redeeming beauty or dignity.

The Quest of the Dream. By EDNA K. WALLIS. (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 6s.)

DORIA FRENCH, in pursuit of the dream, passed through many experiences, of which she tells in sentimental, schoolgirl style. Some of her descriptions of sunsets and scenery are very good work, and some are merely bathos—especially when a Yankee colloquialism breaks in on a piece of high-flown imagery. In this respect the book consists of very uneven work, for the author knows little of the great gift of restraint, and thus easily descends to mere sentimentality. In the end, Doria finds a man of her dreams in David Hartnell, a painter, and then David discovers a new technique of painting in which he wishes to perfect himself—to the exclusion of Doria from his life. The whole story is told in the form of letters, a method of composition which causes us to feel that we never get quite near these people—they are never real to us. Both are nearest reality in the letters which tell how Doria was willing to go to David and be with him in poverty while he mastered his new technique, while David persistently refused to have her. The end, with its "faith creative in its vision and its power," is hardly convincing; it is either a great realisation or a great mistake, and we are not sure which. Perhaps they were happy; perhaps David realised his artistic self and Doria her dream—but their marriage was a risky experiment. We trust that in her next book the author will realise the drawbacks attendant on the letter-writing form of fiction, also that she will write with more restraint.

Julia and I in Canada. By the Author of "Daphne in the Fatherland." (Andrew Melrose. 6s.)

"DAPHNE" in Canada is the Daphne of the Fatherland over again; opinionated, not a little priggish, and thoroughly confident that she knows Canadian business considerably better than the inhabitants of the country. Then there is Julia, a little more self-sufficient, who in the end marries some man who has our deepest sympathy, after teaching the Canadians how to run Canada—although the series of lectures with which she proceeds to enlighten the natives is cloaked by a species of badinage which merely aggravates her offence. Julia and "Priscilla" (Daphne's pseudonym for this volume) confined their tour to the Eastern States. There is an enlightening passage in the book on German missionary methods as compared with the English system, but we would commend the author to study German colonising methods and the success which attends them in Damaraland—not that colonising has any relation to missionary work, but she is so coolly contemptuous of British methods that a view of the other side might prove beneficial. We trust that the Canadian people will pay attention to the author's statement of the way in which their country should be run, and remodel their habits accordingly.

The Road to the Open. By ARTHUR SCHNITZLER. (Howard Latimer. 6s.)

ALTHOUGH this book treats of an immoral subject—as English people view these things—we cannot look on the book itself as immoral, for its lesson is too thoroughly, terribly patent for the story to do other than good to those who read it. The central character is George von Wergenthin, an Austrian baron, a self-centred musician, and a libertine. The story is that of George's relations with Anna Rosner, but it is in the detailed manner of telling that the value of the book lies. The subject is undoubtedly painful, but it is relieved by the skilful sketching in of a small crowd of characters, every one of whom impresses us as a personality, while the picture of Austrian social life is as ruthless as it is vivid. Anti-Semitism versus Semitism haunts the story in a King Charles' head fashion; but this is a subject on which English readers are scarcely competent to judge clearly, since in this country the Jew receives far different treatment from that meted out to him in Austria. Nearly every page is characterised by epigram, which the translator has taken good care to preserve. For instance, "The world would perhaps get on better if parents would more frequently learn by the experiences of their children instead of asking their children to adapt themselves to their own hoary wisdom," a truth that merits more frequent expression. Here is strong meat, certainly, but here is also a very powerful work, and a word of thanks is due to the translator for having done such thorough justice to the original.

Annuals

Penrose's Pictorial Annual comes this season for the nineteenth time with its articles of interest to all those engaged in process work, cover designs and the various details in connection with the printer's art; while for persons less versed in these technicalities the many beautiful illustrations will be a great attraction. In reviewing the year's work Mr. William Gamble, the Editor, among other matters, contrasts the merits of intaglio printing as compared with the use of half-tone blocks. He states that "in the near future half-tone blocks will be displaced to a considerable extent in illustrated books and journals, and probably also in our more important daily and weekly newspapers. It seems to be conclusively proved that intaglio-printed illustrations have hit the public taste better than half-tones." Many who have had experience of half-tone blocks know full well that the printed result is often very unsatisfactory and will gladly welcome their displacement by others giving more satisfactory results.

With regard to the many beautiful reproductions we would especially mention "Nature Study," an instantaneous colour photograph, the negatives of which are by the Polychrome Company, London and New York. For a catalogue illustration of metal ware, that facing page fifty-six is excellent. Tinted paper always helps to display well photos printed on it; hence "New-haven Fishwives," "Water Lilies," "A Water Mill on the Battlefield of Towton, Yorkshire," and "Mending the Herring Nets," are very charming pictures which would look well mounted and put in small frames. The book on the whole is a most creditable production, and, as we have said previously, will be welcomed with equal pleasure by artist and mechanic.

The yearly volume of Messrs. Hachette and Co.'s popular magazine, Lectures pour Tous, now in its sixteenth year, is a handsome one of over sixteen hundred pages which teem with choice engravings and excellent letterpress. These cover a vast field, both entertaining and instructive, and many prominent artists and leading writers of the day have collaborated in their production. A contribution likely to attract considerable attention is "L'Ane Rouge," owing to the recent lamented death of the author, M. Jules Claretie of the French Academy. It is a delightful story in which love and the supernatural play prominent parts. Other Academicians who contribute are M. Henri de Régnier, with "La Femme dont je rêve," M. Frédéric Masson writing on the Empress Marie-Louise, and the Marquis de Ségur with an appreciation of M. Louis Barthou's recent work on Mirabeau. Lectures pour Tous is a vast collection of choice and varied illustrated literature, and, as its name implies, it caters for all and sundry.

The Christmas Number of La Vie Heureuse, issued by the same publishers, is full of coloured illustrations, some good, and some very indifferent, especially those of the Second Empire, where a dark blue predominates in place of a darkish green, the colour required by history, so far as regards the hunts at Fontainebleau and elsewhere. Nevertheless, the number will doubtlessly appeal to those who are not too hypercritical.

Nelson's "Year Book," for 1914, is a very useful little volume. It contains a fund of information, which, though not exhaustive, nevertheless, covers a large ground, and you may find, in this small volume, facts which you often waste many hours in seeking for elsewhere.

An illustrated lecture will be given by the President of the Scottish Society, Loudon MacQueen Douglas, F.R.S.E., on Tuesday, January 6, in the Scottish National Portrait Gallery, 1, Queen Street, Edinburgh, at 8 p.m. The subject will be "The Wearing of the Kilt," and the illustrations will consist of a large series of coloured and other lantern slides, specially prepared for this lecture from many unique publications, both ancient and modern. Admission will be free, and members of the Scottish Society and others are requested to attend in the Scottish national dress.

Some Realities of Irish Life*

IN the romantic history of Europe, no episode is more interesting than the clash between the Teutonic peoples and the Celtic race. It is interwoven in the West with the story of fifteen centuries. Through all that long period the overpowering Teuton has despised and misunderstood the race which he has conquered. Nowhere is this aversion more apparent than in Ireland. Here no political absorption has ever been possible. Divided by the sea, here the Celt has maintained his hated individuality. His gifted and poetic imagination, his refinement of feeling, his romantic mysticism, his weakness and resignation, all these delicate characteristics merely filled the conquerors with contempt. Even the power to develop which he undoubtedly possessed was denied to the Celt in Ireland. In the Middle Ages, when he had to contend against a ceaseless war for conquest, the conquerors scouted all idea of the self-development of a national civilisation. By a cruel assumption, the Celt was proclaimed incapable of success in his own land. A more cruel because practical repression of agriculture, industry, and commerce gained for the Celt the reputation of idleness. For three hundred years there was added, until the early days of the last century, the horror of religious persecution. So Ireland stood "the Niobe of nations," afflicted by every kind of sorrow, barbarous and refined. Even now, though for near one hundred years England has been essaying reparation, the misunderstanding of the Celtic spirit continues. At the same time the English outlook across the Channel is very different from that of fifty years ago. Many factors have contributed to the breaking down of prejudice.

More English people visit Ireland, and, though their observation is often superficial, there now exists a feeling of less prejudice. Folk-lore, the Gaelic League, and Mr. W. B. Yeats have produced quite a cult in Oxford and London, a little esoteric, perhaps, and somewhat circumscribed as a real influence, but still evidence of a view of Ireland quite impossible in mid-Victorian England. Books like the "Reminiscences of an Irish R.M." and Mr. "G. A. Birmingham's" delightful and humorous stories have a widespread popularity, and have done much to introduce Englishmen to the lighter side of Irish life. In "Irishmen All" Canon Hannay writes in more serious vein; though humorous as ever, he shows that he is a master of subtle irony and gentle satire in these twelve character sketches of different types of Irishmen.

Knowing Ireland well, we can say securely that we have seldom read any studies which show so penetrating an insight. Many are unable to see beyond the masquerade of wit and fun which covers the deep reserve of the Celt. But in these sketches the veil is partially lifted, and one finds many glimpses into the realities of motive, of life, and of character. Nor is there any evasion of the ever present problem of politics and religion, which are treated with a fairness and detachment quite remarkable in Ireland (we trust that we give no offence) among those of the author's class and position.

* Irishmen All. By GEORGE A. BIRMINGHAM. With Twelve Illustrations in Colour by JACK B. YEATS, R.H.A. (T. N. Foulis. 5s. net.)

The principal portraits, for such they may be called, are those of The Greater and the Lesser Officials, The Country Gentleman, The Squireen, The Politician, The Farmer, The Publican, The Parish Priest, and The Minister. If space would allow, each is worthy of quotation. But a few extracts must suffice. The Higher Official is a type of the man who, "in Ireland, at all events, arranges and directs the great ballet of Government. His place is in the wings. Politicians of one sort or another do the pirouetting and mince across the stage . . . the public applauds or hoots them; but Bates is the man who devises their antics for them." It is customary among "patriots" to inveigh against Chief Secretaries and Lords-Lieutenant; among others to suppose that they really do govern. Acquaintance with men like Bates gives a very different impression. A man of quiet reserve, of kindly cynicism, of quick penetration, of infinite humour to see "the amusing side of all causes, the absurdities of all political and social creeds," yet an altruist withal, able to understand men and things, and therefore able to govern.

Without offering any opinion on the vexed question of Home Rule, we can readily understand the comments of the average Englishman on reading the sketch of a "Politician." "A nice mess," he would say, "they'll be in, if that is the sort of members Ireland will have." For Timothy Sweeny was a broken-down and ruined shop-keeper, cunning, clever, and determined to rise again by hook or by crook. So Timothy engineered politics for his own ends, and now "he is a great man, a member of Parliament and gets £400 a year for that." But underlying all the sardonic irony of this sketch there is an impression that both Timothy and the voters who elected him are really shrewder men than you might suppose.

We pass to a sketch of an Irish farmer and his wife, a scene of real beauty and pathos, as the fine old man of seventy-five—he had been a hale man all his life—lies on his death-bed, the result of an accident. He had worked hard for sixty years. Once he had spent seven years reclaiming, by his own toil, acres of waste land on the hillside, strewn thickly with great grey stones, among which the whins grew, a blaze of golden blossom in those old summer days of his youth, where now, as he lies a-dying, his sons are saving the hard-won haycrop. "They're cutting the hay," said Mrs. Blake, "and it's a grand crop, thanks be to God." The working of the League had prevented any addition to his rent on account of the reclaimed land. But the League had also caused murder, bloodshed, and terrorism. So James Blake's last words to his patient wife were, "Let not John be meddling with any of their League work, either good or bad."

During the revolution he had worked on, and the crops on the hillside ripened, as those of the ploughman in Zola's "Débâcle," who "drove his white horse across and across a hillside near Sedan, while the French guns thundered against the quickly closing circle of German steel." So this little bit of fertile land became "a more enduring monument than the rich man's tablet of brass."

Those who talk glibly about the dangers of priestly domination in Ireland should read the chapter on the Parish Priest, and the wonderfully fair estimate of the different types of secular priests to-day. Some "are men of strong practical common sense, rarely the victims of spiritual snobbishness or political clap-trap. They have the interests of their people sincerely at heart, and give sound and disinterested advice to those who need it."

But there is another class of priest—the overbearing seminarist, who has no saving grace of humour or humanity. "It is men of this type" (which is rather new and modern) "who constitute the real danger to the power of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland." Still, there are many men of the Spirit who are really both the temporal and spiritual friends of the people. So, also, are many "ministers" of the Church of Ireland, men like the clergyman whose picture is so graphically drawn, who took the highest honours in classics and has spent nearly all his life in an utterly remote little rectory, twenty miles or so from a station, with some forty scattered souls to look after. Yet here, in such unstimulating environment, "Harold Burnaby and his wife have done something for Ireland too," outside the charmed circle of "politicians, philosophers, poets, reformers, founders of leagues, prophets of ideas, or any of the great tribe of evangelists." In fact, it is the misfortune of Ireland that she has too many patriots, "more, indeed, than any other country of the same size." But those who would know something of Irishmen as they really are, and as they really live and move, apart from the theories of either patriots or reformers, faddists or philanthropists, should read the fascinating pages of "Irishmen All." They will be delighted, too, with the capital illustrations of typical Irishmen, reproduced in coloured miniature from oil paintings by Mr. J. B. Yeats of the Royal Hibernian Academy.

P. A. M. S.

Beginning with the January number, The Century will cease to issue an English edition, and the magazine will no longer be found generally on English and Continental news-stalls. Persons desiring to receive the Century regularly should in future remit their subscriptions to the Century Company through their English agents, T. Werner Laurie, Ltd., Clifford's Inn, London.

An Aspect Overlooked

IT is customary and proper for a novelist to pause for a moment before finally collecting the separated threads of his narrative, and to endeavour to trace some logical coherence in the succession of events he has narrated. This opportunity has been used with happy effect by Mr. Arnold Bennett towards the close of one of his most carefully finished and artistic books, "The Old Wives' Tale." The current of life which has so long divided the two sisters, leaving one to vegetate in the shallows of a provincial draper's shop, and sweeping the other through crowded years of Paris, the Second Empire, the Siege, and the Commune, has at last drifted them together again in the quiet resting-place of the Five Towns. Their lives have been remote in feeling as well as experience. One has lived diffusely, the other intensely. The elder accepts existence without analysis; the younger feels acutely how strange it is that she who has undergone so much, and can look upon her birthplace with alien eyes, should be the very selfsame she, unaltered in essence, who grew there from girl to woman, unconscious of the turmoil of her future. And yet she, too, comes to a similar attitude of amused resignation. "After all," she thinks, with a shrug, "life is like that." There are some calamities in it, but many small pleasures; the daily commonplace events bulk larger than the great happenings. There is much matter for wonder, but much more with which to be content.

The remark is not, perhaps, very profound; it offers no solution of the eternal problems; but to the mind of the reader straight from a surfeit of modern fiction it comes with a curious freshness and force. For many of our best living novelists, the men who have really contributed something to English literature, have done most of their work on quite an opposite theory. They select only such aspects of things as will fit in with a premeditated scheme adjusted to their own temperaments. Take an example deservedly honoured, Mr. Thomas Hardy. Nobody at the present day would deny his eminence in letters or his distinction in the world of character-study; his peasants are in some sort immortal; and although the construction of plots is not his strongest point, still, taken singly, they are not incredible and rarely even improbable. But when we look back upon the series of volumes, and consider the sum total of his work, we realise that the general effect is untrue. "Life is not like that," we think impatiently. "These things never happened." The tone is too menacing. There is no malice in Fate, nor does the world conspire against humanity.

In like manner we rebel against Mr. Galsworthy, who "revolves the sad vicissitudes of things" so painfully and so long. We turn naturally away from the dreary wilderness, unilluminated by purpose, thought, or humour, that the late George Gissing discovered in Suburbia. Since Mr. Wells abandoned the kindly everyday sphere of shop assistants, and school teachers, and country actors, and general servants, that he painted with so much insight and sympathy, and hit upon his more recent vein of aggressive reform, we feel that the parting of the ways has come in his case also. We refuse to believe in the wholesale immorality of everybody, we are not convinced that a plain church marriage is the inevitable prelude to disaster, and we incline to doubt what appears to be his fundamental axiom, that the salvation of the world can be worked out only by efficient and unspeakable cads. We are equally unconvinced by Mr. Hichens, the leader of quite another and much more sophisticated school. His characters exist solely for the abnormal; they develop passions for statues and precious stones, or fraternise with renegade monks in the Sahara, or thrill with sinister emotions at orchestral concerts. Such things are uncharacteristic, not merely of common life, but of any life. We do not move so closely upon the borders of the morbid and the supernatural as he would have us imagine. Even the most decadent of men spend much the largest portion of their time in ordinary commonplace ways. After all, the Bank and the beef-steak and the omnibus are necessary facts too. The art of a Shakespeare or a Dickens would not neglect what enters so largely into the web of daily life.

The truth of the matter is that we are unreasonably afraid of the obvious. The atmosphere we deem essential in fiction, and strive so hard to create, is only a distorting medium; the remote characters whose emotions we analyse so subtly are really less interesting than the man next door, if we had only the courage to believe it. The commonplace has one outstanding merit: it is the best to live with. The platitude has become a platitude from its constant and vital truth; that is what saves it from extinction. It has (to use a convenient Americanism) "made good" for so long, it has proved serviceable to so many different generations, that it cannot be wise to neglect it altogether. The brilliant unusual things are wrong more often than the dull common things, although we are inclined to act as if we thought otherwise. Bread-and-butter is not exciting, but it does not exasperate; while, as the Colonel in "Patience" discovered, if you have toffee for breakfast, toffee for lunch, toffee for dinner, even toffee can become monotonous. Of late we have dined rather too freely on toffee, and our palate is getting jaded. The toffee was good toffee, and we admit the ability of the men who made it for us, but we have come to want something else. We weary for plain joints and vegetables once more. We want to see plate-glass views instead of tinted impressions; and we are ready to welcome the novelist who will show us ordinary men and women treading their daily round in the main with enjoyment, and facing evil with fortitude when the inevitable accidents of life beset them on their way.

F. C. M.

The Tyranny of Games

A GAME, whether indoor or outdoor, may conceivably be a good servant, but will always prove a bad master. It should, like sport of every kind, provide relaxation from work, and should be neither a fetish nor a business. Its object is to pass the time pleasantly, not by way of killing it—have we so long to live that we need talk of killing time?—but as a source of agreeable distraction, with an element of not unfriendly rivalry essential to the fullest enjoyment of the best games. The rivalry need not, however, be of the purse. The barbarous Uriankhai of Central Asia are content to wrestle strenuously for no greater reward than a cheese, which the victor habitually flings as largesse to the crowd. It took a higher civilisation to produce the professional footballer, the pride of Millwall or Tottenham, the darling of ten thousand of his fellows who lack both the inclination and opportunity to take any more active part than cheering him to victory. Time was when football was a healthy game for the half-holidays of schoolboys, or even for men up at the Universities, and it ought never to have been allowed to degenerate into a wage-earning business, attaining to the publicity of special editions, ousting news of world-wide importance, furnishing material for demoralising newspaper competitions and attracting immense hordes of weedy admirers who cheer the heroes of Blackheath as madly as Americans cheer their "ball" men at Philadelphia or Detroit, or Canadians their lacrosse teams at Toronto.

What football is to the working class, that, and more, is golf to those in better circumstances, and its sway is more personal. Originally a pastime favoured by humble folk in its Scotch home, it is become the obsession of those in high places, the mania of people otherwise sane, the lodestar of the week-end recess, the perennial topic of conversation in railway compartment and in clubs. Would that its vogue were confined to the week-end! Such restraint could rouse no hostile thought, since even the old school motto insists that, once the books are put away, tempus est ludendi. Unfortunately, even those who are able to play golf on only two days of the week talk and dream of nothing else during the other five, and there are few better illustrations of monkeys chattering on the shores of the Dead Sea than the normal conversation of a couple of golfing enthusiasts penned in a railway carriage during a long non-stop run.

Golf is at least a wholesome outdoor recreation, but what shall be said of the tyranny of bridge, with its offshoot, auction, played in a stifling atmosphere, and so tyrannical as to have slain the arts of dining and conversation that it may add empty pockets to empty heads? The bridge-talker is more contentious than even the golfer. When he cannot deal cards he talks them, and his dogma touching leads and declarations would be offensive if it were not childish. Unlike some other forms of gaming, bridge is a quasi-scientific pursuit. The bucks and bloods of other days were, it is true, so dominated by the tables that they would cheerfully cut down the last tree on their broad acres to meet their losses at hazard, but at least they were too well bred to obtrude their views on faro in polite society. The modern bridge enthusiast shows no such mercy. For him, the rights and wrongs of the last rubber are an absorbing topic of what he fondly regards as conversation.

Billiards has no such pernicious hold on those who are not slow to own its fascination. It provides a ready means of passing an hour in a friendly contest of skill. Gambling is no part of its enjoyment, and it need not be marred by any discord. Occasionally, no doubt, its even tenour is interrupted by the gentle flow of mild invective loosed by an abnormal penchant for "fluking," but it is rarely a contentious, and never a tyrannical, game. Nor can it well furnish an engrossing topic of small-talk away from the table, since it is exceedingly difficult to discuss a stroke without illustrating it, and the best stroke to play is not, like the correct card to lead, a question of exact science, but purely a matter of taste.

It is only grown-up folk, who ought to know better, that we find bowing in this foolish way to the tyranny of any game. Schoolboys are truer to themselves. Most of them like cricket in moderation, yet when it becomes compulsory in the excess prescribed by the short-sighted etiquette of most public schools, they simply "cut" it, even at the risk of personal chastisement, and seek variety in the swimming-bath or even out of bounds along the highways and hedges. For their stalwart refusal to acknowledge the absolute power of what a contemporary likes to call King Willow, they are made to write out lines, or even to feel the cane. It may be that such discipline is essential, even on half-holidays, to the proper working of the system; yet, so long as the boys keep out of mischief and spend their time in the open air, it seems a little ridiculous that they should be severely punished for preferring one recreation to another, at any rate as a matter of variety from the business of the nets. Who knows but this early compulsion to play cricket or hockey at school leaves its mark on them in after life so that, true to type, they continue to give to other games, not one of which will bear comparison to cricket, the allegiance exacted from them in the days when the most dreaded invitation they could receive was a summons to the headmaster's study after morning school?

Messrs. Constable & Co. are publishing immediately a translation of M. Louis Bertrand's "Saint Augustin," which was recently reviewed in THE ACADEMY. The work of translation has been done by Mr. Vincent O'Sullivan, and, in view of the keen interest which M. Bertrand's book has excited, the publishers anticipate a great appreciation of it in its new form.

The Great Clan Donald*

ANOTHER book by the author of "Coke of Norfolk and His Friends" is welcome. The history of the great Clan Donald, from the early days of Somerled and Conn of a Hundred Fights to the present time, is full of romance and stirring incident. Accounts of valiant Scottish chiefs, grim battles, quaint stratagems, acts of horrible vengeance, love affairs, and amusing anecdotes are given with a fascinating sprightliness of style, and those who are Scotch will doubtless study with avidity the Pedigree and Appendices. The latter contain a list of "wedding cloaths" worn by the wife of Alexander, ninth Baronet Macdonald of the Isles and first Lord Macdonald of Slate. In this lengthy list, which reminds us of an elementary sum in arithmetic, we would rather work out as a problem than pay as a bill, we learn that "12 Holland Shifts, 7d. per ell," cost £7 6s. 11d., while "17½ yds. silverground silver flowers, £3 3s.," reach the alarming figure of £55 2s. 6d.

We are told that Somerled's looking-glass was the stream, the heel of his shoe his drinking-cup, and that he much preferred to spear a salmon than to slaughter a foe. When this peaceful sportsman was asked to sail away and become Chief of Skye, he made the following characteristic speech: "Islesmen, there's a newly run salmon in the black pool yonder. If I catch him, I will go with you as your chief; if I catch him not, I shall remain where I am." It so happened that the salmon was caught, and never was a fish landed with greater joy or with more far-reaching and beneficial consequences. Somerled lost no time in ridding the Isles of his foes. On one occasion, while on a small island with only a hundred followers, he was besieged by the Norwegian fleet. Realising that he and his men were likely to be defeated, he adopted the following ingenious stratagem:—"The whole force under his command being clothed in goats' skins, he ordered the Highlanders to march round the island with their colours flying and their bagpipes playing. This attracted attention, and the moment his troops had passed out of sight, the men were desired to turn their coats inside out, and with this altered exterior, and a different gathering played on the bagpipes, they marched past the Norwegian fleet again. Having completed this singular metamorphosis several times, the invaders became intimidated at the number of regiments apparently mustering to oppose them, and set sail without beat of drum. This is the only instance on record when a Lord of the Isles became a turncoat."

There was a bitter feud between Hugh and his kinsman, Chief Donald Gorme Mor, or Big Blue Donald. When Hugh's Castle was on the eve of completion, he plotted to slay his Chief. He gave a great feast, and wrote a letter of invitation to Donald, in which he "expressed penitence for the past and craved forgiveness for the future." Having written this hypocritical letter, he penned another to a fellow-conspirator, and it so happened that the plan for assassination was accidentally sent to Donald, while the conspirator had the surprise of reading the epistle intended for the Chief. Donald fully appreciated the mistake, and entered into the matter with considerable zest. He invited Hugh to Duntulum Castle, whither the unsuspecting rogue repaired. No sooner had the guest entered the castle than he was thrown into a dungeon, allowed to starve for a time, and finally given a large quantity of very salt beef. Having devoured the meat, he was afflicted with a violent thirst which was never assuaged. We are told that he endeavoured to scrape a hole through the wall with the shin-bone of the ox. He nearly succeeded, but strength failed him, and he died raving mad, "having in his agony torn to pieces with his teeth the pewter dish on which the beef had lain." It is difficult to find extenuating circumstances for this cruel act of vengeance, but it is wholly impossible to excuse Big Blue Donald for the way he got rid of his lawful wife in order that he might bestow his love elsewhere. The unfortunate lady "had lost an eye—whether through matrimonial dissension, history does not reveal—and Blue Donald when he cast her out mounted her upon a one-eyed horse, led by a one-eyed boy, and followed by a one-eyed dog." It was a vicious jest, and Donald paid dearly for an insult that can scarcely be surpassed.

Boswell has been aptly described as the king of bores, and, as bores are invariably lacking in sensitiveness, he was scarcely less distinguished for being one of the most tactless of men. His famous "Tour in the Hebrides" is referred to in the volume before us, in so far as it affects the Clan Donald. Boswell expected that the head of the Macdonalds would be surrounded by his clan, and that he and his master would participate in many a festive entertainment. He writes: "We had a small company, and we cannot boast of our cheer." Boswell and Johnson heard many tales respecting the parsimony of their host. Johnson observes: "Boswell had some thoughts of collecting them and making a novel of his life!" It is good to find the offensive Boswell referred to in the following lines of Walcot:—

Loud of thy tour a thousand tongues have spoken
And wondered that thy bones were never broken.

Let Lord Macdonald threat thy breech to kick,
And o'er thy shrinking shoulders shake his stick.

We must pass over two chapters entitled "The Diary of a Sassenach," containing a graphic description of a journey to, and a sojourn in, Skye, and turn to the very romantic story of Louisa Maria and Godfrey Macdonald. Here, surely, is material for a very diverting novel. The story occupies many pages, from the time when the young Louisa played battledore and shuttlecock to a runaway marriage and the final righting of a great wrong. What that wrong was and precisely how true were the loves of Godfrey and Louisa we leave to the reader, assured that he will peruse these pages, and those that precede them, with more than usual interest.

* Macdonald of the Isles. A Romance of the Past and Present. By A. M. W. STIRLING. Illustrated. (John Murray. 12s. net.)

Sand and Spinifex

BY A WANDERER.

THE Arabs have a pleasing tradition to the effect that Allah, who is all-wise, and whose ninety-nine attributes are daily recited by the Faithful, planted the Sahara with sand and aloes, and then laughed at the result of his work; a ghastly legend, to appreciate the full horror of which one should hear it for the first time, as I did, when riding a weary horse over the burning carpet of the Great Thirst. The desert has achieved quite a vogue as a background of romance, and, glimpsed from the carefully stage-managed environs of Cairo, or edited by the fantastic imagination of Mr. Hichens, it may, no doubt, assume the glamour called for in the artistic stage of a burning passion between adventurous lovers, who, the world forgetting, would fain be by the world forgot. All this is very creditable to the literary and dramatic art of those who have so transmogrified the hideous reality as actually to rouse a desire for closer acquaintance in the bosom of those jaded children of civilisation who, either in their own library or from their stall at the St. James's Theatre, turned their dreamy eyes towards the Garden of Allah and envied those refugees from the conventions who hid their unholy loves in its parched solitudes. What, I wonder, would these tender, if somewhat unhinged, maidens have thought of the real thing? Bitterly, I trow, they would have regretted the shady side of Bond Street, the lounge at the Carlton, and their favourite golf course. For there is no romance whatever about the real desert. Its nomad Bedawin are not eagle-eyed kings of men, breathing the perfumes of Araby and inspired with such high-souled ideals of honour as we read of in those who of old defended the Sepulchre against Christian chivalry, but tatterdemalion thieves, exceedingly unclean in their habits, ripe for any petty larceny, tyrannising over their weaker neighbours and fawning before armed Europeans, save where, with safety in numbers, they can attack them without risk of repulse.

Sunrise over the desert is among the themes which have driven fluent pens inspired by eyes that perchance never saw the sun rise over any scene more exalted than Margate sands; but, down in Africa, it is the hour that heralds yet another breathless day of painful trekking or wearisome halt. The sun may be friendly enough to those who know him at his worst in an English August, and those who rarely see his face may long for more intimate acquaintance. To them, however, that dwell under his scourge, he is the enemy and tyrant of their race, and it is a fact that the children of the desert, who know it best, also hate it most.

As I rode over the dreadful stony plain, called Behara ou Guentoor—the meaning of this Arabic I know not, but it should be synonymous with Tophet—and Mohammed acquainted me with the manner in which Allah laughed at his handiwork, I felt the callous cruelty of it, and knew that only in kinder climes could men have imagined a God of Love. For those born under the Sun, a fiercer deity, a God of Vengeance, alone could command fear and homage; and as my wretched horse, which was carrying me inland to Marrakesh, shambled painfully over the shimmering sand and loose stones, the sardonic humour of the nightmare around me was suddenly evident. What a travesty of vegetation! Garden of Allah, indeed! With its cactus and prickly pear, its palmetto, its clinging thorns, defensive and aggressive, and the occasional clump of skeleton palms to emphasise the treeless monotony of the rest! Here, of a truth, was a garden for the damned. Mr. Hichens had not yet written his amazing story, and I never came across him, though I once missed him by no more than a few hours on the shore of Galilee, and would have been glad to ride with him over the Plain of Jericho that hot April day and to congratulate him on the romance of it all.

There are two obvious products of these waterless tracts, and they are the nomad and the camel. Of the nomad, the less said, perhaps, the better. Jabal was the reputed father of them that dwell in tents, and from earliest times down to the modern poultry-stealing gipsy his offspring have been a pretty lot of ruffians, picturesque, no doubt, to civilised folk who occasionally play at camp life, but ever a thorn in the side of their law-abiding neighbours of settled abode. The camel, considered, at any rate, apart from the environment it fits so well, is almost as unspeakable. It is unusual for me to harbour unkindly feelings towards any living creature on four legs, short, perhaps, of a hyæna, but, even after weeks in its company, when it carried all my slender belongings far from railways, it never won a place in my affections. Its utility was above all question, but so in its proper place is that of a luggage van, and my love for the two is about the same. The camel is pre-eminently the child of the desert, enduring, brutish, apathetic, suspicious, vindictive, proof against good fortune and adversity alike. It must, I imagine, be the most unemotional animal on the face of the earth. Compared with it a public hangman and a tax-collector are hysterical. I have seen one bear its driver's blows, administered with whole-hearted zeal, as indifferently as it would have borne the caresses that never came. I have times and again let my own meal in camp wait while I saw the camels fed, and gone near having my hand bitten off for venturing too close to the objects of my solicitude. The camel will bear any burden save that of gratitude, of the need for which, to be sure, it has little enough experience. It is almost perfect physically; morally, it is about all that an animal should not be. Yet who, knowing its home, can blame it? One does not dig for diamonds in the pit of Hawiyat!

The Garden of Allah is a Garden of Death. It has no flowers, save only the scanty blossom of the prickly pear or the fleeting pink of the bitter oleander. Its birds are the ghoulish vultures that gorge on the festering remains of them that fall by the way. Perhaps its most consummate cruelty is the illusion of the mirage. When you have ridden for hours with this false promise of water ever receding in the middle distance, it needs little eloquence to convince you of the laughter of Allah. You can hear it.

The Theatre

Some Christmas Nights' Entertainments

DRURY LANE

HAPPY days! Happy days! is the agreeable refrain that runs through the many melodies of "The Sleeping Beauty Re-awakened." Happy days of insouciant youth, happy days of bald-headed and "transformation" decorated maturity. It is the oft-repeated burden on the stage at Drury Lane, it is re-echoed again and again throughout the vast and glittering auditorium. To be privileged to see one more Boxing Night entertainment here is to realise the eternal youth of cities and to gain a glimpse of the easy and generous happiness of mankind.

We do not pretend to a devotion to this particular form of stage art, but we at least understand its appeal and appreciate the heavy labours of the management which enable it to place before its delighted patrons an enormous and lively show, which, beginning at seven o'clock, does not end until after midnight. Perhaps the endeavours of Mr. Arthur Collins and his many co-workers have been lightened a little this year because, for the first time at Drury Lane, they have done what has so often been accomplished in musical comedy, and given us a second edition of last year's success. But, of course, there are a hundred new inventions and subtle changes in the elaborate fairy-play—and then there is a new generation for pantomime every year.

In most cases the cast is filled by the same amusing, gifted and beautiful people as heretofore. But each of these is surer and more victorious in their curious or attractive characters. Miss Florence Smithson, as the beauty who sleeps so gracefully, gives us a Princess Marcella who delights the house. Her voice is clearer, her manner more delicate, her pathos more artificially touching than heretofore. She is a Dresden china princess of the best period, and goes a-pair with the handsome Prince Auriol—who is for a time a gardener and, for a little while, a very harmless kind of beast of legend. This is, of course, Mr. Wilfrid Douthitt, whose fine singing fills the wide span of the Theatre Royal with gorgeous melody.

Better than ever are those well-contrasted comedians, Mr. George Graves and Mr. Will Evans. The first is the Duke of Monte Blanco—whose second wife is the attractive but sadly wicked fairy, Anarchista, who makes him a scarecrow for years and years—and the other, the Chancellor Pompos, but it does not matter in the least who they represent. They really appear to us as two delightful old friends who have come once more together to amuse us and, incidentally, to enjoy themselves and our enjoyment of their queer, honest humour and gay devices. The present edition of "The Sleeping Beauty" gives them a fairly free hand, and in scenes a little beyond the region of the fairy story, in which they work together with a will, they are delightfully funny after a curious fashion which would, we believe, be quite impossible outside England. These two actors and Mr. Stanley Lupino as the ill-bred person who has for the time being taken the place of the rightful Prince, provide most of the fun of the night.

As for the rest, there is Arcadia and beauty, all kinds of fairies and fairy dreams, lovely dresses and, as was the case last year, the most beautiful scenery ever used in a pantomime. Notwithstanding the long interludes of comic business, the long-reaching fairy story, the immense quantity of spectacle—

. . . . No one is bored; bright eyes meet eyes
Still brighter, for they lack disguise,
Life sweetly comes, but never flies in this agreeable land of seasonable delights.

This general effect of gaiety and completeness is greatly helped by the authors' invention of the character of Puck, who brings together the human world and the realm of fairyland with easy, confident grace. Puck is, of course, Miss Renée Mayer, whose success last year is greatly increased. She has wit and skill, she dances delightfully, and sings as sweetly as the nightingale. One of the most entrancing numbers in the whole performance is the song and dance which Miss Mayer gives on the borderland of the fairy world and the sleeping beauty's palace. With the support of a crowd of charming sprites playing on bells, she sings and dances with extraordinary élan and humour, but it is her continued vivacity throughout the whole entertainment that most astonishes her audience, for she speaks the first and last words, and is not far from the gorgeous scene at any moment of the play. Mr. Arthur Collins always has victories, but the present pantomime is one of his greatest.

THE LYCEUM

MR. WALTER and Mr. Frederick Melville have induced Mr. Newman Maurice to write just the right sort of gay and ridiculous children's pantomime which fits with the democratic spirit of the moment. "Babes in the Wood" is full of fun and character, lively songs, beautiful dances—and dancers—and bright scenes. The Babes themselves are played by two clever little people named on the programme Ray and Zack. Whenever they are on the stage they hold the audience's attention with ease and grace; they sing, and act, and dance, and make merry or are sad with admirable effect and unflagging courage. They are supported by a dozen extraordinary and amusing people. Mr. Harry Weldon is the son of their wicked uncle, one of the most complicated people ever seen in a pantomime, for he plays at least a hundred parts and is sure of laughter in all of them.

Then the Bold Robbers, who eventually have so long and so comic a fight, Mr. Alexandre and Mr. Hughes, are full of the highest spirits and the most curious ideas. They are in and out of the pantomime at all times, and always lighten and brighten it. The wildly funny policemen, Mr. Woodhouse and Mr. Wells—the fat one is very harshly treated when he becomes a schoolboy in a nice pinafore—are also ready at any moment with some side-splitting piece of knock-about fun.

There is the graceful Miss Daisy James as Maid Marian, with charming songs and delicate romance. There is Miss Jane Eyre as the ever famous boy of pantomime, Robin Hood, whose fine voice and form give a certain distinction to the long production. And there are hundreds of other clever people among whom are especially remarkable that vigorous and graceful French dancer, M. Robert Roberty, who was recently at Covent Garden, and the petite danseuse, Miss Pickford, with whom he has some delightful moments—the most agreeable, perhaps, in the whole of this long feast of fairyland. Miss Lottie Stone, too, sends a troupe of graceful dancers who greatly help in the illusion that the birds of the sky as well as the fairies are immensely interested in the sometimes tragic chances that come to the Babes in the Wood and elsewhere.

As a whole the Lyceum pantomime will be considered a great success; its lively music arranged and written by Mr. Sullivan-Brooke, its engaging ballets arranged by Mdlle. Rosa, its brilliant costumes by Mr. Clarkson, and its admirable stage management by Mr. S. Major Jones would almost make it if a dozen amusing comedians and clever and beautiful ladies did not work throughout the fourteen elaborate scenes with the whole-hearted purpose of giving us pleasure.

Among the more popular successes of the season the Lyceum pantomime has a sure and prominent place.

"THE POOR LITTLE RICH GIRL." AT THE NEW THEATRE

THIS is a charming play of fact and fancy, in a form which somehow suggests a materialisation of a fairy poem by Maeterlinck. Although it has evidently been very cleverly adapted for the English stage, it retains the essential flavour which belongs to the best American work. Our money-making fathers and the mothers who are social climbers no doubt sometimes neglect their children so that they may follow their own desires, but not quite after the fashion of the Money Man, Mr. Lionel Atwill, or his wife, the Bee Woman, Miss Evelyn Weeden, of the present play. The moral which is severely set forth by Miss Eleanor Yates does not touch us very greatly, nor make an absolutely entrancing stage effect. But it does one fine thing very completely; it introduces us to a delightful actress in the part of Gwendolyn, the poor little rich girl. In this difficult character Miss Stephanie Bell not only looks very beautiful, but acts with such easy sincerity that any rather weak places in the construction of the play are easily passed over and transmuted into delicate and enthralling sentiment.

We feel considerable gratitude to Mr. Frank Vernon, the newest of new managers here, for having undertaken the by no means light task of transplanting from the States a play which has had so many admirers over there. He has brought together a splendid company, and every part in the long cast, whether in the form of creatures of fact or visions of fancy, is filled with just the right person for the particular character represented at the moment.

One of our chief delights is to welcome an American play here, because there is still an absurd idea abroad that the London Press is not fair to the United States in this matter. Such a view implies a large number of ridiculous assumptions. For example, it is supposed that the critic is told what to write by his paper, that the journal is governed by the views of the theatre manager, that the managers, as a whole, are banded together against the talent of American authors. This is all such utter nonsense that it would not be worth thinking about were it not so often repeated, and were not rather stupid foreign plays often brought to our shores with loud heralding of past victories.

The bald fact is that most of us write in the hope of pleasing our readers and pointing the way to an interesting evening, or warning them against a dull one. Whether the play be written in the Hebrides or the Himalayas is a matter of total indifference to us, as is the question as to whether the author is a king in Babylon or a Christian slave. All we ask for is to be interested. And this, the new play by Miss Gates will certainly do.

The story is really of the simplest character, but it is told with an immense amount of elaboration, an elaboration which requires all the skill of the present clever company to carry to a successful issue. Gwendolyn is twelve years of age; it is her birthday, and she feels more than ever that she is neglected by her kind but busy father and her affectionate but utterly worldly mother. She longs to be wild and free, but she is guarded and more or less bullied by servants, governesses, and a whole crowd of by no means devoted hangers-on. Her nurse, described as a two-faced thing, admirably played by Miss Florence Lloyd, desires an evening off, and insists on the little girl taking some sort of narcotic. In her haste to be free of her charge she gives Gwen a dangerous quantity of the medicine, with the result that girl passes for a while from the real world into the one of dreams, where in her loneliness she has often sought release.

Thus we come to a scene which is called the Tell Tale Forest, where the various characters of the play appear with all their faults as they really are. Gwendolyn passes very nearly to the gates of death, but there is a wonderful doctor, made very real and agreeable by Mr. Malcolm Cherry, who eventually saves her life and, incidentally, shows the worldly father and mother their mistaken mode of life. In the end all is happiness and peace. The poor little rich girl is now wealthy in the affection of her parents, and relieved from the guardianship of various evil persons. This is shortly the idea of the play, but such characters as the organ-grinder, Mr. Hendrie, who becomes a very powerful and mysterious person in the mystic forest; the city broker, Mr. Jarman; and a dozen others add constantly to the varying interests of the action.

Perhaps the elaboration is a little too great for our simple taste; perhaps there is a trifle too much effort in stating a slight idea, but the attention of the audience is always retained, and on the first night the whole piece was received with the warmest applause. We trust that Mr. Vernon will be as successful as he has been bold. At least everyone interested in the stage of to-day should make a point of seeing Miss Stephanie Bell in "The Poor Little Rich Girl."

Many Matinees

THE SHEPHERDESS WITHOUT A HEART AT THE GLOBE THEATRE.

THE fairy phantasy which Mr. Bertram Forsyth has written, and Mr. Franklin Harvey has set to music, is sure of the admiration of all children who know their Hans Andersen—and most of the others. The "mortal folk" are boldly drawn types acted with pathetic sincerity by Mr. E. W. Garden and Miss Florence Haydon and various clever children, while the "faerie folk," of whom there are very many and very lively examples, are full of grace and charm and fun. "The Dresden Shepherdess," who eventually has a heart given her by a generous cuckoo, is played by Miss Evangeline Hilliard, who will, we feel sure, be generally admired. For our own part we like especially the Mouse family, who make a charming interlude in the fanciful play. Many of the actors double their parts and appear in totally different characters. Mr. Bertram Forsyth, the author, does this with excellent result as Dreams and as Blotch, the image of naughtiness, who is pretty soon disposed of—as he naturally would be in so bright a fairy play.

The scenes are laid "Within Four Walls," firstly and secondly we see the snow-covered "Wonderful World Outside," and then the inside world again.

ROYAL ALBION HOTEL, BRIGHTON.

THE NEWEST HOTEL.

Closer to the Sea than any other Hotel
at Brighton.

Magnificent Din'g Room and Lounge with beautiful Sea Views.

The Academy and Literature says:—"We have tried all the hotels in Brighton and none can compare with the Royal Albion for beauty of position, comfort, and personal attention to visitors' wishes."

For Illustrated Brochure and
Tariff, apply to
THE MANAGER.

Telephones :

903 Post Office (2 lines).

Telegrams :

"Brilliancy, Brighton."

THE KARSINO and NEW ISLAND HOTEL HAMPTON COURT.

Proprietary: Mr. FRED KARNO.

Tel.: MOLESEY 1

The only Residential River Hotel open
all the Year round.

THE RIVIERA OF LONDON

THE FAVOURITE RESORT OF LONDON SOCIETY.

LUXURIOUS PALM COURT.

DANCES & ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

GRAND BILLIARD MATCH, January 3rd, 1914.

GEORGE GRAY v. CLAUDE FALKINER.

For Illustrated Brochure & Tariff, apply Manager.

Each is effective and simple just as is the story, the dialogue, and the jolly music, and the appropriate and distinguished costumes designed by Mr. Tom Heslewood.

The matinées at the Globe Theatre will be found a delightful entertainment for little children, for it contains the gaiety of pantomime with the happy sentiment of many of the pleasantest nursery stories ever written.

"ALICE IN WONDERLAND" AT THE COMEDY THEATRE

PERHAPS some of the humour which we used to enjoy in Lewis Carroll's "Alice in Wonderland" and "Through the Looking Glass" has worn a little thin in the course of we don't know how many years. But the stage entertainment as written by Mr. Savile Clarke to music by Mr. Walter Slaughter remains a fresh delight. This year Miss Cora Goffin makes a characteristic, queer, and charming Alice. She is especially attractive in her many songs and dances when supported by a delicious group of lobsters, fairies, and other graceful and charming girls. As the well-remembered Mad Hatter, Mr. Hayden Coffin is better than we ever remember to have seen him. He throws himself into the absurd part with surprising courage, and is always amusing and interesting and severely within the picture.

The present revival, too, gains greatly by the acting of Miss Annie Hughes, firstly as the Queen of Hearts and secondly as the White Queen. In short, the whole cast is excellent, and the dear little Oysters, Rabbits, and other agreeable people make the dances very beautiful and gay.

Among the very many entertainments especially arranged for the youngest generation this Christmas, "Alice in Wonderland," which is only seen at matinées at the Comedy, will, we feel sure, give an immense amount of pleasure both to those who have enjoyed this really musical dream play many times before, or to the least experienced of new-comers.

CHILDREN'S PLAYS AT THE COURT THEATRE

FOR the first week of this season of children's plays, acted by children, Miss Netta Syrett provides three delightful little fairy comedies. Tiny children play all the parts and act and dance with perfect confidence and skill which makes the whole performance a most agreeable holiday entertainment from beginning to end.

"The Fairy Doll" shows us the amusing idea of two little girls, Rosalind, Miss Ruth French, and Barbara, Miss Joan Carr, who have inherited a curious old dolls' house, full of old-fashioned dolls, from their grandmother. Some happy chance has given them a beautiful fairy doll, Miss Catherine Homer-Avery, and they propose to domesticate her in the already rather overcrowded house. But they soon get the idea that the family who lives there would not appreciate a fairy. She comes to the wise conclusion that the dolls are really material living persons, and that they probably live at night, after twelve o'clock. Having made a garden for the fairy outside the house, and placed her there, they come down in the dead of night to find out how matters are going forward. As they suspect, the papa, the children, and above all the servants are all very angry about this fairy business. The family, and especially the early Victorian papa and his son, are severely dealt with by their owners, and some highly amusing scenes develop out of this little fancy. All the parts are well taken, but the old-fashioned mamma of Miss Olive Hogan is particularly engaging and convincing. In the end there is a threat to turn the whole family out of the house, an affair very likely to occur, if one may judge by the somewhat severe temper of the two landlords or, as they say, landladies.

"The Enchanted Garden" which follows is equally fanciful in a more conventional way. The dances are particularly gay and graceful, and the whole piece lightened by the delicate wit and satire with which Miss Syrett always decorates even her slightest work.

But still better than the first two pieces is the last. In this little mystic play, called "The Strange Boy," one is taken just beyond the borderland of everyday life into that half-gay, half-sad world where wild pipes play and the hearts of human beings fulfil their lust for romance and unknown, partly believed, mysteries that lie just beyond the edge of the world. There is poetic beauty and gay laughter in all three plays, and there are actresses who, as they would, could make some of our most gifted favourites feel a little jealous. But perhaps, after all, the real people of the stage may be left in peace, for we have no doubt that much of the charm of these lively children is owing to the skilful, refined art with which Miss Syrett has surrounded them.

EGAN MEW.

The monthly meeting of the Royal Meteorological Society was held at the Institution of Civil Engineers, Great George Street, Westminster, on Wednesday, the 17th ult., Mr. C. J. P. Cave, president, in the chair. A paper on "The Great Rain Storm at Doncaster, September 17, 1913," was presented by Mr. R. C. Mossman and Mr. C. Salter. The storm lasted 14 hours, and more than 4 inches of rain fell at six stations, of which four had more than 5 inches. No adequate explanation of the storm can be offered, and the phenomenon affords an opportunity for special investigation. A paper on "Recent Studies of Snow in the United States" was contributed by Dr. J. E. Church, jun., the director of the Mount Rose Meteorological Observatory, Nevada, U.S.A., and Mr. C. E. P. Brooks read a paper on "The Meteorological Conditions of an Ice Sheet and their Bearing on the Desiccation of the Globe."

The Paradise of the Levantine

HOW many realise the growing wealth and power of that strange race between the East and West which we name Levantine? Few in Western Europe know the height of luxury which this people has achieved.

Constantinople is to-day the City of Pleasure par excellence of the Levant; in that capacity it is growing year by year. It owes its position not to the kind of amusements which our Western capitals provide—for these are rare and second rate—but solely to the unique and gorgeous beauty of its site, its scenery and climate. It is the Paradise of the Levantine, and above all of the Levantine girl. And it is not too much to say that even if every evil prophecy of the prophets of evil were fulfilled to the letter, the possibilities of future development of this city as the residential centre for good Levantines are so enormous and inviting that their accomplishment will more than counteract the loss in the actual trade. Let us picture for a moment Prinkipoo, that dream-island of the Sea of Marmora, lying within an easy distance by steamer from the Golden Horn. Here dwell the families of many of the merchant princes of Greece and Turkey. Mounting its lovely lane-like roads, one catches glimpses on either hand through trellis-gates of the gardens of villas embowered in blossom, of close-cut lawns, pergolas and cool recesses deep in shade; while every now and then comes in view the intense azure of the sea stretching with scarce a ripple to the rolling fawn-toned hills of Asia. Here wives and daughters of these Levantine princes, decked in the latest fashions of Berlin, gossip and flirt, play tennis and disport themselves generally in a way which would make the most highly emancipated pessimist of England stare, and even blush. And Prinkipoo is only one such spot of fifty.

The Constantinople Greek prefers and has always preferred the Bosphorus to Greece, and that, in spite of centuries of grumbling at the hindrance set by stupid governments to his marvellous activities; and, far from tending to diminish, his numbers are more and more recruited from amongst the wealthy of his Hellenic kinsmen, both of Europe and of Asia. For, be it fully understood, the Levantine wants a Capital of Pleasure of his own. The Levantine is neither European, nor yet Asiatic. He forms a race apart; gifted with all the powers of industry of Western races, and yet endowed with a deeply Oriental outlook upon life; he remains in mind and character strangely inscrutable to East and West alike.

In the Grande Rue de Pera stands a restaurant frequented largely by successful merchants. Inside, you find a spacious hall closely spread with little tables round which sit groups of men who look at first like large black red-sealed bottles of burgundy stuck on chairs. There is a low murmur of babel-tongues. These are principally people of this mysterious race. Watch the nearest group and mark the faces. At first sight you will say that not one of them belongs to the same type. There is one with a large heavy face, with fleshy nose, but a mouth firm and refined, which shows no hint of Oriental origin. Beside him is another with a short knobby nose and red wet lips projecting evilly; another who might be English save for the level colour of the skin and the blue eyes, with just a hint of Mongol in their curve; another, thin and pale, refined and delicate in every feature, a picture of a Saint of Italy. There are six in all, and scarcely one of them from his physical appearance could be said to have a racial trait in common with the other.

And yet—it is strange—as you gaze you experience the conviction that these men are all one race, differing in their religion no doubt, but united in appearance by some absolutely fundamental similarity. It is not a mere matter of expression altogether, though that no doubt is part of it. It is some unity of blood and of the spirit. Out of the welter of these wrecks and shards of bygone Empires, what new distinctive and original capacities of human kind may not here have been evolved? For these able men have been cradled in persecution and bred for centuries under conditions of life half Western and half Eastern, and never heretofore continuously existent on the globe. Often enough must some reflection like this cross the mind of those who know Constantinople, and who realise this age-long process of alchemy of souls which has been going on beside the Golden Horn. When we think of the tenacity of these people, and realise their success in commerce, in education, in the achievement of the amenities of social and family life under conditions of misrule and difficulty, which yet sometimes appeal to them much more than European government, we may surmise that there lives some common principle of inner power, and that their future may be greater than we dream. These are the people, in any case, upon whose future prosperity in Constantinople the fate of that city must greatly depend. And its growth and development by them as a Residential Capital may, it is hoped, be counted on to compensate in large degree for the losses it may undoubtedly sustain. After all, even in commerce there are compensating influences.

There is the prospect of more settled government in Macedonia and Thrace, which, when linked up with railways, must tend to bring Turkey in Asia into closer relationship with the Continent of Europe, in spite of tariffs which of course will be imposed.

The rise of such thriving states as Bulgaria and Roumania may also well tend to make Skutari, the Asiatic suburb of Constantinople, more important as a starting point for Baghdad, and the wealthy of their people will surely build their villas on the Bosphorus. Upon the whole therefore it must be said that it is too early to adopt a gloomy outlook as to the future of Byzantium. There is at present some serious reason for alarm, not for its decay, but for some decline in its importance as the great commercial and political metropolis of Turkey in the great avenue of trade.

Much will depend upon the future Government of the Turks; but if the Municipal Authorities continue as they have begun—offering facilities for the transfer of land, for the laying out of streets, and the building of palatial villas—then we may live to see the whole world of fashion flocking to this near Eastern Elysium.

J. S.

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

BY LANCELOT LAWTON

THE FAMINE IN JAPAN

THE news recently published that in Hokkaido, the northernmost island of Japan, a terrible famine is raging serves once more to draw attention to the unhappy state into which that country has drifted, and will suggest a few timely reflections such as will serve to correct mistaken notions, still widely held, as to the social and economic conditions prevalent in the land of our Ally. To undergo the torture and devastation of famine is no new experience for Japan. We are told that the present catastrophe is the worst of its kind since 1869. What exactly this statement means it is difficult for people unacquainted with Oriental countries to realise. In the case of Japan, where the authorities for reasons connected with State finance pursue a deliberate policy of concealing the truth, we are merely afforded momentary glimpses behind the veil of reticence which obscures a tragedy so widespread in its effect as to embrace every conceivable form of human suffering and degradation. These glimpses, in conjunction with the experiences of the past which the writer gained personally on the spot, confirm the view always advanced in THE ACADEMY that Japan, far from being, as depicted by many writers, the land of sunshine and smiles, is a land deep in the travail of sorrow and tears. Though scanty, the details available enable us to present an accurate picture of the grim struggle that is taking place. The crops and fisheries have failed, the former giving only one-thousandth part of the normal yield. Starvation is rife everywhere, and parents are selling their daughters for the merest pittance. "Batches of girls," says one dispatch, "are arriving daily at Tokyo for shipment abroad or entrance into the Yoshiwara." This last refers to those vast compounds in Japan where, under a discipline hardly less severe than that of convict prisons, innocent girls, for no other crime than that of poverty, and when still children as far as years are concerned, are condemned to a life of ceaseless degradation, unaccompanied by the least glimmer of hope.

The State that sanctions, directs, and in some measure benefits from this nefarious traffic is the Ally of Great Britain. It is true that the parents of the hapless victims are driven to desperation by extreme hunger and want, and that they profit by the dark transaction to the extent, at the most, of a few paltry shillings. But let us not forget that these people go to make that mass which some of our leading writers and publicists have held up to us as a community imbued with those lofty ideals of Bushido well worthy of our emulation. Doubtless we shall be told, and in a limited sense the reply is justified, that we should look to our own conditions before assuming a censorious attitude towards others. But although England has gone through many periods of stress, it cannot be said of her that she ever sanctioned or facilitated the wholesale degradation of her daughters that their parents might thrive. Unhappily, as we have said, Japan is our Ally; from the political standpoint we were differently placed in regard to Putamayo and the Congo. Sympathy with the Japanese people in this time of suffering will, we hope, manifest itself in abundance. When, however, we come to inquire into all the contributing causes of the calamity, we are bound to criticise severely the policy of the Japanese Government—a Government, let it be remembered, that owes responsibility to his divine Majesty the Mikado, and not to the people who are now starving.

After the Russo-Japanese War no serious attempt was made to develop to the utmost possibility the productive resources of the Empire. On the contrary, the large sums of money that remained in hand from the loans contracted in England and elsewhere were employed in building up armaments altogether out of proportion to the reasonable requirements of State, and in the pursuit of a proud Imperial policy on the Asiatic mainland. Here it is of interest to recall that about the period under review there was a famine which presented all the terrible features that characterise the existing disaster, to which we have already made allusion. The writer then made known this fact, and the Lord Mayor, responding to the sympathy felt by the British people, was about to open a Mansion House Fund when he was informed by the Japanese Ambassador that no such step was necessary, as the Government had taken all needful measures. As for some time afterwards thousands of people continued either to perish or to subsist on ferns and leaves, and as, also, the unwholesome traffic in human souls continued unabated, the assumption was not unwarranted that the Government was animated by ulterior motive. The foreign sycophants who, to an extent which has no parallel in the case of any other country, made Japan the happy hunting-ground for picturesque detail where-with to gratify their insatiable thirst for ink, saw in the attitude of the Japanese Government the embodiment of the pride of the Japanese nation, the glorification of the spirit of Bushido, and so forth. Nevertheless, as we have said, the people went on perishing and the Government, too proud to receive the friendly sympathy of an Ally, continued to sanction and facilitate the moral degradation of little children bartered away as women. But the story did not end here. For all the while that the gaunt shadow of starvation hung over the land, the agents of this self-same proud Government were touting in every capital of Europe for loans wherewith to defray the cost of armaments. Yet not a penny would they deign to receive to alleviate the sufferings of their humble fellow countrymen who, after a grim struggle, in death sank back into the soil where manfully they had sown but could not reap. These incidents, too, occurred at a time when the echo of the salutes and the cheers that marked the return of the victorious forces from Manchuria had hardly died away.

To-day Japan is faced with a famine admittedly far worse than any which she has undergone in the past. The region affected is Hokkaido, where the climate is Siberian in its rigour. It is a region which has been neglected largely on account of the vain policy pursued towards Imperial expansion on the Asiatic mainland. Yet all authorities on the subject, including a former governor, declare that Hokkaido is one of the fairest possessions of the Empire, and that were it properly developed it would yield in abundance the good things of this earth. The authorities are, of course, not responsible for the calamities of nature. But by oppressing the people with excessive taxation, by diverting their attention to overseas dominion to the detriment of agriculture which is the foundation of the country's welfare, and by using for superfluous armaments money which could wisely have been applied to productive and cultural development, the Japanese Government has incurred the censure of civilisation.

MOTORING

EVER since the introduction of the pneumatic motor tyre, the Press has had to chronicle from time to time accidents and fatalities due to tyre bursts, and in spite of the great improvements effected in tyre manufacture these occurrences are getting more frequent than ever. The year just ended has been particularly unfortunate in this respect, a long series of catastrophies culminating recently in the death of England's most brilliant and most daring motor racer. When it is considered that this calamity was due to the bursting of a tyre which is admitted to be capable of standing a greater strain than any other—namely, the Palmer—it seems reasonable to conclude that there is no pneumatic tyre in existence which can at all times and in all circumstances be guaranteed to remain intact at the prodigious speeds obtainable by the modern motor-car. It can, of course, be contended that such speeds are unnecessary anywhere, and quite impossible on the road, and that in the ordinary way tyres could not be subjected to such strains as those imposed by record-breaking motorists. This is quite true, but the fact remains that the mere possibility of the bursting of a tyre, with the serious results that usually occur at any speed over 35 or 40 miles per hour—a speed frequently exceeded in ordinary motoring—makes many motorists look forward to the time when the really unburstable tyre will make its appearance.

The question of the moment is—has such a tyre been evolved, or is it likely that it will be? According to documents and reports recently received by us, the answer is in the affirmative. An "indestructible" and "unburstable" pneumatic tyre is about to be placed on the British market by a "large syndicate," and the motorists' troubles in this respect will soon be over. Unfortunately there have been in the past so many similar claims to the one under notice, all of which have proved abortive, that the experienced motorist will want a lot of convincing that the problem has at last been solved. In any case, he will be curious about the new tyre, so that a brief description may not be uninteresting. Its basic principle is that of sectional construction. That is to say, it is composed of segments (8 to 11), each independent of the others. Thus, if one segment is punctured, the escape of air from the one makes no appreciable difference to the running of the car, since all the other segments remain sound. So far, there is no novelty in the idea, as many motorists will remember a "sectional" tyre, constructed on similar lines, which was destined to revolutionise tyre manufacture several years ago, but which, for some reason or other best known to the promoters, has failed to do so. There is, however, novelty in several respects, notably with regard to the methods of inflation and attachment, and in the appearance of the complete tyre when fitted to the wheel. In the latter respect, the sectional tyre referred to was "impossible," whilst the "Indestructible" is, judging from illustrations, indistinguishable from the conventional pneumatic. Space considerations forbid a technical description of the methods of inflation and attachment of the segments to the rim, but it may be said that they appear to be quite sound theoretically. All the motorist can do is to wait for the actual appearance of this ideal tyre, and for authenticated reports of its behaviour in actual use—R.A.C. certificates of performance for preference. One important point, in addition to that of safety from bursts, should not be overlooked, namely, that of economy. If the new tyre justifies its claims, it ought to reduce the tyre bill to a minimum, because in case of injury only a single segment needs to be replaced, instead of the whole tyre.

During the 1913 competition season Vauxhall cars have secured no fewer than 76 first prizes and special awards in open contests. This is, we believe, a considerably higher number than can be claimed by any other car, and includes reliability trials, hill climbs, fuel consumption tests and speed trials in many different parts of the world, and under the most diverse conditions of road and climate. For these reasons the Vauxhall exhibits at the forthcoming Manchester Show, which will be open from January 9 to 17, are sure to command special attention, more especially as a large proportion of the Vauxhall victories have been accomplished at the big meetings in the North country. The most interesting model will probably be found to be the "Strafford" 16/20 h.p. With an equipment absolutely complete in every detail (including a C.A.V. 12-volt dynamo lighting set) and a chassis guaranteed for three years, this car will be sold complete and ready for the road for the very moderate figure of £485. A specimen will be shown on the stand of Manchester Autocars, Ltd. (No. 26),

R. B. H.

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

WE all expected the New Year to open well, but one or two things have happened that seem to have scared the markets. For instance, we are now told that New South Wales wants more money and will offer us three millions of 4 per cent. bonds at 96. We have all known for a long time past that the Colonies were in dire need of money. Therefore the fact that they are borrowing should not surprise us. Certainly it is much better business to lend the Australian Colonies money at 4 per cent. than to purchase 6 per cent. public utility bonds and lose your money after twelve months. When will the investor learn wisdom? Underwriters are becoming very sick. The Sierra Leone issue was a practical failure. Banks do not mind advancing on such gilt-edged securities, but there is a limit even to the capacity of the Joint Stock banks of London. The news from France in regard to the financial position there is also disquieting. On the whole it is difficult at the moment to see any rise in any market.

MONEY.—Money still remains hard, but as the year grows older the Bank of England will be forced to reduce her rate. There is really no longer any pressure in Berlin, and as business in America is falling away, the New York banks will have cash to lend. I think we can safely count upon a 4½ per cent. bank rate within the next month. The Statist, however, holds the view that money will be neither plentiful nor cheap until our political financial year ends. This looks as though the Government intended to hold up money. They can do that with great ease, but it is playing into the hands of the banks, and will not make them popular in the country.

FOREIGNERS.—The news that Perier and Co. had lent 2½ millions to Turkey, and that the Sultan had promptly bought a Brazilian dreadnought is a very serious business, perhaps more serious than any of us imagine. The French Government pretends that it controls the French banks. If this be true, then it would appear as if the Government were intriguing for a new war. There is no doubt that Greece will view the purchase of such a huge battleship as a most unfriendly act. Indeed, the Greeks in London declare that the only thing for their Government is to commence hostilities immediately and so prevent the delivery of the boat. This is rather wild talk. Nevertheless, it has got to be considered. I do not believe for one moment that Perier and Co. were not informed by Turkey as to how the new loan was to be allocated. It is hardly likely that France will lend Turkey any further monies unless she has a definite agreement that ensures peace, and she will certainly exact a similar agreement from Greece. It is now said that the Servian and Russian loans will be brought out almost immediately, but we have heard this story before. We must not forget that the French banks are choked up with Italian Treasury bills, and that they are probably just as anxious to unload these as they are to get rid of their Servian and Bulgarian notes. Truly, the position in France is one of extraordinary danger. It seems to me that the French are on the edge of a financial precipice. Their greediness has landed them in trouble. The bankers are excellent men of business, and they may be able to get out of the mess, but to do this they need the help of the Government, and this at the moment does not appear forthcoming. If we had a bad crisis in France it would at once react upon London, for the two countries are so closely allied that what injures the one must injure the other. Then, again, Russia has to be considered. She badly needs 20 millions for her railway schemes, and the French banks and the French Government are both pledged to give this loan precedence. No one can see the way clear, and even the most important bankers in France talk in the gloomiest fashion. Another extremely disconcerting fact is the announcement that the new State Bank of Albania will be practically run by the Triple Alliance. The concession gives the bank enormous power, and is of a very extraordinary character. It is openly said that Austria and Italy intend to divide Albania within the next few years. If they attempt to do this Greece, Servia, and Roumania will form a combine. There is nothing but gloom ahead of us in the Foreign market, and although in England we attempt to keep out of Foreign politics as much as possible, we cannot do this except at the expense of our prestige. Also we must not forget that a financial crisis on the Continent will prevent any rise in English markets for perhaps twelve months. Germany would appear to be in a much safer position financially than any of her neighbours. The Germans have been acting with great caution during the past six months. They have been accumulating funds, refusing loans and acting with great discretion in regard to the new concessions. Therefore, Berlin will be less hurt than any other European capital if panic does seize the European bourses. The one bright spot in the position lies in the fact that everybody is anticipating evil. Meeting danger half way is the only possible method of overcoming it.

HOME RAILS.—The Home Railway market, in spite of every newspaper writer having declared that English railways are the soundest investment in the market, remains deadly flat. The truth is that people will persist in dying, and as every deceased estate that comes on the market usually contains a nice large parcel of Home Railway stocks, so there is a perpetual tap on which provides the jobbers with shares. It is said that the dealers are short, but they are only short because they count on their ally Death. Quite apart from speculation, which is always dangerous, I think that as an investment all the heavy lines can be bought in safety. They are now two or three points below last year's prices, and all of them will certainly maintain their dividend distributions of 1912, and probably exceed them. I believe that 1913 will prove to have been the best year our Home Railways have had.

YANKEES.—The American market is attempting to put on a cheerful air. Presumably the bankers have in view the vast masses of short-dated securities that must be replaced with long-dated bonds. There may be some opposition to this policy. For example, I notice that some of the financial papers in the States are singing the praises of short currency notes. Who has inspired these articles I do not know. But I do know that big banking houses like Kuhn Loeb and Co. openly say that the short-dated note will prove the ruin of all the small railways. An attempt is also being made to write up copper, and it is possible that the stock markets may respond. If they do, then my readers should get out as quickly as possible, for there is nothing more certain in the world than the fact that copper is going down. Canadian Pacific continue weak. They will probably droop until they touch 200.

At this price they are a reasonable 5 per cent. investment. I notice that a good many papers are copying my remark with regard to the purchase of Canadian Northern by the C.P.R. Indeed, some of the Canadian correspondents are taking the suggestion as an accomplished fact. I have long listened to talk by insiders upon this question of purchase, but it is not yet an accomplished fact. I believe that it will be brought off, because I do not see how the Canadian Northern can continue to finance. The only question is how much will C.P.R. pay. If it is willing to pay the full price of the various bond issues, it will buy the railway too dear, and if it is lured into paying Mackenzie and Mann for their common stock, which is only water, then I would not give 150 for C.P.R. stock.

RUBBER.—One or two reports have made their appearance during the past week, but none of them are of serious importance, and certainly none of them deserve a word of praise. The Vine Trust appears to be in quite a hopeless condition, and holders of shares should get out as quickly as possible. I have again and again warned people against this company, and the latest balance sheet proves that everything I have said is true.

MINES.—The Kaffir market has been quite cheerful. We hear the most beautiful tales of how working costs are to be reduced and dividends increased. I wonder whether this talk will all fade away as soon as the New Year has fairly started. The little rise in prices has made a great difference to the Kaffir balance sheets, and probably that is why it was manipulated. I confess that I have long lost my faith in Kaffirs. Copper shares are dull and Tin shares lifeless.

MISCELLANEOUS.—There is very little business in the Miscellaneous market, but as I said last week, I think it a safe thing to sell Coal, Iron and Steel shares, all the smaller Brewery securities, and all Shipping shares. Electric Lighting shares can be safely bought. Even if the combine does not come off, they are a thoroughly sound investment.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

On Sunday evening, January 11, and Monday afternoon, January 12, the Pioneer Players will produce at the King's Hall, Covent Garden, "Paphnutius," or "The Conversion of Thais," a play written about 960 by Hroswitha, a nun belonging to the Benedictine Monastery of Gandersheim, in Lower Saxony. The play, one of six dramas written by the nun-playwright "in imitation of the manner but not of the matter of Terence," will be produced by Edith Craig on the simple lines demanded by its construction. When it is remembered that these plays of Hroswitha's are the only ones that have survived from the long period extending between the decay of the Pagan theatre and the rise of the popular mystery and miracle plays, and that as far as is known they have never before received a public performance, the Pioneer Players' production of "Paphnutius" promises to be a highly interesting dramatic event. "Paphnutius" has been translated from the original Latin by Christopher St. John, and at certain points during the action, music of the best period of plainsong, specially arranged for this performance by a Benedictine nun of to-day, will be sung. Mr. Harcourt Williams will play the monk, Paphnutius, Miss Miriam Lewes the penitent Thais, and Miss Ellen Terry the kindly Abbess who receives her after her flight from the world.

Full particulars of the performances can be obtained from the Honorary Secretary, Pioneer Players, 139, Long Acre, W.C.

CORRESPONDENCE

MUSICAL CRITICISM.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Dear Sir,—The remarks contained in Mr. Josef Holbrooke's letter, appearing in to-day's issue of THE ACADEMY, may, and doubtless do, apply to many musical critics, but, Sir, certainly they do not apply to the writer of the articles on music in your journal. If there is one man in London writing with a rare sympathy and real insight, and with a just and true appreciation of the manners and methods of the modes of expression which the young composers either evolve or adopt and find most suited to our respective needs, he is your critic. Did Mr. Holbrooke, to mention but one out of many possible instances, read the article in THE ACADEMY on the Royal Philharmonic Society's recent all-British Concert? If he missed it he should hasten to acquaint himself with it, and learn therefrom, perhaps, the elements of reasonable criticism and courtesy.

Some of Mr. Holbrooke's other remarks are singularly inaccurate, but I write to you, Sir, not to air my views on pianoforte-composers, but to refute a malignant and untrue statement concerning your critic. Let me just ask Mr. Holbrooke if he recollects giving my "Five Impressions" for pianoforte their first public hearing? Likewise other compositions of mine their initial performance? I remember these occasions with much gratification. One flatters oneself they were worthy of Mr. Holbrooke's pianistic and intellectual powers: one day I hope to write something equally acceptable to "our young giants on the piano" and to "our Percy Graingers"; one hopes Mr. Holbrooke may too. Finally, why does Mr. Holbrooke hyphen together Mr. Scott and Mr. Gardiner, "Bantock-Clutsam" and "Strauss-Reger?" I beg I may be allowed to stand alone, as Mr. Holbrooke himself does. Yours, etc.,

H. V. JERVIS-READ.

Little Burstead, Essex, December 27, 1913.

QUINTETS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—Has it ever struck any musician or lover of the divine art that some of the most glorious and inspired music ever composed is contained in the form of Quintets? Take, for instance, Beethoven's Quintet for Strings in C major, Op. 29; Mozart's Clarinet Quintet in A major, or Schubert's C major String Quintet, Op. 163. Can anything more transcendently sublime be imagined than these three works? Then there is Mozart's delicious String Quintet in G minor, Schumann's superb Piano Quintet in E flat, Op. 44; Brahms's magnificent F minor Quintet for Piano and Strings, Op. 34; and the same composer's exquisite Clarinet Quintet in B minor, Op. 115. There are some other truly splendid Quintets in existence, but the seven just mentioned are unquestionably the finest. Each one is unsurpassed and unsurpassable in its imperishable beauty, and will continue to delight and elevate mankind as long as the world lasts. Yours very faithfully,

ALGERNON ASHTON.

10, Holmdale Road, West Hampstead, N.W.

FRENCH POETRY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Dear Sir,—I am preparing an anthology of English renderings from French poetry so as to give (as far as is possible by translation) a complete and adequate presentation of the finest lyrical work produced by our Gallic neighbours down to the year 1900.

May I, by your courtesy, say that I shall be grateful to those lovers of French literature who may care to help me by submitting versions? These will be copied and returned to their owners.

The French original should accompany the rendering, and date of birth and death of the author be given unless the writer's work is of such outstanding celebrity as to render it easily accessible for reference. Yours very truly, Chapelles-Bourbon, WILFRID THORLEY.

par La Houssaye,
Seine-et-Marne.

"THE GOLDEN BOOK OF ENGLISH SONNETS."
To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—I notice that there is an error in my review of this anthology which should, I think, be corrected. J. A. Symonds did not rhyme "campaniles" with "pearls," but with "peals." He had apparently forgotten that "campaniles" is pronounced "cam-pa-nee-lez"; or, perhaps, he imagined that most ignorant people in England pronounced it "cam-pa-neels," and that he was therefore justified in rhyming it with "peals." Yours faithfully,
SAMUEL WADDINGTON.

BOOKS RECEIVED

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS.

- John Woolman, His Life and Our Times: A Study in Applied Christianity.* By W. Teignmouth Shore. (Macmillan and Co. 5s. net.)
Ombres Françaises et Visions Anglaises. By Comte d'Haussonville. (Bernard Grasset, Paris. 3 fr. 50.)
Hector Berlioz (1803-1869). Sa Vie et ses Œuvres. By J. G. Prod'homme. (Ch. Delagrave, Paris. 3 fr. 50.)
George Wyndham. By Charles Boyd. (Arthur L. Humphreys. 1s. net.)
Murillo, l'Œuvre du Maître. Illustrated. (Hachette and Co. 15 fr.)
Francisco Goya: A Study of the Work and Personality of the Eighteenth-Century Spanish Painter and Satirist. By Hugh Stokes. Illustrated. (Herbert Jenkins. 10s. 6d. net.)

FICTION.

- Joan's Green Year: Letters from the Manor Farm to her Brother in India.* By E. L. Doon. (Macmillan and Co. 6s.)
Lady Mabel's Beauty. By M. Lushington Milne. With Frontispiece. (John Long. 3s. 6d.)
South Sea Shipmates. By John Arthur Barry. (T. Werner Laurie. 6s.)
The Way of the Cardines. By Stanley Portal Hyatt. (T. Werner Laurie. 6s.)
An Unfinished Song. By Mrs. Ghosal. With Portrait. (T. Werner Laurie. 3s. 6d.)

MISCELLANEOUS.

- The Way of the Heart.* A Play in Three Acts by Amice Macdonell. (George Allen and Co. 6d. net.)
The Golden Bough, A Study in Magic and Religion. Part VII, Balder the Beautiful. Vols. I and II. By J. G. Frazer, D.C.L., LL.D. (Macmillan and Co. 20s. net.)
The Lumber Room, and Other Plays. By Catherine Belairs Gaskoin. (Stanley Paul and Co. 2s. net.)

Twilight and Beyond. (John Long. 3s. 6d.)

Le Style Louis XVI, Mobilier et Décoration. By Seymour de Ricci. Illustrated. (Hachette and Co. 25 fr.)

Considérations sur l'Art Dramatique à Propos de la Comédie de Bernard Shaw. By Augustin and Henriette Hamon. (Eugène Figuière and Co., Paris. 1fr.)

Children of the Hills: Tales and Sketches of Western Ireland in the Old Time and the Present Day. By Dermot O'Byrne. (Maunsel and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

Ten Spiritual Designs. By Edward Calvert. (T. B. Mosher, Portland, Maine, U.S.A.)

JUVENILE.

Messieurs les Animaux s'amuse. By J. Jacquin. Illustrated by G. H. Thompson. (Hachette and Co. 5 fr.)

VERSE.

- Rose Windows, Book I.* Poems by Robert V. Hockscher. (George Allen and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)
Poems of Arthur Hugh Clough. With an Introduction by Charles Whibley and a Portrait Frontispiece. (Macmillan and Co. 7s. 6d.)
The White Rosary, and Other Lyrics. By Elsie Carrier. (C. H. Kelly. 6d. net.)
Songs of Sunshine. By Olive Linnell. (The Walter Scott Publishing Co. 1s. net.)
Madge Linsey, and Other Poems. By Dora Sigerson Shorter. (Maunsel and Co. 1s. net.)
Aids to the Immortality of Certain Persons in Ireland Charitably Administered. By Susan L. Mitchell. (Maunsel and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)
The Living Chalice, and Other Poems. By Susan L. Mitchell. (Maunsel and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)
My Wreath of Blue, and Other Poems. By L. William Fleming. (B. H. Blackwell, Oxford. 2s. 6d. net.)
The Sign of the Tree. By Harriet Mason Kilburn. (Elkin Mathews. 3s. 6d. net.)
Echoes, a Book of Verse. By A. L. H. Anderson. (Elkin Mathews. 2s. 6d. net.)
Early Poems. By M. A. (Elkin Mathews. 3s. 6d. net.)
From Across the German Ocean. Poems by Margaret Arndt. (Elkin Mathews. 2s. 6d. net.)
The Poems of François Villon. Translated by H. de Vere Stacpoole. (Hutchinson and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)
Aurora. By G. de St. Ouen. (Co-operative Publishing Co., Buenos Aires.)
The Mother. By F. M. de Fabek. Illustrated. (Murray and Evenden. 1s. net.)
The Blessed Woman. By E. A. Ballard. Illustrated. (Murray and Evenden. 1s. net.)
Poems and Ballads. By Hermann Hagedorn. (Macmillan and Co. 4s. 6d. net.)
The Poems of Sir Thomas Wyatt. Edited by A. K. Foxwell, M.A. 2 Vols. Illustrated. (Hodder and Stoughton. 21s. net.)
Collected Poems. By Newman Howard. (Macmillan and Co. 7s. 6d.)

PERIODICALS.

Peru To-day; Publishers' Circular; Lectures pour Tous, 1913; Vie Heureuse, Christmas No.; Literary Digest; Collegian; Wednesday Review; Revue Bleue; Revue Critique d'Histoire et de Littérature; Bookseller; Fortnightly Review; Cornhill Magazine; The Vineyard; Cambridge University Reporter; The Modern World; British Review; Imperial Review; Poetry Review; Nineteenth Century and After; Catholic Directory, 1914.

THE ACADEMY

AND LITERATURE

No. 2175

[Registered as a
Newspaper.]

JANUARY 10, 1914

PRICE THREEPENCE

CONTENTS

	PAGE
Notes of the Week.....	35
Ambition	36
George Herbert and Bemerton.....	36
The Art of Arthur Schnitzler	37
Barcelona	38
Reviews :
An American Aristides—II	40
Villon	41
The Cry of the Children.....	42
A Literary Phenomenon	43
Eighty Years of Work and Play	44
Queens of Aragon	45
The Peculiar Treasure of Kings	45
An Amiable Book	46
Shorter Reviews	47
Fiction	49

	PAGE
In the Learnd World	50
An Isle of Dreams	51
Addington Park	52
The Magazines	53
The Meaning of the Golden Bough	55
The Theatre :
"The Attack" at the St. James's Theatre	56
Holiday Entertainments	56
On Reaching Germany	58
Notes and News	60
Imperial and Foreign Affairs	60
Motoring	62
In the Temple of Mammon	62
Correspondence	64
Books Received	64

ALLIANCE ASSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED.

Head Office:

BARTHOLOMEW LANE, LONDON, E.C.

ASSETS EXCEED £23,500,000.

Chairman:

The Right Hon. LORD ROTHSCHILD, G.C.V.O.

Business transacted by the Company:—

- (1) LIFE INSURANCE, with and without Profits, with special provisions for the payment of Estate Duties.
 - (2) FIRE INSURANCE of every description.
 - (3) INSURANCES TO COVER LOSS OF RENT, Interest and Profit consequent upon Fire damage to property.
 - (4) MARINE INSURANCE.
 - (5) BURGLARY, THEFT and PLATE GLASS INSURANCE.
 - (6) ACCIDENT, including PERSONAL ACCIDENT, Motor Car and Employers' Liability Insurance.
- Fidelity Guarantee and Sinking Fund Policies are also granted.

Applications for Agencies are entertained, and Prospectuses with other papers may be had on written or personal application.

ROBERT LEWIS, General Manager.

BY ROYAL WARRANT TO
HIS MAJESTY KING GEORGE V

WALPOLE BROS. LTD.

IRISH LINEN MANUFACTURERS

89, & 90, NEW BOND STREET, W.

Sale of Irish Linens

PROCEEDING THROUGHOUT JANUARY.

WALPOLE BROS. supply Pure Irish Linens direct from their factories to the purchaser, and thus eliminate all intermediate profits.

No. 868
SHAMROCK SCROLL
DESIGN.

Cloths.	Sale Price.
2 x 2 yds. ...	15/3 each
2 x 2 1/2 " ...	19/- "
2 x 3 " ...	22/6 "
2 1/2 x 2 1/2 " ...	24/6 "
2 1/2 x 3 " ...	29/6 "

Cloths.	Sale Price.
2 1/2 x 3 1/2 yds. ...	34/6 each
2 1/2 x 4 " ...	39/- "

NAPKINS.

Breakfast Size ...	22/6 doz.
Dinner Size ...	29/6 "

BARGAINS IN BOOKS.—

Kipling's Complete Works, 25 vols., half calf, gilt, fine set, £12 12s.; Hamilton's Parodies, 6 vols., £2 10s.; Jesse's Historical Works, 30 vols., Nimmo, 1901, £7 17s. 6d.; Thackeray's Centenary Biographical Edition, 26 vols., £6 6s.; Barrington's Graham of Claverhouse, 30s. net, for 10s. 6d.; Purchas's Voyages, 20 vols., £9 9s., Glasgow, 1905; Slaters' Engravings and their Values, 1912, 18s.; Chaffer's Marks and Monograms on Pottery and Porcelain, 1912, 42s.; Baily's Magazines of Sports and Pastimes, 64 vols., £7 10s.; Grimm's Fairy Tales, large paper, illus. by Rackham, £2 2s.; Proc. Inst. Civil Engineers, 142 vols., cloth, £16 16s.; Pinkerton's Voyages and Travels, 17 vols., 1808,

£5 10s.; Porter's Knights of Malta, 1858, 2 vols., £3 3s.; Burton's Arabian Nights, 17 vols., illustrated, £17 17s.; Gould's History Freemasonry, 3 thick vols., morocco binding, £2 2s., cost £6 6s.; James' Painters and Their Works, 3 vols., £3 3s.; Habershon Records of Old London, Vanished and Vanishing, coloured plates, folio, £2 2s.; Fea's Secret Chambers and Hiding Places, 7s. 6d., for 3s. 6d.; Oscar Wilde, by L. E. Ingleby, 12s. 6d., for 4s. 6d.; Ditchfield Vanishing England, 15s., for 6s. 6d.; Landon's Lhasa, 2 vols., new, 42s., for 14s.; Spenser's Faerie Queene, 2 vols., Cambridge University Press, £3 13s. 6d., for 32s. Will take any good books in exchange for above.—BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

JOURNALISTIC and SECRETARIAL TRAINING FOR LADIES.—Rapid systematic coaching. Special course in Journalism. Excellent introductions given.—Telephone or write, THE TRIANGLE SECRETARIAL OFFICES, 61, South Molton Street, W.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss Messer, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

ANDREW MELROSE, LTD.
PRIZE NOVEL
COMPETITION 1914

(Fifth Year)

Adjudicators: Mr. W. L. COURTNEY,
Mr. H. G. WELLS, M. A. E. W. MASON

PRIZE £250

Intending competitors should apply immediately for papers relating to this Competition, enclosing stamped envelope to

ANDREW MELROSE, LTD.,
3, York Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

COPIES OF BACK NUMBERS OF
THE ACADEMY, WITH THE

Special Literary Retrospects

CONTAINING

Articles, Reviews & Poems

BY

JOHN ADDINGTON SYMONDS, W. E. HENLEY,
WILLIAM SHARP, LIONEL JOHNSON,

and many other Notable Writers, can still be obtained.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION: Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free.

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Offices of
THE ACADEMY, 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

To

.....

Please send me THE ACADEMY for the next..... months.

I enclose remittance value.....

Name.....

Description.....

Address.....

THE ACADEMY

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magasine rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post-free.

The EDITORIAL AND ADVERTISING OFFICE is at 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

Notes of the Week

WE have never professed to be very enthusiastic adherents of the policy of the Triple Entente. We realise its necessity, and that it must be most sedulously adhered to. Of course, the policy of splendid isolation is the policy which appeals to every Briton, but it is necessary to realise the movements of the world, and a policy of isolation at the present time would be a policy of suicide. If that thesis be true, it is clear that no more mischievous action can be conceived than that of the Brunner-Byles group action, which has now the authoritative sanction of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. "Do ut Des" were the words with which Prince Bismarck summed up the one basis of international combination. The only asset we have which is of any value to Continental Powers is our fleet. If that is weakened, the power of our foreign policy immediately dwindles, with the natural consequence that those Powers which are at present acting with us are filled with distrust, and are naturally exercising their minds whether it is incumbent upon them to fulfil obligations which were only entered into as a part of a mutual compact. One does not expect Sir John Brunner and Sir William Byles and their coterie to possess sufficient intelligence to realise these obvious facts, but if the Chancellor of the Exchequer is unable to do so, we would suggest to his colleagues that someone else should be found to fill his position.

We are delighted to observe that in the city of Leeds a practical move is being made to counteract the tyranny of Trade Unions. We have before borne testimony to the good work which the Unions, when they are honest, have done. Obviously, without organisation, the worker may be oppressed by an unscrupulous employer. The institution of Unions to prevent such injustices was an entirely commendable action. There is no doubt that for a time the Unions performed a very salutary function. In later years mad revolutionaries have come forward to control the operations of these important combinations, with the result that what was quite useful threatens to become the bane of social life. The action of the citizens of Leeds, banding themselves together to perform the duties of refractory strikers, is quite good, and is absolutely called for in the exigencies of the moment. We hope that the example will be largely followed throughout the country. We do not wish to be misunderstood; none would be more desirous than we are that the worker should obtain an adequate wage for his labour. We only deplore that the best and most sensible methods of arriving at such an end are barred by the Trade Union officials, who realise that their power and their salaries would cease if such methods were adopted. Of course, we refer to profit-sharing and co-operation.

The problem as to whether there is life on other planets of our solar system always receives fresh interest when Mars approaches the Earth; and when the chances are exceptionally favourable, as they are at present, there always lingers the hope that something more than mere speculation may result from the array of telescopes peering at our rosy neighbour in the skies. If Professor Lowell's theories could be proved correct, what glory would be his in future astronomical history! We may say, of course, that it really does not matter much whether the "markings" on the provoking planet's surface are canals or not; and no doubt our own lives would proceed on much the same lines were the phenomena to be placed definitely outside the sphere of optical illusion and inside the realm of intelligent construction. But, were life proved to exist on Mars, hardly a man or woman but would thrill at the thought of this globe, whose inhabitants must surely see the Earth plainly, swinging round its appointed path—so far away, yet so subtly in sympathy since it shared the great mystery of life. We may never know; but the thought fascinates.

The making of a satisfactory dictionary must be an extremely trying task. We have all had the experience of referring to some "standard" book of words and discovering that the particular term on which we needed enlightenment was not there, and we have not the slightest doubt that when the magnificent "New Oxford Dictionary" is finished some sly little word or another will have contrived to evade its widely-cast net. This week we find Sir James Murray, the editor, at a loss for the meaning of the word "tray" as applied to a pack of cards; he appeals to the press, and the general opinion seems to be that to "tray" a new pack is to cut it into three heaps, previous to the shuffling, in order that the suits may be more evenly distributed. We foresee a whole comfortable page, all to itself, for the word "tray" in the next section of the monumental work, for a dictionary such as this knows no sordid limits!

Ambition

To me, a boy, so many things there seemed
Of worth, enough for twenty lifetimes quite;
And day by sunny day I walked and dreamed
What kingdoms should confess my conquest's right.

And as I dreaming walked, I'd idly note
How secret were the trees, how blue the skies,
And wonder now what stifled in my throat,
And now what sprang like tear-mist to my eyes.

So came at last to soberer, sterner days,
Days that had nought of tenderness for dreams;
Spent me—and grudged the spending; climbed steep ways
To many a sunrise—and despised its beams.

Till, from satiety of foolish strife,
I have come now to ask the better part:
That I may pluck some sweetness out of life
And give a little of my wistful heart.

PHIL. J. FISHER.

George Herbert and Bemerton

A MILE and a half from Salisbury, on the way to Wilton and its glories of architecture and pictorial art, lies the little village of Bemerton, and as you pass through this peaceful and secluded spot, you see on your right a tiny church, and opposite it the walls of the parsonage. In itself neither of these buildings might at first be thought worthy of staying the steps of the traveller or of slowing down the pace of the headlong motor. Yet they are hallowed with memories, for the one was built by the gentle and pious George Herbert, and in the other he dwelt during the last three years of his short but pregnant life.

In his "Country Parson" Herbert has left us a word-portrait of himself; Dyce, in his beautiful picture of George Herbert at Bemerton, has shown us the outward man musing in his river-washed garden and evolving those perfect poems, which in their collected form as "The Temple," are known as well as "Paradise Lost," and are probably more widely read, at least among the English-speaking race, than Dante's great trilogy.

The name of George Herbert and that of his most memorable production are probably both better remembered than are the events of his life. The latter may be thus summarised: He was born in Montgomery Castle, Wales, on April 3, 1593, and was a younger brother of that eminent Lord Herbert of Cherbury, whose autobiography and life of Henry VIII are among the better-known books of the language. George Herbert was sent to school at Westminster, whence, in 1609, he passed to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was elected a Fellow in 1614, and was Public Orator from 1619 to 1627. At this period he hoped for some Court preferment, but the friendship of Nicholas Ferrar, the founder of the famous community at Little Gidding, whose career enters largely into the pages of "John Inglesant," turned his attention to a religious life. He had received the gift of a prebend of Lincoln in 1626, which may have further directed his budding inclination. On April 6, 1630, Charles I, at the request of the Earl of Pembroke, presented Herbert with the living of Bemerton. At first he seems to have been in doubt as to the propriety of accepting the gift, but went to Wilton to thank Lord Pembroke for his interest. At that moment Laud was at Salisbury with the King, and Lord Pembroke took occasion to tell him of Herbert's hesitation. The Archbishop sent for Herbert, and showed him so conclusively that it would be wrong to refuse the living that he consented, and a tailor having been hastily summoned to make the necessary garments, he was instituted to the rectory by John Davenant, Bishop of Salisbury, on April 26, 1630.

For three years Herbert led a saint-like life at Bemerton. Here he tended his little flock and wrote his undying verses. Twice a week he might have been seen wending his way to Salisbury Cathedral. His energy was as notable as his powers of contemplation, his pure life, and his divine gift of poetry. He repaired his little church and rebuilt his parsonage, largely through the help of friends, but spending himself no less than £200 on the work, which, as he once said, "to one that have nothing yet is very much." On a stone tablet placed in one of the walls can be read the following lines which Herbert addressed to whoever might succeed him in the living:—

If thou chance for to find
A new house to thy mind
And built without cost,
Be good to the poor,
As God gives thee store,
And then my labour's not lost.

One wonders if he realised how soon a successor would be enabled to act up to this gentle exhortation. At the beginning of the year 1633, consumption laid its deadly hand on George Herbert, and on March 3 of that year he died. Isaac Walton wrote his life, in which is a pathetic account of his last days, and Coleridge made some thoughtful notes on it; his works have been edited by Nicol (1863), Grosart (1876), and Short-house (1882). But in his "Country Parson" and "The Temple" and in his "Jacula Prudentum" (where, by the by, he anticipated Johnson's famous "Hell is paved with good intentions" by writing "Hell is full of good meanings and wishings") we may best, I think, realise the gentleness and beauty of his character. Wilton, with its glories and its line of ennobled Herberts, cannot claim such a splendid niche in the temple of Fame as is occupied by George Herbert, the saint and singer of Bemerton.

E. BERESFORD CHANCELLOR.

The Art of Arthur Schnitzler

WE are rather brutal, we English. We are not to be won in the theatre by wit, by irony, or by fantasy. To capture our attention we must be knocked down by melodrama—the national form of theatrical expression. Or we may be rendered maudlin by sentiment, or dazzled, like children, with a display of rich scenery, or made uproarious by mirth. These, with their variations, are the appeals that usually reach us. All others are difficult, if not vain.

Yet, perhaps, these reflections would be truer of yesterday than of to-day, for that we are becoming less insular, less intolerant of ideas other than our own, we cannot doubt. We are not impervious to ideas, as the Continent used to imagine. If they are projected through practical channels, we take them greedily. When Mr. Marinetti, the Futurist, for instance, becomes a matter of "news," the Daily Mail is open to him, be his opinions what they may.

So the dramas and stories of Arthur Schnitzler appear in our theatres or at our libraries when Europe has consecrated his art with her approval. With our keen and practical sense of life, we would fête the devil himself in London if he "became the rage," and he would be a fool as well as a devil if he thought he had made any real impression on us. "Civis Romanus sum. I am an Englishman"—that is the attitude—"well, what of Schnitzler?"

His art is Viennese, and an expression of Vienna, a city where life flows in other rhythms to those of London, rhythms sweeter if less stronger, gayer and more shallow, more beautiful and less profitable. Vienna is a kind of German Paris, less perverse, less feline, less vain than the French city; lighter-hearted, more Latin in culture and feeling than Berlin. It is a city of the old Roman world, peopled with men and women of a Germanic race, through whose veins flow memories of a civilisation finer, purer, and more beautiful than their own. The Viennese have to live up to their city.

Arthur Schnitzler, whose play "The Green Cockatoo," was being acted at the Vaudeville Theatre a few weeks ago, is a literary expression of the Viennese spirit. It is delicate, feminine almost in comparison with our rude national masculinity; cynical, too, and rather sentimental. Pagan and Epicurean it must also be called. It would be more artificial, more Parisian if it could, but its good Teutonic body holds it to the realities of life, so that all its outbursts of naughtiness are touched with a suspicion of respectability, and all its vie bourgeoise is a little perverse. It is this same spirit which lives in the souls of the characters of Schnitzler's novels and dramas. They exist in a world where the sensibilities are easily awakened, where hearts are inflammable—they are kept soaked, one would think, in a spiritual kerosene—where the perfume of a rose may precipitate a crisis, the beauty of a face evoke a rapture that is neither passionate nor insincere. The lovers in the Schnitzler stories and plays love, as a rule, neither like boulevardiers nor good bourgeois. They are subtle, but insufficiently definite to make a type. The Anatol dialogues which have been translated into English by Mr. Granville Barker are very characteristic of the whole body of Schnitzler's work. They are light, sometimes witty, sometimes tender, sometimes very sentimental, and sometimes in very bad taste. Anatol is a delicate amorist, and really one cannot help feeling that he is rather a foolish sort of fellow as well. He does not know what he wants, whom he wants, or why he wants her. Heroes must have their mission—Columbus his America. And Anatol—what is Anatol's end in the limited scope of the adventures Schnitzler presents to us? Is it the pursuit of a hedonism of which he seems half ashamed, or is he flying from the call of that bourgeois life he knows to be his soul's fate? I fear his tragedy is that he is just Viennese, an echo of that eternal refrain which floats over the blue waters of the Danube, graceful and full of joy, but imprecise and over-romantic.

Love is a pleasure, and an art on the Continent. In England it is a duty. Love is the theme of nearly all the Schnitzler romances; the method is contained in the antithesis of the real and artificial, the theatrical and the actual which we see in its clearest definition in "The Green Cockatoo." The means by which the romances and plays are worked out are wit, psychology, intuition, and a little invention.

In "The Green Cockatoo" we have an excellent example of Schnitzler's method. He uses the contrast of reality and theatricality most brilliantly. The distinction between the cabaret actor when he pretends to be angry with his rival and when he really kills him is delineated with great subtlety. Of course, the drama of the whole piece resides in what is little more than an image. It is fine and delicate, it is ironical, it is anything but positive and practical, and therefore, I suppose, London could not quite make up its mind to like it.

Schnitzler has a dozen or more plays to his name, half a dozen novels, and some volumes of short dialogues, such as "Anatol" and "Reigen." "Anatol" is worth analysing, for it is Anatol in various forms and circumstances who lives through all the pages that Schnitzler has written. He is in another form the hero of "Liebele." For Anatol and Max, we have Fritz and Theodor. There is still the same pursuit of love as an ideal, as a source of happiness, though both Anatol and Fritz are more than a little afraid of their ideal, and are only too ready to be put off with a substitute. Anatol, Fritz, and the other heroes of the Schnitzlerian stories are sentimentalists who pity themselves. Poor Anatol is always floundering in and out of love affairs, whose happiness or unhappiness seem to leave him equally ill at ease with himself. Whether Mimi bids him good-bye, or he regains Bianca, he always seems to feel himself the victim of a fate he is too lazy to grapple with. He is an egoist who grows sentimental over himself.

There are deeper notes in Schnitzler, of course—fine serious notes, full of beauty and quiet wisdom, though the motives are generally the same. Who does not recognise this motive which occurs again and again in French literature? Two instances of it suggest themselves in Murger's "Vie de Bohême" and Charpentier's "Louise." Christine's father is reproached by a neighbour for not looking after his daughter more closely. The neighbour hints that a liaison may exist between her and the young Fritz. The father remembers his own sister, who grew up to withered spinsterhood under his too zealous guardianship, and determines that his daughter shall have more liberty to make her own life. Speaking of his sister, he says:—

She used to sit with me in the evening by this lamp in this room, with her gentle smile, with a strange kind of devotion as if she wished to thank me for something, and I—the one thing I wanted to do was to throw myself on my knees, and ask for forgiveness for guarding her so well from all danger and all happiness.

That is a motive which occurs more than once in Schnitzler, and mingled with it are other motives which go to make the mysterious, terrible symphony of the Vie de Bohême. For it is of the Vie de Bohême that Schnitzler writes with something of the sentimentality of Murger, though not always with the same sprightliness. Deeper themes and a wider phase of life are touched on in some of the other plays, as in "Der einsame Weg" or "Der Schleier der Beatrice" (a tragedy in verse), but in the main it is of Bohemians and derelicts that Schnitzler writes, of adventurers and their innocent victims, of disenchanted syrens, and submerged theorists aspiring vaguely from their disordered Bohemian chaos to a world of order and repose.

EDWARD STORER.

Barcelona

IN spite of all one hears about the commercial prosperity of Barcelona and the progressive character of its inhabitants, compared with those of other parts of Spain, their virtues do not seem to have affected the inherent villainy of the Catalonian Railways. An insufficient study of the indicateur at Perpignan, combined with a desire to avoid the overpowering heat of the day by travelling at night, beguiled me into taking an ordinary "express" train instead of the train "de lujo." The train "de lujo" is apparently run by the Sleeping Car Company in connection with the Paris-Barcelone rapide, and is the only one which goes faster than twenty miles an hour. My train made the journey interminable. We had to change at Port-Bou, the most uncomfortable frontier station of my recollection, and after a wait of an hour and a half, during which I made unavailing efforts to discover when we were supposed to start, also secured four bad pesetas and a packet of unsmokable cigars masquerading as cigarettes, we finally got away.

The dawn was by this time a soft pink over the hills; Every now and then we caught a glimpse of a small cove, with the Mediterranean, delicately grey and veiled, washing its sandy shore; and on the whole, the first view of Spain was distinctly attractive. But the sun rose; the advertised hour of our arrival at Barcelona came and went, and by comparing the names of the stations (at all of which we stopped) with a guide-book, I discovered we were not half-way. I grew ravenous. The sun increased in strength and the carriage became like a furnace; the train crawled, lingered, and crawled again. At about ten o'clock (we had been due in at Barcelona at 7.43 a.m.) we came to a place called Empalme, which had a buffet where the most attractive-looking omelette-sandwiches were offered to the hungry. It was here that I discovered that the four pesetas given me in change at Port-Bou were worthless! French gold which I vainly offered them they would not look at! A bell rang; I just managed, starved and exhausted, to get back on to the train as it moved off. At last, after passing the little walled city of Hostalrich perched on its hill (on the left) and the great massif of Montseny on the right, the train dawdled into some half-baked suburbs and arrived with self-satisfaction at the shabby terminus. I doubt if there is any other city in the world with more than half a million people in it with such a miserable front door.

The station and its appointments were in contrast to the elegant yellow tramcars passing and repassing in the boulevard outside. I took one of these, labelled "Plaza de Cataluña," which I had gathered was the centre of activity containing most of the hotels, and we swept along a wide avenue, passing a hideous Arc de Triomphe in red brick, done in a bastard Moorish style, and an equally hideous Law Courts, till at last we arrived.

The Plaza de Cataluña is vast and not particularly imposing. Most of it is planted with dusty-looking palms standing in sandy pools which steam in the sun. The yellow tramcars hurry to and fro in all directions. On the north side the ugly Hotel Colon and a local railway station are the principal buildings; but on the south side, where the Ramblas start, there is a great deal more animation. Indeed here, on the south of the square, one gets at once into the stream. Here is the big café of the "Maison Dorée," whose little tables are always crowded with people. The pavement in front of it is almost impassable with jostling, laughing crowds. Bearded men snatch republican newspapers from barefooted, grimacing boys; little parties of blind or maimed musicians—too grotesque in appearance almost to be believed—find a perch somewhere in which to grind out their stale tunes; infants of either sex run in and out of the tables, holding up lottery tickets; youths walk about offering little directories, containing the photographs and tariffs and the hours of reception of the ladies of pleasure; and, among them all, policemen in scarlet coats, with helmets, white trousers, patent leather boots, and carrying malacca canes, stroll about with elegant languor. The whole place gave the impression of being "on the eve" of some great event. The strikes had been quelled a few weeks before my arrival, but there was still a good deal of electricity in the air, and there was a pleasant feeling that "anything might happen."

Barcelona lies on a broad plain stretching between the hills of Tibidabo, Pelada and Vallvidrera, and the sea. With its suburbs it covers a large expanse, as the new quarters of the town have been laid out on grandiose lines, with wide boulevards and big squares. The old town forms a kind of kernel in the centre of the agglomeration, and contains all the buildings of interest, unless the astonishing "art nouveau" buildings in the Gracia quarter can be called interesting. Ugly as they are, they certainly have more individuality than much modern work.

From the architectural point of view, there can be few towns of its size as commonplace, even ugly, as Barcelona. The "handsome" boulevards of which the guide-books speak in terms of praise suggest, when you see them, some mushroom colonial town, rather than an ancient and dignified city. The place entirely lacks any of the splendour that is to be seen in so many even of the smaller cities of Italy and France. If it were not for its animation, for the pageantry, if one may use the word, of the life of its citizens, it would be—one must admit it—exceedingly unattractive. As it is, one cannot separate the town from its inhabitants; their vivacity is untiring; their interest in things, in themselves, in life, is infectious.

In the evenings I got into the habit of visiting some of the innumerable small theatres and music-halls for which the town is famous. In the lower part of the Calle Marquès del Duero, or "Paralelo," in the Montjuich quarter—Montjuich is a fortress-crowned hill, whose guns dominate the harbour and the city—there is a constant succession of little theatres and cabarets on either side of the road; there are also some others nearer the Ramblas—such as the "Buena Sombra" and the "Eden Concert." At night, half the inhabitants of the city, of all classes, but principally of the poorer kind, seemed to be in the "Paralelo," filling its theatres or sitting outside its brilliantly lighted cafés, listening to one of the rival military bands. A kind of dull roar of music mingled with the continuous undertone of the tramcars, and was curiously exciting. One got the impression that things were "going on" all round. One could imagine the stamping of a hundred different dancers on a hundred different stages within a stone's-throw of one another. Compact little parties of sailors, sometimes ordinary seamen, sometimes officers, walked up and down the broad pavements with their unmistakable look of caution combined with a determination to enjoy. Nobody seemed to stay in any one place for very long. There was a constant coming and going at all the cabarets and theatres, and the form of entertainment in each of them seemed to be much the same—a similar succession of heavy dancers and of singers whose harsh, strident voices sometimes touched a chord which gave them an odd fascination. I remember one woman particularly—I think she was at the Eden Concert—who had this curious gift of exercising an unexpected, undesired fascination. Physically she was quite unattractive; her voice was harsh and odd like her songs, but there was something about both which was unforgettable. I went to hear her three or four nights running. Now, looking back at Barcelona, her harsh voice seems to call to me to return and hear it again. The spell of it cannot be shaken off. She was not a great artist; she was just strange and human and herself. What her song was about I do not know, but it expressed emotions keenly felt, emotions which a foreigner, even if he understood the words she sang, would probably have been unable to enter into. Perhaps the noise of the tom-tom in savage countries has the same effect on the listener.

One of the best places in the Calle Marquès de Duero was called "El Recreo." Here, in the centre of the room, was a railed enclosure where the performers graciously consented to accept the young men of the audience as their partners. One saw in this way some good dancing of the tango variety. Alternately with the dances there was the ordinary music-hall performance, and beyond an open courtyard on the left could be seen a gambling-table presided over by an elderly man in his shirt-sleeves, who raked in the money with that observant lack of interest, combined with a decent melancholy, which seems to be the peculiar gift of the croupier. None of the places seemed ever to close, and none of them began before half-past nine or ten, while the usual dinner-hour was half-past eight.

The nights were very hot, and it was pleasant sometimes to take the tramcar to the funicular railway which climbed the steep slopes of Tibidabo. On the top of this sharp escarpment, overlooking the great city, is a very tolerable restaurant. There is nothing whatever to do at Tibidabo. In the daytime one could, I believe, pay a visit to a pathetic "Somali Village" encamped on the side of the hill, or practise revolver-shooting; but at night there was nothing to be done except admire the view—the wooded hills looming darkly at the back, the straight lines of the city's lights in front, and beyond them the shimmer of the sea. From the summit of Tibidabo a walk stretches along the ridge of the hill, amid delicious pinewoods through which peep veiled glimpses of the lights below, to the village of Vallvidrera, whence another funicular communicates with a second tramway line leading back to the Plaza de Cataluña. It was rather delicious to spend the early night hours up in the cool air of the hill-top, in a silence made more intense by the cicadas and by the vague murmurs which came to one on the breeze, and then to return to the crowded bustle of the great square and the Ramblas.

In the daytime the only hours when one felt inclined to explore were in the early morning. All the interesting parts of the town lay immediately to the south of the Plaza de Cataluña, where the mediæval narrowness of the streets made a cool and grateful shade. In this part were to be found the Diputación Provincial, a huge fifteenth-century stone palace, very tall and dark, and its adjacent Audiencia, the Ancient Court of Appeal, an exquisite Gothic building with a remarkable stone staircase and much fine carving; also the Cathedral, with the charming Plaza del Rey to the east of it; the fourteenth-century church of Santa Maria del Mar, and several streets of old houses, one of which, the Calle Moncada, contains a house called the Casa Dalmases (No. 20), with an interesting staircase elaborately carved in stone. All these buildings are close to one another and within a stone's-throw of the dark and cool Cathedral—the heart of the ancient city.

After an hour or two of exploration in the old parts of the city it was delightful to pick up a tramcar on the Ramblas and descend to the Port, to the broad Plaza de la Paz, dominated by its hideous monument of Christopher Columbus, where the white steamer for the Balearic Islands was drawn up at the quay, and the little Mouche flitted to and fro carrying the bathers to the farther side of the harbour. The sea-bathing of Barcelona is one of its greatest and most unexpected attractions. I have never known better bathing anywhere. The cabins were clean, and there were all the comforts of civilisation, such as fresh-water shower-baths, foot baths, and so on; also a diving-board and other amenities, while dominating the dressing-rooms was a raised platform containing the café and bandstand. The place seemed to be crowded all day, and at night it was equally full, for people liked to dance and listen to the music, within sight of the sea.

Barcelona in the hot weather is a town which saps one's energies like a tropical country. It is difficult to do anything except sit and look on, difficult to move away from it—to arise and "get hence." I lost my train to Montserrat, the great excursion for visitors. When, thanks to a cool twenty-four hours, I managed to get to the station to come away, I brought with me confused memories of a town where there was no gold and so much bad silver that every coin had to be rung on stone before it was accepted; of crowded Ramblas, where handsome, vivacious men and women walked to and fro under the trees, and where one could buy attractive birds in cages, or lovely flowers; and of a dark, plain woman singing on a tawdry stage a song as harsh and outlandish as her voice—and as enthralling.

DOUGLAS GOLDRING.

Among the first New Year novels of Stanley Paul & Co. are "Cupid's Caterers," the adventures of a man "sub-editress" on a popular feminine weekly—coming from the pen of Mr. Ward Muir, this promises to be exceptionally amusing and interesting; and "The Waters of Lethe," by Dorothea Gerard. The same firm is also issuing Mr. Headon Hill's new book, "The Split Peas," a society romance describing the adventures of a young officer of the Guards.

REVIEWS

An American Aristides—II

By SIR WILLIAM BULL, M.P.

Theodore Roosevelt. An Autobiography. Illustrated. (Macmillan and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

TO get the "atmosphere" of Roosevelt's political career you must bear in mind that very few of the upper class touched politics at all: it was not considered quite respectable for them to do so. I remember when visiting the United States for the first time, and people learnt that I was a member of Parliament, they looked at me as much as to say: "Oh, that is the way you make your living, is it?" At any rate, that was the idea they conveyed to me.

Roosevelt, young and enthusiastic, saw that it was a bad thing for his country that those who, for want of a better term, I must call the upper classes, took no interest in politics at all and looked down on those who did; just as the upper middle classes to-day in London allow the trading classes to do most of the municipal work in some boroughs. He explains:

When I began to make inquiries as to the whereabouts of the local Republican Association and the means of joining it, these men, and the big business men and lawyers also, laughed at me and told me that politics were "low"; that the organisations were not controlled by "gentlemen"; that I would find them run by saloon keepers, horse-car conductors, and the like; and not by men with any of whom I would come in contact outside; and, moreover, they assured me that the men I met would be rough and brutal and unpleasant to deal with. I answered that if this were so it merely meant that the people I knew didn't belong to the governing class, and that the other people did, and that I intended to be one of the governing class.

We have seen how he worked his way up resolutely and fearlessly. Whenever he was "up against" his own party he always appealed to the people outside politics—the voters who watched the young country gentlemen scrambling about in the political mire with amused interest; for Roosevelt could not help being interesting.

Somebody asked me in the week why I likened him to Aristides. I thought it was apparent, for he resembles the illustrious son of Lysimachus in many ways. I assure you I did not write sarcastically. The Athenians became more virtuous in imitating their great leader, and it will not be denied that American politics have greatly improved since Roosevelt "waded in." Aristides was called the Just, and I am sure Roosevelt is a just man, fair and honest, with quick feelings of sympathy. His fault was that he was too conscious of what he had accomplished, and insisted on telling people so by bawling it at them. I believe they got rid of him simply because they were tired of his civic virtue and his too great insistence on the fact, which, after all, when you come to think of it, is a slight on his fellow-countrymen. If he had possessed a little more of the political temperateness and placid temper of Aristides he would have been President to-day.

To go back to the book, in his account of the war, Roosevelt passes a compliment to the member for the Fareham Division of Hampshire. "One of the best men with our regiment was the British military attaché, Captain Arthur Lee, who was made an honorary member of the mess." When Roosevelt was made Governor of New York, the usual custom was followed of the party filling all the positions for him. It reminds me of an old friend, a recent Lord Mayor, who found that, although he had 900 invitations for his banquet to give out, he had only 40 tickets left for his private friends when all the official invitations had been dispatched. Roosevelt was firm, and carefully chose men for their qualifications for the positions, sometimes regardless of the fact that some of them were his opponents in politics. He naturally offended a great many of those who had supported him, and I have no doubt that he was called ungrateful by men who determined to be revenged. The description of the way he dealt with Senator Platt, one of the party "bosses," is one of the best things in the book. Platt was alarmed at Roosevelt's independence, "feared he was a little loose on the relation of capital and labour, on trusts and combinations, and the right of a man to run his own business in his own way, with due respect, of course, to the Ten Commandments and the Penal Code. Anything outside these two were clearly altruistic, and demanded profound consideration."

Next comes a charming chapter of his recreations, indoor and outdoor, at Sagamore Hill, Oyster Bay, and elsewhere, in the middle of which is a delightful description of a tramp with Sir Edward Grey through the New Forest, in England.

In this chapter he dives into other things; he thinks statesmen ought to read poetry and novels; it is clear that he himself has read pretty widely, and he tells you why he likes particular authors.

A lover of children, he did everything he could to make his own children's life as happy and pleasant as possible, sparing no thought or trouble to let them have a good time to look back upon.

When he became President, he was a more absolute ruler than many monarchs. There is no doubt that he took a good deal on himself, but a President of the Republic of the United States has far more real power, if he chooses to use it, than our own King George, for instance; in fact, even the Senate interferes in a way that, if our House of Lords, before the Parliament Bill, had acted in a similar manner, it would have meant an outcry from the Radicals like that of the Queen in "Alice." The easy-going Americans probably knew that Roosevelt sometimes exceeded his constitutional power, but saw that in the main he was right and honest, and supported him in abolishing abuses. He fought the Trusts, and with equal energy fought the Trades Unions, when he considered either were unjust. He cut red tape to ribbons in the Civil Service. What strikes one is his vigour and interest in life, and the amazing number of people in all spheres whom he knew intimately.

He considers there were two schools of political thought, upheld with equal sincerity; the division was not normally along political but temperamental lines. He believed in Presidents of the type of Andrew Jackson, who, by the way, is only known to the average Briton as the godfather of Mark Twain's "Jumping Frog," and Abraham Lincoln, who served the people affirmatively in cases where the Constitution did not explicitly forbid certain courses of action. Buchanan and Taft seem to think that the President was merely the servant of the Congress, and did not act unless invited to do so by that body. Roosevelt followed Lincoln and, like Cromwell, he was "a king in fact, all but the name." This book is, I suppose, the first time that the ruler of a great nation has so frankly taken the world into his confidence.

Villon

The Poems of François Villon. Translated by H. DE VERE STACPOOLE. (Hutchinson and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

FRANÇOIS VILLON occupies a unique position in literature. His life, or a part of it, is better known to the superficially cultured than his poems; yet we must modify this statement a little: a few tags from his poems are as universally famous and remembered as anything out of the Middle Ages, and the bits of his life that are generally known are known very inaccurately. Villon is such an ideal hero of historical romance and costume-play that he has ended by becoming almost too popular, and has had to yield his part on occasion to less hackneyed actors, such as the shadowy Gringoire.

Mr. Stacpoole has undertaken a formidable task, and has emerged from it, we incline to think, with no little credit. Difficulties of idiom and difficulties of atmosphere have over and over again been most successfully surmounted. It is extraordinary how easily some of Villon's master-lines slide into the right number of English syllables, with a really useful word at the end. At other times liberty is very hardly won indeed: as prisoners have been known to make ropes out of their bed-clothes, the translator, in a case like this, is sometimes driven, in order to give rotundity and consistency to his verse, to incorporate into it—may we be forgiven for dallying too long with a seductive analogy!—his very mattress! We open Mr. Stacpoole's book at his translation of "Les Regrets de la belle Heaulmière," and we find these lines:

For love of one black thief who used
My youth as bee the flowering bow.

Good lines! Swinburne would not have disowned them. But in Villon's text there is no bee and no "flowering bow." We have grave doubts as to the legitimacy of the procedure. The Second Commandment's embargo on the production of graven images applies, in our view, to the translator of a poet. It would be a little painful to be asked to recall, say by some University Extension lecturer, "Villon's beautiful image of the bee and the flowering bow."

Perhaps other readers will be more indulgent. The fault, if it be one, is not very frequent. Something had to be done, and Mr. Stacpoole, left to himself, writes very good modern English Villonese. Something had to be done, here for one reason, there for another. Sometimes the translator is faced with the dilemma of sacrificing either a whole poem or one "unprintable" phrase. We admire the humorous agility with which he successfully fills up a lacuna; "here for words place dots" completes a line, maintains a rhyme, and warns the reader to look or not to look, as the case may be, in the appendix, where he would find all the originals of the translations and one or two other poems.

There is no formal biography. Mr. Stacpoole thinks that biography in such a case is more or less synonymous with slander. And the acts of François Villon—are they not written in the "Ballades" and the two Testaments? Mr. Stacpoole is very eloquent on the text, "Other times, other morals," and insists that Villon was a truly good man and, "considering the times in which he lived, wonderfully clean-spoken and devoid of brutality." It is perhaps true, and, if true, certainly regrettable, that our age and country expects this sort of prefatory apologia, but the habitual traveller in the realms of history, which are seldom the "realms of gold," will always find it tedious and disconcerting. Besides, the Philistine is as suspicious of eloquence as he is of other forms of art. He will cheer Mirabeau the speaker, but when he goes home he will moralise complacently on Mirabeau the man, and quote with gusto Mirabeau's sublime last confession of failure.

We seem to do nothing but carp and quibble. Our intentions are really quite different. We recommend this book confidently—we were going to say "unreservedly," when we remembered that we had hinted at some, probably purely subjective, reservations—to everyone who likes good poetry with a subtle aroma of the past. But there is one point we cannot pass over. Why does Mr. Stacpoole say that "Villon is the greatest and truest of French verse-writers"? His reply, indeed, follows on the heels of his statement: "He is the only French poet who is entirely real; all the rest are tinged with artifice." This may be true; but, at most, it only applies to the truth of Villon's poetry. No Englishman has the right to say that somebody is "the greatest of French verse-writers." Every Frenchman may say it, though the name used to fill the blank will not always be the same. We may add that we are of the opinion of Mr. Stacpoole.

"The Cry of the Children"

The Life of the Rev. Thomas Bowman Stephenson, LL.D. By WILLIAM BRADFIELD. Illustrated. (C. H. Kelly. 5s. net.)

ALMOST at the same time that Dr. Barnardo was beginning his great work which afterwards became so famous, Thomas Stephenson, with two friends, initiated a similar scheme for outcast waifs and strays. On July 9, 1869, the first two boys were received into "The Children's Home," a mere rented cottage in the neighbourhood of the railway arches which cluster round Waterloo Station. From this small beginning sprang the well-known Home for Children in Bonner Road. In the first year twenty-nine children were received, and the ordinary income was £307. In the year 1911, no less than two thousand two hundred children passed through the Home, and the income totalled £54,715. In 1872, a farm was established in Lancashire, and later, another in Canada, to which large numbers of children were transplanted. Dr. Stephenson's other great work was the institution of deaconesses for work among the poor, the result of the impressions he received from a visit to Kaiserswerth during the time of the Franco-German War, as Florence Nightingale had been stirred by her visit some twenty years before. Eventually Dr. Stephenson founded the Wesley Deaconess Institute, a work which is to-day in process of wide development. The story of this fine philanthropy is well told in this interesting biography of Dr. Stephenson, who was born at Red Barn, Newcastle-on-Tyne, in 1839, the centenary year of the "Society of the People called Methodists." He was educated at Wesley College, Sheffield, and in 1859 he was accepted by the Conference for the ministry and sent for training to Richmond College. A few years later he took his degree in Arts at the University of London, and entered on his ministry at Norwich, where he laboured until he was transferred to the Waterloo Road Chapel, London. Here his attention was first drawn to the outcast, homeless children who used to sleep among collections of boxes and barrels in back yards, of whom Dr. Osborn's daughter wrote a pathetic little ballad, beginning:

Poor little Scaramouch, homeless and sad!
Ragged little Scaramouch, dirty and bad!
Father gone to prison, mother in her grave,
Vice and crimes learnt betimes; who is then to save?

Stephenson and his colleagues, Mr. Horner and Mr. Mager, came nobly to the rescue, and the memories of thousands of good men and women must now call them blessed. In 1877 a beautiful chapel was opened for the Bonner Road Home, and at a festival in connection with the ceremony on May Day, the Right Hon. W. E. Forster, M.P., the Minister for Education, took the chair, and Dean Stanley also came to support the Children's Home. Mr. Bradfield remarks on Dr. Stephenson's peculiar fitness for the work:—"His own temperament and disposition fitted him admirably for the care of these little ones. He had very high ideals of the importance of duty, order, and obedience. The children of the Home were his children, and he never thought of himself as divided from them by any social barrier." The Bishop of London (Dr. Creighton), after being taken round the Home, observed that he knew how easy it was to arrange things for an inspection, "but," he added, with a twinkle in his eye, "it was not easy to arrange beforehand that children should hang on to a man's coat-tails, and claim him as their property as they had done for Dr. Stephenson." In 1874 Dr. Stephenson headed the poll by a large majority for the Hackney division at the second triennial election of the London School Board. Dr. Stephenson was a deeply spiritual man, and he made the chapel at Bonner Road Home the centre of that earnest religious teaching which had so permanent an effect on the character and afterlife of the children. Those who read this record of a noble life will learn something of the secret of his powerful influence. There are several portraits in the book, of which the most striking forms the frontispiece, where the good Doctor is pictured in cassock, cap and gown, wearing the Order of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem in England, of which he was an Honorary Associate as a "person eminently distinguished for philanthropy."

A Literary Phenomenon

Scientific Proofs of Another Life. Compiled by ROSE LEVERE, LL.B. (J. E. Evans-Jackson and Co. 5s. net.)

TRULY this is one of the most remarkable books ever "embalmed in printer's ink," if we may borrow Mr. W. T. Stead's striking, and post-mundane, phrase. At last we are able to see ourselves as the spirits of the departed see us. We now know something of Public Opinion in the Great Beyond. The ordinary current views of the spirit-world on the events past and present of this sphere are actually within our grasp. It is just as if we took up the Spiritual Daily News, or whatever in the next world corresponds to one of our beloved halfpenny papers. And this wonderful result is entirely due to the hardihood of Miss Rose Levere, a member of the New York Bar, who has had the courage to interview nearly one hundred departed spirits. But we had better give the "scientific proofs" in this gallant lady's own words:

The essays herein are by persons of historical distinction, who now come back in spirit and independently write them. The letters were given in my own room under conditions which to me established beyond all peradventure the identity of the writers and the genuineness of the writings. But they hold inherent qualities which show this. The choice of themes, the style, the diction, the character of expression so peculiar to each writer, and so impossible of successful imitation, will at once appeal to the intelligence of every reader endowed with ordinary literary genius.

What further need have we of proofs? Indeed there are none. All modern science must stand at once dumb and confounded. Besides, chivalry—and, despite Burke, the age of chivalry is not quite dead—chivalry accepts unhesitatingly the courteous dedication: "With love and kind regard to all into whose hands this book shall fall, I dedicate it as a pronouncedly affirmative answer to the question asked in all ages, 'If a man die, shall he live again?'"

One of the oldest spirits to appear in Miss Levere's room was that of Moses, who thus gave utterance:

Now I, Moses, cometh unto ye (sic) this night in the city of New York, and speak unto ye saying, I had bounds set around Sinai that the multitudes should not come upon the mount and interrupt the writing and talking seance. The giving of the tables of stone meant the giving me a place to find them. The glory of the Lord was the harmonious condition necessary. The tables of stone were smooth plates of soft stone or slate deposit . . . and in the midst of the darkness the great commandments were scratched upon the surface of the tablets by an angel hand sent thither by the Lord.

Now the veriest tyro in criticism, if "endowed with ordinary literary genius," must at once recognise here "the style, the diction, the character of expression, peculiar" to the (reputed) author of the book of the Exodus. It is true that the spirit-Moses' command of English leaves something to be desired. But allowance must be made for some possible difficulties of translation into Americanese. It would be interesting to know what language the spirit used as a medium of communication. Perhaps, however, all spirits now learn English as the language of the future. In the present case the convenience of such a course is obvious, seeing that among the shadowy contributors may be found such figures as Socrates, Pontius Pilate, and Jeanne d'Arc.

The famous Greek philosopher gives a striking example of the well-known Socratic dialogue, thus: "A child with its father on a railroad train asked: 'Papa, why is it I feel so good when the train goes fast?' 'Because,' answered the father, 'rapid travelling exhilarates.'" For the sake of the sage's reputation it is almost a pity that Miss Levere did not suppress the rest of his shallow and commonplace letter on exhilaration; for example: "A glass of wine exhilarates. Anything that lifts us above the more sordid conditions of earth has a tendency to exhilarate us. . . . Anything that hastens us through the air gives the spirit a sense of temporary emancipation from the material environments of its ponderous encompassments."

Jeanne d'Arc informs us that "it was as possible to have had in operation a dynamo in the City of Pompeii as in the City of Philadelphia, for the same law governs the energy to-day that did in the days of Moses. Law is as old as the universe, and older." But we can excuse her much, as she sketched a portrait of herself and labelled it "The only true likeness in existence." The Marquis de Lafayette discourses on his impressions of George Washington, who "when a young man was a great admirer of the fair sex, and had his sweethearts in many sections of the thirteen colonies." Pontius Pilate gave a sort of medical account of the death of Christ on the Cross, as the result of a broken heart. This was very kindly translated and transcribed by Mr. W. T. Stead, who also gave his services in writing out the Law of Parentage by Daoud, the Soul-Mother of the Compiler of this Book (i.e., Miss Levere), who lived fourteen thousand years ago in Amia, the seventh province of Atlantis. Among other spirit-contributors may be mentioned Charles Darwin, Herbert Spencer, Dean Swift ("Is Inspiration Insanity?" an able defence or apologia), Sir Isaac Newton, and Phineas T. Barnum. One and all have a marvellous acquaintance with modern mundane affairs, and especially with things American, but unfortunately they tell us nothing definite about the "Great Beyond" which they inhabit. Still, it is kind of them to discuss our trivial affairs so readily with us, and we trust that on the first opportunity Miss Levere will be so good as to convey to them our most grateful thanks. One thing we notice, with some regret for the dear souls—not a single one possesses even the ghost of humour. They still apparently take life very seriously. Each article in this book is accompanied by a picture of the contributor, and we are told on the authority of Mr. Stead that "the portraits were drawn independently by the spirit-artists, a picture being drawn as shown by the enclosed cuts at one sitting." A more ghastly and gruesome set of caricatures we have seldom seen. Many of them look positively imbecile. For all that, as Mr. Stead tells us, "No volume compiled in any age of the world equals in uniqueness this one, from the fact that the literary work of it was done absolutely independently by spirits." This judgment we can fully endorse by saying that it is as a literary phenomenon we call attention to this work. It stands alone. It exhausts a class. It is its own great parallel. It fills up, begins, and ends, a chapter in the Curiosities of Literature.

P. A. M. S.

Eighty Years of Work and Play

Bar, Bat, and Bit: Recollections and Experiences. By the HON. SIR EDWARD CHANDOS LEIGH, K.C.B., K.G. Edited by F. ROBERT BUSH, M.A., Secretary of the London Playing Fields Society. (John Murray. 7s. 6d. net.)

SIR EDWARD CHANDOS LEIGH has set down his reminiscences in a simple and attractive manner. As they include in their scope a period of eighty years and a great many persons who have also been personalities during that period, they throw a good many side-lights on the history of our times.

The title of the book is happily chosen. The author has many interests, but the Bar, cricket, and the hunting-field are the three matters that have claimed him most. His beneficent and successful efforts on behalf of the London Playing Fields Society have flowed, we imagine, directly out of his love for cricket and the sympathy that impels us, "when we have a good thing, to make it common."

The author has a fourth interest, which he does not specify in his title, but, as he shares it with all mankind, except a certain number of pessimists and a few impossible optimists, he is probably right in withholding from it special significance. He has always had a lively and informed interest in politics, and has a good deal to tell us of the statesmen of the period. His political complexion has been steady Whig, but his general attitude more nearly approaches that keen impartiality that is sometimes sighed for than that of any modern we can remember. It is to be remembered that he was for a great many years Speaker's Counsel, a position of vantage for the spectacular consideration of the Parliamentary battle.

The Bar is a joyful mother of anecdote. There are many little stories of forensic experience in these pages. We were particularly charmed with the following invitation conveyed by a coachman during Sir Edward Chandos Leigh's rounds as revising barrister: "Please, sir, the public hangman lives near here, and he wants to see you, because he says you prosecuted for murder, at Lincoln Assizes, the first man he ever hanged!" A retort made to Lord Brampton, who was notoriously close-fisted, has, it appears, been fathered on to various people, but here it is attributed to an anonymous Q.C.; the repartee is: "What is the use of saving money? You can't take it with you when you die, and, if you did, it would melt."

Among the cricket stories are accounts of two ridiculous single-wicket matches, "no-balls not to count," in one of which the challenger bowled his opponent from "within three yards of the wicket," and won on the special conditions. The writer learnt his cricket at Harrow "by means of a catapult"—his own suggestion. The hunting reminiscences include portraits of some very famous men, and accounts of famous runs, especially with the Warwickshire and Pytchley hounds.

Some of the most interesting pages deal with Harrow and Oxford. We are a little surprised to find the writer's account of his old school summed up in a kind of apologia. He speaks of Harrow as "a school which it was getting a little the fashion to decry."

Oxford stands for undergraduate days at Oriel and a fellowship at All Souls'. A photograph of the Bullingdon Club, with a very imperfect key to the names of the members, figures, rather unexpectedly, late in the volume; we can discover no other allusion to the Bullingdon Club.

Sir Edward Chandos Leigh has, with the exception of a short and rather perfunctory philippic against certain modernities, held the balance between then and now, between crabbéd age and crabbéd youth. That is to say that these are not only entertaining but genuine reminiscences.

Queens of Aragon

The Queens of Aragon: Their Lives and Times. By E. L. MIRON. Illustrated. (Stanley Paul and Co. 16s. net.)

THIS account of the twenty-six Queens of Aragon, from Gisberga or Ermesinda to Juana de Enriquez, is a little disappointing. It tends to emphasise the pathos of the poem by Coplas de Manrique, quoted at the commencement of the book. To the poet's plaintive questions, where are the princes of Aragon, "the highly-born dames," "the gentle knights," "the song of Troubadour," "the mazy dance of old"? we can but answer that these romantic beings and gay happenings of the mediæval Kingdom of Aragon scarcely live again in Mr. Miron's pages. Had he caught something of the spirit of the old Troubadours he would have written a much more interesting book, described fewer "supers," and really shown us that "Queenship of Aragon was no less queenship of the Courts of Love." He has given us instead the rather dry bones of history, with a wealth of detail and a vast accumulation of names that are often simply bewildering. The canvas is over-crowded, and his zeal for amassing facts and straying occasionally into side-issues has tended to blurr a picture that might have been full of pomp and circumstance, touched with the glamour of romance, and quickened with the fire of poetry.

Our feeling of disappointment, however, cannot be laid entirely at the author's door. If his book is lacking in feminine interest, if we see far too little of the Queens of Aragon, it is partly because these royal ladies, in spite of their beauty and other attractions, received insufficient notice from contemporary historians. "It is from the densest mists of mediæval history that we must summon these Queens of the past," writes Mr. Miron, "and we shall often find ourselves baffled in our quest for truth about them." This is a frank confession, but the stories, excepting the fascinating account of Urraca, and one or two others, are really too thin, too wrapt up in "densest mists," to form the main theme of a fairly lengthy volume. The chronicler of that period was evidently not caught "by the spell of beauty on a throne." He lived in eventful times, and seems to have devoted his energy to setting down what he regarded as weightier matters. "On four occasions only during four centuries is there mention and description of the coronation of a Queen of Aragon," an omission that seems to prove that the historian was a very ungallant and one-sided person.

These Queens, for the most part, lived behind a veil while their lords were engaged in battle or in affairs of State. Writing of the Aragonese, Mr. Miron observes: "Once, and once only, in their strenuous history, they called a woman-child to rule over them, but they called her from a cradle, and they gave her, with her crown, a strong man, almost old enough to be her father, to teach her queenship." The wonder is that with such scant recognition, such meagre appreciation, there were any Queens of Aragon at all. Only an ardent and mirthful Troubadour could have lifted the veil that hid these royal ladies and revealed the very essence of romance. Sometimes he did so with the result that he quickened a page of history for all time. Troubadours were poet-adventurers, and as such highly favoured, but unfortunately there was a limit to their singing, and far too infrequently were they bidden to lighten the sombre accounts of learned but dull historians.

Mr. Miron has an intimate knowledge of his subject, and students will find his imposing bibliography useful. Only once does he break forth into cheap and irritating staccato sentences, merely clap-trap questions that are unworthy of a style that is otherwise dignified. On page 44, writing of Urraca, he inquires: "What was the truth of her? The voluptuous termagant? Or the wronged and religious Queen? Victim, or evil genius? Who shall decide?"

The Peculiar Treasure of Kings

Le Style Louis XVI, Mobilier et Décoration. By SEYMOUR DE RICCI. (Hachette & Co. 25 f.)

NOT long since, Mr. William Heinemann sent us a splendid English version of Mr. Seymour de Ricci's work, of which we wrote as "Furniture before 'The Deluge'"; now we have the advantage of seeing the Paris edition in its native form. There is not, of course, much that is fresh to be written upon the subject, but we are very happy to have the opportunity of drawing the attention of our French readers to a volume which is in itself a very encyclopædia and treasury of the decorative forms which began to take the taste of princes when Louis XV was king, and which lasted until the great Revolution.

During the last fifteen years or so in England there has grown up an abounding interest in the fine craft of delicate cabinet-work, and thus the productions for the Courts of France during the eighteenth century have necessarily received our close attention and vast appreciation.

For the men who worked in Paris under the patronage of the Bourbons and their followers were indeed master cabinet-makers, even if our enfranchised views on decoration suggest that they inclined too fully towards the meticulous and bejewelled. Although the style Louis XVI may be said to have made considerably for simplicity, and it could not longer be said, as Voltaire sang—

Ces cabinets où Martin
A surpassé l'art de la Chine, and it was held that the period of curious pagodas, chinoiseries, and singeries had passed, still many delicate vanities remained which our own men of the Chippendale type used and broadened and, in the view of many, ennobled. But apart from the designs of Louis XVI furniture—so admirably suited to the architecture of that time—it was the exquisite workmanship which commanded the attention of the connoisseur, and now, more than ever, gains the praise of the cleverest cabinet-worker. Mr. Ricci's elaborately illustrated volume not only shows us a vast quantity of examples of the period with which he deals, and of rooms in which they were set, but it also helps the willing student to know exactly where these pieces may be found and, we apprehend, examined. However engaging a book on furniture may be, however fully and fitly illustrated, it is the pieces themselves that the enthusiast wishes to see and, if possible, to handle. We are rich in such examples in England, but none the less grateful to so accomplished a writer for pointing out to us the homes of many other carefully preserved specimens of a style that grows every day in interest.

All the cabinet-makers of importance towards the end of the eighteenth century are well represented, and also a considerable number of persons who strove to work in an even simpler style. The result is a volume, whether in French or in English, which no collector of furniture should be without, and which no craftsman in the enchanted world of cabinet-work can afford to neglect.

An Amiable Book

Memories of a Musician. By WILHELM GANZ. (John Murray. 12s. net.)

THIS amiable book has an interest beyond that of a mere record of the celebrated musicians whom, in the course of a long life in London, the author had seen or spoken to. Our shelves sustain many volumes of musical reminiscences which treat of Mr. Ganz's period, and make mention of cursory interviews with distinguished folk. It thrills us no longer to read that "I was present at the début of Mme. Leatherlungs as Norma; it may be described as a triumph; many were moved to tears, and the stage became a garden owing to the number of bouquets that were cast at the feet of the diva. I met her frequently both in musical and aristocratic houses. The essence of good nature, she yet had a quick temper, and I remember seeing her box the ears of old Signor Continuo when he had played the final chord of the aria, without waiting for her to descend from her prolonged C in altissimo. She made it all right, however, the next day, by sending him a great cheese from Hudson's—the Signor loved cheese—and it was said that they toasted slices of it together before her bedroom fire at her house in Abbey Road, in token of their reconciliation." Mr. Ganz enlivens his pages with many a pleasant anecdote about a public idol; with apparent unconcern he not infrequently lifts the corner of a curtain, and his book affords a curious and useful survey of the ebb and flow of music's tide in London during the seventy years when he dabbled his feet in that capricious flood. But he himself is, after all, the most interesting part of his book. He came to England as a boy of fifteen, ready to play the violin in a quartett or an orchestra—or the cymbals, it did not matter; to accompany at a party for half a guinea; to do anything, in fact, that he was asked. He could do many things, it appears, but probably his versatility stood in his way, for he never achieved a commanding position either as a solo pianist or a leader of orchestras. Yet he arrives, and speedily, at a very comfortable and honourable place in the city of his choice. He has a house in Harley Street, he sends his sons to the Universities, he is a welcome guest in many a country mansion, and is always sure of a cordial nod of recognition from very great persons. He gives lessons on the piano to the great persons' daughters, he organises their musical soirées, he conducts orchestral concerts, and is the acquaintance, if not the friend, of all in that great flock of celebrated musicians or performers which annually lights down upon our shores.

To have attained such a secure and agreeable eminence in London denotes the possession by Mr. Ganz of remarkable qualities of character. We mean no disrespect to his talents when we say that there must have been many of his contemporaries who started with similar, perhaps with even greater chances of success, his rivals in musical ability, of character as unblemished, who never knew a tithe of his success. Why was Fortune so kind to Mr. Ganz? It is impossible to read his book and remain in ignorance of the answer to this question. His writings breathe such an air of kindness and simplicity in the best sense of that word, such a friendly air of content with the world and readiness to make the best of people and things, that we are sure we have found the secret of his success. This is the autobiography of one who has the charity that "thinketh no evil." There is not a word in it that could give pain to the most sensitive; here we are entirely and wonderfully free from that atmosphere of jealousy, suspicion and rivalry which musicians are supposed to live and thrive in. Mr. Ganz no doubt had ability, diligence and devotion to his patrons' interests to recommend him, but he had more. He must have had that in him which made them conscious that he could be a good friend as well as a good teacher or adviser.

These "Memories of a Musician," then, interest us primarily as the guileless story of a man who can surely never have done or said anything unkind, of a nature happy and ungrudging, of a success that must have disarmed the envy of rivals. But they are also interesting for what they tell us about famous musical folk. As we read, we are listening to the simply but eagerly told reminiscences of a man who had heard Edward Fitzgerald's "My old Pasta." Think of that, ye moderns! Pasta, alas, was past her prime by a good deal when Mr. Ganz heard her, but Jenny Lind was not, and he knew her well. He saw Rachel as Andromache, he knew Jansa who had played in first performances of Beethoven's Quartetts, he was at the première of "Rigoletto" in 1853, he knew Mme. Dulcken the pianist whom Rush, the Stanfield murderer, went to hear in Norwich while meditating the slaughter of half a dozen persons. He played in the orchestra when Berlioz conducted the Choral Symphony after five rehearsals; he knew Wagner, and did his best to play Wagner at his orchestral concerts before the days of Richter. He brought St. Saëns to London, he gave the first complete performance here of the Symphonie Fantastique, and the Dante Symphony of Liszt. He heard Braham sing "Total Eclipse" when that great tenor was eighty years old. These were memories worth recording. We like, also, to know that placid-looking Mme. Tietjens began by having a horrid temper which led her to smash all the crockery she could reach, and that her wise sister used to send out for penny tea-cups when she saw a storm brewing, and that the great singer eventually conquered her temper. We like to think of Mr. Edward Lloyd earning £1,500 in six months by royalties on "The Holy City" and "The Star of Bethlehem"; of Mme. Patti, though she never had to keep her agility in order like other singers, practising her angel-voice on Bach's pianoforte fugues; of an eminent teacher of singing saying to a newly arrived and unknown singer of remarkable gifts and a beautiful voice, "Will you be my show pupil? I will give you £3 a week if you will!" We tremble as we read of Mme. Schumann playing Chopin at a party, while all the company talked; we wonder if Lord Morley knew that Mr. Gladstone "used to sing in his younger days"; we sympathise with Verdi for "hiring for the whole season" all the barrel organs in Genoa that played "Rigoletto" and "Trovatore," and locking them up in his rooms; we love Offenbach for his letters to Wagner acknowledging the present of a copy of "Das Judenthum in der Musik":—"Dear Wagner, you had better stick to music"; and, later, a copy of the "Meistersinger": "Dear Wagner, I think you had better stick to writing books." Mr. Ganz giving lessons to an old lady of eighty in Beethoven's Sonatas; teaching the piano to Miss Braddon; sitting next Lord Beaconsfield at dinner, but never hearing him speak—these are among the pleasant pictures which this book has given us. We are sure that Miss Braddon was a delightful pupil, and that Dizzy could be an awe-inspiring neighbour. We began by describing this as an "amiable book." It will be seen that we have found it entertaining. But what we have liked best in it is the picture of a man so bienveillant, so cordial, so uniformly genial as its good-hearted author.

Shorter Reviews

The Austrian Officer at Work and at Play. By DOROTHEA GERARD. (Smith, Elder and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

AUSTRIA has lately been more in our thoughts than usual, owing to the visit of the Archduke Francis Ferdinand, heir to the throne, to England. We ought to know and think more of Austria than we do; her past history, position on the Continent and military strength should all induce us to bear her in mind as an important factor in political developments. It is the word Habsburg that binds together in Austria a heterogeneous mass of nationalities. As a member of the Triple Alliance Austria's weight might any day be thrown on the side of Germany. But this little book compiled by the wife of an Austrian cavalry officer does not pretend to deal with high politics or grave military questions. She has divided her work into two parts: Echoes of War, and Evolutions of Peace. She admits that, many triumphs notwithstanding, the nineteenth century was on the whole a century of mourning for Austria. The Empire issued morally weakened from the Italian campaign of 1848-9 and the rebellion of Hungary; in 1859 she was worsted by the French and lost all hold on Italy; she gained nothing from the Danish war of 1864, and was crushed by Prussia in 1866; the occupation of Bosnia in 1878 was a long, wearisome, and seemingly interminable task. The historical narrative is of the lightest description. The second part, which deals with the life and pursuits of the Austrian officer, his duties, pastimes, escapades, exploits and feats, chiefly of horsemanship, is much more lively and interesting. Some of the stories tax the reader's credulity, and the author does not vouch for the absolute accuracy of each detail, many of the incidents naturally not having come under her personal notice. Many changes have been introduced, it is said, in the Austrian army; hard drinking has given place to modified abstemiousness; duelling is rarer, though not abolished, but the officer's life is still gay, and he meets death gaily; the army is stated to be animated by one common zeal. The book will commend itself to military men, and should find a place on every regimental reading table. The general reader will find some information in the first part, and much entertainment in the numerous anecdotes of the second.

My Recollections and Reflections. By YOSHIO MARKINO. Illustrated. (Chatto and Windus. 6s. net.)

AFTER many years of struggle and hardship, Mr. Markino has now attained for himself the certainty of an appreciative public for almost anything he may write. There are those who criticise, sometimes unkindly, at other times almost brutally, what they term the "pidgin-English which is supposed to be 'quaint,' " accusing the kindly Jap of posing in order to supply the periodicals with what they want, namely, essays in broken English. In the chapter headed "Emotion and Etymology" Mr. Markino deals with this matter, and explains in his own inimitable manner the reason for his "imperfect" English. May it be long before he learns to speak, without a slip, the language of the country he has adopted; for the English tongue never sounds so beautiful as when spoken with the clear enunciation and accented syllables of an educated foreigner.

Messrs. John Long, Ltd., will shortly publish a new novel entitled "Mary's Marriage," by Edmund Bosanquet, author of "A Society Mother" and "Catching a Coronet."

In the present book, the author treats of many subjects. The chapter relating to Hara, the Japanese artist, and the contrast Markino draws between himself and his friend are interesting reading, and prove that the writer is no egoist, and is perfectly willing to give unstinted praise where it is due, even when by so doing he exalts another at the expense of himself.

One of the best parts of the book is that devoted to the Post-Impressionists. As an artist, with all an artist's emotions and insight into causes, Mr. Markino's opinions on this subject are well worth perusing, and should form a guide for those people who know so little what to make of some of the strange artistic productions of the present day.

As he says himself, the Japanese art is nearer akin to the French than the English, and, if the art, also the artists; therefore, probably it is to his dear John Bulleses that Mr. Markino's book will make the greater appeal; for in every sentence he writes he reveals himself and his own personal feeling on all matters, social and philosophical. Englishmen do not, as a rule, do this, and unfortunately are apt to mistrust men of other nations who differ in this respect from themselves. However, should only the fair sex be pleased, something not to be despised will have been accomplished. One small complaint we would make; the illustrations are a little disappointing. There are none of those delightful thumb-nail sketches which were so charming in "My Idealed John Bulleses."

George Wyndham. By CHARLES BOYD. (Arthur L. Humphreys. 1s. net.)

ANYTHING which refers to perhaps the most engaging personality who has flitted across the parliamentary stage in recent times must be of extraordinary interest. George Wyndham was a man of a century. We do not mean that he was a giant of intellect, but he was a level-headed, honest and successful politician. It is unnecessary to refer to the eminent advantages which he possessed in an illustrious lineage and a most delightful presence; suffice it to say that his varied career as soldier, country gentleman and statesman is without tarnish. The little reprint from the Cornhill magazine, from an article by one who was intimately acquainted with Wyndham, is very acceptable; later on we are promised a detailed life and the publication of the private correspondence of the famous Chief Secretary.

In the present small volume we are given a few examples of his epistolary style. It is racy and vigorous, and although from the extracts culled it is evident that Wyndham lacked the extraordinary elegance and finish of Cowper as a letter writer, it yet must be conceded that he took a very high rank amongst those who in the present day by hereditary talent and personal genius preserve the almost lost art of letter-writing.

Wyndham's principal achievement was of course his great measure of land purchase in Ireland, and here we think that it is instructive to recall how the influence of one mind has contributed to the immortality of those who developed his policy.

The late Lord Salisbury laid down in effect the policy which raised Mr. Arthur Balfour to the position of Prime Minister, and which led to Wyndham's political celebrity. Mr. Balfour carried through with extraordinary ability the policy of "resolute government" laid down by Lord Salisbury, and Mr. Wyndham, as private secretary to Mr. Balfour, imbibed the ideas which flowed from Lord Salisbury.

The policy of resolute government did not and was not intended to shut the door to conciliatory and remedial measures. The select committee of the House of Lords which was presided over by the late Lord Cairns, and of which Lord Salisbury was a member, clearly recognised that the question of the land was at the root of all the trouble in Ireland, and they reported accordingly. Hence the Ashbourne Act, which was a good beginning, and the Wyndham Act, which was a splendid culmination. If Wyndham's Act has failed at all, the fault is not in the Act, but in the parsimonious interpretation of it.

The pity of it! The popular, the loved statesman cut off in the full enjoyment of life, as is apparent from his correspondence up to the last. Heavy indeed was the loss to the country, when Wyndham and Lyttelton were called away within a short time of each other at a critical period when the influence of their characters and accomplishments were essentially needed.

C. C.

Cobbles Gentleman, Limited, and Other Stories. By AUSTEN SOMERS. (Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent & Co. 1s. net.)

THE four sketches forming this small book are described as comedies; but, if they are noted for anything in particular, it is for the lack of humour in their construction. The first one, "Cobbles Gentleman, Limited," has a small plot, capable of good development, but the opportunity is missed, and a merely dull recital of what befell a waiter during a day's holiday is the result. The same may be said of the other three stories; the working-out is not good enough. Not a smile can be raised from one of them.

Fiction

Hands Up! By FREDERICK NIVEN. (Martin Secker. 6s.)

WITH a very short interval, Mr. Niven takes us from a study of middle-class social life in Edinburgh, in "Ellen Adair," to a study of high-class cow-punching and train-robbing in the Wild West, in "Hands Up!" The transition proves his skill; if one of the stories pleased us, well and good; if both please us—and they do—we acknowledge his mastery of two spheres.

We are not on a level with certain haughty and dogmatic reviewers who endeavour to instruct Mr. Niven in the difficult business of dealing with half-wild cattle, who know precisely how a calf should be held, and who say in effect: "When we were cow-punchers we didn't do it that way." Such superior knowledge, such glorious exhibitions of technique, are beyond us; we, alas! shall never help at the branding, never watch the daily train pull out of "Black Kettle," never know such a character as Apache Kid, that queer mixture of ferocity and friendliness. But we can thank those who picture these things so vividly, and say, without any reservations, that this is as fine and lively a story as we have read for a long time. It is full of adventure and excitement, yet not without excellent studies of character; Apache Kid, who would hold up a train-crew at the muzzle of his "gun" and think nothing of it, and the next day risk his life for a friend, being one of the best. "Scolty," the little telegraph-clerk at Black Kettle, the doctor who came from miles away on a "pump-car" to attend to Apache, and several other people in the story, are as real as actual friends. We congratulate the author on a splendid addition to his list of novels.

Sentiment. By VINCENT O'SULLIVAN. (Duckworth and Co. 6s.)

APPARENTLY the author made up his mind to write a novel, and gave up the task halfway, for the story which gives this book its name occupies just half the pages, while the rest of the volume is given up to short stories. "Sentiment" is a very merry yarn indeed, and William, the hero, provokes a considerable amount of mirth on the reader's part. Penelope, the heroine, is a clever character study, a sensuous, pleasure-loving girl whom we feel will never reveal all of herself—the enigma of womanhood personified. William as a poet is fun undiluted, for the story is half farce and half drama, but wholly worth reading.

The remainder of the stories are mixed in character and quality. "Mrs. Turner" is a grimly realistic sketch of poverty's worst side, and on the other hand the last story in the book is an exquisite little piece of irony, telling as it does, of a woman who was extremely shocked at finding that a poet had idealised her—as if Dante's Beatrice had been wroth at finding out that Dante had immortalised her. Here are stories for every mood, for the most part above the average in quality.

A Social Innocent. By R. ST. JOHN COLTHURST. (John Long. 6s.)

FOR little witticisms of the chuckle-provoking order, this book would be hard to beat; for example, sport and politics, says one character, "seem to be one and the same thing in Ireland." These little japes, however, are almost lost without the context, and they only form one side of the story. It concerns a man with plenty of money, who had never left Ireland—and wild Ireland at that—until he had reached the age when most men have nearly learned the wisdom of indiscretions. He came to England as a very unworldly person, and made the blunders that an unworldly person would naturally make in high—very high—society. How he learned wisdom of a sort, and how in the learning he found his ideal woman, make up the story, and we recommend it as excellent light reading.

Yet it is not all light, for once in a while the author is moved to reflection, which expresses itself in some little serious paragraphs, generally at the beginnings of chapters. They are rather stilted, as if the writer were new to this sort of thing, but they ring true, and for once we do not find them wearisome. In spite of its amusing pages, the book is written earnestly, yet without cant or cant phrases; it is a fresh, healthy story, and should achieve a good measure of success.

Exceeding Pleasant. By L. OULTON. Illustrated. (Lynwood and Co. 6s.)

SOME of these tales are exceeding uninteresting rather than "exceeding pleasant"; there is, for instance, the one entitled "Old Crown Derby," which reads like an unsuccessful attempt to "pot" a third-rate melodrama, Pelissier fashion, and leaves us in doubt as to whether the author seriously intended to write a story, or suffered from nightmare and wrote the thing before being thoroughly waked up. The story which gives a title to the collection is a very dull affair; we tried to read into it political satire, a skit on suffrage, or some other hidden meaning, and failed miserably; it remains an enigma, and a tiresome one at that.

But the last tale in the book atones for all the rest; it is entitled "The Black Dread," and tells of the return of "The O'Hehir" to an old Irish castle, and the fate that befel him there. For gruesome fascination this sketch is equal to the work of Bram Stoker at his best—or worst, as inclination may dictate. The phantom ropes that dangled before the eyes of the O'Hehir, and the tentacles that came from nowhere to grip him, are depicted with ghastly realism, and we advise readers whose nerves are shaky to save up this story for a morning perusal—they may read the rest with perfect safety at any hour they like, and in that we take their patience for granted.

In the Learned World

THE discovery by M. Armand Gautier of the wide-spread diffusion throughout nature of fluorine may turn out to be one of the most important of the century. Fluorine, which belongs to the group of elements known as halogens or salt-formers, was until lately almost unknown to us, the use of hydrofluoric acid in "etching" or eating away the surface of glass being about its only property put to commercial use. On its isolation by Moissan in 1886 it was hailed as the "alcahest" or universal solvent of the alchemists, inasmuch as it attacked nearly all known substances, formed a violent explosive with hydrogen, and generally behaved like a perfect fury. Later researches, noted in this column from time to time, have shown that fluorine is present in small quantities in the blood, bones, and secretions of ourselves and other animals, although its use in the organism is a mystery. M. Gautier has now shown by experiments just communicated to the Académie des Sciences that what are called thermal waters, which are always of eruptive origin, invariably contain fluorine, and, following up this clue, he has found fluorine in large quantities in the gases escaping from the craters of active volcanoes, especially Vesuvius. Of the waters containing it, that of Vichy is perhaps the most familiar to the general reader, and there is now little doubt as to its frequent occurrence elsewhere. Its possible use may be indicated by the part that it plays in the formation of ozone. M. Gautier has been helped in his researches by M. P. Clausmann, and a summary of them will be shortly published.

The curative as distinguished from the industrial applications of electricity become every day more numerous, and one of the latest is its employment in the alleviation of deafness. Nearly all maladies of the internal ear have hitherto been incurable by reason of the great difficulty of applying to it either fomentations or other means of reducing inflammation before suppuration sets in. Dr. Hamm, a distinguished aurist of Brunswick, has now put to practical use an apparatus invented by Professor Peukert, a professor at the Polytechnik of the same city, which he calls an othotherm. By the aid of this, which is in effect a high-frequency apparatus on a small scale, a temperature as high as the patient can bear can be maintained for any length of time in the internal parts of the ear without inconvenience. Dr. Hamm claims that by its use he has cured not only chronic affections of the tympanum or drum of the ear and chronic inflammations of the internal tissues, but also the deafness following suppuration of the same parts. An account of the apparatus, which is remarkably ingenious from the mechanical point of view, is given in last month's Revue Scientifique.

Another medical application of electricity may be found in its use for heating the external surface of the limbs and trunk, a remedy which has been observed to give considerable relief in cases of rheumatism and gout. The ordinary plan of enclosing the part affected in a case containing incandescent bulbs or other means of raising the temperature by electric means has its drawbacks, inasmuch as it can only be applied for short periods and over limited tracts of skin. Some sort of clothing heated by electricity has therefore been found more beneficial, and this has hitherto taken the form of a kind of quilt containing spirals of wire embedded in asbestos and heated by the current. Garments made on this principle would be as rigid as the plate armour of the Middle Ages and as cumbrous as the padded linen suits adopted by citizens fearful of assassination in the time of the supposed Popish plots. M. Herrgott, a civil engineer of Belfort, has just produced, however, a fabric by which the conductors of the current are actually woven in the fabric, and, as they are made of nickel, are not likely to oxidise. M. Daniel Berthelot declares that the result is satisfactory, and Professor Bergonié, who is one of the pioneers of medical electricity, has used quilts made of it in the hospitals of Bordeaux with good effect. He says that a quilt made of M. Herrgott's material can be connected with the street current as easily as a lamp, and that its lightness is not the least of its merits.

The Académie des Sciences have also received a communication from MM. Stoklasa and Zdobnicky as to the effect of water containing the emanation of radium upon the growth of plants. According to him, radio-active water will increase the natural productiveness of lentils, peas, and wheat by from 60 to 160 per cent., and he finds it has the same effect upon the poppy, the beetroot, and some other plants cultivated for food. The flowering of the plants thus watered is not only considerably advanced, but the fecundation of them also takes place much more rapidly, and the total yield is thereby considerably increased. Naturally radio-active waters are rare, the area over which they occur being practically confined at present to a well-defined tract in the West of England and France, and with radium at its present price it seems hardly likely that the manufacture of artificially made radio-active water could be conducted on commercially profitable lines. Yet it is improbable that the present scarcity of radium will continue when the demand for it is so continually increasing as it is at present; and when the supply becomes relatively plentiful by the discovery of new deposits of pitchblende or otherwise, the farmer may see a way out of his present difficulties which at present is hidden from him. Certainly in intensive culture of all kinds his salvation appears to lie. F. L.

The Liberal Berliner Borsen Courier for December 14 reports on good authority that the British-German negotiations re the distribution of the spheres of interest in Africa have been definitely concluded; the negotiations on the Anatolian and Mesopotamian questions are still pending, but promise to come to a speedy and satisfactory issue.

An Isle of Dreams

"Call us not weeds; we are flowers of the sea."

THE detachment of the island atmosphere is congenial to the holiday mood, but to be the perfect playground of a summer vacation your island must fulfil certain simple conditions as to latitude, configuration, and shortest distance from the mainland. There must be no linking viaduct like that which gives entry to Anglesea, no railroad ferry such as crosses Canso Strait into Cape Breton, for, with such aids, the association is altogether too intimate. Nor must the island be so near that ferry boats cross and recross every hour, as from England to the Isle of Wight. One boat a day in each direction is ample and adequate, and the crossing should take two or three hours, so that no smaller craft are tempted to land invading hordes of curious tourists at odd hours. In these times, when wireless telegraphy links even sinking ships with other ships and lands far out of ken, complete isolation is no longer attainable, but the angler on his holiday likes to put as many obstacles as possible between himself and his workaday surroundings, and if he be a sea angler, then an island has claims that are obvious.

Santa Catalina lies at the ideal distance from the Los Angeles mainland, in sight of its coastline, yet sundered by a dancing strait that imparts strange antics to the daily steamer when broad seas swell to meet her keel. Its one town, Avalon, headquarters of the famous Tuna Club, has been built on that aspect of the island which looks to leeward of the prevailing summer wind, so that the fisherman can reckon on water like a pond during most days of the week. Hereabouts, too, the Pacific is deep right up to the foot of the cliffs, where, on boulders worn round and smooth by heavier surges, sea-lions drenched in spray bark day and night, and the water is so crystal clear that a shoal of yellow-tail or sea bass may be seen twenty yards ahead of the launch swimming in circles three or four fathoms down.

Thanks to these conditions, and to the quickening influence of warm currents from Japan, the inshore waters near Avalon offer to the curious visitor a spectacle unrivalled among the marvels of ocean life. I have crept through the Barrier Reef of Queensland, going half-speed and looking down on great fishes of many hues floating in and out of fairy palaces of coral; and I have, with the aid of a water telescope, spied on the minor tragedies of the underworld in the clear water on the north coast of Jamaica, where I once watched a great barracouta devour several small fish and then in due course caught and devoured the barracouta myself. Nowhere else, however, have I seen anything of the kind to equal the sea-gardens of Avalon. Here is a very rialto of fishes, up and down which they drift like gorgeous birds in the dim greenery of some tropical jungle. Over their silent abode one may float, as on an airship, in one of the glass-bottomed boats and look down on tangled acres of every conceivable tint and texture—red, green, olive, pink, heliotrope, broad-leaved and coralline—amid which fantastic fishes play at hide and seek in the strangely polarised light of those translucent depths with effects indescribably beautiful. Those favoured waters teem with life at all depths, and even at the surface fishes resembling golden carp may be seen routing in the kelp that thickly fringes the foot of the cliffs. This luxuriant growth is a source of constant chagrin to the careless fisherman who lets a yellow-tail or white sea-bass gain its sanctuary, for the fish is certain not only to regain its liberty, but so to entangle the tackle in those stubborn clumps and waving fronds that only a portion of it is recovered, to be greeted by its lamenting owner "in straight-flung words and few."

Very different from the sandy keys of Florida is this bold and rocky coast that looks out on the sunset and Japan. Florida is, in fact, intolerable after May, for the sandflies and mosquitoes are insatiable, and the coast, though swept by an occasional hurricane from the Gulf, seems to have caught some of the stagnation of the brooding Caribbean. He who has another month to spare will do well to face the four days of dusty travel that lie between the Gulf of Mexico and the Golden Gates. Traversing as it does the "bad lands" of Arizona, this run on the Southern Pacific is not exactly what Americans are fond of describing as a "scenic route"; yet, since it gives a glimpse of the Rio Grande, on the Mexican frontier, and of the Salton Sea, it is not wholly devoid of interest, and it ends pleasantly enough among the green swards and orange groves of California.

One morning, at Colon and Panama, I took some trouble to drop a line in both the oceans on the same forenoon, a freakish inspiration which, ending, as it deserved, in complete failure at either end of the Isthmus, was prompted only by the probability of no one having been enterprising enough to accomplish it before and the even greater certainty that no one would be foolish enough to do it again. Even where they approximate so closely, the neighbouring oceans, which, we are told, were joined at no remote date as time goes, are very different to the careless eye. Colon is always knee-deep in muddy water, whereas Panama is dryshod half the day and looks out on the ebbing waters across a considerable middle distance of uncovered foreshore.

California in June is a dreamland of flowers and oranges, of blue seas and of skies that shame their changing tourmaline, of snow-topped sierras, mystic lakes, giant trees and valleys hidden from the hustle of cities. Yet there is in all that State no spot more desirable than the little island of Santa Catalina, reclaimed from the savagery of San Clemente and other neighbours in the Channel, but wild enough to woo a man from the tiresome order of civilisation. The fish that first, nearly thirty years ago, drew sportsmen to its shores was the tuna, or tunny, and it was here that the first tuna of any account was taken on rod and line by my esteemed friend Dr. Holder, to whose magnetic writings the island has since owed the pilgrims that gather from all quarters of the earth. The brief but variegated history of tuna-fishing for sport is closely bound up with island landmarks; and Madeira, Santa Catalina and, last of all, Cape Breton have between them seen all the serious attempts, successful or otherwise, at the capture of this splendid fish with rod and line. Yet the heaviest tuna, a specimen of two hundred and fifty pounds or thereabouts, caught some years ago by Colonel Morehouse, credited to Santa Catalina, is dwarfed beside a fish of six hundred and eighty pounds more recently captured in Cape Breton waters by Mr. J. K. L. Ross after many a gallant attempt to acclimatise the sport in Canadian waters.

The chief drawback about tuna-fishing at Santa Catalina is that in some seasons there are no tunas. Thus one may travel the ten or twelve thousand miles from England and back without even seeing one. I know this, for I did so myself. The tuna, in short, is less obliging than the tarpon, which never fails those who go so far to seek it. It is a great traveller, capricious in its comings and its goings, chasing the flying fish round Santa Catalina one day and gone goodness knows where the next. I got to Avalon on the next.

Yet there are compensations, for here, even more than elsewhere, there are many good fish in the sea. If tunas are holding revel in other spots, the angler may console himself with white sea-bass and yellowtail, which, caught on the light tackle ordained by the Tuna Club, give as exciting sport as any man need wish for. Those who crave even bigger game may keep a look-out for the tell-tale fins of a basking swordfish, which, when hooked, will probably stand on end and charge the launch, or they may anchor on the ground for black sea-bass and fight one of the heaviest fish taken on the rod. My own experience was confined to comparatively small examples, but I managed, one morning before breakfast, to catch a couple that between them scaled two hundred and ninety pounds, and I would not have gone out again that day for anything short of a tuna itself.

Although the deep-still bays of the island are still amazingly full of fish, Dr. Holder and his far-seeing friends have wisely anticipated the inevitable effects of over-fishing, and have lately succeeded in getting a law passed to exclude nets from a territorial limit of three miles.

The Tuna Club keeps every detail of sport at this perfect sea-angling resort under absolute control, including the guides, who number fewer men of colour than in Florida, though the doyen of them, familiarly known as "Mexican Joe," shows unmistakable traces of one or other of the ancient races that first the Spaniard and then the Yankee improved off the face of the earth. Most of them, however, are white men, and at one time the best of them was Jim Gardner, an Englishman. Gardner has, however, gone back to the land, and when I last saw him he was contemplating a trip home to claim a legacy. Here, as in Florida, the part played by the guide is at least equal to that of the fisherman, and in all my fights with Californian sea fish, weighing from ten pounds to one hundred and sixty, my guide did quite as much as I, for, like a Scotch stalker, he first found the fish and then took me up to them, and his was the hand that gaffed each when the fight was over.

Santa Catalina would deserve to stand for the Mecca of sea anglers all the world over, were it only as the headquarters of a Club that has, more than any other, infused high sporting ideals on a sport that stands in some little need of such dry nursing. Apart, however, from this claim on our affections, it is, without pretension to splendid scenery or variety of resources, a very happy island set in a summer sea and blest with a climate as near perfection as our limited imagination goes. To it go enthusiasts from all over the world, who, having sat under the hospitable roof of the Tuna Club, return to their homes with enduring memories of American good fellowship and of such sport as, lovable though it may be in other respects, the coast of Britain could never have afforded even in those happy unnumbered days in which barbarous Jutes caught bass and pollack in sight of the Foreland.

F. G. AFLALO.

Addington Park

WITHIN twelve miles of the Royal Exchange a gross act of vandalism is in process of consummation. Addington Park, one of the few areas of primeval forest in the zone of Greater London, is being wrecked. If the jerry-builder had reached this district and his wave of bricks and mortar was about to submerge it, one might bow to the inevitable, if with bad grace. But the park lies in open country. Its noble glades and grassy rides have been the delight of generations of ornithologists, entomologists, and tree lovers. Those majestic avenues are being hacked down to make space for a golf links. We believe no little "city" in a Western State of America could be found guilty of an act so wanton. Truly, we strain out the gnat and swallow the camel. If a famous picture or a rare book is bought for the American market, we raise a hue-and-cry. One of the beauty spots of Surrey, a sylvan paradise which can never be restored, is to be marred and blotted out of existence without protest. Ten thousand trees are to come down, the wreckers proudly tell us. The rights of property were never more grossly abused. Such an act should be legislatively impossible. The American millionaire, if he buys great pictures or unique books, does not make an auto da fé of them. He has, as a rule, some sense of responsibility toward the State.

Addington Park has been undisturbed forest for centuries. Its beeches were of the grandest in the county of Surrey. Now all is smoking ruin. Hundreds of these magnificent giants lie like corpses on a battlefield, and here and there are smouldering fires of brushwood. We regard this wholesale murder of noble trees as a civic crime of the first order. The butchery of trees which is relentlessly waged in the outer ring of London will surely bear its own Nemesis in changing climate and rainfall.

We believe the laws of some of the Continental States, notably France, recognise the rights of the community in the slow maturity of trees. It certainly should be possible to curb the worst excesses of private greed. Addington Park has hitherto given sanctuary to rare birds and animals, and was one of the most famous haunts in England of entomologists. In 1807 it was purchased for the see of Canterbury, and became the residence of successive archbishops, whose bones moulder in the little God's acre in the valley. Some fourteen years ago, in evil hour, Archbishop Temple persuaded the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to apply for an Act of Parliament for its sale. The public were then rigidly excluded from its precincts. Nevertheless, all who skirted its fences could watch the pageantry of spring and autumn about its coombes and on its wood-crowned heights. Now it is in the occupation of an alien army. It is being slaughtered to make a Cockney holiday. Its glory is departed. The country to the South of London is the poorer; a noble landscape is being blotted out.

One asks one's self whether incidents such as these are not evidence of a woeful decline in public spirit. What can compensate the public for the loss of a forest, especially in close proximity to a great city? From the grassy glades of this park the present writer has heard the sound of the Tower guns firing a royal salute, and yet, so rural was the scene, one might have fancied one's self in Savernake. We repeat that, if such destruction is inevitable, what cannot be cured must be endured. We "put up with our improvements" as cheerfully as we may. But in this case the object is contemptibly inadequate. Scores of more eligible sites for a golf links could be found in the neighbourhood.

We hear weird claims put forward for the nationalisation of land. It is abuses such as that now to be perpetrated which inspire them with fresh vitality. Here is a property which was rich in every range of natural lore, rich in historical and archaeological association, a landmark to the pedestrian who, from populous city pent, struck into the open country. The "sport" that starts by converting a noble inheritance of woodland into a Brummagen wilderness is truly sport of the bastard order, paid for, indeed, in pieces of silver, but likewise in the execration of all those who love rural England. Such an act matches the wilful burning of a public library or the wanton destruction of a priceless work of art. The mischief is irreparable.

Addington Park matched the Forest of Arden in mystery and charm. Dryads might have played

Where'er the oak's thick branches stretch
A broader, browner shade,
Where'er the rude and moss-grown beech
O'er-canopies the glade.

Its wicked desecration is in keeping with that wave of cheap commercialism under which nothing beautiful or rare is sacred to the arts of the Dutch auctioneer.

A. E. CAREY.

The Magazines

IN the British Review for January, Mr. G. K. Chesterton continues his study of modern journalism by an essay on "The Silence of Journalists," and he has some sharp criticisms of the questionable newspaper methods of the day. The object of the journalist, he says, is to make men ignorant; "ignorant of something important, while they are interested and even learned in some things entirely trivial." This is a necessity, of course, if the newspaper is to pay well and attain a huge circulation. Mr. Storer treats of J. M. Synge and St. John Hankin in his series "Dramatists of To-day." Major Redway writes trenchantly upon "Our Army System," and Mr. Litchfield Woods has an amusing piece of satire entitled "Self-Help."

One of the best articles on a certain aspect of language that we have read is that by Logan P. Smith, "Dialect Words," in the English Review; it occupies sixteen closely printed pages, and is a really valuable and suggestive study. Mr. Ernest Newman gives us a surprise in this issue by a long defence of the mechanical piano-player. He points out its immense scope and its superb technique in skilful hands, and certainly seems to make out a good argument, leaving himself, however, the necessary loophole of escape by admitting that the perfect human player—is perfect, beyond all mechanical aids. Mr. Wells continues his new "Anticipations" in "The World Set Free"; the Editor discusses acutely Mrs. Pember Reeves' recent little book in an article on "The State and the Family"; and there is an interesting chapter from Mr. George Moore's forthcoming book, "Vale," entitled "Yeats, Lady Gregory, and Synge." Other excellent items go to make a capital number.

The literary tit-bit for most people in the Nineteenth Century will be the "Eight New Love-Letters of Jane Welsh," presented authoritatively by Alexander Carlyle, as a precaution in case they should appear, by chance of new ownership, "illegally, without editing, and most probably defaced by errors of transcription and other blunders." They are intensely interesting, and one contains a remarkable story of a proposal to the lady and her difficulty in dealing with the persistent admirer. Mrs. Archibald Colquhoun writes on "Woman and Morality"; Stephen Gwynn on "The Irish Gentry"; Francis McCullagh on "Portugal, the Nightmare Republic"; and politics and military matters are in capable hands as usual.

The January number of Science Progress is one of the most successful that Sir Ronald Ross has issued. Amongst the numerous subjects treated are "Nutrition and Education in Mental Development," by Dr. F. W. Mott; "Nervous Activity," by Professor Fraser Harris; a Study of Lord Kelvin's Work for Science, and Sir Oliver Lodge's recent address to the British Association; an effective paper by Dr. E. H. Ross, "Recent Advances in our Knowledge of Syphilis," illustrated with coloured photographs. A paper by a workingman, "Why are People so Confined," in which there is original and native force, is sure to obtain some interested attention. This brief statement of subjects far from exhausts the number of topics of science and general interest dealt with.

The current number of Poetry and Drama, dated December, contains a new poem by the Laureate and one by Thomas Hardy, neither of them particularly distinguished; it is, however, an excellent and full issue with any amount of interesting material. The two most thoughtful articles are one by Basil Dean on "The Problem of the Repertory Theatre," and one by J. C. Squire on "Francis Thompson." Lord Dunsany's last play, "The Golden Doom," is here given, and there is some charming original verse by various poets—that by Mr. Walter de la Mare and Mr. Buxton Shanks being, to our mind, the most beautiful.

The Scottish Historical Review opens with the text of the Introductory Lecture delivered to the Class of Ancient History, University of Edinburgh, last October, by Professor Hume Brown; subject, "Intellectual Influences of Scotland on the Continent." It forms a masterly article in its present form, with the curiously unexpected conclusion that in the nineteenth century only one Scotsman, Sir Walter Scott, can be mentioned in this respect. The next essay is by David Baird Smith on "William Barclay"; there are two other lengthy papers, and copious reviews, illustrated.

The "Reminiscences of a B.S.A. Policeman" form a most interesting feature of the Empire Review, by E. B. Baker. More serious matter is provided by Lord Sydenham, who writes on "India and Education," and criticises the university and college system at present in operation; by Lord Ampthill, who discusses "National Service"; and by "Diplomatist," who treats Foreign Affairs. The Hindustan Review to hand for November has an exposition of Wireless Telegraphy by Professor Chandi Prasad, M.A.; an excellent article on "European Intercourse with India during the Middle Ages," by Mr. P. C. Ghosh, M.A., and a learned philosophical essay by Mr. Oza, M.A., among other very interesting matter.

Mr. C. E. Lawrence has a neat and timely article in the Book Monthly "On Manuscripts: Some Hints as to their Preparation for Publication," which should be read by all young authors, and might be extended in its application to those who write for the papers. Some amusing instances of "Library Humour" are given by Frank Haigh, and Miss Esther Wood writes upon William Morris. From the headquarters of the Gypsy and Folk-lore Club, 5, Hand Court, Bedford Row, comes the official organ of the same name, with some fascinating articles; one, on the "Corsican Vendetta," pointing out that this is one of the old customs that could well be spared. It is almost incredible that this terrible blood-feud is still in active operation so near to the mainland of France, Spain and Italy. A novel feature is a list of markets at which the enterprising reader may sell his wares if he cares to go "on the road" for a forty-weeks' tour.

Harper's Magazine is a splendid issue. Two fine travel articles are "A Sub-Antarctic Island," by R. C. Murphy, and "Australian By-paths," by Norman Duncan; one dealing with the whaling industry which the Norwegians have made their own in the South seas, the other with the deserts of Western Australia. Mr. Arnold Bennett continues his novel, "The Price of Love," and there are many other well-known contributors. In the Windsor Magazine an account of a journey with Bedouins to desert tombs held sacred by them is given by N. Hadden, with liveliness and capital pictures; Mr. Eden Phillpotts tells a little story of Devon called "The Axing of the Banns," and the series on "Famous Brothers" is continued. The illustrations in both these magazines are of the usual superb quality.

The Modern World (Madras) for November is just to hand, and, despite some obvious difficulties with the English language, has some suggestive articles by well-known Indian gentlemen. "What Lord Hardinge Can do for India" is unsigned, but it puts one side of the question very ably. Certain items of this review we cannot quite understand; the first sentence of a paper on "Estrangement and Irreligion," for example: "Young Men of India! . . . beware of being ensnared in such Western ideals as beef-eating, brandy-bibbing, cigar-smoking, free-lancing, and such abhorrent practices." We were not aware that any of these things have attained the dignity of "Western Ideals"; but as the author of the contribution alludes to "the master-pen of Marie Corelli" some excuse may be found. We quote two sentences from the "Reviews of Books," suggesting that they might have been more clearly and simply expressed: "In his opinion, perhaps in everybody's opinion also the fundamental factors which constitute power in the sense of modern political phraseology, are the wealth of the Democracy canalised both by the plutocratic oligarchy of the Bankers whose clients are the modern States, great and small and the public opinion which is becoming more and more conscious of its efficacy in public weak and international facts." . . . "We cannot but thank with delight on the splendid panorama that the writer presents of the political condition of the world in one volume, with none the less an impressive manner." The editor of the Modern World is courageous, and deserves success; his contributors, however, might spend a few hours on the themes of spelling and composition, with advantage to all.

All the profits of the Children's Theatre during this week (January 5-10) will be devoted to the endowment of a "Children's Theatre Cot" at the Charing Cross Hospital. Mrs. Percy Dearmer and Miss Netta Syrett wish to mark their opening season in some special way, and they feel that they could not do this better than by giving the children of London this opportunity to help a hospital which does so much for sick children in the heart of the city. The booking last week showed that the idea of a theatre for children is a welcome one. Those who secure seats for this week will not only gain an afternoon of merry enjoyment, but will be directly helping in a noble work.

The Meaning of the Golden Bough*

THE last two volumes of Dr. J. G. Frazer's momentous work complete his researches into the origin and meaning of the myth which has provided him with the covering title of no fewer than eight books, and, as in the case of his preceding works, present adequate testimony to the indefatigable industry and the unrivalled powers of marshalling his facts which particularly distinguish all Dr. Frazer's output.

What was the "Golden Bough"? The author, in these two volumes containing 666 pages in all, sets out to illumine us and arrives at the final conclusion that the Golden Bough was merely the mistletoe, which, with his passion for analytical examination, he ultimately suggests is the variety known as Loranthus Europæus and not the common mistletoe (viscum album). This attention to detail is eminently characteristic of Dr. Frazer, who seems to us, if the truth may be confessed, to devote himself more to the particular brand of mistletoe than to the elucidation of the underlying meaning of the myth.

However, as he says himself, the legend of the priest of Diana, who watched over the Arician grove, and was slain with the Golden Bough, is, in reality, only an excuse wherein to discuss questions which concern the gradual evolution of human thought from savagery to civilisation. But though his eye embraces an immense area and his work as a study in folk-lore generally is unequalled in the profusion of analogies exemplified in its pages, when all is said and done, does Dr. Frazer take us very much further towards solving the problem of the origins of civilisation which is his ostensible aim? On his own confession, indeed, this prolific collection and comparison of the customs of civilised and barbarous races merely lead him to the somewhat barren conclusion that there is an "essential similarity in the working of the less developed mind among all races." His creed, if creed it may be called, is that the folk-lore of varied nations demonstrates a steady evolution of mental development. Many arguments might be adduced from the author's own works against the acceptance of this theory, but at least we may set out on the other side of the account the universal belief of all ancient philosophers, from Pythagoras onward, that there was a world prior to theirs whose knowledge and accomplishments far outweighed their own civilisation. Their teachings, in fact, were absolutely opposed to the doctrines of the evolutionists.

Dr. Frazer now admits that in the course of writing these many bulky tomes he has had to throw some of his earlier theories on the scrap-heap. Particularly is this the case with the ancients' conception of Zeus or Jupiter. Originally, Dr. Frazer thought the chief god of the Aryan peoples was conceived as, firstly, a personification of the sacred oak tree, and only secondly as a god in the sky, the Lightning and Thunder Deity. He has changed his mind and is inclined to reverse the characteristics. But why should the idea of the majesty and omnipotence of the Unseen God have been on what is apparently such a low plane? Has not Dr. Frazer perhaps lost himself in his labyrinthine researches? Has he preserved the husk and lost the kernel?

He explains the idea of the oak's association with Zeus because statistics prove (and we do not doubt his statistics, though glad to be spared them!) the oak to be struck by lightning more frequently than any other tree, and hence "the riven and blackened oaks must indeed be favourites of the sky-god." It seems to us on the contrary to point to the very reverse. To describe the blackened and blighted remains of a once wide-spreading oak tree as a favourite of the sky god because thus stricken is not only opposed to common sense but is in contrast with mythology, wherein Zeus invariably casts a thunderbolt at those who, as we might expect, have angered him, not at those he loves.

The fact is, in spite of the vast amount of erudition Dr. Frazer has brought to bear on his subject, in spite of his huge array of analogous customs, in spite of his scholarly and fascinating style, he has not really succeeded in conveying to the least degree a proper understanding of the mental horizon of our ancient Aryan ancestors. He has not only failed to arrive at the real conception of Zeus, but is equally at sea in regard to the sacred tree—oak or otherwise—and the Golden Bough or mistletoe. Let us look briefly at the problem on the supposition that in very early days those who taught the myth were not semi-savages whose mental development was scarce begun, but were men of scientific attainments who—as we know was the case with the Druids and Magi—kept their learning and achievements as arcane secrets concealed amongst a mass of fabulous and magical matter.

Dr. Frazer finds that Zeus was primarily a personification of the thunder and lightning. He also finds that the priest of Diana at Aricia was invested—he says in the imagination of his worshippers, but who ever heard of the hoi polloi with imagination?—with the power of overcasting the heaven with clouds and eliciting storms of thunder. Surely that priest must have had some power or some means which at least created the impression of ability on his part to produce clouds, lightning and thunder, not merely in the imagination of his worshippers, but as evidence of their eyes. Dr. Frazer might find many parallel examples were he to seek them, such, for instance, as the sulphurous emanations at the sacred grotto at Delphi. He also finds the mistletoe itself perhaps conceived as a germ or seed of fire, connected also in some manner with lightning. Thus in the myth of Balder, the Good, all the gods agree to make him proof against every danger, but Loki, the Evil One, encourages Hother to shoot at him with a piece of mistletoe with the result that Balder is pierced through and through by the mistletoe and falls dead. All these hidden symbols of the true meaning of Zeus, the Sacred Tree, and the Golden Bough Dr. Frazer is content to leave as fanciful and imaginary lore concerned with atmospheric thunderstorms, actual oak trees and mistletoe berries. Perhaps the day will come when he will adopt a different theory. Meanwhile we respectfully suggest that a study of the Assyrian, Median, and Persian symbols of the Sacred Tree, the Winged Globe, and the curious representations of the genii or priests holding in their hands or carrying in caskets what appear to be mistletoe berries may assist him to throw a fresh light on an obscure and as yet little understood subject, but a subject which when interpreted correctly may entirely revolutionise the theory of a steady evolution in mental development as regards our forefathers of old time. C. B.

* The Golden Bough, A Study in Magic and Religion. Third Edition. By J. G. FRAZER, D.C.L., LL.D., Litt.D. Parts VII and VIII—Balder the Beautiful. Vols. I and II. (Macmillan and Co. 20s. net.)

The Theatre

"The Attack" at the St. James' Theatre

TO those who have grown accustomed to seeing Sir George Alexander personify the cool, noble, dignified man of the world, riding over all obstacles with certainty of final success, his assumption of the character of Mérital may prove a trifle disappointing. Mérital is cool, undoubtedly, but his behaviour when in difficulties is hardly noble. He is the leader of an influential party in French politics, and a slip of his youthful days—the embezzlement of a sum of money—is brought up against him most ingeniously by Frépeau, an enemy in the guise of a friend, and the controller of a paper. Mérital at first would ignore the assertions of his adversaries; Frépeau, however, who brings the news, has already, to his disgust, given it the publicity of a denial, thus seeking to drag Mérital into the mire of a damaging controversy. Mérital, to defend his reputation, arraigns Labelle, who is Frépeau's tool and has scattered the scandal broadcast, for libel; also—and this is where he loses that impeccable dignity which we have always associated with Sir George—he discovers a shady affair of Frépeau's past, and threatens him with exposure, à tu quoque which does not suit at all, we might say, the dynasty of the courtly, captivating Alexandrian kings. However, Frépeau is discomfited; Labelle—whom we do not see—is sentenced, and all ends well for Mérital, his name and fame. And after all has ended well, and the play, as far as the audience's keen interest is concerned, is virtually over, we have a lengthy scene in which Mérital explains his early career to the lady who is to be his wife, tells how he repaid the money that he had taken in a gust of sudden temptation, and is duly forgiven.

The vital part of the play lies in the political machinations and the scenes between the two men; the love interest is secondary, though charming. Miss Martha Hedman, who made her first appearance in this country, took the part of Renée de Rould with exquisite taste and comprehension; the scene where she tells Mérital that it is not his son whom she loves, but himself, might easily become farcical in unskilled hands, but, as she played it, was full of grace. It is the author's fault, not hers, that this scene was rather spun out until the convincing effect of her first few minutes of gentle appeal was weakened. Mr. Holman Clark was wonderfully good as the double-faced Frépeau: his gradual change from affection to defiance, from defiance to submission, and from submission to a bravado that seemed to save his self-respect even to the very last, was an extraordinary piece of acting. Mr. Vivian Reynolds as Garancier, Mr. Philip Desborough and Mr. Reginald Malcolm as Mérital's two sons, Miss Gladys Storey as Georgette, all took their parts excellently, and Mr. J. Adeane Barlow made a perfect servant. In this English version of Bernstein's "L'Assaut," translated by George Egerton, we imagine that the smaller parts, which are not essential, have lost something in lightness—especially in the scene where the two boys congratulate their father on his success. The general effect, however, is pleasing, and the company received the congratulations of a crowded house. W. L. R.

Holiday Entertainments

THESE particular theatrical adventures grow in favour every year. The most remarkable feature this season, however, is the fact that the children of to-day appear generally very content with the clever productions of a few winters ago.

"PETER PAN" RETURNS TO THE DUKE OF YORK'S THEATRE.

There is nothing but pleasure in the splendid production of Sir James Barrie's masterpiece for children. No laughter is heartier, no sentiment truer, than that of this now famous play. In its tenth year, it shows no sign of age; there is a freshness of spirit underlying the genius of the author that will outlast our time and a good many of both the actors and the audience. The present production gives us a new and admirable Pirate Captain. Mr. Godfrey Tearle's Hook, although quite other than that of Mr. Holman Clark, who is engaged at the St. James's, is full of interest; he is at once melodramatic and burlesque—the feared and beloved of thousands of boys. There are a few other changes in the cast, but of small importance. Miss Chase is still the Pan of other days, and plays with the delicacy and charm which is already so well known. To us she is not so inspired and beautiful as the original Peter, but, judging by the enthusiasm of the audience, we are rather lonely in this view of the matter. In any case, the entertainment goes forward with delight, and is likely to have a long run of successful matinées. It will not be forgotten that "Quality Street" is played at the same theatre, so if you will, you can see two Barrie plays at the Duke of York's on one day, and both are delightful.

"WHERE THE RAINBOW ENDS" ONCE MORE AT THE GARRICK.

This is another old friend, although seven years younger than "Peter Pan." Added to adventure and laughter and some satire, you here get a strong under-current of patriotism. We have no doubt that the Osborne boys and others are ready to do all they can for their country's welfare, but some of the lines are a little too high-flown for the real schoolboy of to-day. One may admire Nelson and be ready to give all one has for the benefit of the State, but one would like to be quiet about it. This the authors of "Where the Rainbow Ends" do not permit—there is too great an effort on the part of Saint George for England; but there are so many more delightful features in the play that the whole goes through with great success and vivacity.

FOR CHILDREN BY CHILDREN (AND OTHERS).

The daily matinées at the Court Theatre vary now between the entertainment composed of Miss Netta Syrett's three fairy plays and the rather more worldly "adventure" which Mrs. Dearmer has written to music by Mr. Martin Shaw. The characters of "The Cockyolly Bird" are said by the author to be "real people," "toys," "animals," "Japanese" and "pleasant cannibals," so you see that the childish mind is well provided with matter and that the seven scenes give us plenty of variety.

We are not sure that a child critic should not be employed to write of such a play as "The Cockyolly Bird." We own we are widely appreciative of every form of stage art, but we feel we are not children, and perhaps cannot enter into the spirit of what seemed to us a very amateur production with the true zest of youth. But, fortunately, we were placed among a group of little boys and girls who expressed their opinions loudly during the play and kicked the back of our stall with hearty enthusiasm throughout the afternoon. This part of the audience proved itself delighted with Mrs. Dearmer's efforts to amuse them. The only severe criticism we heard was a strong demand that the curtain should be left up while the scenes were being changed and that tea should constantly be served. Apart from these points, the adventures of Kit, Miss Fay Lilmar, a little boy who does not like his governess, hates geography, and fears the coming of a girl companion to his mother's house, appeared to be very highly appreciated. As many of the parts were played by charming children, and as the wonders of the story, with its coming to life of toys, its agreeable Polar bear, and so on, ran smoothly and gaily, we imagine "The Cockyolly Bird" will be very popular—especially with those who like to have the back of their stall kicked throughout the performance.

"ROYAL YORK" HOTEL, BRIGHTON

Supreme Comfort in a Warm and Sheltered Position. Excellent Sea Views

SOME PRESS OPINIONS.

"To the Cuisine particular attention has been paid, and no expense spared, whilst the service is absolutely perfect."

"And in the Royal York you have the perfection of an English hotel and English cooking."

AND—

Colonel NEWNHAM DAVIS says:—"The Chef makes soup like a Frenchman, grills like an Englishman, and fries like an Italian."

Telegrams: "Presto, Brighton."

Telephones: 206 Post Office, Brighton.
293 Brighton.

THE KARSINO and NEW ISLAND HOTEL
HAMPTON COURT.

Proprietary: Mr. FRED KARNO.

Tel.: MOLESEY 1.

The only Residential River Hotel open
all the Year round.

THE RIVIERA OF LONDON
THE FAVOURITE RESORT OF LONDON SOCIETY.
LUXURIOUS PALM COURT.
DANCES & ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

For Illustrated Brochure & Tariff, apply Manager.

"CHARLEY'S AUNT" AND "MARUSA" AT THE PRINCE OF WALES'S.

It is a little late in the day to recommend anyone to go and see the aunt of Charley still running, for the world has decided to keep on going, whatever happens. But as the present is Mr. Brandon Thomas's own season, especial care has been taken to make the representation of this classic farce as perfect as well can be, and laughter is assured. There have, of course, been many changes since we last saw the play, but to us they seem all for the better; the pace is smarter, the "Babs" of Mr. Percy Crawford possesses new notes of fun, the Jack Chesney of Mr. Geoffrey Kerr adds a touch of truth and charm to some situations which used rather to lack those qualities. As for the rest of the company, they play with a will, and the whole arrangement of fun and frolic goes forward to an obligato of constant laughter.

Mr. Brandon Thomas has put on the stage a very different play of his own in front of "Charley's Aunt" in the evening bill. It is a story of the Russo-Japanese War, and is chiefly remarkable for the dancing of the much-admired Marusa. Miss Vivian Vanna appears in this character with perfect success. Her dramatic dance shows that she possesses all the qualities so greatly admired in the ballet-dancers of to-day. She has fire and youth and beauty, knowledge of her craft, and exquisite feeling for the colour and movement of the music which Mr. Edward Jones has provided for Mr. Thomas's rather queer little play.

EGAN MEW.

Mr. Werner Laurie is just publishing "An Unfinished Song," by Mrs. Ghosal, at 3s. 6d. This novel, which depicts the life of high-class Indian society and the change wrought upon it by touch with Western education, is the work of the sister of Rabindra Nath Tagore. In her own country Mrs. Ghosal has produced novels, plays, poems, and scientific works, and has for twenty-five years been the editress of one of the foremost Bengali magazines. She was one of the first women to emerge from seclusion and mix freely in society. Although interested in everything English, she has never visited England, and this is the first time a work of hers has appeared in this country.

We have received from Mr. Josef Holbrooke his preliminary announcement of the thirteenth year of his series of Concerts of Modern English Chamber Music, to be held at the Art Centre, Mortimer Street, London, W., on the following dates:—Fridays: February 27, March 27, April 24, and May 29, at 8.30 p.m. each evening. Subscriptions for two reserved seats at each concert will be two guineas, and for four seats three guineas. Reserved seats for single concerts are 5s. and 2s., and admission, 1s. Subscriptions will be received at the Hall in Mortimer Street, the usual agents, or by the Secretary, at Vale House, Tufnell Park, London, N.

On Reaching Germany

"WILL the estuary never end?" the visitor asks in wonder, as the steamer goes piloted, hour after hour, up the mouth of the Elbe to her appointed dock.

To gain a first impression of Hamburg you must approach it for the first time from the sea—never from the land; you must gaze on mile upon mile of funnels and rigging etched on grey sky, of crowded barges and quays, of tugs and tenders; you must pass from liner to liner, as from room to room in a temple, till your spirit is ready to fall down and worship the huge image of the Imperator, squatting like some monstrous fowl before the very shrine itself. Thus humbled, you will come to Hamburg, and only thus will Hamburg notice your arrival.

The city has reached the awkward age. Forty—thirty years ago, it was a kind of northern Venice—a town of old buildings, standing knee-deep in water, like dock-hands always ready to load or unload. Some of these old buildings still remain, effective, yet discredited. The new city, only half completed, is a city of "blocks." From a shop or from your hotel you will be directed to a restaurant "in the next block but one," or "here in this block"—nothing could be more American. A native explained to me, with obvious pride, the system of land tenure and leasing prevailing in his town. I forget, or never understood, the explanation, but the result of the system seems to be that Hamburg is becoming, faster than London, faster even than Paris or Berlin, a city divided into square stone buildings, light, clean, airy, and not much uglier than ugly barracks. If there are any architects enrolled in the Fabian Society they have doubtless visited Hamburg, and looked with longing eyes at the tiny, black-coated figures running in and out, up and down, the huge hygienic hives now standing in rows behind the Alsterdamm. Buildings and streets are clean beyond belief; thin iron frameworks allow a maximum amount of glass in every window; the rooms are as high and airy as wards in a hospital. One gains an inevitable impression of rapidity and certainty of execution, as though Hamburg were some new nickel-coated patent. "That's neat!" seems to be the particular platitude the sight-seer will find most valuable in Hamburg. Here is nothing antiquated, nothing that can be improved on—or, if there is, you need only be patient for a very little while. It will soon be supplanted.

Hamburg is sometimes described as a very English town. More truly characteristic than Berlin, it is none the less the kind of town that English municipal authorities are trying to copy, rather than itself reminiscent of England. The outlying districts, the trams, the "fine" (i.e., vast—in all branches of architecture these words are now interchangeable) streets and open squares are of the kind that municipal bodies in this country regard as Utopian. Hamburg, whatever happens to it, is so situated that it must always be a beautiful city; it is for that reason all the more dangerous for other towns to copy.

The arrangement of its streets is, in its hard logic, typical, I suppose, of the German mind. The new Hamburg will be as featureless as a flawless argument. No, that is an exaggeration: a city so constantly interrupted by water can never be featureless.

Hamburg is, besides a port, a city facing outwards, and, as in most ports, there is little vehicular traffic in the streets, whose titanic proportions are, therefore, especially overwhelming. It is now customary to build streets wide and spacious for the sake of light and air, but a large thoroughfare with very little traffic is as great a failure as an hotel with three hundred bedrooms and thirty guests. In broad streets and under huge stone offices, pedestrians—whether in Hamburg or in London—look like flies; it ought to follow that in New York this unpleasant impression would be stronger still, and Mr. William Archer has confirmed this opinion: "What is truly terrible in New York is that it seems a city of giants and a city of pigmies. Not that its inhabitants are physically smaller than those of other cities—only they are more definitely dwarfed by their surroundings. . . . To a superficial view, everything seemed colossal; but to the imagination, and even to a closer visual scrutiny, the scene suggested not an abode of Titans, but an immeasurable ant-hill." In the half-empty roadways and pavements of the newest quarters of Hamburg the resemblance to an ant-hill, an inconveniently uncrowded ant-hill, was very strong, and I wondered whether modern cities, wide and tall, might not in time have the same oppressive effect on their citizens that the mountains of Switzerland have had upon the Swiss. Out of sight, out of mind, the port, with its busy quays and wharves, might slip the memory for a while were not the traveller compelled to observe that the passers-by are hurrying on business of which he gets no glimpse.

He feels shut out from the life of the city, an idler, a drone, whereas at Berlin he will discover himself the welcome, the essential customer. He leaves the flat country round Hamburg, travels through flat country till he reaches the flat environs of Berlin; he has had no hint of the change, but no sooner has he set foot in Berlin than he is conscious of a change. Perhaps he cannot define it till he learns from a guide or a waiter or a chatty shopkeeper that three million strangers visited Berlin last year, but then he understands. Berlin is still anxious to attract visitors. Unlike London and Paris, it is not used to them yet, and its eagerness to please, contrasted with the indifference which London and Paris in their peculiar ways manage to express, keeps Berlin provincial.

Like Hamburg, it will become the sort of city an unimaginative Socialist of ten years ago would have described as Utopian. The huge emporiums scattered all over it seemed—though I do not care to insist on this hurried impression—larger, more crowded, and to contain a greater variety of departments than the big shops of London or Paris. In these shops of the future,

ROYAL ALBION HOTEL, BRIGHTON.

THE NEWEST HOTEL.

Closer to the Sea than any other Hotel
at Brighton.

Magnificent Dining Room and Lounge with
beautiful Sea Views.

The Academy and Literature says:—"We have tried all the hotels in Brighton and none can compare with the Royal Albion for beauty of position, comfort, and personal attention to visitors' wishes."

For Illustrated Brochure and
Tariff, apply to
THE MANAGER.

Telephones :
903 Pbst Office (2 lines).

Telegrams :
"Brilliance, Brighton."

however, it is possible to buy everything. Nothing would be easier than to live for a year in Berlin without entering more than one shop. . . .

This shop—and there are dozens of examples of it—will comprise the whole "block." When the native leaves it he returns to the "block" of flats in which he lives. More by accident than design, I found myself on the last day of my visit some four or five miles from the Unter den Linden, in an enormous thoroughfare called the Kaiserdamm. "Enormous" is the only word. It stretched in a perfectly straight line as far as the eye could see in either direction, and was as wide, I should judge, as the space between the railings that run beside the Mall. Great stone buildings stared at one another across the almost deserted street. There were flats above and shops below, each a tolerably close—often an identical—reproduction of its neighbours.

Walking back to the city, I noticed that the Kaiserdamm presently called itself Bismarckstrasse, then Berlinerstrasse, then, under the name of Charlottenberger Chaussée, it disappeared into the Thiergarten whence it re-emerged just in time to take up its famous rôle of Unter den Linden. "Just like Holborn, New Oxford Street, Oxford Street, and the Bayswater Road," someone may say. But our crowded, uncertain streets can give no idea of the size and straightness of this great thoroughfare, its cleanliness, its emptiness, or its crushing regularity. Block after block, barrack after barrack, is filled with citizens of a modern city.

"Only a nation of workers," I mused, "could have erected buildings like these." Then I remembered how early the city was astir, how late the shops continued open in the hope of transacting business. A sturdy race, with an insatiable appetite for work and a persevering love of pleasure! Every visitor to Berlin finds it difficult to reconcile the industry of the citizen with the popularity of innumerable restaurants and dancing-halls, open till two, four, even six in the morning. The difficulty grows on inspection, for the German has a genuine love of pleasure—he differs from the Frenchman, who loves excitement. The amusements of Berlin seemed much duller than the amusements of Paris. But there is no doubt that the people enjoy them, and their capacity for pleasure equals their capacity for work—a healthy sign. Their amusements are dull because their city, being young and with, as yet, no striking individuality of its own, has fallen an easy prey to the Cosmopolitanism that is ruining Europe for the inquisitive traveller. The amusements of Berlin are borrowed from Paris, London, and New York. At a music-hall I heard no word of German spoken on the stage throughout the evening. Two of the "turns" were French, two were English, and the rest American, yet I saw in the audience no foreigner besides myself. Possibly the "bill" was exceptional, but naturally I was struck by it.

A. P.

Notes and News

A course of eight lectures on "The Art of Printing Historically Considered," will be delivered by Mr. R. A. Peddie at the St. Bride Institute, Bride Lane, Fleet Street, E.C., beginning on Monday next, at 7.30 p.m. At the first lecture Mr. Peddie will deal with the invention of the art and its progress during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Admission free.

The Pioneer Players' performance at the King's Hall, Covent Garden, of the tenth century play, "Paphnutius," the announcement of which has created such wide interest, will begin on Sunday at 8.30 sharp and on Monday at 3.0. The audience are earnestly desired to be in their places before these hours, as, owing to the fact that part of the auditorium will be used for some of the scenes, it will be necessary to shut out late comers until the first interval. A special souvenir programme has been compiled for the occasion. It will contain a reproduction of Albert Durer's frontispiece to the first printed edition of Roswitha's plays, which represents the nun-playwright presenting her panegyric of Otho I to her abbess, and short literary contributions by Miss Christopher St. John, the translator of "Paphnutius," and Mr. G. K. Chesterton.

Mr. Andrew Melrose informs us that he has just made arrangements for the fifth annual £250 Prize Novel Competition associated with his house. The adjudicators for 1914 will be Mr. W. L. Courtney, Mr. H. G. Wells, and Mr. A. E. W. Mason. Enquiries by intending competitors should be addressed to Andrew Melrose, Ltd., 3, York Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

"Through Jubaland to the Lorian Swamp" is the title of a book of exploration and adventure to be published shortly by Messrs. Seeley, Service and Co. A vast expanse of British East Africa is quite unknown, never having been traversed by a white man. Through these regions Mr. I. N. Dracopoli, F.R.G.S., explorer, naturalist, and sportsman, marched with a few followers, making his objective the almost unknown and quite unexplored Lorian Swamp, encountering many dangers and adventures, and recording many interesting and valuable facts.

"Annals of the Magic Isle," with notes and introduction, by Mr. Ralph Hall Caine, concludes its serial issue with the last week of the year. Sir Walter Besant used to be a very warm advocate of the serial issue of other than merely works of fiction. In this case the mythology of the Celt (more particularly that of the Isle of Man) is told in the novel form of Boccaccio or "The Arabian Nights." Beginning with the vaguely defined faith of early history, these "Annals" serve to illustrate the influence the Celtic habit of mind has imposed upon law and customs everywhere. It is curious to note that la couvade (the hatching) customs of the Basques had their equivalent among the Manx, and that there could have existed in a community so near at hand a kind of universal marriage feast, not unlike that described by Prescott in his "Conquest of Peru." The compact, however, had to be continued for longer than a year and a day to make the wedding bind. Hence, apparently, customs of law that exist in pale shadow in certain Celtic communities to this hour.

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

BY LANCELOT LAWTON

THE INTRUSION OF MR. LLOYD GEORGE

FROM every point of view the adventurous incursion of Mr. Lloyd George into the domain of naval policy is to be deplored. Bound up with the questions which he discussed were issues of international importance, such as required delicate handling on the part of one occupying so responsible a position as that of Chancellor of the Exchequer. But neither in the method nor in the manner of his expression could it be said that Mr. Lloyd George was particularly happy. Before commenting upon his remarks we are compelled frankly to object to the vehicle which he selected for the ventilation of his views. Again and again experience has demonstrated that an interview in the columns of a partisan Press is an improper medium for a ministerial declaration on any question affecting foreign policy, and is likely, as the present instance has proved, to create unfortunate misapprehensions abroad. In order that our diplomacy may bear the character of honesty and consistency, we regard it as essential that all official pronouncements of a serious nature relating to international affairs should emanate, not from any isolated Minister talking casually to a newspaper reporter, but directly from a Minister whose department is involved and who is selected by the Cabinet to speak in the name of the nation.

The mischief likely to result from individual action cannot be exaggerated. For example, in foreign countries, where the workings of the British party system are insufficiently understood, undue and even distorted significance may be attached to seemingly innocuous utterances. Not infrequently it happens that the attempts of the Opposition Press to make political capital out of an occasion such as that under review tend to add to the embarrassment which the original offence has succeeded in creating. Again, it may even be that the actual purport of the remarks called into question is not rightly comprehended abroad, and for this circumstance hasty translations and summaries and speeches must be held to blame. Altogether, then, it is manifest that incalculable harm can be wrought by irresponsible utterances on questions of foreign policy, when these emanate from the lips of responsible Cabinet Ministers. Naturally enough, utterances of this kind are well meant. But invariably they end in confusing both our friends and our rivals among the nations, to the detriment of the general harmony, and call for the unfortunate remedy of explanation and counter-explanation which in turn, and somewhat indelicately, exhibit domestic misunderstanding and inadvertently excite public attention to an incident that were better soon forgotten.

When we come to analyse Mr. Lloyd George's observations, we find there is truth in what he says. He is not, however, to be credited with any striking discovery in this particular respect, and there was no sane reason discernible to us why he should choose the present moment for drawing attention to certain obvious facts. Like a precipitate surgeon with but crude professional skill, in his desire to hasten the healing of wounds he has to some extent reopened them; and if the patient, who was going on very nicely without his assistance, must return to his bed again, it is certainly the fault of the Chancellor. But taking a broad view of the European situation, we do not necessarily anticipate so sorrowful an issue. For it is evident from the tranquil tone of the French Press that the Foreign Office has already been at work to repair any mischief resulting from the indiscretion. Time will doubtless clear up the irritation reawakened in Germany. Truth to tell, Mr. Lloyd George, though abundantly possessed of political tact, useful on the platform and in Parliament, has not so far shown himself to be conspicuously gifted with diplomatic qualities. In all probability he is surprised that in relating what he would conceivably term the simple facts of the situation, he has produced a furore throughout Europe. Had he, at the outset, consulted with Sir Edward Grey, or, for the matter of that, with any clerk in the Foreign Office, he would have been told that, so sensitive is diplomacy, a great many simple facts must be thought about in silence and not alluded to in speech.

In emphasising Mr. Lloyd George's failure to appreciate the subtlety of international relations, it must not be supposed that we have lost sight of what was, perhaps, the main motive which prompted him to speak. His remarks certainly do convey the impression that they were directed rather to the Liberal forces at home than to Chancelleries abroad. Having appraised the growing significance and strength of that section within his own party opposed to armaments, he appears to have seized an occasion to improve his own personal position by demonstrating to his supporters the depth of his Radical convictions. But he failed completely to take into account the state of Continental feeling as it affects our foreign relations. As we have said, the veracity of his exposition cannot in the main be denied. It is true that we are on more friendly terms with Germany than has been the case for some years; that Germany, as far as her land forces are concerned, is placed in an unenviable position, sandwiched between France and Russia, both possessing vast armies; and that throughout Christendom, more especially in Western Europe, there is a revolt against military oppression. The whole of these remarks, though perfectly true, placed in sequence as they were by Mr. Lloyd George, constitute a typical example of an unhappy utterance.

Let us take first the point of view that our friends, France and Russia, are justified in assuming. Mr. Lloyd George infers that, if a struggle against Germany is to come, we may well leave the issue in the keeping of the Russian and French armies. What, then, is our return for inclusion in the Triple Entente? Equally unfortunate is the Chancellor in his treatment of Germany. It is quite evident that beneath a calm exterior German public opinion still harbours against England a considerable degree of nervous suspicion, and the belief is widespread that friendship with this country must necessarily involve, somehow or other, a sacrifice of national pride, and, to an extent, of Imperial ambition. Hampered in this respect, the Wilhelmstrasse was anxious, unobserved, as it were, to conclude an understanding with England during a recent period singularly free from the aggressive manifestations of the Chauvinist school. All is going well, when, suddenly, Mr. Lloyd George splashes into still waters. In effect he says Germany has been coquetted into friendly relations with ourselves, the French and German armies can do the rest, and in any case, obviously hinting at the Zabern affair, the people are in revolt against the rule of the sabre. The trouble arises from the fact that it was really not necessary to say these things. It is with Mr. Lloyd George's conclusions, not with his case, that we quarrel. In-correctible optimist though he is, he cannot convince the nation that, without universal agreement, any sensible reduction in armaments is feasible.

MOTORING

ALTHOUGH, owing to the recent fire at Rusholme, the annual Motor Exhibition at Manchester, which opened yesterday (Friday), is necessarily on a much smaller scale than was originally contemplated, it will be found to be fully representative of the best productions of the leading makers, both British and foreign, and there is every indication that a big amount of business will be done. After Olympia, the Manchester Show is the most important in the kingdom, and its abandonment on this occasion would have been a keen disappointment to the thousands of North-country motorists who find it inconvenient to make the journey to London in November. The result of the change of venue to the Manchester City Hall, which has only about half the accommodation afforded by the destroyed building at Rusholme, has been the all-round cutting down of the space allotted to the exhibitors, so that even the most important makers have been unable to show more than one or two examples of their workmanship; but there is some compensation in the fact that the exhibition is more centrally situated and accessible to the general public. Generally speaking, the exhibits have already been seen at Olympia, but among the 70 or 80 different makes of cars shown there are several which make their appearance for the first time; whilst there is an exceptionally comprehensive display of tyres and accessories. The Exhibition will remain open until Saturday next, the 17th inst.

One of the specially interesting features of the Manchester Show is the Napier exhibit on Stand No. 44. Like all the other makers, the Napier people have had considerably to curtail their original programme, and they are only able to show two of their models; but each of these has special claims to attention. One is an example of the 30/35 h.p. six-cylinder which accomplished the remarkable Alpine-climbing test a few months ago—a fortnight's continuous climbing of the steepest passes in the Alps—whilst the other is the 20 h.p. four-cylinder, an entirely new model, which makes its public appearance for the first time, and which represents the principal Napier departure for 1914. In its salient features the new car is designed on similar lines to those of the well-known 15 h.p. Model de Luxe, but the engine dimensions are larger (89 by 127—R.A.C. rating 19.4). All the special Napier features in connection with the carburetter, lubrication, the silent worm-drive to back axle, the multiple metal plate clutch revolving in an oil bath, etc., are embodied in the new model, which should prove very popular with those who want something between the 15 h.p. and the more powerful Napier models.

It will be remembered that in November last a Local Government Board inquiry was held with respect to an application made by the Essex County Council for the imposition of a reduced speed limit on certain parts of Lea Bridge Road, Leyton High Road, etc. The application was of considerable importance, in view of the fact that the thoroughfares scheduled were main roads, and it was strongly opposed at the inquiry by representatives of the R.A.C. and the Automobile Association and Motor Union. Motorists will learn with satisfaction that the opposition of their leading organisations has been successful, the Essex C.C. having just been notified by the Secretary of the Board that their application is refused.

Just before Christmas the Dunlop Rubber Company issued a list of revised prices for the repair and the re-treading of tyres, which, doubtless owing to the holiday interruption, appears to have escaped general notice. The leaflet is one of importance to motorists, inasmuch as it gives details of substantial reductions in the cost of retreading any make of tyre. For example, the price for retreading a plain or grooved cover equals exactly one-third of the list price of a new cover, whilst the studded retreading prices are just half the list price of a new cover. At several of the Company's depôts, notably at the big factory at Kilburn, London, N.W., at Birmingham, Glasgow, and Dublin, tyres can, if desired, be retreaded within 48 hours, although a longer allowance of time is recommended. As a matter of fact, to get the best results, the rejuvenated tyre should be carried as a spare for at least a week before being used. Copies of the revised price-list for repairs and retreading can be obtained from most motor agents, and at all the Dunlop depôts.

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THERE is still no business on the Stock Exchange. We hoped that when the dividends had been paid the money would come back into the market for re-investment, but it did not. The truth is that no one has any confidence. Paper has been crumbling away in value for so long that people want nearly 6 per cent. to compensate them for the risk of depreciation. They cannot get 6 per cent. with safety. The New South Wales loan appears to have been the worst failure we have had for a long time. The underwriters have been stuck with over 90 per cent. There are dozens of other loans waiting to come out, but the question is when will they make their appearance. It requires a good deal of courage to bring out a new issue in these days.

The Municipality of South Vancouver offered us £200,000 5 per cent. bonds at 91, but it only has an estimated population of under 40,000 people, which is spread over 9,300 acres, and it owes £895,593. I do not suppose that anyone will subscribe, partly because they will be certain to buy cheaper later on, and partly because there is nothing at all attractive in locking up your money in such an issue. The Province of Saskatchewan is asking for a million 4½ per cent. five-year convertible bonds offered at 96½. The revenue of the Canadian provinces is very small, and they all of them guarantee with great recklessness. There is also a great deal of jealousy between the provinces and the Federal Government. Therefore, cautious investors will probably keep out of provincial issues. Both New Zealand and Tasmania are also going to borrow money. The fact is, all the Governments in the world and most of the railways thought that they could go on borrowing for ever, and consequently they spent the money before they got it. They are now in the disagreeable position of owing a great deal more than they should.

MONEY.—The Money market has suddenly become quite easy, and the banks are now eagerly bidding for bills. Indeed, the market rate is only a little over 4 per cent. for three months' bills. If this easiness continues we shall certainly get an immediate reduction in the bank rate. It would appear as though the slackening off in trade were having an immediate effect upon the Money market. Some people think that the new banking Bill in the United States will cause large banks in New York to draw their balances from London, but it seems to me that they will hesitate to do this, and as far as I can understand, the provincial bankers in America have been preparing for the new Act for some time past. Hence the stringency of money in the Western States. If the United States withdrew its balances from London there would be no chance of a reduction in our own Bank of England rate, but I do not think this is possible. Some people say that we shall get a $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. rate this week, but I write before the announcement is made. Cheap money is certain to come in spite of what everyone says.

FOREIGNERS.—The latest news with regard to the French national loan is that it is to be postponed until the autumn. This is good news, for it will very much relieve the situation. Also, it looks as though the French Government were quite certain that there would be no serious political complications. The bankers have apparently won all along the line, and we are now promised the Servian loan of ten millions. It is a curious thing that Servia should be the first State to tap the French reservoir of gold. It is said that the Servian Government made terms with Russia and France, and, indeed, politely blackmailed those countries. Whether this be true or not, the fact remains that Servia is to be first served. The offer will be made on the 14th and the price will be under 94. Next will come Russia with her 20 million railway loan. This she will have no difficulty in obtaining. Greece and Turkey have both been promised new issues. It is probable that Greece will ask London for a certain amount of money, but Turkey and Servia will confine their issues to the Continent. What will happen to the French bankers if they cannot induce their customers to take up all these various issues, I do not know. In 1913 nearly 200 millions sterling was taken up by the French banks, and only a portion of this has been placed out. Underwriters in Paris are all stuffed up with paper. However, it will be better for everyone when the Treasury bills now in the portfolios can be turned into negotiable bonds; for they at any rate have a definite commercial value on all the bourses whereas the Treasury bills are extremely difficult to negotiate. There is some talk of Paris participating in another Chinese loan. The Continent has been nibbling at illegitimate Chinese bonds for a long time past, tempted by the extravagant terms that have been offered by the Chinese. The financial position in China is not good, and I warn my readers to be careful to keep out of any Chinese issues, except those officially quoted on the London Stock Exchange. Cuba is advertising that she is prepared to accept tenders for a big loan, and some of the papers are warning the investor against the Government on the ground that it has not yet come to terms with the Cuban Ports people. I do not think this is quite fair. The Cuban Ports was a very bad promotion, and no one can blame the Cuban Government if it fights to the very last for its rights. However, Cuba will find it extremely difficult to get any money, whether she settles with the Cuban Ports bond holders or not. Copper remains weak, and Tintos continue dull. Brazilians have been supported during the last two or three days, but they are still very weak, the 1913 loan being quoted at 8 discount. I am afraid that the financial troubles in Brazil have only just begun, and I cannot advise anyone to hold the securities.

HOME RAILS.—In spite of the fact that within a few weeks we shall be getting the first railway dividend announcements, the Home Railway market remains idle. The only activity has been in North Easterns. The takings for the past year on this railway have been remarkable, and there is talk of the dividend being increased at least 1 per cent. South Westerns have also been bid for. Why, I do not know, as it certainly is one of the least attractive of all our Home Rails. The cheapest purchases, as I have continually remarked, are Great Western and London and North Western, and it is quite possible that both lines may improve their distribution; but even if they do not, they return $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. at present prices. Little Chats have been weak, and the figures of the Great Northern do not tempt people to buy the deferred. There has been some talk about Metropolitans, and the latest tale is that the Great Central will acquire the line. I do not think that there is any truth in this. They would probably like to obtain the Extension, as it would give them an alternative route and render them independent of the Great Western, but when negotiations were pending before, the Metropolitan asked far too high a figure, and the two railways quarrelled. No doubt, if the Metropolitan could sell its Extension to the Great Central and its Underground route to the District, it would be an excellent thing for the shareholders, and also for the railways concerned.

YANKEES.—In the American market there is an incipient boomlet. Yet trade throughout the United States, in spite of the ridiculous optimism displayed in New York, is bad. The Union Pacific report was interesting; at first it frightened people, as they did not like the suggestion that the investments have fallen nearly fifty million dollars. However, we are now told that the profit on the Southern Pacific deal will be sixteen million dollars. The news of the bonus has come as a surprise and shows that the Railway and the Government are at one. Shareholders get 33 per cent. bonus and 8 per cent. dividend in future. Therefore holders to-day find their stock only costing 140. No one could have a better position than this. I consider Union Pacific quite the soundest of all the American railways. Canadas have jumped about in a very lively way, but they are now a shade harder. Trunks keep dull, as further money will be needed to complete the line. Brazils decrease day by day, and they are now four points lower than the make-up. Clearly, the road is in a bad financial condition. Copper is weak, and Amalgamateds have been sold in consequence. The reports from the Argentine in regard to the harvest are rather mixed. Maize would appear to be good, but the other crops below the average.

RUBBER.—There is nothing new to be said about the Rubber position. Week by week disappointed shareholders try to get out of their shares, but there is always a certain amount of support for the market. The Lumut figures were good, but the board very wisely kept the dividend at 6 per cent., for it knew that if rubber remains at its present price it will not be easy to pay even 6 per cent. for the current year. The shares are, therefore, overvalued to-day.

OIL.—The Premier Oil and Pipe meeting is to be held on Friday, and the Hollebone's committee has received support for about 1,200,000 shares. This should be sufficient to enable them to carry their candidates. I understand that the Germans will also put up a candidate. All the various Egyptian Oil issues have been flat, the news from Egypt being decidedly disappointing. But some of the London holders of Red Seas think that Shell is trying to squeeze them out. There has been further talk of Kern being bought out by the Shell, but I think this premature. Shell wants to buy and Kern wants to sell, but it is all a question of price, and that price has not yet been decided upon.

MINES.—In the mining market Kaffirs are now quite forgotten. All the silly talk about reduction of costs through the use of small drills, having served its purpose, has died down. The excitement in the Mining market centres round the various Russian shares, some of which have been bid up in a rather fantastic manner. The Canadian Mining market seems to have fallen rather flat, but Kirkland Lakes continue to be bid up without any business. This is little better than a rig. Nothing is doing in the Tin market, but Tronoh and Malayan Tin have both been weak. Globe and Phoenix has decided to reduce its dividend to 1s. This is a very wise step. It does not follow that the mine is looking any worse, but simply that the company has been borrowing money to pay dividends, and the new board evidently think this a foolish policy, which, indeed, it always was.

MISCELLANEOUS.—In the Miscellaneous market there has been very little business, but Charrons have been bid for. All Motor shares have been quite a feature. Mr. Barton continues to carry on his campaign in Alby Carbides, not, probably, because he wishes to sell these, but because he desires to get rid of the subsidiary. Van den Berghs have also been bid up. For some extraordinary reason Coal shares are all harder, and I certainly think that holders should take advantage of this to get out, for although collieries may have a few months more of good trade, there is no doubt that we have seen the end of the Coal and Steel and Iron booms. The Canadian Bank of Commerce figures are rather startling, and show that the bank has been borrowing very heavily. Deposits are down; loans on securities have risen, and the balance-sheet is nothing like so strong as it was last year.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

"ORANGE FREE STATE."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—In your issue of November 15 your reviewer of Miss Markham's "The South African Scene" speaks of "what Miss Markham unwittingly still calls the Free State." Since Union it is again "The Orange Free State," and now no more Orange River Colony. A reference to the proceedings of the Conference will verify this. A consideration of who it was that moved that the name be restored points a moral.

May I add a word to your reviewer's reference to Dr. Viljoen? I had the pleasure of meeting him some three years ago in the enforced intimacy of a railway carriage on the thousand-mile journey from the Cape to Johannesburg. As a Britisher I was prejudiced, arrogant and more than a little sore, but I may safely say that not the most obstinate anti-Dutch Britisher could fail to be charmed by Dr. Viljoen's cultured and liberal personality. I am, etc, W. T. HEUGHAN.

Central Schools, Germiston, Transvaal.

MUSICAL CRITICISM.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Dear Sir,—Regarding the amusing letter you printed last week from "one of the young composers," may I say that there is nothing malignant in my letter about your poor critic—there is only truth; and I do not find the slightest allusion to the point I made, by your critic. The fact that I played some little pianoforte pieces by the "young composer" of your letter should, of course, be the reason of his ridiculous assertions—for it is well known that these "young composers" lick the hand that crushes them, or bite the hand that assists them. . . . That is why the bulk of them are kept by their fond parents—because of their absolute inability to go and fight for themselves. The Philharmonic concert referred to was perhaps the most ridiculous fiasco ever indulged by that well-worn Society—and that is saying much. Yours,

JOSEF HOLBROOKE.

Vale House, Tufnell Park, N.

SURREPTITIOUS SNAPSHOTS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Dear Sir,—In common, I am sure, with many other users of hand cameras, I join most heartily with Mr. Aflalo in his protest against the ungentlemanly practices which mark a certain small proportion of the photographic community. But I would dissent, with equal force, from Mr. Aflalo's dictum that the hand camera is "unreliable for the finest work." Some twenty-five years' experience with almost every variety of camera, hand and stand, leads me to declare emphatically that for the finest work the balance of advantage is with the hand-camera: that is, if by "finest work" we imply the result which by its selection of view point, rendering of tones and inclusion of life is most pleasing to our sense of beauty, and the most faithful recorder of our recollections of a scene. I am, yours very truly,

JAMES A. SINCLAIR.

54, Haymarket, S.W.

BOOKS RECEIVED

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS.

Memoirs of an American Prima Donna. By Clara Louise Kellogg. Illustrated. (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 10s. 6d. net.)

PERIODICALS.

Empire Review; London University Gazette; Cambridge University Reporter; Book Monthly; Scottish Historical Review; University Correspondent; Bookseller; School World; Educational Times; Mercure de France; Windsor Magazine; English Review; Gypsy Folk-Lore Gazette; Harper's Magazine; Poetry and Drama; St. George's Magazine; Revue Bleue; Deutsche Rundschau; Literary Digest; The Author; Churchman's Year Book, 1914; Librarian and Book World; Publishers' Circular; Revue Critique; La Revue; Peru To-Day; Palestine Exploration Fund Quarterly Statement; The Bookfellow; Women's Industrial Council, 19th Annual Report; The Antiquary; Bulletin of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, N.Y.

THE ACADEMY

AND LITERATURE

No. 2176

[Registered as a
Newspaper.]

JANUARY 17, 1914

PRICE THREEPENCE

CONTENTS

	PAGE
Notes of the Week	67
Candid Criticism	68
A New Word Game	69
The "Entente" in Peril	70
The Return of Edwin Drood	71
Reviews :
A Third Sex	72
A Passer Through Prague	73
An Italian Philosopher	74
The Scourge of Apathy	75
The Sangrail	76
More Thraliana	76
An Observant Motorist	77
A Roguish Satirist	78
The Machinery of Mind	78
The Stormy Petrel of Spanish Art	79
Fiction	80

	PAGE
Occultists and "Magic"	82
Foreign Reviews	83
Present-Day Paper and Posterity	84
Some New French Plays	85
Education and Music	86
The Theatre :
"Mary-Girl" at the Vaudeville Theatre	88
The Pioneer Players in "Paphnutius" at the Savoy Theatre	88
More Magazines	89
Discoveries at the Royal Albert Docks	90
Notes and News	92
Imperial and Foreign Affairs	92
Motoring	94
In the Temple of Mammon	95
Correspondence	96
Books Received	96

"ROYAL YORK" HOTEL, BRIGHTON

Supreme Comfort in a Warm and
Sheltered Position. Excellent Sea Views

SOME PRESS OPINIONS.

"To the Cuisine particular attention has been paid, and no expense spared, whilst the service is absolutely perfect."

"And in the Royal York you have the perfection of an English hotel and English cooking."

AND—

Colonel NEWNHAM DAVIS says:—"The Chef makes soup like a Frenchman, grills like an Englishman, and fries like an Italian."

Telegrams ; Telephones: 206 Post Office, Brighton.
"Presto, Brighton." 293 Brighton.

BY ROYAL WARRANT TO
HIS MAJESTY KING GEORGE V

WALPOLE BROS. LTD.

IRISH LINEN MANUFACTURERS

89, & 90, NEW BOND STREET, W.

Sale of Irish Linens

PROCEEDING THROUGHOUT JANUARY.

WALPOLE BROS. supply Pure Irish Linens direct from their factories to the purchaser, and thus eliminate all intermediate profits.

GREEK KEY BORDER AND PLAIN STRIPES.

Cloths.	Sale Price.
2 x 2 yds. ...	15 3 each
2 x 2 1/2 " ...	19 - "
2 x 3 " ...	22 6 "
2 1/2 x 2 1/2 " ...	24 6 "
2 1/2 x 3 " ...	29 6 "

Cloths.	Sale Price.
2 1/2 x 3 1/2 yds. ...	34 6 each
2 1/2 x 4 " ...	39 - "

NAPKINS.

Breakfast Size ...	22 6 doz.
Dinner Size ...	29 6 "

BARGAINS IN BOOKS.—

Kipling's Complete Works, 25 vols., half calf, gilt, fine set, £12 12s.; Hamilton's Parodies, 6 vols., £2 10s.; Jesse's Historical Works, 30 vols., Nimmo, 1901, £7 17s. 6d.; Thackeray's Centenary Biographical Edition, 26 vols., £6 6s.; Barrington's Graham of Claverhouse, 30s. net, for 10s. 6d.; Purchas's Voyages, 20 vols., £9 9s., Glasgow, 1905; Slaters' Engravings and their Values, 1912, 18s.; Chaffer's Marks and Monograms on Pottery and Porcelain, 1912, 42s.; Baily's Magazines of Sports and Pastimes, 64 vols., £7 10s.; Grimm's Fairy Tales, large paper, illus. by Rackham, £2 2s.; Proc. Inst. Civil Engineers, 142 vols., cloth, £16 16s.; Pinkerton's Voyages and Travels, 17 vols., 1808, £5 10s.; Porter's Knights of Malta, 1858, 2 vols., £3 3s.; Burton's Arabian Nights, 17 vols., illustrated, £17 17s.; Gould's History of Freemasonry, 3 thick vols., morocco binding, £2 2s., cost £6 6s.; James' Painters and Their Works, 3 vols., £3 3s.; Habershon Records of Old London, Vanished and Vanishing, coloured plates, folio, £2 2s.; Fea's Secret Chambers and Hiding Places, 7s. 6d., for 3s. 6d.; Oscar Wilde, by L. E. Ingleby, 12s. 6d., for 4s. 6d.; Ditchfield Vanishing England, 15s., for 6s. 6d.; Landon's Lhasa, 2 vols., new., 42s., for 14s.; Spenser's Faerie Queene, 2 vols., Cambridge University Press, £3 13s. 6d., for 32s. Will take any good books in exchange for above.—BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

JOURNALISTIC and SECRETARIAL TRAINING FOR LADIES.—Rapid systematic coaching. Special course in Journalism. Excellent introductions given.—Telephone or write, THE TRIANGLE SECRETARIAL OFFICES, 61, South Molton Street, W.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss Messer, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

COPIES OF BACK NUMBERS OF
THE ACADEMY, WITH THE

Special Literary Retrospects

CONTAINING

Articles, Reviews & Poems

BY

JOHN ADDINGTON SYMONDS, W. E. HENLEY,
WILLIAM SHARP, LIONEL JOHNSON,

and many other Notable Writers, can still be obtained.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION: Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free.

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Offices of
THE ACADEMY, 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

To.....
.....

Please send me THE ACADEMY for the next..... months.

I enclose remittance value.....

Name.....

Description.....

Address.....

THE ACADEMY

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post-free.

The EDITORIAL AND ADVERTISING OFFICE is at 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

Notes of the Week

LAST week we congratulated the Corporation of Leeds on the practical measures which it had taken to counteract the course adopted by its employes on strike. The Corporation, it is true, is largely indebted for the successful issue to the public spirit of citizens, students and others, who came forward to carry on essential services; but there is no doubt that some local bodies would have lacked the courage to have resort to volunteer action to crush strikers, whilst other bodies would—because of their complexion—have rejected such proffered aid. The authorities of the City of Leeds, through their Special Committee, have throughout acted most fairly towards those who until recently have deserved the thanks of the citizens for their services; but they have resisted, and rightly and successfully resisted, illegitimate pressure which, by striking at public necessities, was intended to bring outside pressure to bear on the Corporation to yield to demands which that body, as the guardian of the interests of the citizens, condemned. The lesson to strikers must be a salutary one, and perhaps it will lead to a more healthy disposition as to the manner in which claims may be formulated for consideration, and machinery agreed on for their examination and decision. Given good faith on both sides, divergent views can easily be adjudicated and a solution arrived at. Free working-men hate the strike) and only resort to it as a result of methods which are the negation of their freedom—the unreason of passion or the iron heel of interested compulsion.

The formation of the S.P.E.—the Society for Pure English—with Dr. Bridges as one of its supporters, is a step to be noted with satisfaction. Its aim seems to be to induce a few men of letters, supported by the scientific alliance of the best linguistic authorities, to agree upon a scheme for informing popular taste on sound principles, for guiding educational authorities, and for introducing certain slight advantageous changes. One of the proposed reforms relates to the employment of foreign words where English ones are available; the reformers consider that foreign terms, if adopted, should be frankly recognised as English and assimilated to the standard of our language. The Society might remonstrate with the writers—some of them of repute—who use chaperone (a female hood!); who write morale when they mean what the French call moral; of a double entendre when they mean a mot à demi entente.

All reformers of language, however, will do well to remember the truth insisted upon by Professor Wyld in his "Evolution in English Pronunciation," that it is quite unnecessary to take a despondent view of the future of our language. It is for ever changing, but there is no need to believe that change is always for the worse. Unless we are convinced that Chaucer's English was a poorer thing than that of King Alfred, or the English of Shakespeare a more corrupted form of Chaucer's language, or that Tennyson's speech was a debased variety of Elizabethan English, there can be no reasonable ground for supposing that the present language is degraded and in a state of rapid disintegration.

The situation which has so suddenly arisen in the labour world of South Africa is rendered more complex by a factor with which we in this country have not to contend—the attitude of the thousands of native workmen and the extensive native population in sympathy with them. Towards these natives, the policy of the Boer has always been one of severe repression; at a sign of rebellion or defiance he would not hesitate to use his weapons. Such methods naturally can hardly be adopted by the English, who pride themselves on the administration of justice amid alien races more or less dependent upon them; indeed, as Lord Milner pointed out in his speech at the Royal Colonial Institute on Tuesday evening, "success will not go very far if it does not rest on the solid base of good government and a just, humane, and enlightened policy in dealing with teeming native populations." Professor Bonn, in the lecture which followed Lord Milner's speech, showed where Germany had failed and had gained experience, in her mistaken endeavour to break up native races in South-West Africa; and although the state of our own comparatively recently acquired territories in South Africa seems rapidly returning to the conditions of Boer government which obtained before the war, certain problems press heavily upon those in nominal, if not always in actual, authority.

Candid Criticism

THESE are many advantages in living in an old and settled country which has hundreds of years of art, music, and literature behind it, and which can take the part of mentor to the world in general with a certain degree of dignity. It can afford to disregard the shrieking of its own sensational Press—engineered so acutely for the breakfast-table entertainment of the people and the profit of persons proclaiming themselves, as though through a megaphone, public benefactors; it can acknowledge a little tail-twisting with a mere leisurely growl as a tribute to its own importance; and it can assume an immense, impenetrable content with things as they are until, after many years, the time for rousing action comes.

There are, however, some drawbacks. The truest content springs from enterprise successfully concluded, not from undisturbed, self-satisfied stability; and the serene, established country may suffer in many ways the penalty of its laurelled age. Generalisations will not carry us far: we are thinking especially of the arts, and, more definitely still, of literature in its department of criticism. In this country the critic is permanently hobbled by law and custom lest he should run wild, in a moment of excitement, and knock somebody over. He dares not say what he thinks in the language that he feels would be most effective and suitable; he therefore is forced to become an adept in the trick of periphrasis. When he wishes to condemn a bad book or to ridicule a silly one, he must be very careful; he must make play with a blunted sword, with a well-padded bludgeon. He has, of course, the resources of irony and sarcasm, the reserves of pungent wit and clever badinage, to draw upon; much can be done with these by a skilled writer; but they do not always take the place of straight hitting.

This is emphasised by a glance at some of the papers which reach us from the other side of the globe. One review in the Book Lover of Melbourne, referring to a novel by a well-known author, begins by calling it "a beastly book . . . distinguished merely by a blatant disregard of every convention of good taste and morality." What would the English reviewer have said? "There are passages which, to speak frankly, we could well have dispensed with—obviously they are not intended for the eye of 'the young person'; on the whole, however. . . ." And then comes the saving clause, the tit-bit to mollify the publisher. Here is another charmingly expressive comment from the Bookfellow of Sydney: "Set the ghost of Martin Tupper down in Calcutta, with a jar of ghee, a French prose-poem, and two lotus-buds (one of them a lady), and if he doesn't turn out R. Tagore at 110 deg. Fahr. we'll eat a Nobel trustee. Thus antipodeanly arrogantly do we defy the shadow of W. B. Yeats's great name." Who could mistake the gleeful defiance of it! We can quite believe that the honeyed elegances of the Bengali poet do not appeal to this robust writer. Again, in the same issue, referring to a recent prize offered for an Australian national song: "This bag of feeble rhymers' tricks is a National Song for Australia! . . . If the firm put the Nation first, why did it not give its money anonymously? And if it put the Nation last, its patronage is a defilement to patriotism. . . . This feeble little penny-trumpet piece that two Professors and a Musical Bachelor have prized is not a National Song: it is a national sin. . . . Pish!" Bravo, Bookfellow! Would that we in the old land could howl for scalps so vigorously! There are three and a half columns on the subject, and, judging by the effusion in question—which is quoted—the editor of the Bookfellow is absolutely right in his scathing protest.

Now, in conclusion, let us look at the Triad, of Wellington, New Zealand, which pronounces itself, we think justly, to be "the most courageous, conscientious, and candid magazine in the Dominion." Having suffered indignity at the hands of the Theatre, a Sydney paper, it thus retaliates: "The fact is, of course, that from the critical standpoint the Theatre can no longer be said to exist. It is a parasite organ of theatredom, and exists only to throw around the butter and wave the decorative flag. The only people it ever ventures to criticise are little struggling people unable to defend themselves or make their protest good. One cannot take such a pert jackanapes of a paper seriously." The Theatre, on the other hand, poking bitter fun at the Triad, which specialises on musical criticism, says: "The Triad is a monthly publication that prints pages of erudite piffle about the performances of the Kauri Gum Glee Club and kindred institutions. . . . One gathers, after reading its columns, that the world's elect and the simpering soprano of the Wanganui weekly warbles are equally unworthy of the life artistic. The former, however, gets a page; the latter a paragraph." This untrue insinuation of snobbishness the Triad energetically resents; and so the fun goes merrily on.

This sort of thing makes us regret that the brave Pickwickian days of Potts and Slurk are past. For, although it would hardly be considered good form to allow wholesale head-thwacking or unfettered comment such as the examples which we have selected, it is quite possible to err by going to the other extreme. Too much caution, too timid a choice of words, make for ineffective criticism, and custom, though a good, useful, protective servant, may become deadening when it is permitted to bind the expression of thoughts and ideas too tightly.

W. L. R.

A New Word Game

BY H. BELLOC.

ALL the world knows that one of the hobbies which can so fascinate a man as to make him a crank—or worse—is etymology. The derivation of words is a delightful prospect, and the hunting up of the origin of a word a most absorbing sport. It is one of those games which become awfully serious to the player and correspondingly tedious to the man who can't, or never has, or, at any rate, won't, play it. It can lead men into the wildest nonsense—such as attributing race to language, or fixing on some modern term the meaning of an antique root from which its mere sound has tortuously descended. With all its abuses, follies and delights the sport is certainly a first-rate occupation, and thousands have proved the truth of that.

But there is a converse to it: a sort of complementary game which, for my part, I enjoy almost as much, and that is the following out of the branches that extend from some one main trunk word, and watching the astonishingly different fates they suffer and their contrast with their original. I cannot tell whether this harmless amusement will appeal to anyone else as it does to me. But the evenings are long just now, and it is an excellent Patience or Solitaire, believe me, if one has nothing else to do.

Following up the story of one word is like watching a river system which goes up inland without tributary or backwater for hundreds of miles: like the Nile, for instance. Then, quite at the end of its journey you find it branching out amazingly. Papyrus is such a word: and "paper" stood for paper and nothing but paper, for some thousands of years—until, all of a sudden, it began to "spear," as they say in the South of England; that is, it began to throw out, to bud out, right and left in new and vigorous branches, and it came to mean a daily journal, a form of proof, a decoration for a wall, a non-existent supply, a debt, a gratuitous entry to a place of amusement, and I know not what else. "Paper" in quite the last few generations, in the last hundred years, I think—certainly not much more—has produced all these little children. "I have changed my paper." "Have you got it down on paper?" "It is a paper Army." "His paper is all over the City." "The House was full of paper"—and so on. For how many centuries did not that honest and universal word mean one thing and one thing only from the Euphrates to the Atlantic—and then, all at once, it bloomed like the aloe in its extreme old age.

Other words throw out four or five big branches near the beginning of the business, and each branch forms a separate system of its own. Consider Chair—a great favourite of the collector in this line of goods is "chair." Chair is itself, of course, only a twig. The stem is the Greek kathedra, and that stem, by the way, runs up into two main branches of the fork in our common speech, for it gives us both cathedral, and the phrase ex cathedra. But that is by the way. "Chair" becoming both chaire and chaise in French gives you pulpit eloquence in that language, and a carriage in English. And in its English form it means the furniture on which you sit down, and authority over a public meeting, and a form of ovation. A man rises from his chair to quell a tumult, with cries of "Chair! Chair!" and if his activity makes him popular he is later on "chaired"—carried high in air by his dupes. "Chair" is something more. It is a professorial appointment, a hall-mark and a direction of learning. The man who rose from his Chair to cry "Chair! Chair!"—and who was afterwards chaired—might well hold for the moment the Chair of Tautology in a seat of learning. Here you have a word rather like one of those standard apple trees which has been too much pruned and which was planted late. Right from the ground it begins to branch. The branches are far apart and few, but strong; and each has a few sub-branches.

Then there is the word which never meant to grow and which of its very nature you would think could not grow, but would remain simple till the end. Such a word is the private name Jacob. Yet see what happens to it! For century after century after century in the Desert and on the edges of the Desert it was a man's private name given to one man after another: יעקב—"Yaakob" or Yakoub—the supplanter. There must have been Jacob the son of this and Jacob the son of that right away back to the beginnings of the tents and of the camels. How could it possibly grow? Yet grow it did. For there came upon the world what is called the Christian Religion, and among its chief Apostles were two bearing that name, and the name went drifting over all Christendom and bore fruit everywhere.

It became, in the first place, several different local forms. You had Iago; you had Jacques; you had James; and Lord! what a foison from those three and from the Latin Jacobus from which they all come!

A Jacobin is too-ardent and certain a Democrat: why? Because the more extreme Democrats of the French Revolution met in the Jacobin Convent in Paris. But how did that Dominican place in the Rue St. Honoré come to be called Jacobin? Because all Dominicans were called Jacobins. And why so? Because the mother-house of the Dominicans in Paris, the house where St. Thomas Aquinas wrote and taught (not that in which the Jacobin Club met centuries later) stood up in the University on the Street of St. Jacques and against the Gate of the same name.

Then you have Jacobite—dead as the name of a heresy, historically surviving as an adherent to the Stuart cause. And you have Dago, faintly and distantly derived from the Spanish name, and in Santiago you have the warcry of the Reconquista, two Naval actions, a pilgrimage and a valse; and Iago for your character in Shakespeare, and the Court of St. James's, and all the quarter of St. James's for the English connotation and, on a minor twig of so bushy a plant the Rum of that name. For in France to-day, when you say "St. James" it calls not the Palace nor London to the mind, but the West Indian spirit: "le punch" and "le toast," those most deathly boring of all French institutions—especially when they are “of honour.” Heavens! How little anyone thought when he called out “Yacoub” over the sand to summon back his slave or his son what a whole bush of meanings would grow out of so plain a piece of dead wood!

Then there are words planted like seeds during the transition of the Roman Empire into the Dark Ages. The fruit of some has shrivelled; others have grown into most vigorous burgeonings.

They planted scutum, the oblong-shield of the Roman Regulars, and it gave you the tax scutage, which is dead; and in France the écu, the big silver-piece, now of five francs—a word just surviving and soon perhaps to die. Nearly the whole of that tree is dead or shrivelled. But there is some thin, immensely vital shoot of it running up through our time rejoicing; the word “esquire,” the title all can give, and all refuse, the most necessary part of all correspondence which the wise write in hieroglyph. Every time you scribble that “Esq.” to put off a bore or a dun scutum, a shield is at the root of you: for an “esquire” is the bearer of a shield: poor dog!

But if you want a fine, healthy developed foison from a similar seed consider bota. What was bota? It was any sort of leathern pouch caught up; a convenient thing for carrying a burden. That was bota. It remains, does the parent stem, still quite unchanged in the Spanish Hills: and there it is a leathern skin for wine. But it flourished in every other soil exceedingly, and is flourishing. It made boot, certainly: I am inclined to think in spite of the learned that it made booty and bootless; by boot it begat the servant at the inn and the cupboard in the carriage; it made bottle (botella—the little wine skin), and so it made butler in an evil hour. It therefore made butlery, and buttery at Cambridge and battels at Oxford. Then another bit of it (starting from so close to its origin that it might be a twin) gave you butt, a cask, and some say—but I deny it—butt, a target; for this, I think, is butte. And do you not think that bot, which is dead now and meant a payment, came from a purse in some way?

What of Atlas, who bore the world upon his shoulders? He is a mountain; he is an ocean; he is a book of maps as well—and yet he was the father of the Pleiades!

What of George? George is simple enough. It is Ge—the earth—and erg. It is earth-working and the earth-worker. It is the husbandman. But George, that simple Greek word (Mr. Farmer) got sainted and was cast abroad by the whirling mill of Christendom and you have him as an architecture, and as a coin, and as an expletive, and as a battle-cry, and as a ship . . . and I am told there are other connotations.

The list is endless. Play you with it if you like. I am never tired of the game; nor is any part of it more delightful than the conflict it breeds with other collectors who go purple in the face in their disputes with your theory of this word or of that, and whom you artfully egg on to foaming at the mouth.

The “Entente” in Peril

ALTHOUGH the wave of emotion which swept through France, directly the French newspapers acquainted their readers with the recent pronouncement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on armaments, has been followed by a period of seeming calm, it is quite certain that the apprehensions of our neighbours respecting the future of the Entente Cordiale are not yet dispelled. It is realised in France that we in Great Britain are on the eve of yet another struggle on the question of our Fleet, and that, pending the issue, France herself can only hope for the best. It is long since the cry of “Perfidious Albion!” was raised in France, and Frenchmen would be loath to raise it again. They prefer to think that, in spite of all incitements to the contrary, England will remain true to her pledged word in the understanding which exists between the two countries.

That understanding was arrived at for purposes of defence, not of aggression. There is no aggressive element in the French foreign policy of to-day. Not a single French statesman has any thought of throwing down the gauntlet to Germany. But merely a policy of defence carries with it great responsibilities. They weigh heavily on France, much of whose present large financial deficit is due to the measures which she has been obliged to take in order to ensure the national safety. She holds, however, that in many respects, her interests and ours are identical, and for this reason she hesitates to believe in any change in our naval policy, and trusts that the British Radical malcontents, headed by Sir John Brunner and backed up by Mr. Lloyd George, will be defeated in their designs.

There is much in the French point of view which should appeal to us to strengthen the Unionist Party in its determination to resist the mischievous tendencies. We maintain a Navy primarily for the defence of our Kingdom and our Overseas Dominions, but we also have vital interests in European waters. Some of those interests are undoubtedly affected by the growth of Germany's naval armaments; yet, whilst Germany, without deviating from her course, draws gradually towards her intended goal, it is suggested that we should desist from competing with her, and allow her to attain to a superiority which, in the day of conflict, might well prove fatal to us.

In a broad sense, we have no quarrel with the German people. If they were masters in their own house, the present-day oppressive competition in the matter of armaments might possibly cease by common consent among the nations. But the Germans are ruled by a Constitution which enables their Government to do as it pleases in such matters, and that Government and its militarist supporters have repeatedly refused to come to any understanding. Mr. Winston Churchill's offers were rejected with contempt, and during the past week or so Mr. Lloyd George has been plainly told that, even should there be an abatement in English naval armaments, there will be none in Germany's.

Though there have been occasional scares respecting a German invasion of England, Germany's aim is not the possession of this island, but of Holland and Belgium, and this is one of the questions in which our interests coincide with those of France. It is generally understood that France has agreed to patrol the Mediterranean in the event of hostilities, leaving us to take all necessary measures in Northern waters. German armies might overrun Holland and Belgium to-morrow, but the possession of those countries would be of little value to Germany if we could effectively blockade their coasts and render their ports useless.

It is not to maintain her present limited seaboard, it is not even for the defence of her Colonies, that Germany is creating a great fleet. It is to attain to an enlarged European seaboard, such as Holland and Belgium would supply. And that seaboard she can only acquire by crushing the British Navy. Every German boy learns that Holland and Belgium form part of "Greater Germany," at present unhappily separated from the Fatherland, but destined to belong to it once more, under mediatised sovereigns. There are even works which claim French Flanders down to the Artois hills as part of "Greater Germany," and some carry the pretension so far as to include Boulogne in the coveted territory. Thus Amsterdam, Rotterdam, Antwerp, Dunkirk, Calais, and Boulogne would all be German ports. What a boom for German trade! England displaced, too, from her proud position as the world's great carrier; her own ports reduced to a subordinate status; and German Dreadnoughts patrolling the Channel with brooms displayed derisively at their mastheads!

Is it possible, France inquires, that we shall allow the English Channel to become a part of the German Ocean? She cannot believe it. Nevertheless, she remains very anxious, for she well knows that the pushful Chancellor has more than once forced his policy on the present British Cabinet, and may possibly do so again. If our naval armaments cease, even if they are appreciably diminished, it is certain that one of the chief conditions of the Entente will be unfulfilled, and that the two nations will drift apart once more. Only after much patient diplomacy and the recognition on either side that there were great interests common to both countries to be safeguarded did the present understanding come into being. Its future now depends on the success or the defeat of the Little Navy partisans. Are they to destroy the international balance, and are we to renounce our position as the premier naval Power and become subservient to Germany?

It is for the Unionist Party to make the Chancellor understand, and to impress, indeed, on the whole nation, that the question of our naval armaments, like that of all other European armaments, can only be restricted by a common and binding agreement between the Powers. Such an agreement would undoubtedly bring relief to the nations, but without it we cannot slacken in the work of National Defence.

ERNEST A. VIZETELLY.

The Return of Edwin Drood

THE recent trial of John Jasper for the murder of Edwin Drood, held at the King's Hall, Covent Garden, has reawakened an interest in one of the most fascinating of literary controversies. What, it may not be irrelevant to inquire, is the net result of the trial? Are we any nearer a solution than we were before? I think we are. I think, indeed, that Mr. Cecil Chesterton was able to demonstrate, beyond all shadow of a doubt, that Edwin Drood had not been murdered by Jasper.

There are many converging lines of evidence, all of which point to this conclusion. Some of them have been discussed by Mr. Wilfrid L. Randell in an article on the subject which appeared in THE ACADEMY on February 8, 1913. There is, for instance, the not insignificant fact that one of the tentative titles chosen by Dickens for the novel was "Dead? or Alive?" (Another, by the way, was "The Disappearance of Edwin Drood.") Again, Chapter XIV, in which Landless and Drood and Jasper go up the postern stair—it is the last we see of Drood before the news of the murder—is entitled, "When shall we three meet again?"—which is not so much meaningless as dishonestly misleading if there is to be no future meeting between the three parties. Still stronger corroborative evidence is to be found in the design that was drawn for the wrapper by Charles Allston Collins. One of the pictures represents a man in a vault, holding a lantern in his hand, and starting back in surprise as the rays from the lantern fall upon the figure of another man. Assuming the two figures to be those of Jasper and Edwin Drood, the subsequent development of the plot becomes at once intelligible. Jasper, possibly impelled by that impulse to revisit the scene of his crime which is common to murderers and has frequently led to their detection—or, it may be, with the object of recovering the ring which he had forgotten to remove from the hand of his victim—goes down into the vaults under the cathedral, where he is confronted with the very man whom he believed he had killed. The situation is one that would have appealed with a peculiar intensity to Dickens. Finally, if Drood had indeed been murdered by Jasper, I fail to understand why Dickens should have bestowed upon his book such a title as "The Mystery of Edwin Drood," or why he should have disposed of one of his principal characters about half-way through the course of the narrative. The element of mystery is at once removed, for it is obviously the intention of the author to suggest that Drood had been killed, while leaving a loophole for his possible escape. That Dickens would have devoted the remaining portion of the novel—six whole monthly parts—to tracking down Jasper until complete evidence of his guilt had been established is absolutely unthinkable.

But who was Datchery? Here, I confess, we are upon more debatable ground. The theory put forward by Mr. Cuming Walters that Helena Landless disguised herself as "a single buffer" with white hair and black eyebrows, and, in her newly donned male attire, visited many of the very people in Cloisterham with whom she had been intimate, was mercilessly exposed by Mr. Chesterton. What did she do with the pint of sherry which accompanied her fried sole and her veal cutlet at the Crozier? Mrs. Lawrence Clay, who at the trial said all there was to be said for the preposterous Helena Landless theory, was forced to the despairing admission that she poured a part of it into a certain "receptacle" in the dining-room—designed, presumably, for another purpose—while no one was looking! After this, one was not surprised to discover that she had learned the art of tavern-scoring in—where do you think?—Ceylon!

My own belief, which I share with Mr. Chesterton, is that Datchery was Bazzard. At first sight, no character in the book would appear more unlikely to be capable of sustaining such a rôle than the taciturn clerk of Mr. Grewgious. He appears in the first instance as a "Norfolk dumpling," but as the narrative proceeds it becomes evident that this mysterious person is something more than a mere country clown. Afterwards, one learns that he has written a play—a fact which may not be without some future significance.

The Bazzard-Datchery theory is not without some more direct corroboration. In Chapter XX we find Rosa calling upon Mr. Grewgious in Staple Inn. She asks her host if he is "always alone," and Grewgious replies: "Always alone; except that I have daily company in a gentleman of the name of Bazzard, my clerk." "He doesn't live here?" asks Rosa again. "No," rejoins Grewgious; "he goes his way after office hours. In fact, he is off duty here altogether, just at present." I have italicised the word "here," as it appears to me the most important word in the sentence. If Bazzard was off duty "there," where was he "on" duty? I suggest that he was acting for Grewgious, who was employing him at the time to clear the reputation of Neville Landless, and that he was acting in that capacity the part of "a single buffer, of an easy temper, living idly on his means."

I am not writing a report of the trial, or I would have liked to have alluded at some length to the grave judicial precision of Mr. Justice Chesterton and to the remarkable forensic skill of the counsel on both sides. The witnesses were excellent. Mr. Sheridan Jones made a witty and alert Bazzard, but hardly suggested to me the Bazzard of Dickens. A last word should be said of Miss J. K. Prothero's impersonation of the opium woman. It was triumphant.

T. MICHAEL POPE.

The first exhibition of the Society of Animal Painters is being held at the Leicester Galleries, Leicester Square. The membership includes the names of the two Royal Academicians, Mr. H. W. B. Davis and Mr. Briton Rivière, and almost all the other well-known painters in this branch of art. Miss Lucy Kemp-Welch has been elected first president.

REVIEWS

A Third Sex

BY SIR WILLIAM BULL, M.P.

The Future of the Woman's Movement. By H. M. SWANWICK, M.A. With an Introduction by Mrs. FAWCETT, LL.D. (G. Bell and Sons. 2s. 6d. net.)

SOME people think that the Woman's Suffragette movement will die out, or at least slumber again with intervals of fitful wakefulness, as it has during the last forty or fifty years. I am not of that opinion. The real emancipation of women began when the Humber Company built the first ladies' machine in the '80's. This and lawn tennis gave a large number of girls amusement and companionship with men in the open air which had hitherto been lacking, except in the case of hunting for the wealthier classes, and croquet which was really a solitary as well as a slow game for the middle classes.

The young lady of half a century ago who did wool work also wasted thousands of hours of valuable time in practising the piano; in nine cases out of ten she had no taste or inclination for music, and is now as defunct as her grandmother who swooned in graceful attitudes on every occasion. Women are rapidly taking up a more aggressive position in the world; they travel unchaperoned; they ride alone in taxis, and live like bachelors by themselves in flats, if they think fit, without scandal. You cannot get away from it. As a matter of fact a new sex is growing up: a third sex—women who deliberately abandon all feminine attributes and honestly do not care for love or passion. They want to live their own lives; they do not want to get married or expect it. They imitate men as far as they can in their attire. They smoke cigarettes and lead useful lives as clerks, typists, telegraphists, actuaries, doctors, and take up a hundred other occupations which were formerly the sole occupation of men. They do not want men; they are learning to be independent of them. I do not pretend that all women who follow these occupations are of this class, but I maintain that there is a large and growing proportion of what is practically a third sex. Inasmuch as the proportion of men over women is increasing, I see no harm in it but good. Spinsterhood is no longer the reproach it once was and women lead far more interesting and brighter lives than ever they did before.

The woman's demand for the vote is the natural outcome of all this, and the fact that some of them mean to have it has to be faced by both parties in the State whether they like it or not. A large number of Members of Parliament are academically in favour of women having the vote, and many of them many years ago pledged themselves to it on a thousand platforms without much thought as to what it entailed. "Why should not women who pay rates and taxes have the vote when they have men servants who have it with not a tenth part of the intellectual qualification necessary to judge as to which way to vote on great questions of national or municipal importance? Taxation without representation is tyranny," they said, and from that time they were counted among the supporters of those who believed in Women's Suffrage.

But there was no driving force behind it all; each party fooled the women in turn, until violence became rampant and many supporters fell away. Some because they genuinely believed that violence in this connection was wrong, whilst others made it an excuse.

"People said and say: 'If they get the vote, they will be in Parliament in no time and we shall have a female Prime Minister.'" was another argument against it. I do not think that is likely for many generations. Women on any of the larger local authorities have not been much of a success. A lot of water must flow under Westminster Bridge before they are sufficiently trained. The female mind at present is not attuned to public speaking in debate. We have had some of the best female intellects on the School Board and the London County Council, but no one can say they have shone. They have done splendid work in committees, but their voices have not been heard to much useful advantage in the Council chamber. It will be, as we say, many years before we have a female M.P., and many generations before we have a female Prime Minister. When she arrives, it will be by common consent.

We have read most of the literature on the subject, and it is growing into a big library on both sides. The best book we read on the anti side was called "An Englishwoman's Home," written by one "M. E. S.," and was a working woman's plea for exemption from political responsibility. It did not pretend to be scientific, but it was written by a shrewd woman of the world, who had mixed with men and who had written much. She dissected the weaknesses of her own sex with merciless acumen, and showed where they were bound to fail.

The present book is the best one in favour of the movement we have come across for some time. It is short and pithy, and a list of the topics discussed will give some idea of its scope: "Causes of the Women's Movement—What is the Women's Movement?—The Subjection of Women—Physical Force—Democracy and Representative Government—Votes—The Economic Problem: (i) The Wage Earner; (ii) The Mother; (iii) The Housewife; (iv) The Prostitute; (v) Commercialised Vice—The Man's Woman—The Woman's Woman—Sex Antagonism—The Old Adam and the New."

Counsel for the Crown are always strictly moderate in their statements, and for that very reason their speeches to the jury are often so deadly. The author is clever enough to take the same line; she puts her case moderately but forcibly—very differently, indeed, from some advocates whose hysterical claims evoke nothing but contempt. She gives many interesting facts; she points out that the "poor sex" have, on a very moderate estimate, raised and spent in twelve months a sum of £100,000 in working for the vote alone, which may be taken as some evidence of the intensity of their demand. "Money talks," as the common expression runs. Then she notes the woman's increased desire to "spend money," wisely or foolishly as the case may be. A cynical reviewer would here comment that women have done that in all ages, but our earnest author means spending the money they have earned themselves with a sense of independence. The question of Prostitution is not shirked; neither is it dealt with in a lurid way. It is discussed as frankly as if two men were talking seriously on a serious subject in a smoking-room. The Chicago report on the subject is again and again referred to, and some startling figures are given.

Whether you are for or against Women's Suffrage; if you take any interest in the welfare of your kind, you should read this book. It is bound to arrest your attention, and perhaps put the matter before you in a new light. Although the policy of this paper is dead against the "militants," we desire above all things to be fair.

A Passer Through Prague

My Bohemian Days in Paris. By JULIUS M. PRICE. Illustrated by the Author. (T. Werner Laurie. 10s. 6d. net.)

PARIS of the 'eighties is the far-off world of which Mr. Price writes. The people of that period still spoke of the Ville Lumière, and dwelt on the truth of such well-worn axioms as "Qui s'excuse s'accuse," and still followed other antique fashions. The author of the present work does much the same. Although he is writing of thirty years ago, he begins by stoutly maintaining that no great changes have taken place since the Bohemia of his day, and that all things are as jolly, bright, and charming as when he was young. This is the agreeable attitude that Mr. Price at first assumes, but as he continues his reminiscences it is gradually borne in upon the reader that times have changed a little, and that even so happy a reveller as the author—and artist—perceives that, after all, his book is but a history of old days, "souvenirs des beaux jours de notre jeunesse."

Now, the making of books on Bohemian life in Paris is a delicate and charming art. Many have practised it, and several of those writers have done it far better than Mr. Price. This, we need hardly point out, is unfortunate for the present volume, but it is lucky for us that we have so many more delicate and subtle memories of student life in the city of most catholic allure.

The long-past personal adventures which the locust hath eaten require very skilful handling in their re-incarnation—unless the whole affair is to appear banal, vulgar—the weary gloating over intrigues and simple amusements which were jolly enough for a young boy, but a deadly bore to people who hear of them years after. We own Mr. Price, gifted as he doubtless is in a thousand ways, does not possess the qualities which could make his Bohemian days in Paris remarkably delightful. One knows all his stories of his student freaks and love affairs already; everyone has been through these experiences. There is the excitement of fever and the depression of recovery. But given the spirit of romance, and the same bare facts become golden fancies; the mystic rose of youth turns many dull affairs into gay dreams and splendid visions; the fairy fancy may decorate a hundred stupid intrigues until they appear as lively poems of delight.

Mr. Price has relied merely on Paris and thirty years ago and the ordinary student's life as it then was. He states the facts more or less clearly, and adds that she was beautiful and kind and those were happy, happy days. We think it may have been so; but we are not interested, unless he can tell his story with art and feeling and decorate his pages with lively drawings. He does not do either. In his desire to tell us about himself, he indites a bald report, he loses the delicious spirit of Paris and la jeunesse in his attempt to make a plain statement of facts. Nevertheless, the opening chapters do give us something of the not always inevitable charm of youth. But in this case it is the manner in which various French families and artists, especially Gérôme, receive Mr. Price when, as a boy, he adventured into the world of art that makes this blithe outsetting interesting and instinct with the essence of old hopes and dreams. Later the book is dull by reason of its attempt to give us too much realism and not enough of the place and period. Years ago someone made a rather bad translation of a lyric by Clément Marot:—

Here in Paris, city free,
One day, passing melancholy,
I into alliance fell
With the gayest damosel
That e'er came from Italy.

She is seized of honesty,
And I think (my fantasy)
Is no fairer damosel
Here in Paris.

I'll not name her here to thee;
Only my sweet friend is she. . . .

And so forth, with a lightness and sense of beauty which Mr. Price, perhaps, possesses, but is unable to endow his present work. The spirit of Thackeray, of Du Maurier, of Henri Mürger, of Marot's "Dedans Paris, Ville jolie," is missing, and its absence transforms a book which we hoped would be a delightful picture of youth and art into a disappointment—indifferently illustrated.

An Italian Philosopher

The Philosophy of Giambattista Vico. By BENEDETTO CROCE. Translated by R. G. COLLINGWOOD. (Howard Latimer. 10s. 6d. net.)

IT is probable that even the name of this Italian philosopher is known to only a limited circle of English students of philosophy, and it can hardly be expected that so solid and elaborate a work as Signor Croce's, even in its English translation, can prove attractive to the general reader. Vico lived so long ago as from 1668 to 1744, at Naples, the son of a small bookseller, always in straitened circumstances; he held for thirty-six years an appointment of Professor of Rhetoric at the University, for the small annual stipend of £17, and was obliged to eke out his resources by literary work and still more by private lessons. In spite of all obstacles, including domestic troubles, this man of genius became "the hero of the philosophic life." Sometimes plunged in a profound individual and cosmic pessimism, he could rise to the certainty of scientific method, advancing from his earlier work, and from his first attempt at philosophico-historical research to his Scienza Nuova after twenty-five years of unremitting and toilsome thought. The positive side of his theory of knowledge was developed in this last-named work, where the human knowledge of the mind and of history is raised to the level of divine knowledge. It would be impossible within reasonable limits of space to attempt to give a clear idea of Vico's views and philosophical system. His theories of knowledge passed through two phases. His obscurity consisted in the obscurity of his ideas, writes Signor Croce, "in his insufficient understanding of certain connections, and the substitution for them of fallacious ones; in the arbitrary element, that is, which he introduces into his thought, or, to put it more simply, in his own downright errors." His "New Science" might, in its philosophical aspect, it is said, owing to the prominence given to the study of the individualising forms, above all the imagination, be called without paradox a philosophy of mind, with special attention to the philosophy of imagination or æsthetic.

The wide range of his subjects will be evident from a mere enumeration of them. He dealt with the imaginative and semi-imaginative forms of knowledge, the moral consciousness, morality and religion, morality and law, the historical aspect of law, Providence, the law of reflux, metaphysics, history, obscure periods, heroic society, Homer and primitive poetry, Roman history, the return of barbarism, contemporary culture. Separate treatises might be written on each of them. His metaphysics, for instance, meant his conception of reality as a whole, not of the world of man by itself; the word included also his ultimate negative conclusion asserting the unknowability or the imperfect knowability of one or more spheres of reality, or of that highest sphere in which the others reunite. There are many acute observations of moral psychology in Vico's writings, "expressed in his gem-like style"; Signor Croce instances "his little-known theory of laughter, which he derives from disappointed expectation and from the weakness of the mind, and therefore denies the faculty both to animals and to the perfect man, considering a man who laughs to be a satyr or faun, intermediate between a brute and a man." In his own days Vico passed for an eccentric and lived as a recluse: even to-day, though well known in certain restricted circles, he has not taken in Italy the place he deserves in the general history of thought. Though he cannot stand comparison with the later philosophers, there is full agreement between his historical discoveries and the criticism and research of the nineteenth century. "Above all, he agrees with his successors in his rules of method, his scepticism as regards the narrative of ancient historians, his recognition of the superiority of documents and monuments over narrative, his investigation of language as a storehouse of primitive beliefs and customs, his social interpretation of mythology, his emphasis on spontaneous development rather than external communication of civilisation, his care not to interpret primitive psychology in the light of modern psychology; and so on." Clearly, Vico was a philosopher of independent and original views, whose thought may profitably be studied by other philosophers and professors. Learned men and students of all countries may therefore take an interest in Signor Croce's book: but such works have their unavoidable limitations of popularity.

The Scourge of Apathy

Lord Roberts' Campaign Speeches. A Continuation of "The Message to the Nation." (John Murray. 6d. net.)

Militarism. An Appeal to the Man-in-the-street. (T. Fisher Unwin. 4d. net.)

THIS reprint of the speeches delivered by Lord Roberts at Bristol, Wolverhampton, Leeds, and Glasgow, between February and May, should convince the public who could not attend his meetings of the seriousness of the military situation. It is a pathetic case. Our Grand Old Field-Marshal, who speaks with unique authority, has been for years pleading with the nation to provide for its self-defence, while there is yet time: and well may he say that the nation has been smitten, apparently, with the most terrible scourge that can afflict a great State—the scourge of apathy. The remedy he proposes is simple, feasible, and adequate: he has been bitterly criticised and grossly misrepresented, but with marvellous pluck and patience he returns repeatedly to the charge. Universal Military Training, obligatory on the young men of all classes between eighteen and twenty-one, for a few months and weeks in successive years, is the method advocated; for the formation of a Citizen Army, to be prepared to defend England in case of invasion, and to admit of the Expeditionary Force of the Regular Army leaving this country, when required for service abroad. Such a National Army would not be a conscript army: foreign service would not be compulsory. Lord Roberts contends, and rightly, that the present Territorial Force has failed in discipline, numbers, equipment and energy. A new Territorial or Citizen Army is essential, in which promotion should be by merit and suitability, and the training necessary should be only long enough to ensure efficiency in discipline, drill, and musketry. The nation and the Government, by special arrangement with every employer, would guarantee the safety of his employment to each citizen soldier. In words that echo Thucydides, the speaker reminded his audiences "that the surest way of preventing war is to be prepared for it," and, again, "For that is the true slavery—to live in fear of other nations through trusting for your defence to the valour or skill of other men." It is true that the creation of such an army would require a small sacrifice, by every able-bodied youth, of a few months, but the sacrifice would be fully compensated by the health-giving and strength-giving discipline, and by the conditions of service, calculated to foster strength of body and of character, quickness of intelligence, moral fibre, which would greatly improve his general efficiency.

Through Lord Roberts, as spokesman, the National Service League has urged its object—to ensure the safety of these islands and the maintenance of the Empire. The cause is doubtless making way, but the attitude of the Government and the apathy of the public are terrible obstacles. It is not sufficient to depend upon our Navy alone. So long as we are unprepared to defeat invasion by land, we invite catastrophe and the loss of Empire.

The other pamphlet on "Militarism" is anonymous—is the author ashamed to own it? It is addressed to the Man-in-the-street, to encourage the democracy to disregard the warnings of Lord Roberts. It fastens on the word "militarism," which he has shown to be a false accusation against the Universal Military Training he advocates. It denies the truth of the maxim, which has been generally recognised as true since its Roman origin—Si vis pacem, para bellum, and substitutes the absurd paradox: "If we want peace, we must prepare for peace." What preparation is required for peace, which is still, thank goodness, the normal condition of the Empire? It proposes that Germany or Russia should begin the reduction of her military arm, and England of her Navy. It is opposed to the maintenance of an Expeditionary Force, and suggests the reduction of the Regular Army, to be replaced by Territorials. In short, this little pamphlet ignores facts and parades its ignorance. It ignores the dangers of commencing disarmament while other nations are armed to the teeth. The democracy would suffer equally with others if the views of this pamphleteer were to prevail.

Perhaps too much attention and space have been bestowed on this small production. But there is no subject of greater moment to the Empire than the defence of England. No one wants militarism: Lord Roberts is against it. Preparation for self-protection is the best guarantee of peace.

The Sangrail

The Quest of the Holy Grail. By JESSIE L. WESTON.
(G. Bell and Sons. 2s. 6d. net.)

READERS of Tennyson and of Hawker—the poet-priest of Morwenstow—are familiar with the Christian story of the Holy Grail. The Grail legend has long occupied the attention of students of folk-lore. It has, in fact, been brought into the region of controversy. Until comparatively recently, Miss Weston says, “scholars were divided into two sharply opposed camps. The one held that the Grail story was a purely Christian ecclesiastical legend, while the other maintained that the Grail, far from being a Christian relic, was simply the automatic, food-providing talisman of popular tradition, and as such, of purely folk-lore, preferably of Celtic origin. This last is the view of Miss Weston, who, however, examines very carefully the Christian theory of origin. She contends that “there is no ecclesiastical story which connects Joseph of Arimathea with the vessel (dish or cup) of the Last Supper, and that as early as 1260, the Nederland poet, Jacob van Maerlant, in his ‘Merlin,’ denounced the whole story as mere lies, on the specific ground that the Church knew nothing about it.” She further advances the suggestion that the Joseph-Grail story was a devolution of the older myth, and was fabricated by the Glastonbury monks, to raise the position and importance of the Abbey, when its fortunes were somewhat declining towards the close of the twelfth century, the model being found in the legends of Fescamp, an abbey of the same order as Glastonbury.

In the Celtic myth the Grail appears as a food-providing vessel, which appeared automatically according to notions of sympathetic magic, in connection with mysterious ritual celebrations, part, perhaps, of an esoteric cult symbolising Nature’s annual death and resurrection of life under an anthropomorphic form.

There can be no doubt concerning the esoteric nature of the rite, as appears from the following :

du ségré du Graal si fet grant pechié et grant mal cil qui s’entremet de conter fors si comme il doit aler.

[of the secret of the Grail, he commits a great sin and a great wrong, who undertakes to tell the tale otherwise than as it should run.]

Miss Weston examines very fairly the methods by which, as she considers, the Grail legend was equated with the Christian Eucharist, although she misses one point, the sacrificial aspect of the Eucharist as parallel to the ceremonial and sacrificial offering of the life-giving natural food of the earth. But the parallel of partaking this food with the Communion of spiritual food as the source of spiritual life is certainly striking.

If the folk-lore origin of the myth be the true solution, there was nothing to remark; indeed, it might be expected that Christianity would readily adapt it to the Christian mysteries. The connection between the mystery of physical life and life Immortal is sufficiently obvious. We have to remember, too, that in the face of paganism, the Christian rite was also more or less esoteric. The most telling argument in favour of the folk-lore theory is the existence of the additional features in the legend of the lonely castle, the fisher king, the waste land, the dead knight, and the wailing women: of which none can find a place in the Christian hypothesis. But in the clash of Paganism and Christianity a cloud of obscurity is raised, which in all legends and stories (witness the assimilation of the heathen Pantheon) tends to hide true origins. Miss Weston, however, has very learnedly made out a good case, and doubtless many will accept her conclusions.

More Thraliana

The Intimate Letters of Hester Piozzi and Penelope Pennington, 1788-1821. Edited by OSWALD G. KNAPP. With Thirty Illustrations. (John Lane. 16s. net.)

MRS. PIOZZI, previously Mrs. Thrale, shines in literary history only in the reflected light of the great Dr. Johnson. If the lexicographer had not deigned to accept the hospitality of the Streatham brewer, if he had not conducted a correspondence with his hostess there, and if he had not afforded her the opportunity of later publishing her reminiscences of the literary giant of the Eighteenth Century it is probable that Mrs. Thrale would have been quite unknown to fame. Dr. Johnson was friendly, however, only with Mrs. Thrale. With Mrs. Piozzi, as she became on her second marriage, he refused to have any communication. In his eyes she had committed the triple offence of marrying a foreigner, a papist and a music-master. For such an enormity Johnson never forgave her. His resentment was shared by practically the whole of the circle of which Mrs. Thrale had been the centre at Streatham, and from the day of her second marriage one may say that most of the celebrities with whom she had previously been acquainted passed out of her life.

As a consequence, the present volume of some two hundred letters, none of which had hitherto been published, ought not to raise very great expectations. If it does there will certainly be disappointment. The correspondent to whom they were addressed, Penelope Weston, afterwards Penelope Pennington, was a lady who never gained an entry into literary history. She was at the most merely an admirer of the genius of her friends and acquaintances. She was one of the few who did not desert Mrs. Piozzi on her second marriage, but she was able to give her but little news of the world from which her correspondent was exiled, and the latter could give her none in exchange. Practically the only celebrity who appears in these letters, otherwise than as a distant figure, is Mrs. Siddons. With her and her family Mrs. Piozzi remained intimate. Nevertheless, these two hundred letters throw no new light on the career of perhaps the greatest actress England has known. Apart from the Siddons family, one catches a glimpse now and then of a few other well-known figures. The banker-poet, Rogers, was one of the several suitors for the hand of Mrs. Piozzi's youngest daughter. Mention is made of a chance meeting with the actress, Elizabeth Farren, after she had become Lady Derby; Mrs. Piozzi mentions accepting once or twice the hospitality of the Ladies of Llangollen. To her, as well as to all others who knew or knew of them, some degree of mystery in connection with them was apparent. "The unaccountable knowledge these Recluses have of all living books and people and things is like magic; one can mention no one of whom the private history is unknown to them."

These letters consist for the most part of small talk of little if any interest to anyone besides the two correspondents. There is an occasional remark about or inquiry concerning a member of the larger world, and in particular during the earlier half of the period covered by the correspondence. Mrs. Piozzi furnishes many reflections on the course of the then contemporary revolution in France. As a consequence of events on the Continent the shadow of the fear of invasion not infrequently falls across these pages. Otherwise, the principal topics of correspondence are Mr. Piozzi's gout so long as he lived and the ungrateful treatment meted out to her by her daughters, and also, it must be admitted, in the later days by her adopted son on whose behalf Mrs. Piozzi almost impoverished herself. The writer of these letters suffered many griefs and sorrows in the course of her long life, but these had no result in souring her disposition. The sweetness of it grows more apparent as the years pass, and at the end one cannot forbear from loving the lonely old figure waiting patiently and uncomplainingly for death; never losing her courage, her cheerfulness or her serenity; setting an example to all who came in contact with her. For her, death had neither terror nor repulsion. She looked towards the end as all may hope to look as their time approaches. "I have an appointment to keep with dear Piozzi, whom I brought out of his own sweet country to lie in the vault he made for me and my ancestors at Dymchurch, where I am most willing to keep him company."

Mr. Knapp connects the letters by means of a copious commentary, which nevertheless is, in parts, insufficient thoroughly to elucidate the text. The reading would have been easier if there had been some readier means of differentiating the comment from the text, preferably by the use of varying type. The illustrations are suitable and well produced, and all interested in Mrs. Thrale and her period will be grateful to both the editor and the publisher of the volume.

Continuing its tour of the world, the Quinlan Opera Company is leaving Australia for Canada and the United States. On the return of the Company to England next autumn Mr. Quinlan will give a short season in the provinces, and present in English Wagner's "Parsifal," D'Albert's "Tiefland," and Ferrier's "Monna Vanna," in addition to the 29 operas already in his repertoire.

An Observant Motorist

A Motor Tour Through Canada. By T. W. WILBY.
Illustrated. (John Lane. 5s. net.)

DREAMS of a united Canada, of Canada as an Imperial granary, and of the development of other aspects of the Dominion are, as the author points out, in a fair way to full realisation; but in his last paragraph he advances a plea for "the Canada of the scenic road," and in his book is eloquent justification of it. Few English folk realise that there is not yet a trans-continental road across Canada; that even as far east as the lands bounded on the south by Lake Superior the car had to be shipped, since the lake formed the only means of transit, while farther west the difficulties of the tracks—for they cannot be called roads—were numberless, and in British Columbia the adventurers bumped their car from sleeper to sleeper along the railway, since there was not even a track to follow.

The book is brilliantly kaleidoscopic, for its author has not only rushed across a continent, but has also recorded faithfully the manners, customs, and peculiarities of the people he met on the way. His illustrations are excellent, and the text of the work is no whit behind them. Humour comes in with the Monckton Bore, in Eastern Canada, and reaches its zenith with the advent of the Man of Statistics, 'way out in the very far West. The east had its peculiarities. "When it came to the prospect of tackling Choctaw perpetrations like Tontimogouchiasibash and the full-flavoured Pugwashsourispagdhaliochau, I gave order to change our course and fled," with good reason, too. Mere Welsh would tremble here.

Conservatism, the author records, is the keynote of life in the eastern provinces; there are settled conditions and a solid, bounded population. Along the St. Lawrence is more of French than English Canadian influence, with religion as "the dominant and insistent note of the highway," in the form of crosses by the wayside. So steep is the road into Quebec that the car was backed up it, forward progress being found impossible, and "all Gaul collected on the side-walks."

There are in the book, when in company with its author one has reached farther west than Quebec, full details of the Canadian "rules of the road," for motorists in the streets of the cities. There is a note on Ottawa water which grants the author absolute freedom in the noble company of exaggerators, and there is a plea that Canada should waken to the need for intellectual progress as well as for muscular and commercial development. It is only too true that the Dominion has as yet produced hardly a writer of note, nor has one of her citizens yet achieved great prominence in any art or science. Hurried and busied over commercial and agricultural aggrandisement, Canada is far behind in the race for intellectual fitness and development, and the time draws near, with the increasing settlement of the country, when this will count as a drawback. There is plenty of welcome for muscle, but little for brains.

This, together with the plea for a trans-continental highway, is one of the things in which the author bids Canada bestir herself. Commercially, the Canadian is already astir, and in the right way, too. "He does not call for Demagogy or Socialism or Labour organised against the forces of Capital to win his position among his fellow men, only sterling work, ability, and willingness"—Canada wants the best, and to them she will give of her best, while the wastrels remain in the Old Country to organise strikes and foment labour unrest.

But that is apart from the work before us. The author has written a racy, fascinating story of an exceedingly interesting tour. It is not a dry catalogue of things even, but a breezy, intimate record of experience, a work of value to students of Canada, a witty, humorous book, and one to which we accord a hearty welcome.

A Roguish Satirist

Vices in Virtues, and Other Vagaries. (Longmans, Green, and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

It is quite possible that Shakespeare, when he optimistically contended that "there lives some soul of goodness in things evil," would have been prepared to admit that there is also an element of truth in the converse proposition. That some soul of badness—or, at any rate, of undesirableness—resides in many things which are universally accounted lovely and of good report is a no less tenable thesis; and it is one with which excellent play has been made by the anonymous author of as smart a collection of satirical essays as we have encountered for some time past. The writer's humour is, in every sense of the term, good humour; his eye for the drawbacks that attend attributes and achievements of the conventionally admirable sort is unerringly keen; and he delivers his shrewd hits with a slyly deprecating air and an obvious sense of enjoyment which we confess to having found refreshing and wholly irresistible.

No great amount of penetration, it may be, is needed for the business of indicating the "vices" which attach themselves to much of the organised charity of the day, though it has seldom been done with such combined lightness and sureness of touch as here; and it may be objected with some point that to represent the "innocent" pursuit of gardening as an occupation conducive to the commission of all or most of the seven deadly sins is a mere humorous tour de force. But it is in his wickedly effective presentation of "the other side of the shield" in respect of certain generally admired qualities of mind and character that our author shows himself, for all his conscious exaggeration, a really observant moral philosopher. Who will fail to recognise the truth which underlies his paradoxical contention that there is such a "vice" as that of loving people—relations and others—without liking them in the least? Who will not revel in his denunciation of the hard tyranny of "commonsense," that triple armour of unsympathetic narrowness and bullying self-sufficiency? So, too, with his laughing indictment of the evils that spring from unselfishness, and of the unwitting maleficence of people who yield blind and unreasoning worship to the fetish of what they call their "principles." In these and other instances we find touches of a gay wisdom which, lightly winged as it is, hits its mark with sure and effective aim.

In two of the essays, oddly enough, we find their author reversing his usual practice, and seeking for us the soul of goodness in things evil. That he is convincing in his exposition of "The Joys of Indigestion" we are not prepared to admit; but many who have invalid friends will doubtless find an unholy delight in his consideration of the subject of "Ill-Health as a Profession." Among the "other vagaries" included in this diverting miscellany, there is a disquisition on "The Ungentlemanliness of Ladies" which, in view of its temptation to "feminist" reprisals, may possibly help to explain the author's preference for anonymity. He has not been over-kind to the members of what he himself acknowledges to be "a much-abused race" in his sprightly essay on "Reviewing." But we freely forgive him for the sake of the genuine pleasure we have derived from an exceptionally clever and entertaining little book.

The Machinery of Mind

A Manual of Psychology. By G. F. STOUT, LL.D.
Third Edition. (University Tutorial Press.
8s. 6d.)

DR. STOUT'S manual is too well known to need any introduction. The present edition, however, contains extensive and important changes. Two chapters, those on "Instinct" and "Attention," have been added. The leading motive of the former is an exegesis upon the proposition that "instinctive behaviour is essentially conditioned by intelligent consciousness." The criticism which we are impelled to pass upon this chapter, as upon a great deal of the work, is that, however interesting and illuminating disquisitions on these and similar topics may be, their connection with the proper subject of the book is not easily seen, and the result of their inclusion is to throw upon the unfortunate student the almost intolerable burden of 736 pages of compressed wisdom. Fully one-half of this number is concerned with metaphysics pure and simple, and the author is at no pains to utilise the lessons taught by the metaphysician to throw light upon the difficult places in the study of psychology.

We are perfectly at one with Dr. Stout when he tells us that the great error to avoid is "sketchiness"; that the "study of psychology is of no use to the student unless he is able to live himself into psychological problems"; that cut and dried statements are of not much use, and so forth. While giving the learned author credit for realising these facts and for the best intentions of avoiding the mistakes made by so many of his predecessors, we must confess that he has too often fallen into the very errors which he was so anxious to avoid. He uses, for example, the old fallacious phraseology concerning that nightmare of the student, the problem of consciousness. The unfortunate tyro is left to believe as best he may that consciousness is something per se, a self-subsisting unity. He might equally well be invited to study digestion without reference to the activities of the digestive organs or the properties of the substances digested. The author goes at very great length into the relative merits of the opposing modes of thought regarding the problem of consciousness known as "parallelism" and the theory of "interaction." To any save the skilled metaphysician both of these so-called explanations are equally futile. Conscious processes do not "accompany" nervous processes: they are themselves nervous processes. And to say that conscious processes "interact" with nervous processes is as if one were to say that autumn interacts with falling leaves. Conclusion after conclusion is vitiated by the failure to break away from the hypnotic spell of a phraseology formulated before mankind had even the very vaguest knowledge of the essential factors of the problem.

These threadbare shibboleths matter nothing to the modern seeker after truth. It suffices him to know that from time immemorial men have concerned themselves with these futile inquiries into reality, and the multitude of difficulties evolved from the depths of their own minds, and that they are as far from a final solution as ever they were. What concerns him is to get a living grasp on the vital substance of the matter before him, to attain some clear conception of the mechanism and working of this delicate piece of machinery which we call "the mind." He is no longer to be satisfied with the customary bare statement that there happen to exist such things as nerves and sensitive organs and muscles and a brain. In sober truth, psychology as distinct from psycho-physiology is an outworn creed. It has made desperate and pitiable attempts to assimilate itself to changed conditions and has merely rendered itself ridiculous thereby. The reader's consolation must be that the dawn of better things is at hand. That we may hope to possess one day a real science of psychology the constant references in this voluminous work to the elementary teachings of psycho-physiology would alone suffice to show.

A new book, entitled "In Far New Guinea," is sure to be welcome. The author, Mr. Henry Newton, has spent many years in the island in closest touch with the natives, and has a wealth of information to impart concerning their work, customs, cannibalism, sorcery, feasts, and tabus, together with interesting observations on the nature and resources of the country. The book will be published by Messrs. Seeley, Service & Co.

The Stormy Petrel of Spanish Art

Francisco Goya: A Study of the Work and Personality of the Eighteenth Century Spanish Painter and Satirist. By HUGH STOKES. Illustrated. (Herbert Jenkins. 10s. 6d. net.)

THE romance of the late eighteenth century in Spain is told in this finely-conceived biography of Goya by Mr. Hugh Stokes. The author is by no means content to give us all the known facts in connection with this master's life and work—they are not very full or illuminating—but he presents us with a lively and careful consideration of the society in which his hero lived and the ever-changeable circumstances in which he did his brilliant work.

Goya is a most difficult subject. In the first place, his work varied immensely; side by side with his most delectable portraits you will find his weakest drawing and poorest painting. And then he was catholic in his gifts or tastes; just as you have decided to consider him as a painter of church decoration, you find that you must make a close study of his often rococo but excellent cartoons for the tapestry factory of Santa Barbara, or that he is accepting commissions for delicate and charming genre compositions or designing his long list of aqua-tints and etchings which made him famous all over Europe as the inventor of Los Caprichos. He mastered lithography in its earliest years. Above all, he was a portrait-painter of extremely uneven achievement until the last years of his long life, during which time his genius blossomed like the rose.

When you have realised that he is the devoted student of Velazquez you will find his beautiful, free little paintings of children owe something to Murillo; when you most feel the influence of Anton Rafael Mengs—who was forced into pseudo-classicism by Winckelmann—you will learn that Correggio taught Goya much, and that the work of Titian and Tiepolo gave him help. Even the famous Frenchmen, like Watteau and Fragonard, showed him the way to some delicious pictures. One could continue the list, but to what purpose, since Goya was still always himself and always intensely Spanish. He has been spoken of as the Hogarth of his country, and Mr. Stokes shows us that one of Goya's many portraits of himself gives us a man very much of the same style as the English painter of social satires—and many better works. But you cannot label Goya in so simple a way. His nature, like his art, was bold, uncertain, infinitely strong and all-embracing.

That the same man should have painted "La Vendemia," the artificial and elegant vintage tapestry cartoon, and have drawn the vague yet macabre horrors of the Capriches, that he should have made dozens of dignified church decorations of no great distinction, and then painted the frescoes of San Antonio de la Florida so light-heartedly as to suggest the sort of work in colour that Offenbach accomplished in music, was perfectly natural to him. These diversities will appear remarkable only to those who have not studied the heart of man nor made themselves acquainted with the million moods of a genius. But it is difficult to tell the story of such a one and his art even in a volume of nearly four hundred well-considered pages.

Mr. Hugh Stokes is not, however, affrighted in the least by his chosen task. He adventures among the biographical recriminations of a dozen writers on Goya in a keen, sympathetic and critical mood. He shows us every point of view, but he invariably holds to his own without hesitation or the slightest vagueness. When he can use the research or opinions of those who have gone before him, such as Lafond, Charles Yriarte, Mr. William Rothenstein, or fifty others, he does so boldly, with acknowledgment, of course; but when his views vary from those of previous writers on the subject, Mr. Stokes is not worried: he uses his own acute sense of the most likely result of circumstances about which he is well informed with perfect surety and clearness. The result is one of the most delightful biographies of an extraordinary personage and gifted artist that has been published for many years.

The personality of Goya is said to have attracted and subdued those with whom he held social intercourse. There is nothing, however, to prove his charm even in so meticulous a study as that by Mr. Stokes. But then Goya was a genius and, in a sense, the archetype of a Spaniard of his particular period. Charles VI was a stupid king but a good sportsman, who greatly admired the art of Goya because the painter understood and loved shooting and the romance and bravery of the bull-ring. Most women loved Goya's powerful character and overwhelming physique, his violent passions and his daring, confident nature. He, too, loved women and loved humanity, and we should think gave more than he took from those about him, as all artists do. But he also claimed much, and was ready to face the world in any circumstances throughout the greater part of eighty years.

There were, however, periods of some kind of nervous affection which are not clearly accounted for by his foreign biographers nor the latest English student of his life and work. Some have supposed that his brain may have suffered from time to time and that many of his most violent drawings, such as the decorations of his own house, are the result of some mental aberration. We think otherwise. The normal personality of a gifted artist may at any time produce such extraordinary results and works so varied as those of Goya. Of this any reader of the present work can judge, for Mr. Stokes presents every side of the question clearly and without bias. But even apart from the intrinsic value of the subject, "Francisco Goya" will be, we think, enjoyed, because Mr. Stokes shows that he himself has great pleasure in writing on the world of art in Spain of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. His wide sympathy for, and intense appreciation of, the masterpieces of art generally colour his valuable work throughout and produce the effect of a conversation on a subject we love with a friend in whose views we are warmly interested.

E. M.

Fiction

Rough Hewers. By AGNES L. NEILD. (Murray and Evenden. 6s.)

THIS is evidently a first novel, and its author handles English awkwardly; there is too much of the story, for it is cumbered with inconsequential and slightly irrelevant things, while most of its characters are old acquaintances of the hardened fiction reader. Giacomo Durant, certainly, is a well drawn figure—a singer who was beloved by a woman far too good for him, and who married a little shop girl, Sylvia, who took to drink after her child was born. But Clement Heathcote, the earnest young curate who damaged his health working in a poor parish, and Margaret, who loved Giacomo but married Clement in the end, are stock figures, of the type beloved of serial writers. Not that these serial writers did not know their business, but the material they used is growing a trifle threadbare. There is a fire in the book, well depicted, but evidently contrived for the purpose of getting rid of Giacomo when the author had no further use for him. We cannot recommend the book as interesting, for it belongs to the manufactured order, and, except for Giacomo, there is not a single character who moves other than in marionette fashion, with the strings in full view.

Marama. By RALPH STOCK. (Hutchinson and Co. 6s.)

IT may be alleged that "Marama" is an improbable story, but, at all events, it is an interesting one, and that is more than can be said of many ordinary works of fiction. Marama, the daughter of an Englishman and his Samoan wife, is placed at a boarding-school at St. Leonards-on-Sea at the age of four. The girl is sufficiently fair not to betray her half-caste origin, of which fact she is kept in ignorance until she returns to her mother's land, just before she enters womanhood. Here she finds her father a slave to drugs and entirely in the hands of his unscrupulous son-in-law, a white man who had married Marama's only sister—a dusky maiden inheriting her mother's swarthy colouring. Marama is now faced with a problem. Brought up for all the years she remembers as a European, what is she to do in this land of her birth? Is she to maintain her English training, or shall she throw in her lot with her sister and her mother's people? The balance is well kept by the author throughout many chapters of the book. The English training pulls and so do the inherent instincts of the heathen woman. To add to her indecision, a native chief proposes to make her his wife, while an English fugitive rescues her when she is madly dancing before an assembly of Fijians. Force of circumstance and her love in the end decide the matter. The plot is well conceived and well worked out; and because it is on unusual lines the story is all the more enjoyable.

The Thing in the Woods. By MARGERY WILLIAMS.
(Duckworth and Co. 6s.)

MYSTERY-STORIES with ghostly thrills in them are growing fewer, possibly because the Psychical Research Society has transformed so many spooks into commonplace and rather depressing things; so that when we come across a yarn with a real thrill in it, we are not over captious with regard to its probability, or the manner of its telling. This is a real mystery story concerning the likelihood of an uneducated Yankee Dutchman turning into a thing with long nails that made awful scratches on people, and caused sundry horrors in some Pennsylvanian woods at odd times. Lycanthropy is given at the end as the partial solution of the mystery, but the author is wise in not turning up all the lights—a thing guessed at is always twice as impressive as a thing known.

For an American story, with an American doctor as its hero, there is very little American ring about the book; save for one old darkey and his rabbit's foot, the whole story, the people, and the language, are thoroughly English. This, however, is a detail, though a few more Yankee traits in the characters would have made the whole thing more probable; in the meantime, bearing in mind the scarcity of thrilling stories, we welcome this as a fairly good one. The scene in the pit of the ruined sawmill is gruesome enough for anyone, and there is, of course, a love interest by way of relief.

Joan's Green Year. By E. L. DOON. (Macmillan and Co. 6s.)

THE novel written in the form of letters had at one time a distinct vogue, and certain fugitive attempts to resuscitate it have been made within the last few years. They have not been crowned with any conspicuous success. If Miss (or Mrs.) Doon shares the fate of most of her predecessors, it will be in some measure because she has chosen an art form which is hopelessly demodé. The story, too, strikes one as a trifle thin. Joan Caneley goes down to a manor farm to spend a holiday. She remains there for a year, during which time she contrives to fall in love with an amiable publisher with a weak heart, whom she ultimately marries. There are a number of sketches and impressions of country life. But the people one meets in these pages do not strike us as real. We do not say that the author herself has not met them; but if she has it is evident that they were on their best behaviour at the time. To enjoy "Joan's Green Year" one should read it in patches. There is some very pleasant humour, and a sufficient stock of sentiment to equip a library of young ladies' fiction. But—to be quite candid—a little of it goes a long way. It belongs to the class of literature known as "bedroom books." The purpose of these works is, we believe, to induce sleep by easy stages.

Mary's Marriage. By EDMUND BOSANQUET. (John Long. 6s.)

THE task would not be an easy one to say how many stories have been written in a similar way to "Mary's Marriage." A girl engaged or about to marry the wrong man, and after many complications, more or less ingenious, as the case may be, finding her true love in the end, of course, with a good setting and excellent character-drawing, can make quite an ordinary or commonplace plot well worth working out; but neither is excellent in this story. The scene is laid, for the most part, in Ireland, and political events are touched on in the course of the story. The reader is left with the impression that Mary is a charming woman, that her true lover well deserved the prize, and that the false one had his just punishment in losing her; but in a long novel we want a little more than this—not to be able to be quite so certain as to what will happen in the last chapter as soon as we have read the first. Interest flags, and the reader is tempted to skip many pages when there is nothing left to arouse curiosity as the story drags to its close.

The Elusive Wife. By R. PENLEY. (John Long. 6s.)

THE scene of action in this story is laid principally in Tenandria, a small and almost unknown kingdom on the Adriatic. A man of wealth and position is seriously injured in a motor-car accident. Thinking himself on the point of death, and knowing that his property would be inherited by a worthless relative of the worst type, he pays an unknown girl £1,000 to become his wife, so that she may inherit his fortune. She disappears at once, and he slowly recovers. Years afterwards, husband and wife meet; but as he was swathed in bandages at the time of the hasty wedding, his wife does not recognise him, more especially as in the meantime he had inherited an uncle's title. Complications are caused by their falling in love with each other, since she believes herself married to another man. Many distinct types of characters are portrayed; some good, others unscrupulous and cruel, who exercise more or less influence on the lives of the hero and heroine.

The Romance of Tristan and Iseult. Drawn from the Best French Sources and Re-told by J. BEDIER. Rendered into English by H. Belloc. (George Allen and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

THE old story of Tristan and Iseult is here told with good effect. None of the pathos of the story is missing in the translation, and many details are supplied not always to be found in other versions. The finish varies from that of one of the latest operatic productions, but the whole tone of tragedy is maintained, the difference being only in the death scene.

Occultists and "Magic"

INTERESTING to the general playgoer, to the occultist Mr. Chesterton's play constitutes a curious phenomenon. Its value as a contribution to occult thought is nil, yet as a "sign of the times" the psychologist cannot afford to overlook it; indeed, it gives much food for thought.

What are the facts? A stage-play appears, frankly entitled "Magic," and frankly about "magic," written, strange to say, by a sturdy champion of the normal, an ardent apologist (in an unexcited world) of Christianity, a sparkling dealer in paradox, an anti-faddist, anti-feminist, a sprightly refuser of all serious topics.

What is he doing in this galère of "magic," and what is his play doing at the Little Theatre, where the vibrations of "Fanny" and of Miss Cicely Hamilton's point of view must be still so strong? If Mr. Chesterton has desired to achieve a supreme paradox, certainly he has succeeded—that no one will deny. Or, to go to the other extreme, does he really intend us to take him seriously? Let us do so for a moment, even at the risk of his thinking us absurd. His recent book on Blake must be our excuse.

The play, if it is anything, is a defence of the super-physical. To what section of the public is it, then, directed? Whom is it expected to convince? The audience at the Little Theatre is usually composed of fairly well-equipped people, or, at any rate, the theatre has that reputation. Surely such an audience is likely to contain a certain number of actual experts in occult matters, while even the exoteric intellectual may be credited with some little working knowledge of most branches of current thought.

What have such people to learn or gain from the propaganda of "Magic"? Nothing. They will go, once, out of curiosity, but they will leave with a smile, with a feeling of irritation, a feeling of disappointment and regret. And the others—the less well-equipped members of the audience? If they are insensitive, they will probably decide that the whole play was rather a fuss about nothing, and remember gratefully the brighter moments of the Duke; while if they are sensitive, they may be left with an unpleasant and most false consciousness that "evil spirits" are the strong powers in the world.

What is Mr. Chesterton's own point of view, one wonders. Is he an accomplished occultist, concealing from a chilly world much esoteric knowledge under the effectual veil of this very naïve and odd little play? Or does "Magic" represent the sum total of his knowledge and convictions? If so, one is sorry, for he does not seem to have advanced beyond some slight acquaintance with the evil or negative side of the hidden powers.

It is as well to say at once that the prologue forms a notable exception, for that, taken by itself, seems to imply that the author has a very real and exquisite sense of the fair, hidden things of Nature. All that Mr. Chesterton has to say about fairies we shall take seriously, whether he likes it or not. But as the play develops, disappointment follows on disappointment. It is natural to compare it with "A Message from Mars," but the comparison is not favourable to "Magic." "A Message from Mars" was a convincing and coherent affair because the appeal was frankly to the imagination, not to a belief in the unseen world. On that understanding we could accept anything. But in "Magic"—unless the words, "a fantastic comedy," save the situation—we are definitely asked to believe in certain psychic phenomena, and it is at this point that the occultist very naturally feels he has something to say. The production of such a play as "Magic" (not the play itself, be it understood) is an important event to those actively interested in the spread of mysticism. Occultists welcome the appearance on so distinguished a stage, and by a most gifted author, of a play dealing with their special subject. They feel it is an indication that this subject occupies the mind of the critical, intellectual public increasingly, and, most important of all, that art and occultism are beginning to join hands.

But at this point satisfaction ends. Occultists visit the play, a little wondering, but hoping that their beliefs are to be nobly vindicated. The disillusionment is complete. What of the actual "magic," the theme of the whole work?

Alas! it is not of any very great importance. A red lamp becomes blue, certain "presences" make themselves felt in the Duke's drawing-room; there is a good deal of talk about "séances," "mediums," "spiritualistic circles," and so forth, which all sounds curiously ancient and suggestive of the old Leech drawings in Punch, where hands on waggly wires gave thrills to ladies in crinolines and gentlemen with side-whiskers.

How are we to reconcile this nonsense with the exquisite faith which breathes from every line of the prologue?

I have called the play naïve, and to the occultist it must seem so; but it cannot be considered negligible, for though "older souls" may smile at the portentousness and mystery which are thrown round some rather elementary psychic matters, they must also regret extremely that such stress should be laid on the merely evil and trivial side of super-physical existence. That can only do harm. Moreover, it is (perhaps quite unintentionally and from lack of proper knowledge) an unfair presentation of the position of occult thought to-day, which has advanced beyond the trivial and sensational manifestations that unfortunately made such a strong appeal to popular imagination in mid-Victorian times.

One is left to a general conclusion that as Mr. Chesterton's play makes one angry, there is probably "something in it." But that "something" is certain not a satisfactory apologia for the truths of occult science. If it was not Mr. Chesterton's intention to make such a defence, then the play seems to rest on no foundation at all. But the situation remains curious, and to the student of current events, interesting.

I. E. E.

Foreign Reviews

DIE DEUTSCHE RUNDSCHAU.

DECEMBER.—A very interesting feature of this number is the address delivered by Professor Max Planck on his installation as Rector of Berlin University. He treats of the present position of Physical Science—of the need for new definitions and fresh examination—of the developments of the atomic theory. Interesting also is Hoffmann's journal, kept during his employment in Posen under Government during 1802-4, and edited by Herr Hans von Müller. Herr Dickhuth appears to have really concluded his account of the War of Liberation, for the French are all back across the Rhine. The present article deals chiefly with results and general considerations, such as the perfidy of English policy, but there are still some fascinating details. The troops of Yorck, for example, were still wearing, it appears, at the end of the campaign, the clothes they started in for Russia. Charlotte Lady Blennerhasset has some vivid reminiscences of Victorian England as she saw it when she came to live there in 1871.

LA REVUE.

November 15.—"Comte And. . . ." plumbs unknown depths of private history in his "souvenirs" of the Archduke Franz Ferdinand and his wife. M. Finot's answer to the question: "Sommes-nous plus heureux qu'autrefois?" — some delightfully irresponsible Faguet, and letters of Champfleury are other features of the number.

December 1.—M. Léo Claretie, who is the prime mover in the Victor Hugo celebrations to be held in Guernsey this year, reviews the poet's existence in the Channel Islands, basing himself chiefly on notices in the Gazette Officielle of Guernsey. They confirm the received opinion that Victor Hugo must have been a difficult guest. Princess William Radziwill continues her somewhat scandalous notes on the personages of the Court of Berlin round about 1870. M. Nordau has an article; there are reproductions of studies by Albert Besnard; and there is an interesting illustrated article on "la forme des sons."

December 15.—Mr. Norman Angell's doctrine may be read in petto in his "lettre ouverte aux Etudiants français"; he appeals to the French as the pioneers of ideas to help him to realise his own particular ideal. M. Faguet, on an obscure Belgian philosopher, Geulincx, is almost at his best. M. Romain Rolland writes on Stendhal's connection with music and his early biographies of musicians.

LE MERCURE DE FRANCE.

November 16.—M. Champault concludes his Homeric studies with a collection of not wholly convincing puns discovered in the Odyssey, and gives reason for supposing that the whole Odyssey was an allegory. M. Marcel Coulon breathes a little life into that over-exercised figure, Arthur Rimbaud, and M. Stuart Merrill refutes aspersions on Walt Whitman's morality. Unpublished reflexions of Grétry on Diderot are given.

December 1.—M. Emile Laloy fears that French, which has already sunk from the first to the third place as a scientific language, will soon fall entirely out of the running. M. Dermée writes warmly of Laurence Sterne. There is an amusing story in M. Boyer d'Agen's account of Fernand Pelez, and there is some Lafcadio Hearn, translated by Marc Logé.

December 16.—M. H. D. Davray borrows and presents facts about Rabindranath Tagore. The Mercur plumes itself, not unreasonably, on having first introduced the great Hindu to Frenchmen. M. van Gennep analyses the effects of Islam in Algeria, and concludes that it is the enemy of civilisation. Among the "inédits" are two letters of Rimbaud (!) and the plan of a novel by Stendhal.

LA REVUE BLEUE.

November 15.—M. Lebrun, deputy, advises the equipment of Papeete, Guadeloupe, etc., for coaling and other purposes, in view of the Panama Canal. Translations of Sir Herbert Tree, on "Hamlet," and Lafcadio Hearn, by Marc Logé, are also to be found in this number.

November 22.—M. Lebrun continues. M. Dumont-Wilden is admirable on the Prince de Ligne. A lecture by M. Hanotaux is reproduced in this and the following numbers, showing how the question of the "drapeau blanc" affected the fate of France and of the Comte de Chambord. M. L. Maury on M. Bertrand's "Saint Augustin" and M. Magne on "Le Verre dans l'Antiquité" are also interesting.

November 29.—A lecture by President Woodrow Wilson, on the place of literature in modern life, runs through two numbers.

December 6.—M. Lémonon admires the resourcefulness of our present cabinet. M. Flat has a fine appreciation of Pierre Loti. A brilliant lecture by M. Boutroux, delivered to the students of Princeton University, on the relations between Science and Culture, will be found in this and the following numbers. M. Boutroux protests eloquently against scientific dogmatism, and maintains that there is a study of man as such that is outside the jurisdiction of science.

December 13.—A very sensational account is begun, by an anonymous writer, of the intrigues and military orders leading to the opening of hostilities between the Bulgarians and Servians; General Savof seems to be aimed at as the person responsible for the Bulgarian débâcle. M. Fournol asks whether diplomatic relations with the Vatican could not be resumed. Unpublished letters of Chateaubriand exhibit the writer as "un grand ministre des Affaires étrangères."

LA REVUE CRITIQUE D'HISTOIRE ET DE LITTÉRATURE.

November 15.—A very long review deals with M. Louis Reynaud's "Origines de l'Influence française en Allemagne."

November 22.—Sir G. Maspero notices among other things the publication of certain important papyrus from the Hermitage, St. Petersburg.

November 29.—Nietzsche's philological studies, recently published, are noticed by M. Théodore Reinach and M. Legras deals with many books treating of Russian history and literature.

December 6.—M. Chuquet, in a long article, disposes finally, we imagine, of M. Battifol as a serious historian. He also deals rather harshly with the "Duroc" of Commandant de La Tour.

December 13.—M. Pernot dismisses as uninteresting forgeries certain letters purported to have been found by the Bulgarians among the Greek baggage, and containing revelations of Greek atrocities.

LA SOCIÉTÉ NOUVELLE.

November.—The greater part of this number is devoted to reviews. The inaugural address of the new Rector of the Université Nouvelle is given, as well as a very interesting defence of Mathematics as a branch of culture by Professor Laisant of the same university.

Present-Day Paper and Posterity

"OF the making of many books there is no end"; if expert report speaks true, of many books made there will be an end. For this the exigencies of the modern paper market will be responsible. Much of the paper manufactured to-day, it is generally agreed, will not endure. It is compounded of materials that in due time will be resolved into their elements, and fifty or a hundred years hence some of the tomes which are now regarded as fine samples of the combined arts of papermaker, printer, and binder will be just shells, containing no more than a mass of debris. I make no pretence to understand the character of the ingredients which go to form so large a proportion of the so-called art papers of to-day. One knows that they are mineral and wood compounds, very different in character from the old-time rags. During a year I handle hundreds of new books and hundreds of old books. One takes up volume after volume a century, two centuries old, and with very rare exceptions they are almost as perfect as in the days when they were put through the more or less primitive printing press. Will it be possible for posterity, for the student in the year 2000, to say the same of the books we are turning out? I doubt it. Not long ago I was examining a work, to my mind of great historical interest, in the presence of a papermaker. He agreed it was a fine production, but he volunteered the statement that the paper would not last. "It will probably become so brittle in the course of twenty or thirty years," he said, "that any attempt to turn over the pages will end in disaster, and in time librarians will be in despair as to what should be done to preserve their treasures from hopeless and irretrievable decay." The cynic will, of course, promptly put in here: "It will be no loss to posterity if the majority of present-day books do disappear. It is appalling to think of the mass of worthless stuff now being poured into libraries which are expected to find them a permanent resting-place, lest some wretched man in the dim and distant future may not be able to complete his studies of our banalities without reference to it. Paper warranted to crumble, not in fifty years, but in fifty minutes, would be a providential dispensation, and save posterity and the librarian from much profitless toil and anxiety."

However true that may be, it is not the province of the present to judge what the future may deem to be of advantage to the student. We to-day can only arrive at what we think to be the truth as to the past by calling many witnesses to the bar. Often in the most unlikely quarters we get a clue the following up of which provides a new fact warranting a fresh trial in the Court of History, whilst testimony which from its interest, its literary quality or its method of presentment has been long accepted, may prove to have been a veritable snare. If books are to be preserved, then all should be available. It is not for us, the parties to be judged, to select the documents. It has been the object of the Legislature to give posterity an even better chance than the past has enjoyed, of getting more easily at everything which may be useful to the student. Is that object to be defeated in any single instance as the result of the mechanical devices of the papermaker whose ingenuity provides the publisher with an article which serves its purpose for the occasion only? Books good, bad and indifferent, once published, should be not for an age, but for all time. Of much that passes for literature or learning at the moment we may be ashamed. But our children and children's children must be given the opportunity of studying it if only that a proper posthumous chastisement may be administered. If books as produced will not last, it is obviously necessary that something should be done to safeguard the rights of posterity in the matter. The publisher is compelled to send a certain number of copies of every book to the British Museum and the Libraries of the Universities. The obligation becomes a farce if the books are to vanish before the encroachments of time like ice in a summer sun. Some inquiry more intimate than I am prepared to institute alone should be made, and if it be found that the present-day papers are destined to be resolved into dust then the law should be amended. It should be made obligatory on the part of the publisher to print a minimum number of copies—a dozen would be ample—for public purposes. A special paper, the durability of which was beyond question, would be used; the extra cost would be small in any case, and if the book were of particular value the extra expense might be met and more than met by the demand from private collectors for copies on the specially-made paper. Some publishers will, of course, object; they object even now to having to send out half-a-dozen copies to the public libraries; but if there is anything in the point raised, their objections need not be seriously entertained.

EDWARD SALMON.

Some New French Plays

IT is quite a risky enterprise to adapt for the stage one of Voltaire's satirical contes. MM. Régis Gignoux and Charles Méré have, however, fully succeeded in their amusing dramatisation of "L'Ingénu." The adventures of young Huron, suddenly landing in France, his simplicity, his astonished candour, which is continually provoked by the established morals and customs of the day, have been remarkably well presented at the Théâtre Michel. The secret of the success is that the adapters have retained as dialogue whole phrases, one might even say whole pages, of Voltaire's witty work; but, when forced to have recourse to their own imagination, they have certainly not lacked wit, for they rank amongst the brightest young Parisian writers.

The only criticism one might make is that the first and second acts do not contain sufficient preparation in the development of the character of the Jesuit, "Le Père Tout-à-Tous," who, as Mr. Adolphe Brisson justly remarks in Le Temps, is a sketch of Basile, prior to Beaumarchais. Those—it is true they are few—who do not know Voltaire's story, which is especially a violent satire against the Jesuits, would be rather surprised and bewildered by the sudden importance taken by the Jesuit, and by the dubiously moral plan he has elaborated, in the wings between the second and third act to assure the deliverance of the Ingénu, young Huron, imprisoned for having rather unceremoniously treated the King's Guards and of assuring for his own self the sympathy of an influential noble, M. de Saint Pouange, who holds a very high position at Court. Otherwise, "L'Ingénu" is undoubtedly the best play of the day in Paris. It is very gay, very light, agreeably salted by that essentially Parisian quality, l'esprit. Perhaps in no other work, except in his correspondence, does the genius of Voltaire appear more strikingly than in this story of a young savage suddenly brought into contact with Society. "L'Ingénu" is also remarkably well played. M. Levesque is simply extraordinary in the rôle of the Jesuit; perhaps it is on account of his astonishing creation of the Père Tout-à-Tous that we regret that we do not see more of him during the play.

Mlle. Clémence Isane is a really deliciously fresh, clever, young girl. She has made quite a striking début, and is altogether a worthy descendant of her ancestress, the great Rachel. Mlle. Germaine Reuver is the most amusingly sentimental of old maids, and MM. Guyon fils and Rouger complete an excellent cast. As for M. Harry Baur, he shows his splendid physique to the greatest advantage in his several costumes; his charming, simple laugh is contagious, and he has indicated, with his usual finesse of observation, the subtle irony underlying the astonishment of L'Ingénu, whilst making the acquaintance of the established conventions of civilisation.

The Odéon has staged "Rachel," by M. Grillet. The presentation of this work did not take place without many prohibitions and discussions. The members of Rachel's family refused to have the life of their glorious ancestress depicted on the stage, for they deemed, no doubt, that she has won sufficient claim to immortality, and that M. Grillet's aid towards assuring her a posthumous apotheosis was rather unnecessary, if well meant. And it is to be feared that many persons who have seen the work will be of this opinion!

He has striven to give in dialogue glimpses of all the different phases of Rachel's life. It is, perhaps, rather too ambitious an undertaking. We see her vagabond childhood, her début at the Théâtre Molière, her first triumph at the Comédie Française. At this point, M. Grillet has introduced a sentimental intrigue which does not add much to the interest of the remaining tableaux, and which does not affect us in the least. On the contrary, the figure of Rachel loses rather than gains in strength by the rather easy melodramatic effects drawn from her love for a young officer. However, the play has permitted us to hear a young actress who will certainly have a most interesting career, Mlle. Sephora Mossé, to whom was confided the task of personifying Rachel, when Mlle. Gilda Darthy, to whom the part had been given, definitely renounced playing it because, as she said, she was really too gloriously beautiful! Mlle. Mossé, whose beauty did not prove an impediment, has revealed in her quite satisfying imitation of Rachel an ardour, a conviction, and an enthusiasm which amply justify her successes at the Conservatoire, where she won this year two first prizes. MM. Desfontaines, Gretillat, and Hervé, and Mlles. de France, Luce Colas, and Grumbach battled heroically by the side of their young comrade during the five lengthy acts which, according to his habit, M. Antoine, director of the Odéon, has magnificently staged.

M. Georges Berr is one of the excellent "Sociétaires" of the Comédie Française; he is also a very amusing and successful dramatic author. His vaudevilles are amongst the most irresistible that are written. "Le Million," given some time ago at the Palais Royal, kept delighted audiences just bubbling with laughter during a quite fabulous number of nights. His new play, lately brought out at the Théâtre Femina, is a worthy successor of "Le Million." "Un Jeune Homme qui se tue" will thoroughly amuse all those who spend an evening at the smart little theatre on the Champs Elysées. The intrigue is simple, yet ingeniously complicated.

Vernonnet is a young barrister, also a millionaire—for a barrister, even a French one, this is quite an appreciable quality. He falls in love with Claudine Tourtier, a pretty little simpleton, just because Tourtier père refuses to consent to his marriage. It is clearly a case of "Mary, Mary, quite contrary." Vernonnet, in despair, threatens to kill himself: he will do so on the day of Claudine's marriage with somebody else. Happily, his plan is discovered by Marguerite, a charming young stenographer. She warns Claudine, who is so deeply moved and surprised that Vernonnet should have had the intention of disappearing from this world for her foolish little sake, that she consents to elope with him. And this, for a bourgeoise young French girl, is really a very serious step. Whither do they go? Why, to the presbytery of Vernonnet's godfather, the Abbé Oulin, curé of the village of Montsoreau, on the banks of the Loire. The worthy ecclesiastic is a little shocked by the unexpected arrival; however, Claudine is of so delicious a simplicity that she conquers him. And in order that French parents may safely take their daughters to the Théâtre Femina during the holidays, Vernonnet and the Abbé discreetly pass the night at the village inn, whilst Claudine stays at the presbytery with the Abbé's sister.

The third act shows us the arrival of the horrified Tourtier family, piled in the motor-car obligingly lent them by Claudine's discarded fiancé. The dear old Abbé pleads the cause of Vernonnet and Claudine. He does this so well that the Tourtiers, père et mère, consent at length to the marriage. The play would seem to end here appropriately. Not at all: by one of those sudden turns so characteristic of M. Berr's imagination, as soon as there is no more opposition to his union with Claudine, Vernonnet discovers that the young girl is possessed of quite a horrid character, whilst she, in turn, cannot restrain herself from squabbling perpetually with him. In order to bring an end to so uncomfortable a state of things, there is Marguerite, whom no one has forgotten. After a succession of amusing episodes, Vernonnet discovers the merits of the sympathetic, pretty, dainty, witty, young stenographer. He marries her, whilst Claudine will live happily for ever after with her patient, neglected fiancé. The last acts are perhaps not quite so good as the first two. One might also reproach "Un Jeune Homme qui se tue" with being of a rather rose-water morality. But sometimes this is not disagreeable. Nevertheless, it is very amusing, quite extraordinarily so; it is also sometimes really touching, and very ably presented. What can one ask more of a vaudeville?

Another piquant feature is that it is acted nearly exclusively by music-hall artists. The Abbé Oulin is represented by Polin, the celebrated piou-piou chansonnier, who dressed as a little French soldier sang those military songs which were the joy of the Paris café concerts. Polin, "our national" Polin as he is termed, has proved himself a discreet and subtle comedian. Claudius, another music-hall recruit, in the rôle of a provincial parent, who plays a considerable, though accessory, part throughout the play, has made a very picturesque creation. He possesses astonishing hilarious qualities. Mlle. Jane Danjou is a very pretty, arch, ingénue, a charming spoilt child, and a really seductive young person. Madame Bertiny, whose pseudonym simply disguises the author's wife, plays with infinite tact and emotion the sentimental Marguerite. She is, as always, elegant, simple and natural. And as for the barrister Vernonnet, he is funnily represented by M. Alerme, a very comic comedian.

Amongst other Parisian plays, let us note at the Apollo a new opérette by M. Louis Ganne, "Cocorico," in which Brigitte Régent trills and smiles with her usual irritating monotony. "Mon Bébé" at the Bouffes Parisiens, a French version of "Baby Mine," gives us the rare opportunity, till now withheld from the majority of mortals, of beholding the charming Monna Delza in an exquisite nightgown, which might just as well be worn for a tea gown! At the Variétés, "L'Institut de Beauté," by M. Alfred Capus, shows us one of those beauty specialist establishments; it is to be hoped that amongst the precious phials for sale at the "Institut de Beauté" M. Capus may find one containing a Wit-Restorer! At the Porte St. Martin, the ineffable M. d'Annunzio gives us a female Hamlet, who in lyrical accents emits fine-sounding words, and incomprehensible ideas, and who finally stabs the man who killed her father. And it is very amusing indeed—for half an hour.

MARC LOGE.

Education and Music

THE relation of music to the general scheme of life, and consequently its position in a general scheme of education, is a subject that has been growing in prominence, if not in importance, with remarkable rapidity. Musicians have pushed forward their claims and are doing so now more and more. It is not surprising, therefore, though it is impressive of the seriousness of their intentions, that the subject should be the principal one for discussion at the annual conference of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, and should also form the basis of another complete conference promoted by four leading societies of music-teachers and students. These conferences were held in London during two successive weeks, beginning on December 29 and concluding on January 9.

Both organisations obtained the assistance of Mr. Frank Roscoe, the secretary of the Teachers' Registration Council, a significant fact when it is seen that it was as a general educationist that he spoke. His subjects were: "The Place of Music in a National System of Education" and "The Training of Teachers." In each of his papers the subject of registration came in only as incidental to the broader issues of the application of ground principles. Undoubtedly the most important points in these papers, and in the discussion which they elicited, were those of the need of employing special teachers for such a subject as music, and of securing proper training for them in the art of teaching. Apart from these technical questions, he drew attention to the remarkable fact that, while more is heard of music and musicians, as such, in public life, the art actually takes a smaller place in the life of the educated classes than ever before. In England, music as part of a liberal education reached its zenith in the time of Queen Elizabeth, when every gentleman was expected to be able to take a part with voice or instrument, or both, in the musical performances which formed one of the chief features of all social gatherings. That it has declined during the last two decades was evident from remarks made on all sides throughout both conferences. Particularly was attention drawn to it in a discussion at the second on "The Decline in the Learning of Stringed Instruments," with the constructive alternative of "Ensemble Classes and How to Encourage Them."

In this discussion teachers of all grades and kinds, headed by Professor Percy Buck, of Harrow, and amateurs headed by Mr. W. W. Cobbett, told direful tales of the diminution of classes and the loss of interest in the study of the violin and its kindred instruments. One redeeming feature of this was that many were studying the pianoforte instead, but there was much complaint of the encroachment of sports, of cards, of dancing, and other amusements, on the time that might well be devoted to art.

Mr. Roscoe was one of the very small number who touched upon the widespread influence and importance of the education given in the elementary schools. Nearly all the others dealt with their subjects entirely from their personal standpoint as teachers in secondary or higher public schools. It is in these, in fact, that the chief difficulties of music as a study, or as a stimulant in the study of other matters, exist. In the elementary schools, music up to a certain point is compulsory. If this is to be of any real service it should extend to the higher-grade schools which many children attend after leaving. There is room, however, in the elementary schools for a better supply of highly-qualified teachers of music. In this respect the other schools usually are better off. As a partial remedy, Mr. Roscoe suggested the grouping of smaller schools for the employment of a specialist, who should supervise the teaching of his own subject.

On the many side-issues much was said in other papers and discussions, some of it of an unnecessarily detailed character, but nearly all eminently practical in its application. From so experienced and successful a teacher as Mr. Stewart Macpherson, of the Royal Academy of Music, advice on "Problems Confronting the Music-Teacher of To-day" was very welcome. The problems with which he dealt were mainly those of a psychological nature, and of the character caused by the artistic temperament of musicians which prevents them from troubling about matters of method and psychology. Mr. Macpherson's insistence on the fact that teaching is in itself an art, an activity of the highest importance which has results of inestimable value in their potentialities, was timely. Though the question of teaching is not left so much now as formerly to the time when actual experience has to be acquired by professional practice, it receives far too little attention from the great colleges and from those who direct the studies of young professional musicians. The need of a sense of responsibility between teacher and pupil, to which he also referred, is closely allied to this, for with a growth of this sense the need of an adequate preparation will inevitably appear.

The problem which is at the root of everything else is the reason why the pupil desires or is desired to learn music. It is a problem which touches not only the teacher, but all concerned in the life of the child. If the reason is the acquisition of a mere "accomplishment," all this discussion, all this exercise of energy in the direction of improved methods of teaching and of the encouragement of pupils, is wasted. If it is the fuller development of all the emotional and mental powers, then it is only a beginning of what will have to be done in the future. Speaker after speaker insisted upon this point. The inability to play an instrument, the inability to learn how to do so, or even how to sing, does not imply a lack of susceptibility to musical sounds. If it did, then most of the music-teaching, even most performances of music of to-day, would be worse than useless. The art of teaching music is that of creating intelligent listeners, because it is by the intelligent hearing of music that the art can have its widest, if not its fullest, emotional effect. This is gradually becoming realised, and heads of schools are, many of them, meeting the music-teacher half-way. The unanimity of the speakers at both conferences as to the impossibility of teaching, in the older sense of the word, was striking. All agreed that the only thing that can be done, even with the youngest child, is to help the pupil to learn.

The attitude which teachers should adopt towards modern music was a subject on which Mr. Alfred Kalisch gave a most thoughtful paper. He did not dogmatise, or even make any direct suggestions on the subject, but pointed to the fact that modern music is the result of modern feeling, amidst which the child is brought up. In some cases, therefore, though not in all, it might well form the starting-point of the study. The difficulties of modern technique and the danger of approaching too near advanced idioms which may never become established, were referred to in the discussion, but the main principle was generally agreed to.

Other subjects, mainly of technical interest, were dealt with by authorities from various parts of the kingdom. There was also much social intercourse and music-making. The latter included a number of new works, most of which were interesting but none of any commanding genius.

H. A.

The National Liberal Kölnische Zeitung for December 19 publishes a warm appreciation of Sir Ernest Cassel and his untiring efforts in the work of furthering a better understanding between his adopted country and the land of his birth. The Kölnische Zeitung takes occasion to refer to his generous gift of £100,000 for necessitous English subjects residing in Germany, which fund is under the patronage of the German Empress, and to the same gift granted to him for necessitous Germans residing in this country, for which the King and Queen have consented to be patrons.

The Theatre

"Mary-Girl" at the Vaudeville Theatre

THE new four-act comedy by Mrs. Hope Merrick conforms to all the conventions of play-writing which have been encouraged during the last ten years. It appears made to suit the actors and what is supposed to be the public taste rather than intended to show the natural dramatic development of character.

The plot is elaborate. The caprice of a countess suggests that she shall follow, as exactly as possible, the arrangements made by a foreign Court and hire a foster-mother for her newly born heir, upon terms which prevent the nurse from seeing her own husband and child for at least a year.

Ezra Sheppard is a market gardener, and his wife Mary is young and fair. She is selected to fill the post and receive a large salary. Her husband does not like the idea, but he happens, for the purposes of the play, to be one of those rugged, religious, narrow-minded persons who are determined at all costs to themselves and to those nearest to them to serve what he believes to be the call of his particular creed. In this case his passion is to build "a strong little 'ome for the faithful, seemly in the eye of God." With this end in view he allows the Countess of Folkington to buy his wife, with the result that Mary goes to the castle and is admired and made much of for a long while, and returns to her husband displeased with her old home, with hard work, and especially with the attitude of her once-loved husband. Many small circumstances and bitter tongues eventually bring their disagreements to a point at which Ezra strikes his wife and she leaves him. The life at the castle has utterly changed her point of view. Once in the world of London, she almost starves and comes to shame. Six months pass, and she returns a broken woman to tell her husband of her miserable life. He is awakened from his dream of self-righteousness at last, and rather unconvincingly burns down his chapel, and by this strange act makes peace with his conscience and forgives his wife, and, we presume, enters upon such happiness as is the lot of man.

In the telling of the story we are introduced to a number of fairly well-drawn if not highly interesting characters. Mr. O. B. Clarence plays the good-natured and unimportant Earl of Folkington firmly and with considerable reserve. Miss Dorothy Fane is a sufficiently disagreeable and worldly countess, whose cousin George, to whom she makes love, is made as real as the author will permit by Mr. Charles Kenyon. Various servants are admirably acted, especially an under-nurse by Miss Mary Clare, but they do not hold us very strongly. Among the village people, Miss Mary Brough gives a perfect picture of an elderly gossip who helps forward the action of the play at various points, but it is Ezra and his Mary-girl in whose fortunes we are invited to be chiefly interested. As Ezra, Mr. McKinnel plays with something more than his usual force and elaborate and considered effect. He is slow, profound, and melancholy—gloomy in manner to the verge of tedium. He possesses his fixed rules of art, and he spares himself nothing in the realisation of his dramatic ideals. Whether such a performance interests the public at large, we do not know, but it is possible that a more varied method would prove, at least, no less engaging. As Mary-girl, Miss May Blayney has a long and difficult part, but she, too, works with admirable skill, and is often both highly effective and touching. At the end of the third act, when she at last turns upon her husband and exposes his unpleasing character to his astonished mind, she rises to a height of power which she has not previously displayed. As a whole, the four acts are not taken quickly enough—a trifling fault which will doubtless be improved away after the anxieties of the first production have passed. Artificiality is the bane of Mrs. Hope Merrick's play; we trust the forcefulness of the acting may prove to be its antidote.

Before "Mary-Girl" Mr. Frederic Norton gives an amusing performance. He is very original and charming in his method and is, in fact, one of those rare birds in the theatrical world—an entertainer who actually entertains. His satire on some kinds of people who recite and a certain form of Italian opera are gay and delightful. We could wish that the long play which follows possessed a little more of such agreeable qualities.

The Pioneer Players in "Paphnutius" at the Savoy Theatre

WHEN Hroswitha, a nun of the Order of St. Benedict, wrote her comedy of the conversion of Thais more than ten centuries ago she doubtless knew, as most artists do, that she was working for all time. And yet one would have to be blessed with a profound understanding of eternity or a conviction of the littleness of time to realise that a play based upon the story of the Conversion of Thais of Alexandria, as told by Rufinus, would be welcomed by a twentieth century audience at the Savoy Theatre to-day. Such, however, seemed the perfectly natural result of the labours of Miss Christopher St. John in translating the Latin play written so long ago with so admirable a motive by the famous nun Hroswitha. Such, too, was the result of the work of the devoted band of "Pioneer Players" under the accomplished guidance of Miss Edith Craig, who as producer and interlocutor respectively, set forth the series of 13 scenes with utmost simplicity and perfect dramatic effect. For, notwithstanding the distance of time between the writing of the original work and the careful translation and production in London, we feel the essence of immortality within the confines of the play.

The passionate enthusiasm for purity felt by Paphnutius when he sought to reclaim Thais from her life of luxury and lovers still burns, if far less brightly, in our later century. Deeply hidden beneath our materialism, still lie the mystic aspirations of this Abbot of a desert monastery; even now, submerged by the magnificence of their harlotry, our modern examples of the type which Thais represents, feel the desire and longing of the spirit of eternity.

It is not too much to say, as Miss St. John does, that many plays written recently are, in the elemental sense, far more old-fashioned than such a curious example of tenth century work as "Paphnutius."

As the audience are at once in sympathy with the hero and with Thais and with the Abbess and the motif of the play, all that remains is for the actors to convince us. No easy undertaking in any time or place, but no more difficult in Miss St. John's translation than in any other play.

Miss Craig's setting of the scenes is beyond praise. Although we are at the Savoy Theatre of many memories we are mentally transferred in a moment to the dusty desert that lies beyond Alexandria or to the rich rooms of Thais within the city, to the monastery or, indeed, to any scene which the play requires. A few admirable groups of decorative figures, some wide and rich or homely curtains, a few trifling suggestions of furniture and the very place is before us. The effect appears easy enough, but it is in reality the result of infinite skill on the part of Miss Craig and the actors.

Miss Miriam Lewes, as the heroine Thais, is first shown to us in her rich home at Alexandria surrounded by slaves and flowers, jewels and the love of many men. Here her slaves dance for her secret delight. This interlude arranged by Mrs. Lowther may not be strictly in accord with the stage directions of Hroswitha, but it is in the spirit of the period and place of which that dramatist wrote, and the scheme is carried out with charming elegance and, even more dramatically important, it enables us to see something of the character of Thais as she watches the movements of her favourites. This strongly marked Pagan element is broken down when Paphnutius appears before her as a lover and makes himself known to her as a man of God. Hroswitha has chosen to make the conversion miraculously rapid. Soon Miss Lewes, who has given a fully realised picture of the inconstant lover, is transformed into a quiet penitent who follows the Abbot across the desert to the monastery, where beneath the rule of the Abbess she is to work out her redemption. The idea is beautifully suggested by the actress, who displays a depth of feeling and tenderness such as few characters could enable her to show.

Mr. Harcourt Williams does not appear to us to be in appearance quite the handsome, young, ascetic Abbot of the text, but his voice and acting make full amends, and as Paphnutius throughout each scene until the death of the redeemed Thais, when he kisses her "pure hands," "pure lips," "pure eyes," he is earnest and convincing. As the Abbess, Miss Ellen Terry inspired the drama with grace and purity and tenderness and added, with her group of devout nuns, a picturesque and sombre note to many of the beautiful stage pictures. Mr. Hereward Knight, who as a young monk, Paul, has a vision of Thais in heaven, was one of the many minor characters played with excellent effect.

We hope that we may see "Paphnutius" again, but in any case, all students of the drama owe their warm gratitude to Miss St. John and the Pioneer Players for allowing them to see this inspiring tenth century work under such highly effective conditions.

EGAN MEW.

More Magazines

WE have received the November special issue of the Triad from Wellington, New Zealand—an exceptionally interesting number of a paper which has accomplished a great deal, during the twenty-one years of its existence, in the way of educating its readers in musical and literary matters. Apart from sundry items of purely local value, there are several excellent articles by capable writers. Mr. Frank Morton, whose prose is better than his verse, is very amusing on the subject of the young ladies of Sydney, and there is much quiet, acute criticism in his remarks. "The Lure of Melodrama," by D. H., is a plea for an art which appeals to the crowd, and which superior people are too apt to despise. The editorial notes are smart and lively, and fearless in their criticism; one paragraph especially, based on a speech of "Wellington's new humorist," nails to the counter what really must be "the silliest bit of twaddling futility that was ever spoken at a public gathering." With this issue come a musical supplement and an art supplement, the latter especially fine, with capital reproductions of many famous pictures.

The Atlantic Monthly for December has an excellent study by Mr. H. Fielding-Hall, entitled "England and Ireland," indecisive, but full of insight on this difficult question. "Some Allies of Love," by R. C. Cabot, is an essay well worth reading; "In Belshazzar Court" is a description of life in a large "apartment-house," by S. Strunsky, which we found fascinating and very sure in its human touches; and the stories in this number are good.

In the Cornhill for January we have some more early work of Robert Browning, hitherto unpublished. Sir Henry Lucy gives some interesting reminiscences; Judge Parry exhibits a fund of humour over "The Law of the Lost Golf Ball"; Bishop Welldon writes on "Miss Gaskell," and C. A. Vince waxes sometimes witty and sometimes tedious over an elaboration of the story of Jack and Jill hardly worthy of the dignity of the Cornhill.

The editor of the Poetry Review discusses the compatibility of "Poetry and the English Climate" in a short introductory article; Mr. G. A. Dunlop writes "The Story of a Sonnet," and Mr. J. Wall compares "A. E." and James Stephens. The poetical contributions are good, especially "Caldera," by Katharine Tynan. In the Irish Review there are three excellent stories, some renderings from Gaelic literature by P. H. Pearse, and several other interesting items. The Antiquary has an article by J. Reid Moir on "The Piltown Skull," with a new theory as to the age of that worried relic; an interesting description (illustrated) of a recently discovered Anglo-Saxon cemetery in Yorkshire and its treasures; and many other articles of interest to students. The best thing in United Empire for December is a lively account of a voyage to Australia in a sailing-ship in 1852, by S. Cookson, when for a whole month the vessel made only three miles' progress, becalmed, and news while at sea was unknown. Sir R. B. Dewar writes on "Hunting in British East Africa," and the series "Master Builders of Greater Britain" treats of Lord Sydenham (1799-1841). The first number of a new French monthly, Revue Sud-Américaine, with headquarters at Paris, is very attractive. Mr. Cunninghame Graham writes on "Le Tango Argentin"—a very different thing from the solemn affair we know; the editor, M. Leopold Lugones, has an article on "Le Panaméricanisme," and many important matters of wider interest than the title of the review are treated by English and French writers.

Discoveries at the Royal Albert Docks

BY WALTER JOHNSON, F.G.S.

DISCOVERIES of a highly interesting kind were recently revealed to a party of about eighty members of the London Geologists' Association, who had journeyed down to North Woolwich to inspect the temporary sections exposed in the extension of the Royal Albert Docks. There, in a huge trench, above a third of a mile long, the visitors could see, in concrete form, the later history of the Thames below the bridges—a spectacle the like of which has not been witnessed for more than a generation.

The new dock is being excavated in a low alluvial flat, most of which is covered with goosefoot, knot-grass, burdock and other weeds of the waste, but here and there the eye may detect an interesting casual, such as the North American thorn-apple (Datura Stramonium). On this plain, only five feet above the Ordnance datum line, one saw huge land dredgers, of German construction, each capable of scooping out 2,500 cubic yards of solid material daily. The dredgers stand, not on the floor of the excavation, but on the brink of the dock, and are continually hauling their spoil up the sloping sides, and depositing it in wagons standing at the top. Working up and down the entire length of the dock from east to west, they are slowly widening the huge trench. The dock at present reaches a depth of 20 to 25 feet, but will eventually be more than twice that depth. When completed, it will be deep enough to allow of a head of water of 62 feet at the gates.

But it was not the mechanical aspect of the work which attracted attention. At a glance it was obvious that the exposed strata varied in character and age. Reading from top to bottom, the following layers were traceable: "made earth," alluvium, peat, sandy clay, and gravel or "ballast." The floor of the cutting exhibited the uppermost part of this gravel only, but the layer is known to extend downwards for many feet. Underlying all, either with or without the interposition of the Thanet Sands, is the Chalk, which will be reached, in certain places, at a depth of only 30 to 40 feet from the surface.

At the outset, it should be noted that, geologically speaking, the lowest of the beds now visible is but a thing of yesterday. Yet the story of the deposits may be read as in a book. Neglecting the made soil, with its pots and pans and its mounds of earth thrown out of the older dock, we have first the alluvium, a dull brown or greenish clay, very stiff, and now cracked in all directions through shrinkage. Dispersed through the alluvium are land and fresh-water shells of modern types. Here, an old farthing or an ancient potsherd is turned up; there, a skull of the Celtic shorthorn ox, or a portion of a mediæval cooking-jar. Some of these relics are preserved in a small museum in the engineer's office, where, owing to the courtesy that was uniformly manifested by the dock representatives, the visitors were allowed to inspect them.

At the base of the alluvium, and just before entering a thick bed of black peat, is a "floor," recognised by its remains as belonging to the Romano-British Age. This floor abounds in oyster-shells, and the presence of hearths of clay and flint seems to suggest that the molluscs were not eaten raw. But the remarkable feature of the peat was the enormous quantity of trunks and branches of trees which had been carried down by the ancient river, and which, becoming waterlogged, had been buried in the peat. Evidently an old land surface, well stocked with small timber, lay at no great distance. Birch, hazel, elder, and fir were most common, but several trunks of yew were found. These derelicts give trouble to the dredger, but they are constantly being wrenched out by the workmen, and now lie scattered on the surface of the gravel floor at the bottom of the trench. Trees of similar species are found in the overlying alluvium, where they are greatly macerated, and they extend into the sandy loam below. Mr. George Barrow, F.G.S., of the Geological Survey, who, conjointly with Mr. A. Binns, the resident engineer, explained the sections, stated that the trees are never found in their natural position. They may occur vertically, but they are never rooted in the gravel below. The spectacle of this "moorlog," recalling the first stages of coal-formation, was very impressive. The whole arrangement suggested one of the old Carboniferous log swamps which in part, at least, originated our coalfields. The analogy is increased by the fact that, here and there, small flood-streams have entered the swamp, and, having carved out their own channels in the peat, have afterwards, owing to subsidence, filled up those very channels with fine silt. The appearance of this clayey wedge, when viewed in section, is comparable to what the miner calls a "dead fault." The most noticeable of these silted-up hollows represents Old Ham Creek, now covered by dwellings, except where it enters the dock. The section across the creek displays a soft, unctuous, soapy clay, in which may still be seen a network of reeds and rushes, remaining in their natural upright position. Similarly, in the peat above, the reeds are observed piercing the spongy vegetation, just as they did when they flourished in the Bronze Age, to which this stratum probably belongs.

Towards the base of the peat two members of the party discovered flint flakes and "pot-boilers," or cooking-stones of flint. This horizon, therefore, seems to represent the late Neolithic Age. Below the peat is the sandy layer already referred to, and still lower is the "ballast." This last consists of flint-gravel in a matrix of sand, and is probably of Neolithic Age; but there is room for discussion on this point.

To pick up a sheep's rib out of the alluvium, or a hazel-nut or a flint chip out of the peat, or to walk over surfaces once trodden by Roman legions and Stone Age man, has a fascination of its own. The learned guides were able to show that the whole series of deposits, from the gravel below to the alluvial mud above, indicated a slackening current, caused by subsidence of the land, which rendered the river unable to carry its load farther. At times, as when the silt-bed was laid down, the whole lowland was covered with inundation waters; later, the site was merely a stagnant marsh. As already mentioned, the geologist calls these features recent, though they really take us back a few thousand years. But the period represented by such a slight depth serves to emphasise the almost illimitable centuries which stretch behind these deposits.

For the gravels of Westminster and Battersea are older than those of the dock; those of St. Pancras and Stoke Newington are still earlier, while the Clapham Common pebbles have a yet longer ancestry. To recall our comparison: if the dock ballast belongs to yesterday, the Clapham gravels were laid down about a month ago.

The January number of the Quarterly Review, as usual, contains a well-balanced variety of articles of present interest. "The Irish Question—Compromise or Civil War?" is naturally the most urgent of all, and has as a companion "The Evolution of the Ulsterman." Mr. Richard Jebb contributes a valuable study of the Imperial Naturalisation Bill; there is an article on "The Future of Rhodesia"; and Mr. Algernon Cecil has something pertinent and luminous to say on "Patriotism." The Dean of St. Paul's contributes a paper on the great apostle to whom his cathedral is dedicated. Among the literary essays are "The Plays of Beaumont and Fletcher," "Mysticism," "The Contemporary German Drama," and one on Samuel Butler, by Mr. Desmond McCarthy.

ROYAL ALBION HOTEL, BRIGHTON.

THE NEWEST HOTEL.

Closer to the Sea than any other Hotel
at Brighton.

Magnificent Dining Room and Lounge with beautiful Sea Views.

The Academy and Literature says:—"We have tried all the hotels in Brighton and none can compare with the Royal Albion for beauty of position, comfort, and personal attention to visitors' wishes."

For Illustrated Brochure and
Tariff, apply to
THE MANAGER.

Telephones :
903 Post Office (2 lines).

Telegrams :
"Brilliancy, Brighton."

THE KARSINO and NEW ISLAND HOTEL HAMPTON COURT.

Proprietary: Mr. FRED KARNO.

Tel.: MOLESEY 1.

The only Residential River Hotel open
all the Year round.

THE RIVIERA OF LONDON
THE FAVOURITE RESORT OF LONDON SOCIETY.
LUXURIOUS PALM COURT.
DANCES & ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

For Illustrated Brochure & Tariff, apply Manager.

Notes and News

Mr. Heinemann is beginning the publishing season of 1914 with Messrs. Bland and Backhouse's important book on the Manchu Dynasty, entitled "Annals and Memoirs of the Court of Pekin." The success of the authors' well-known book, "China under the Empress Dowager," will be in itself a recommendation to readers of this new work, which also in its turn is compiled from material that has not been within the reach of other writers. The book appears this week.

Mr. Fred Burlingham, who the other day climbed down into Vesuvius, and at a depth of 1,200 ft. stayed for twenty minutes to take a series of moving pictures, is now back in London passing his new book, "How to Become an Alpinist," for press, and it will be published this month by Mr. T. Werner Laurie, at 6s. net. A special feature of the volume is 64 beautiful and original illustrations giving many thrilling pictures of Swiss life.

The Fortnightly Review for January has a delightful article by Mr. Walter Sichel on "William Hazlitt—Romantic and Amorist," full of humour and delicate appreciation of the troublesome temperament of the essayist of Winterslow. Mr. W. Barnes Steveni writes on "The Ravages of the Black Death in the Fourteenth Century"—a startling account of the terrible plague epidemic in Russia and Siberia, and the more recent outbreaks in the East, vividly presented and containing much material for thought. Politics and national affairs are thoroughly dealt with in this issue, and there is a very amusing contribution entitled "The Romance of the Scarlet Woman."

An exceedingly strong cast has been engaged for Sir Herbert Tree's revival of "The Darling of the Gods," due at His Majesty's Theatre this evening. The leading parts will be played by Sir Herbert Tree, who appears as Zakkuri, and Miss Marie Lohr, who appears in the part originally played in England by Miss Lena Ashwell. They will be supported by George Relph as Prince Kara (Mr. Basil Gill's performance in this part will be remembered), Mr. Philip Merivale as the dumb slave Inu, Miss Lucy Wilson as Rosy Sky (originally played by Miss Maud Hildyard), Mr. A. E. George as Kato, a fisher of carp, Mr. Henry Vibart as the Prince of Tosan, Mr. Percy Goodyer as Tanda-Tanji, and many others.

The Polish Bureau informs us that considerable indignation has been aroused among the Poles by the news, on what is claimed as unimpeachable authority, that the British Consul at Lemberg (Lwow), Austrian Poland, has maintained secret relations with the Ost-markeverein, an extreme German society whose sole object is avowedly the extermination of the Poles. The Consul in question, Professor Zaloziecki, is a Ruthenian and has openly taken sides in the domestic disputes between the Ruthenians and the Poles. The Ost-markeverein has long been established to foster anti-Polish feelings, and latterly sought to obtain the co-operation of the Ruthenians, by promises of financial and other assistance, in the crusade against the Poles and Polish nationality.

A course of five public lectures by Mr. V. de Braganca Cunha, on "Portuguese Literature," will begin on Wednesday next, at 2 p.m., at University College, London. The first lecture of a continued course of public lectures (Barlow) on "The Inferno," by Mr. Edmund G. Gardner, will begin on the same day at 3 p.m. Two public lectures will be given by Dr. E. W. Scripture—one on "The Use of Phonetics in Curing Speech Defects," on Friday next, at 6 p.m., and the other on "Instrumental Phonetics in its Various Applications," on Friday, January 30, at 6 p.m. A course on "Elementary Statistical Methods for Teachers," by Dr. D. Heron, will begin on Friday next, at 6 p.m., and a course of six public lectures on "Parliament under the Tudors," by Professor Pollard, will begin on Thursday, January 29, at 5.15 p.m. Other courses are in progress.

The Department of Architecture and Sculpture of the Victoria and Albert Museum has recently acquired an important example of English Romanesque art—a Tau or head of a cross-staff, in morse (walrus) ivory, probably dating from the early twelfth century. It is carved on one side with the Agnus Dei between angels, and on the other with a seraph between dragons; the curved ends have been broken away. This most interesting relic was dug up in Water Lane, in the City, about twenty years ago, and has since been in private possession. The only other ivory Tau that can definitely be claimed as English was presented to the British Museum in 1903. Two interesting additions to the collection of German sculpture have been made from the funds of the Murray Bequest; both of them were formerly exhibited on loan from the late Mr. J. H. Fitzhenry. One is a marble statuette of a prophet, late fourteenth century, probably belonging to a series of similar figures made for the high altar of Cologne Cathedral, some of which have been dispersed; the other is a fine figure of St. George in limewood, South German work of the late fifteenth century. These are temporarily exhibited on the staircase outside Room 62. Two large seated figures in painted stone, apparently carved at Verona in the late fourteenth century, were purchased for the Museum at the recent Fitzhenry sale by a small body of subscribers, and are now permanently placed in the East Hall.

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

BY LANCELOT LAWTON

A REPLY TO M. CLEMENCEAU

LAST week we described some of the evil results likely to attend the utterances of a Cabinet Minister when these have no Cabinet sanction. We left out of our exhaustive catalogue, however, the case which has been exemplified by M. Clemenceau of a counter-outburst, equally indiscreet, on the part of a foreign statesman. M. Clemenceau, though not in office, is, nevertheless, a vital force in modern France. What he has to say, therefore, is looked upon as representative of a large section of opinion in the Republic. He is of the belief that Great Britain no longer plays the imposing diplomatic rôle that she did in former days, that the Triple Entente has been consistently "bluffed" by the Triple Alliance, and that altogether, compared with her rival neighbours, Germany is to-day in a remarkably strong position. This exhibition of pessimism, as we have already hinted, is by way of a rejoinder to Mr. Lloyd George's ill-starred suggestion that the time is ripe for a reduction in England's naval armaments. In so far as M. Clemenceau disagrees with the drastic deductions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer we are at one with him. But to a cool mind it does appear that the rebutting evidence which he produces is altogether exaggerated, and, on the surface, needlessly so; for the case against Mr. Lloyd George is black enough without the counter of distorted fact. As the French statesman with admirable candour has thrown down the gauntlet of controversy, he will not complain if his objections are met in a similar spirit. Rather than murmur at his attitude towards ourselves, a friendly nation, we are in a sense inclined to offer him congratulation in that, free from office, he has boldly ignored the polite traditions of diplomacy.

It is just as well that we should get occasionally a direct insight into the workings of vigorous intellects abroad. In this comment, admittedly somewhat discursive in character, we do not wish to appear inconsistent, and the negative satisfaction we gain from the sequel certainly cannot go to the credit of Mr. Lloyd George, whose notorious remarks must be looked upon, as before, as provocative if not impertinent. On the other hand, M. Clemenceau's retort was indiscreet, but for the reason that he did not occupy Ministerial position less indiscreet than the comments of the English Minister. The interest in his statements lies in the information which they vouchsafe. It would seem that a section of influential opinion in France considers that Great Britain inadequately supports her partners in the Triple Entente, and that altogether this instrument has proved a failure. M. Clemenceau's article to which we allude is a misconception from beginning to end, and doubtless, like Mr. Lloyd George, his English counterpart, he is animated by underlying motive rather than a desire to expound logic for the sheer love of the thing. It may be that, like Mr. Lloyd George, too, his wares are intended for home consumption, not for export, or that he wishes to goad England into expanding her Navy to his country's advantage. Whichever view may be correct, the impression remains that he embarked upon his task in somewhat hysterical mood.

As might have been expected, the conflict between prominent representatives of the Celtic and Gallic temperaments is not without its piquancy. Thus M. Clemenceau in scornful terms refers to the "Welsh demagogue," and promptly proceeds himself to run riot with the fiery torch. Both antagonists, M. Clemenceau, the advocate of militarism, and Mr. Lloyd George, the friend of peace, succeed in totally avoiding each other's case by employing arguments that have no basis in any known fact. Last week we dealt at length with the Chancellor's remarks. As far as M. Clemenceau is concerned, he is wrong in his references not only to the remote past but also to the recent past, and in regard to events that were taking place he has been entirely disproved by all that has happened since. Let us first speak of what we have termed the remote past. Looking backwards, the French statesman declares that Great Britain's diplomacy has declined. Apparently he has forgotten the peril that attended her policy of splendid isolation during the latter days of the Victorian era. Surely he is not prepared to continue his way of thinking until driven to the obvious deduction that association with his own country has resulted in damage to our prestige. Nor, in reviewing the recent period, do we find that in international affairs the diplomacy of Great Britain has cut such a sorry figure as our critic would have the world suppose. It was the diplomacy of England that arrested the Russian advance in Manchuria, that helped the French to win Morocco, and that in a large measure maintained European peace throughout the protracted struggle in the Balkans.

Referring to this last episode M. Clemenceau is severely critical. At the "Decorative Conference" in London, he avers, the Triple Entente yielded all along the line to the Triple Alliance. Exactly what he means by a generalisation of this kind it is difficult to fathom. Apparently he has in mind the constitution of Albania as a new State. As against this concession he should not fail to recall that Servia gained what Austria had first declared she would never acquiesce in, an outlet to the Adriatic; that Austria cautiously refrained from re-occupation of the Sanjah and remained inactive while her path to Salonika was barred, and that Germany was compelled to suffer the extreme discomfiture of seeing her friend and protégé, Turkey, nearly driven out of Europe. All these tremendous changes were brought about in the first place because the diplomacy of the Triple Entente was supported by an imposing background of military force, and in the second because the diplomacy of Great Britain, in the wise keeping of Sir Edward Grey, made full use of our disinterested position to minimise friction. Then, M. Clemenceau, reviewing also the situation at the time he wrote, finds as ever nothing but the defeat and dismay of the Triple Entente. He regards Germany's military ascendancy at Constantinople as tantamount to her possession of the keys of the Dardanelles, and, speaking of the problem of the Ægean Isles, he employs the same pessimistic strain. In the meantime, however, as a consequence of the protests of the Triple Entente, Turkey has consented to an appreciable modification of German military influence, while the Powers have gone a long way towards accepting Sir Edward Grey's proposals as to the future of the Ægean Isles.

Furthermore, the Triple Entente is entering vigorous protests against the manifestations of Austrian and Italian intrigue in Albania. M. Clemenceau, dismal to the end, finally predicts an early renewal of hostilities in the Near East, basing his opinion upon the acquisition by Turkey of a Dreadnought now under construction in England to the order of a South American Republic. But ominous though this incident may appear, the astute diplomatists of Greece doubtless have not forgotten that which the French statesman seems to have overlooked. They will see to it that the question of the Ægean Isles is disposed of before the completion of a battleship likely to interfere seriously with the balance of power in Near Eastern waters. To checkmate the Turkish move they have always the choice of declaration of war, in which event the laws of neutrality would compel the British Government to intern the Turkish battleship; and the knowledge that this policy might in certain circumstances be adopted by them will assuredly act as a deterrent to Turkish Chauvinism.

In one more important respect M. Clemenceau is ill-favoured by the current of events. His tirade comes at a moment when M. Caillaux, the Minister of Finance in France, like Mr. Lloyd George, the Chancellor of the Exchequer in England, is advocating a reduction in naval armaments. While fully appreciating his patriotism, the many coincident circumstances attending M. Clemenceau's statement enable us to detect the real motive of his mission. However much Great Britain may be desirous of demonstrating her unwavering loyalty to the Entente Cordiale, she must take heed lest the implacable hostility which French statesmen of the school of M. Clemenceau exhibit towards the Germans should lure her into an adventurous policy.

MOTORING

IN a recent issue of The Motor there appeared an article strongly advocating the adoption of the bulk system of delivering and storing motor spirit, in place of the present two-gallon tin method, which is admittedly wasteful and dangerous, and is in addition very much more costly than is generally supposed. As usual, our technical contemporary has hit upon a topic of great interest to motorists generally, and has seized an opportune time for its discussion. There is no doubt that the development of the home-made spirit movement is being impeded by distribution difficulties, many potential distillers of benzol being deterred from entering the motor market by the trouble and expense associated with the packing and delivering of small quantities; and this fact of course involves less competition and naturally tends to maintain prices of all kinds of motor spirit. There seems to be no valid reason why the spirit should not be stored in 1,000 or 2,000 gallon tanks in garages, and why the private user should not store his supply in tanks holding from 100 gallons upwards, although some modification of the existing legal restrictions would be necessary. The agitation on behalf of the bulk system has the strong support of such authorities as Sir Boverton Redwood and Mr. S. F. Edge, and it is to be hoped that The Motor will continue its crusade against the present method of distribution.

As is generally known, it is the custom of the powers that be in this country to grant a motor-car driving licence to anybody who applies for one and pays a trifling fee, without troubling whether the applicant is blind, deaf, or totally unfitted in every way to be trusted with a car. In Germany, from every applicant for a driving licence the local police authorities require (1) a certificate of birth showing that the age of the applicant is at least 18 years; (2) a photograph; (3) a certificate from an official medical man attesting that the applicant possesses no bodily defects calculated to impair his efficiency in driving—especially defects of the sight and hearing; (4) a proof that he has received adequate practical instruction in the handling of a car from a person or at a place authorised by the competent higher administrative authorities. In addition to this rigorous procedure, it is incumbent upon the local police officials to ascertain whether there is anything against the applicant that might render him unsuited to be entrusted with a driver's licence, such as felony, proneness to drunkenness or disorderly conduct, particularly to acts of brutality. When one compares this sensible method with our own amazing practice of granting licences to anybody and everybody, whether blind, deaf, dumb, maimed, or incompetent in every way, it must be admitted by the most rabid Germanophobe that there is at least one thing they do better in Germany.

Municipal authorities have frequently been blamed for lack of enterprise in availing themselves of mechanically propelled vehicles for their various requirements—especially in the matter of ambulances—but this charge can no longer be made against the Willesden District Council, at any rate. This local body has just taken delivery of a fleet of seven Napiers, which places it absolutely up to date in the matter of motor transport. The first and second vehicles are single and double bedded ambulances for dealing with hospital emergency cases and accidents, both being exceptionally well sprung to avoid jolting; the next three are for the convenience of school children, the interior of each being so arranged with seats all round that 14 children can be seated with comfort; the sixth is a van for carrying infected and disinfected bedding. This is lined throughout with a special material which enables the interior, after being used for the transport of infected bedding, to be thoroughly cleansed before further use. The remaining vehicle is a landaulette for the use of the various committees of the council—the medical officer of health, etc. No doubt, the public benefits accruing from this splendid equipment of motor vehicles will soon compensate for the initial expense, and it is to be hoped that other local bodies will follow the Willesden example.

The second impression of the Vauxhall catalogue for 1914 has been sent to us for notice. It is a beautifully got-up production, and its contents represent the best type of the up-to-date motor-car catalogue, which is no longer a mere list of illustrated specifications and prices, but a really interesting and informative description of the methods of manufacture, the special features of design, and the materials used in construction, as well as a complete record of achievements in contests and competitions of every sort. The numerous and varied examples of coachwork constitute a special feature of the Vauxhall catalogue which is sure to interest buyers of luxurious motor carriages, the Vauxhall Company having acquired a well-deserved reputation for the originality and excellence of its body-building. Section 4 is entirely new, and is a lucid exposition of modern methods of motor-car production, as observed in a tour through the Vauxhall works. It may be mentioned that the catalogue is produced by the "offset" process, which dispenses with the necessity for using glazed paper, and is undoubtedly more artistic in effect than the latter.

R. B. H.

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THE Stock Exchange still complains of dull trade. In truth, people have lost all confidence, and whether they will regain it quickly is more than doubtful. A great noise has been made in the newspapers about the success of the loan issued by the Province of Saskatchewan. I see nothing to make a fuss about. The public subscribed 40 per cent. and the underwriters had to take 60 per cent. Surely, the jubilation is misplaced. However, we are informed that the Municipality of South Vancouver which offered £200,000 5 per cent. bonds at 91, got its money. The Empire Transport bonds were apparently subscribed privately. The Manchester Royal Exchange has offered £408,900 4½ per cent. first mortgage debenture stock at par. The Exchange has a membership of over 10,000, and the debentures are an absolutely first-class gilt-edged investment. The Petroleum Company of Ildokani advertised for £75,000 shares at 1s. 6d. premium. This offer of shares at a premium in a company that has done practically no work, and cannot be said to have thoroughly proved the property, is simply impudent, and it is not likely that anyone would subscribe to the issue. Many new issues are being prepared, but it is doubtful whether they will succeed.

We have had one or two small sensations during the week. The Premier Oil and Pipe meeting was one of the most interesting and amusing functions I have ever attended. It caused a great deal of excitement. The passing of the dividend on the non-assenting preferred shares in the Brazil Railway is a serious matter. Apparently, the company considers that it has the right to treat these non-assenting shareholders with contumely, and there is talk of legal proceedings being taken. Certainly the endorsement on the preferred shares does not give any hint that the directors had the right to pay the cumulative share dividend and pass that of the non-cumulative share. However, we shall hear more of the matter shortly. It has been a bad thing for the Brazil Railway. Traffics have been falling away on this line for many months past, and the latest development hardly increases our confidence in the undertaking.

MONEY.—The Bank of England reduced its rate to 4½ per cent. This was expected by everybody. All the banks had been taking fine paper at 4 per cent. some days previously; it was, therefore, palpably impossible to keep the official rate 1 per cent. higher. The banks are now full of money. Great Britain is getting all the gold she needs, and although I do not expect a 4 per cent. rate before the end of the political year, it seems certain to come early in April. Indeed, in spite of the big loans that will be made in France, 1914 looks like a year of cheap money. Nearly all the banks have now issued their preliminary notifications of profits. They are in almost every instance satisfactory. The London, City and Midland heads the list, and the London County and Westminster has also earned over a million profit. Lloyd's has done equally well. These three great banks are in a very strong position. The National Provincial has made £869,189 profit, and has written off £330,000 from profits, and takes another £150,000 from reserve in order to write down its investments. All this goes to strengthen this great bank. Indeed, all the depreciation that the banks write off will one day come back to them and may therefore be considered as a secret reserve. The London Joint Stock has largely increased its profits, having this year made £582,076, and the London and South Western has also done extremely well. Parr's profits are slightly improved, and Williams Deacons are also better. 1913 was a splendid year for the banks, but they have wisely decided not to increase the dividends, which in almost every case remain the same.

FOREIGNERS.—The Foreign market waits for Paris. It is clear that the present Ministry cannot remain in office many months, but whether it will decide to issue the National loan before it retires is still a doubtful question. It is really necessary for France to make up her mind on this point. A great nation, and one as rich as France is, has not the right to borrow huge sums on Treasury bills and thus dislocate the Money market. The money has already been spent, and the sooner the national loan is issued and out of the way, the better for everybody. There is no news from China, but we are assured that a big loan is to be floated on the Continent. Japan now denies that she has been negotiating in Paris for a further loan. The position in Japan is distinctly bad, and I am assured that the French bankers have no intention whatever of lending the Japanese a single halfpenny. A friend of mine who has just returned from Brazil tells me that the stories of financial trouble in that country are greatly exaggerated. The Brazil Railway is not popular, and there is no doubt that Para and the State of Amazonas are suffering from the depression in the Rubber trade; but my informant thinks that Brazil will soon get out of her difficulties, and that any idea of the Government defaulting on the federal loans is mere nonsense. Tintos have been down as low as 66½ on news of further strike troubles at the mine. Copper is weak, and the American figures are so bad that one suspects that they have been made bad on purpose.

HOME RAILS.—In spite of the excellent traffics, Home Railways remain dull. Prices move up and down as the jobbers are called upon to buy or sell some small parcel of stock. The changes on the week are quite unimportant. I am still of opinion that an investor cannot do better than buy Great Westerns or London and North Westerns. North Eastern consols have hardened, and are now 123, or two points higher than they were at the end of the year, but even at the advanced price the yield is very satisfactory. Underground Electrics have also kept very firm and a good report is anticipated.

YANKERS.—The Stock Exchange has made up its mind that Unions are fully valued on the reduced dividend of 8 per cent. For once I agree with the jobbers. Business in America seems to be going from bad to worse, and the Steel Trust statement of unfilled orders actually shows a decrease of 114,000 tons; nevertheless, Steels have been pushed up to 62. They seem to me very much over-valued.

There is still a great deal of talk about an arrangement with the Government that the railways shall put up their rates. Mexican Rails have been very slack on the news that the revolutionists have turned their attention to this line. Up to the present it has escaped damage. Canadian Pacific move irregularly. It is clear that there are always buying orders when the stock gets to 212. Argentine Rails have hardly been mentioned, but Buenos Ayres and Pacific have been weak and are now at a very attractive price, for the future of this road seems to me assured.

RUBBER.—Raw rubber remains fairly steady at 2s. 2½d. There is now talk about Brazil cutting off her supplies; I should receive these rumours with the greatest caution. The Pegoh report is satisfactory, for the Company has more than fulfilled the promise made in the prospectus. At the same time, the shares are certainly over-valued at 26s. 3d. as it is unlikely that the company will be able to pay more than 10 per cent. for the current year.

OIL.—Oil shares seem to be quite out of fashion. Egyptian Trust and Red Sea have both been sold, but there has been some buying of Lobitos on the revival of the story that the Shell intend to purchase the property. Kerns have also been bought and are now 7s. 6d. They are not over-valued at this price. Premier Oil and Pipe are now 5s. 3d. I am afraid that the committee will be unable to get sufficient support to carry a committee of investigation.

MINES.—The news from South Africa is just about as bad as it can possibly be. Nevertheless the account is so over-sold that it seems impossible that any further fall in Kaffirs can occur. Diamonds are very unsteady and certainly should be sold. Really the whole attention of the Mining market centres round the Russian group, Russo-Asiatics having been bid up to £5 10s. There is no doubt that those behind this market are both powerful and well-informed, and it is quite probable that we shall see a still further rise. My Russian friends tell me that the properties owned by the Corporation are genuinely good, but whether they are worth the figure put upon them in the market is another matter. Cobars are now friendless, and the reconstruction seems inevitable.

MISCELLANEOUS.—In the Miscellaneous market the Rolls-Royce report was liked. The profits are up, and the directors have very wisely written off goodwill and utilised the profits to strengthen otherwise the position of the concern. No finer motor car has ever been built than the Rolls-Royce, and at £2 10s. the shares are not over-valued. Charrons are easing off. There has been some bidding for British Radiums, which are now quoted 12s. I am a little suspicious of this share, but there is no doubt that the company is doing a fair business. Liptons still continue very weak, and Van den Berghs and Maypole Dairy have been sold.

RAYMOND RADCLIFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

MUSICAL CRITICISM.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—One does not know which to admire the more, Mr. Josef Holbrooke's clever music, his amusing letters of advice to young composers, or his caustic comments on the apathy of the public and the wickedness of publishers. But surely Mr. Holbrooke is in error in stating that "young composers lick the hand that crushes them, or bite the hand that assists them." The young—and old—composers that I am acquainted with can well look after their own interests—particularly when it comes to that part of the negotiations where £ s. d. must be discussed. I venture to think that the reason why some of the young composers are kept by their fond parents is not, as Mr. Holbrooke asserts, because of their absolute inability to go and fight for themselves, but because they are misled by well-meaning and clever folk who give them bad advice.

Yours faithfully,

HERBERT WHITELEY.

Golders Green, N.W.

BOOKS RECEIVED

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Militarism and Wages.* By F. Mertens, J. P. (The Garton Foundation, London, S.W. 1d.)
La Condition de la Femme dans la Tradition et l'Evolution de l'Islamisme. By Mansour Fahmy. (Félix Alcan, Paris. 4 fr. 50.)
In a City Garden. By J. R. Aitken. Illustrated. (T. N. Foulis. 3s. 6d. net.)
Fra Lippo Lippi, Painter, of Florence. A Play in Seven Scenes by Joseph Lee. Illustrated by J. Milne Purvis. (John Leng and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)
Through Jubaland to the Lorian Swamp. By I. N. Dracopoli. Illustrated. (Seeley, Service and Co. 16s. net.)

FICTION.

- Mary's Marriage.* By Edmund Bosanquet. (John Long. 6s.)
Faith and Unfaith. By James Blyth. (John Long. 6s.)
Noris. By Jules Claretie. With Coloured Frontispiece. (Thomas Nelson and Sons. 1s. net.)
The Decoy. A Romance by the Countess of Cromartie. With Coloured Frontispiece. (Erskine Macdonald. 3s. 6d. net.)
The Possessed. By Fyodor Dostoevsky. (Wm. Heinemann. 3s. 6d. net.)
Love and a Title. By Flowerdew. (Greening and Co. 6s.)
The Price of Conquest. By Ellen Ada Smith. (John Long. 6s.)
Callista in Revolt. By Olivia Ramsey. (John Long. 6s.)
Pantomime. By G. B. Stern. (Hutchinson and Co. 6s.)
The Waters of Lethe. By Dorothea Gerard. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

VERSE.

- Poems from the Portuguese.* Translated by Aubrey F. G. Bell. (B. H. Blackwell, Oxford. 3s. 6d. net.)
Sa Muse s'Amuse. By Wilfrid Blair. (B. H. Blackwell, Oxford. 3s. 6d. net.)
Philomelia. By Phyllis Gleadow. (Arthur L. Humphreys. 2s. 6d. net.)
Svold: A Norse Sea Battle. By S. F. B. Lane. (David Nutt. 2s. 6d. net.)

PERIODICALS.

- The Champion; Willing's Press Guide, 1914; The Irish Review; Bookseller; La Société Nouvelle; The International Whitaker; Book Lover; Publishers' Circular; Revue Sud-Américaine; Museum of Fine Arts Bulletin, Boston, U.S.A.; Wednesday Review; Collegian; Bedrock; Revue Bleue; United Empire; Revue Critique.*

THE ACADEMY

AND LITERATURE

No. 2177

[Registered as a
Newspaper.]

JANUARY 24, 1914

PRICE THREEPENCE

CONTENTS

	PAGE
Notes of the Week	99
The Gift	100
Assuagement	100
Duty and Honour	100
The Finger Test of Literature	101
Lord Lytton's "Coals"	103
Reviews :
Ancient Mysteries	104
Poets—Sooner or Later	106
Quakers and Quakerism	107
The Bayreuth Letters of Richard Wagner ...	108
More Blackstick Papers	109
The Cubit and the Span	110
Enemies of the Race	110
Shorter Reviews	112
Two Useful Books	112
Fiction	113

	PAGE
"The Immortal Memory"	114
Some New French Books	115
Musical Comedy—and After	116
In the Learned World	117
Notes for Collectors	118
Cloven Tongues	119
France and Humanity	120
The Valley of the Shadow	121
The Theatre :
"The Darling of the Gods" at His Majesty's Theatre	122
Notes and News	123
Imperial and Foreign Affairs	124
Motoring	125
In the Temple of Mammon	126
Correspondence	128
Books Received.....	128

ALLIANCE ASSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED.

Head Office:

BARTHOLOMEW LANE, LONDON, E.C.

ASSETS EXCEED £23,500,000.

Chairman:

The Right Hon. LORD ROTHSCHILD, G.C.V.O.

Business transacted by the Company:—

- (1) LIFE INSURANCE, with and without Profits, with special provisions for the payment of Estate Duties.
 - (2) FIRE INSURANCE of every description.
 - (3) INSURANCES TO COVER LOSS OF RENT, Interest and Profit consequent upon Fire damage to property.
 - (4) MARINE INSURANCE.
 - (5) BURGLARY, THEFT and PLATE GLASS INSURANCE.
 - (6) ACCIDENT, including PERSONAL ACCIDENT, Motor Car and Employers' Liability Insurance.
- Fidelity Guarantee and Sinking Fund Policies are also granted.

Applications for Agencies are entertained, and Prospectuses with other papers may be had on written or personal application.

ROBERT LEWIS, General Manager.

ROYAL ALBION HOTEL, BRIGHTON.

THE NEWEST HOTEL.

Closer to the Sea than any other Hotel
at Brighton.

Magnificent Dining Room and Lounge with beautiful Sea Views.

The Academy and Literature says:—"We have tried all the hotels in Brighton and none can compare with the Royal Albion for beauty of position, comfort, and personal attention to visitors' wishes."

For Illustrated Brochure and
Tariff, apply to
THE MANAGER.

Telephones :
903 Post Office (2 lines).

Telegrams :
"Brilliancy, Brighton."

BARGAINS IN BOOKS.—

Kipling's Complete Works, 25 vols., half calf, gilt, fine set, £12 12s.; Hamilton's Parodies, 6 vols., £2 10s.; Jesse's Historical Works, 30 vols., Nimmo, 1901, £7 17s. 6d.; Thackeray's Centenary Biographical Edition, 26 vols., £6 6s.; Barrington's Graham of Claverhouse, 30s. net, for 10s. 6d.; Purchas's Voyages, 20 vols., £9 9s., Glasgow, 1905; Slaters' Engravings and their Values, 1912, 18s.; Chaffer's Marks and Monograms on Pottery and Porcelain, 1912, 42s.; Baily's Magazines of Sports and Pastimes, 64 vols., £7 10s.; Grimm's Fairy Tales, large paper, illus. by Rackham, £2 2s.; Proc. Inst. Civil Engineers, 142 vols., cloth, £16 16s.; Pinkerton's Voyages and Travels, 17 vols., 1808,

£5 10s.; Porter's Knights of Malta, 1858, 2 vols., £3 3s.; Burton's Arabian Nights, 17 vols., illustrated, £17 17s.; Gould's History Freemasonry, 3 thick vols., morocco binding, £2 2s., cost £6 6s.; James' Painters and Their Works, 3 vols., £3 3s.; Habershon Records of Old London, Vanished and Vanishing, coloured plates, folio, £2 2s.; Fea's Secret Chambers and Hiding Places, 7s. 6d., for 3s. 6d.; Oscar Wilde, by L. E. Ingelby, 12s. 6d., for 4s. 6d.; Ditchfield Vanishing England, 15s., for 6s. 6d.; Landon's Lhasa, 2 vols., new., 42s., for 14s.; Spenser's Faerie Queene, 2 vols., Cambridge University Press, £3 13s. 6d., for 32s. Will take any good books in exchange for above.—BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

JOURNALISTIC and SECRETARIAL TRAINING FOR LADIES.—

Rapid systematic coaching. Special course in journalism. Excellent introductions given.—Telephone or write, THE TRIANGLE SECRETARIAL OFFICES, 61, South Molton Street, W.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

COPIES OF BACK NUMBERS OF
THE ACADEMY, WITH THE

Special Literary Retrospects

CONTAINING

Articles, Reviews & Poems

BY

JOHN ADDINGTON SYMONDS, W. E. HENLEY,
WILLIAM SHARP, LIONEL JOHNSON,

and many other Notable Writers, can still be obtained.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION: Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free.

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Offices of
THE ACADEMY, 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

To

Please send me THE ACADEMY for the next..... months.

I enclose remittance value.....

Name.....

Description.....

Address.....

THE ACADEMY

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post-free.

The EDITORIAL AND ADVERTISING OFFICE is at 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

Notes of the Week

THE crisis which has arisen over the provision of an adequate margin of naval superiority for Great Britain and the Empire is one which cannot be passed over in silence. THE ACADEMY has never exhibited any exaggerated affection for Mr. Winston Churchill, and it has consistently proclaimed him as a failure in every office which he has held until he found semi-salvation at the Admiralty. We may forget, although we cannot condone, his scandalous treatment of Sir Francis Bridgeman, the late First Sea Lord, and the untrue explanations which he offered in the House of Commons of his action. Experience, however, has mellowed his judgment, and it is obvious that at the present moment he is not prepared to sacrifice the opinion of his expert professional advisers to the maunderings of "the Welsh mountebank," the pro-Boer Brunner, the wholly negligible Byles, and the simple fool Booth. The question arises in the present emergency whether Mr. Asquith will for once prefer favourite habits, as has been usual before, to the exercise of his just authority as Prime Minister. Any man who cares for his country's welfare, and, indeed, salvation, is entitled to demand from the person who figures as the head of the Government that he will throw out the intriguing, lying, pettifogging attorney who is ready to sell his country for what he imagines is personal profit; and uphold the Board of Admiralty in the demands which they rightly make in the interests of national security.

We notice with deep satisfaction that the militant suffragettes are entering upon a path of comparative sanity. They desire to see the King, and to put the women's case before His Majesty. There cannot be any reasonable objection to such a course. Whilst we have always condemned the criminal methods adopted by disappointed and therefore hysterical women, we have never been able to agree in the view which is held by some eminent men that even the best women are disqualified to cast an intelligent vote. We are quite aware that many men in prominent positions are absolutely opposed to any women being admitted to the franchise, because, they argue, women are deficient in judgment and are therefore unreliable. Generalisations such as these do not appeal to us; we are entirely convinced that many women exist who are far better qualified to be electors than some of the men whom it has been our misfortune to canvass, and who have obviously only been given the franchise by unscrupulous politicians in search of votes. There is, of course, the argument, which appeals to us, that because unqualified men have been admitted as voters, no valid excuse exists for admitting a number of unqualified women to the same privilege. With all humility, we should like to offer a suggestion. If a new departure is to take place, women must be content—although it is entirely opposed to their nature—to proceed by steps; and we venture to think that some such method as election to vote on behalf of the sex through the medium of an electoral college might be devised by a politician of the versatility of Mr. Lloyd George, who is not afflicted with his exceptional disqualifications for devising sound reforms.

There is something rather attractive in Mr. G. K. Chesterton's suggestion in a recent article that we should have no foreign news in our daily papers, for certainly the wide expanse of information from all the capitals of the earth is apt to be rather uninteresting at times. The question at once occurs, however, what would take its place? We do not want more details of the sordid happenings of our own country—since "news" too often seems to be interpreted as the supplying of particulars of murders, catastrophes, and accidents; and it is too much to hope that the space thus saved would be devoted to brilliant essays or intelligent articles on themes of the moment. We must admit that the Englishman of these days is a cosmopolitan person; thousands cross the Channel now for every one who crossed a hundred years ago. Therefore, we suppose, the foreign news must stand. And there is another reason—we have to realise more and more that other lands have their intimate and important affairs. In reply to the advice "be insular," it would be easy to say that concentration on our own country exclusively would make us far too insular, and would send us well on the way to undue egotism and self-glorification.

The Gift

I BRING no pearls to deck thee—only these,
 The first sweet flowers that open in the spring,
 But I have garnered them 'neath whispering trees,
 'Mid music of soft waters murmuring:
 Ah! be not angry with me that I bring
 No gems to crown thee! I will teach the breeze
 To woo thee softly for me, and to sing
 About thy dreamful couch, sweet melodies.

I have no gift to give thee, save a heart
 That holds thine image only, while I live
 This life, from which, to serve thee, I would part,
 Grieving that I have only one to give!
 Deign thou my humble offering to receive,
 And only let me linger where thou art!

Transvaal.

ANTHONY WEBB.

Assuagement

AND have you reached a pleasant country, sweet,
 Of changeless light, after the dreary morns
 And weary eves of earth? And are your feet
 Treading on gold, that here trod flints and thorns?
 And is your beauty more than ever bright—
 Clear of the pain that marred it here, and thrust
 You down to death? And see you God in light, Whom here we saw darkened, through tears and dust?

If this is so, my loneliness is lightened,
 Seeing you stand with heroes, bards, and saints,
 Your peers; the gloom of my sick woe is brightened,
 Knowing your joy. I purge my lips from plaints
 And bitter cries of unfulfilled desires,
 Hearing your voice among the heavenly choirs.
 Philadelphia.

WILLIAM LAIRD.

Duty and Honour

DEEP below the waters of Whitsand Bay, within a very few miles of the Cornish coast, lies a little submarine, its machinery silent, its final plunge taken; day after day the torpedo craft have swung their hawsers and cruised from end to end, from the green cone of the Rame to the island off Looe, in the hope of finding that lost shell of steel. Better, perhaps, to let it rest now, than to renew the sorrow of friends, since there is no possible chance of life being saved. They were fine fellows, the crew, every one of them; but there is no need to make heroes of them or to write columns of sentimental nonsense. Each man knew that service in this particular branch of the Navy meant the taking of high risks; but the crews of submarines are volunteers—they choose this way of earning a living, and they do their duty.

What is this mysterious impelling force, "duty," which comes to the front every now and then, but which is constantly present, connected inseparably with honour, and only to be disregarded by a sacrifice of honour which the normal man will refuse to make? It is old-fashioned enough, we know; in ancient days it was probably as strong a power as it was in the time of Drake, of Nelson, as it is, in fact, to-day. It has no particular attractions; is often unpleasant, occasionally dangerous; yet, left undone, it brings restlessness, regret, and self-reproach. It is not always the result of fine training in youth or of close reasoning; nor does it arise from any prospect of reward, since a man's sense of duty will sometimes bring him blame instead of praise, poverty instead of wealth. It is something more than the mere doing of the daily task in the best manner possible; one assumes that to be done by thousands who are simply earning a living by using their individual gifts or accomplishments to the best advantage.

It seems, then, to be something inherent, born in us, akin to conscience that pricks a man forward when he would hang back, akin to honour which keeps a man clean amid disreputable surroundings. That it can be misused, strained, exaggerated, we all know by historic examples and by personal experiences; many a man who boasted that he was "doing his duty" has posed as a martyr, bought himself the cheap admiration of the thoughtless, made himself, in short, a fool. The man who talks largely of having done his duty should always be regarded with suspicion. It can be perverted in another way. Certain chilly persons, suffering from this distorted ideal of duty, will do the most unpleasant things, being apparently under the delusion that because a thing is disagreeable they ought to do it. They are the most uncomfortable characters in the world to meet; by some queer abnormal influence they manage to make quite nice people feel distressed and conscience-stricken. They have an air of perpetually setting an example to their less righteous friends; they coax their own little fire of self-satisfaction into a glow which, alas! never warms anybody else, and they are generally very prim, very proper, and slightly patronising. Their eyes never twinkle, and their handshake is depressing. If it is our duty to love them, we fail hopelessly therein—we can but tolerate them.

No very elaborate argument, then, is needed to show that, with certain exceptions which have formed the theme of novels, the sense of duty is allied with that of personal honour, and that the man who satisfies it carelessly and heartily, taking it as a matter of course and saying nothing about it, comes nearest to the ideal. If he risks his life, it is "all in the day's work," and he wants no halo of admiration; if he fails, he needs no reproaches, for he is just the one to find the reasons for failure. He may be rough or polished, educated or ignorant, but we have an occasional reminder, sad though it may be in itself, that his type is not by any means dying out in this country at the present day.

W. L. R.

The Finger Test of Literature

WHEN one speaks of the "finger test of literature," it may naturally be asked, "Whose finger?" Though forced to reply, my own, I hope to make it evident that this finger is, in a manner, a general index for the reading public, and that its adventures are here recorded from no mistaken sense of its own importance. To make the matter clear, a few personalities must be touched upon, for, after all, that finger is of my own flesh and blood; but its spiritual explorations belong to all who will accept its findings.

If I were blind, and had attended a school for the blind in youth, doubtless my reading by touch would be much swifter, hence it should be understood that I was past thirty when, on a slip of tin, I learned to feel out the alphabet with the brave forefinger of my left hand. My eyes have never been strong, insomuch that a few hours' use of them each day puts them out of business for the remainder of the twenty-four—hence my purpose to supplement sight by feeling; at the same time, not being entirely dependent upon touch for my acquaintance with literature, my finger did not toil as persistently as otherwise it might.

When the adventurous thought of learning to read without eyes first dawned, I did not know there were three systems of reading for the blind, but imagined that with the alphabet on that slip of tin, I held the key to all embossed books. Alas! After learning that "b" feels like sliding down hill and "y" like climbing back again, that "l" is formed like a telephone-pole, and "t" like a "staub" used to hold down the flap of a circus-tent, it developed that there was not only American Braille in the world, but Line Type and New York Point. Because embossing is expensive, and because, as a rule, one who can read in one system knows nothing of the others, the literary horizon of the world of the blind is indeed narrow. The choice of a book, fortunately, is not still further limited by one's purse; thanks to free circulating libraries, "Cyr's Fifth Reader," which would have cost seven dollars, and Irving's "Sketch Book" which sells for ten dollars and a half, might be mine for the asking—even the postage to be paid by the Government.

Nevertheless, choosing what book to read was always an engrossing problem calling for much discussion. It was my custom to read aloud to my mother, whose eyes, like mine, were not good for the printed page at night, and a work must be decided upon of sufficient interest to hold her attention while I groped from word to word—yet at the same time it must have sufficient merit to pay for so much labour. I cannot deny that this was putting our prospective author to a severe test, but a book that cannot stand severe tests is not literature. No matter how much we might have enjoyed a book could we have devoured several lines at once with single eye-flashes, skipping dull wastes like mountain goats, and avoiding tedious and useless minor characters at sight of their names coming round the corner of the page, it was now another matter; in vain were the oases green and delightful, if my mother went to sleep while being transported across desert stretches.

Not only must the book hold the attention, but so far as could be predicted from knowledge of the author and rumours of this particular work, it must end satisfactorily. Far be it from me to devote night after night with indefatigable perseverance to a book labouring to make me think more meanly of my fellow-man and leaving me with a bitter taste in my mouth. If, not knowing what to expect, we had embarked upon "Crime and Punishment," had piloted ourselves out of the breakers—always with my uncertain finger—into the illimitable sea of misery, to find ourselves, after weeks of wild tossings, half frozen in Siberia and half dead from our long fear of detection and doubts if we really deserved punishment for murdering that old woman. . . But no, Dostoieffsky was not in our catalogue.

Our choice usually fell upon some well-known and well-beloved author who had written so many books that no one man could be expected to peruse them all unless devoting himself solely to that object. There were some of Sir Walter Scott's romances which we had never read, or at least could not remember—which comes to the same thing—but in my Braille appeared only "Ivanhoe," known too well from school days' enforcement. We found eight titles by Kipling and six by Mrs. Wiggin, but only one by Thackeray—and it, "The Rose and the Ring"! Mrs. J. H. Ewing was represented by six works, J. Fenimore Cooper by one. How ungrateful are they who cry out against the multiplicity of books! Let them turn blind and they will sing another song.

During the past years spent with these Braille books as well as with the varied contents of Matilda Ziegler's Magazine for the Blind, certain truths about style and methods have been not only perceived with rare clearness, but have been, as it were, rubbed into my consciousness by that finger of a thousand and one nights. Its trackings after the palpable footprints of authors has led it to discover divers clues leading to literary misdemeanours which seem crying aloud for publicity. It has already been admitted that a book is placed at disadvantage when the reader cannot skip or hurry. In reading Braille there are other handicaps. If the finger lose its place it must grope among mountains of bewildering dots with no trail leading back to the starting point. Sometimes it goes on strike, refusing to do another stroke of work until it has rested, no matter how exciting the tale—this is after long travel has caused it to lose all delicacy of touch, insomuch that the words grow blurred and everything turns to "x's," "z's" and "q's"—all of which feel pretty much alike. During this enforced waiting, no other finger can be sent as a scab to take the striker's place, for, strangely enough, only that trained and long-experienced left forefinger can read a word; the other fingers are as useless as proud and pampered dames of royal courts if suddenly put in the kitchen. How important it is for our author to have something worth saying, and to say it in the fewest words—words, so far as it may be, without a single “x,” a single “z,” that is to say, simple, home-like words, short and full of life!

Much depends on how the book begins. If there is a grand flourish at the opening no more substantial than breath in a trumpet, if the author deliberately sets himself to his task as if working by the day rather than by the job, if he cunningly selects his words with dexterity too evidently self-conscious, clothing his nakedness of thought in the silks and satins of language, he is pleasing nobody but himself. After the finger has toiled over barren foothills with no refreshing stream in sight, it may go on because there is no other book in Braille closer than Boston, but it proceeds dejectedly, while she who listens fights heroically against drowsiness. Even when the story at last warms to a plot and the plot begins to tingle with suspense, that unlucky beginning dampens the spirits with resentful memories—even a belated murder that might have happened in time to lure us on, now prompts no impulse to look under the bed.

We shall never forget our surprise when we discovered that there is a plot in “Cranford” (published in Braille in five fat volumes). To be sure, it is very fine art to present a story so simply and faithfully that the pages seem torn out of the life of everyday; but this fine art almost lost “Cranford” two readers, for had we died anywhere in the first three volumes, it would have been in the firm belief that we had already found in that work all Mrs. Gaskell had put in it.

Next to a dull beginning, my finger had to complain of the superfluous word, no matter how harmonious or exactly chosen. Since every dot on the embossed page robs that finger of a tiny fraction of its reading-power, it is indeed discouraging literally to throw away its strength on useless ands and buts and verys, to say nothing of those multiplied descriptive adjectives crammed into the paragraph to make “fine reading.” Rhetorical outbursts, maddening balanced sentences, carefully worked-up climaxes, vain repetitions, in short, all vegetation, no matter how luxuriant, that must be cleared out of the way before one can get anywhere—how could all such be met, save in high dudgeon? And if mere useless words were an aggravation, what shall we say of descriptions of scenery and weather which the man with two eyes blithely skips—or of some superfluous character in the tale, put there that the tale may be longer and not that it may wag to any better purpose?

Special complaints must be lodged against all hackneyed phrases, the last word of which is as evident, when the first word is reached, as the earth underfoot, yet which must be felt out in order to get to something else. Occasionally my mother would sigh, “Now he is going to say. . .” And I would dole out what her experienced thought-waves would have washed aside.

And ah, that anecdote whose point we anticipated so long before my finger was laid upon it, that it sat heavy, like a warmed-over biscuit! And ah, when the author feared we did not perceive his wit, and repeated the joke, nursing and fondling it, and giving it back to us again in a change of clothes with the Mark Twain thoroughness!

The author’s pet phrase might cause us to smile indulgently when we came upon it where it had no business—like the monocle in Gilbert Parker’s “The Right of Way”—we condoned because the author loved it so; but a writer’s complacency over his situations and his insulting fears lest we fail to appreciate the wonder of him, we could not forgive; for Sentimental Tommy must be in a book and not at the back of it to give unalloyed delight. In a word, anything that halted the action was inexcusable, though it should take us through a bypath strewn with diamonds. Yet we were not in such break-neck haste as to be satisfied with those short stories embossed from popular monthlies, wherein hero and heroine meet for the first time and get engaged, or farther, during a car ride or a drive across country. We wished to get forward, true, but to get forward naturally. When a character or situation was artificial, it was almost intolerable to find how that artificiality hardened and glittered under the slow tracings of the finger.

On the other hand I have known that finger to stop suddenly while the voice waited before it could go on, not because the finger was swamped in a quagmire of “x’s” and “z’s” and “q’s,” but because it had discovered some rare bit of feeling, some searching tenderness common to all hearts, causing tears to answer tears in the darkness.

To be sure, our life is but a span, our journeying not unlike feeling our way through the dark. Were we Arguses, able to read fifty books at once, still would the great bulk of the Unread rise like a mist-covered mountain peak before us. After all, who will say that the finger test of literature is a standard too narrow? We shall never have time now for superfluous words and for anecdotes born of long travelling—not in this advanced age of the world. We shall never have time for descriptive passages that lead nowhither, yet fail to pay for themselves by intrinsic value—nor for the superfluous character or needless incident that could be cut out of a book without leaving a root-filament in its body. Instinctively we feel that the blind, sadly limited in their choice, should not be given books which seek throughout to show the sordidness of human life and the hopelessness of impersonal fate; and we who have eyes to read the sun-lighted heavens, have we the time for masterpieces of mere words that breathe no life of faith, no immortality of progress? For the blind, printed books are too few to sadden them with records of uninspired purposes and lives wrecked by blind chance; for the living, books are too many to narrow their horizon with those works which read God out of the world.

J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

Lord Lytton's "Coals"

THIS pity that the unhappy story of Bulwer-Lytton's marriage has been allowed to eclipse the more attractive side of the biography which his grandson has recently given to the world.* Thousands have devoted attention to the scandal who would regard the literary and political record of the first Lord Lytton as little more than an anti-climax. How far the tragedy affected his public life, how far it arrested his development in a statesmanship for which he appears to have been peculiarly fitted, none can tell. It seems to have influenced his literary work, his literary interests and his literary judgment not at all. The literary appeal of the second volume is to me irresistible—not profound, but certainly not superficial. Whatever may be the feeling of the present and the future as to Bulwer-Lytton's own work—and it seems pretty clear that few give much time to his novels to-day—there is abiding interest in the views he expressed with facile freedom on the writings of others. His own output and his own engagements can only induce in more commonplace mortals wonder that he ever found the time to read, still less to put his thoughts at considerable length into his letters to his son and his intimates. Perhaps like Carlyle—or someone else—he wrote long letters because he had not time to write short ones. Few men have turned out so rapidly as large a measure of literary work which only just missed being great; and none perhaps has ever realised more strongly the need of rest and the necessity for replenishing the fuel supply of the brain. Stop and "take in coals"—meditate and get new ideas—was his injunction to all and sundry over a large part of his life. He himself roamed the seven seas of literature and put into every port ancient and modern to replenish. In the 'forties he wrote: "All great works require stern and silent meditation. We must brood deeply over what we wish to last long. The proof of genius is increased by the abundance of fuel that supplies it." His idea for literature was to adapt Bentham's axiom in politics: "The greatest happiness of the greatest number should be the object of Government." Lytton said: "'The greatest delight of the greatest number' should be the object of poetic art. I add—which Bentham does not—for both. 'And for the longest possible period.'" Read the most extensively popular of the writers among the dead if you would be original, striking, and popular—Homer, Horace, Ariosto, Goethe, Scott. In Homer, Shakespeare, and Goethe's Werter and Faust, Lytton told his son, "you have the three greatest minds in the known world made familiar to the widest possible circle."

It was in 1831 or thereabouts when Sir Walter Scott was visiting Italy after the disaster which wrecked health, fortune, all save courage, that Bulwer-Lytton dedicated Eugene Aram to the wizard of the North as an expression of "that affectionate admiration with which you have inspired me in common with all your contemporaries and which a French writer has not ungracefully termed the happiest prerogative of genius." He talked of Scott's genius and of his fame as poet and novelist. Remembering this tribute we turn with some curiosity to the letters written thirty years after to ascertain to what extent the more intimate verdict is consistent with contemporary dedication. Lytton had the intensest admiration for Scott, but he was not for a moment in doubt as to his limitations. "Think of Shakespeare, and Homer—Goethe in his two popular works. And to judge what I mean think what Scott would have been if he had had the intellect of Shakespeare or even the vocabulary of Shelley." His son, Robert, he thought, might do wonders as a poet if he would study Scott and then say to himself: "Why not have all his merits and add to them a little more thought and purpose with a polished vocabulary instead of so much slovenly slip-slop."

Lytton read through twenty-one volumes of Coleridge in 1863. To him the author of The Ancient Mariner seemed to have had "by far the largest mind of his age. Scott and Byron, as minds, looked thin and narrow beside his. He is singularly creative as a poet. But unluckily he rather creates other poets than completes his own poems. All the germs of the poetry that blossomed after him seem to me in his verse." Coleridge is a "leviathan" whose slightest movement makes a stir in the ocean that is felt miles and leagues off. "But he wants many of the elements of a first-rate thinker. Like Shelley he can but make fragments, but he makes grander fragments than Shelley and his fragments are fairer representations of the great whole." Lytton lived to revise "an illiberal estimate" of Keats, whom he regarded in maturer judgment as "a transcendent genius," but he thought his influence bad. "We owe to it the effeminate attention to wording and expression and efflorescent description which characterise the poetry now in vogue." Of Browning his opinion was not high, and of Tennyson a little contemptuous. He admired the music in certain of Tennyson's lines, but he regarded him as "a poet adapted to a mixed audience of school girls and Oxford dons." "I admire many felicities in expression in spite of many vulgarities and conceits which his hunt after such prettiness often incurs. But to my mind he has in him less of the masculine quality than any English poet of repute." But then Lytton despaired of being a fair judge "in an age which says Pope is no poet and Rossetti is a great one."

Among the really delightful pronouncements made by Lytton as literary appraiser for the benefit of his son is the linking up of Johnson and Macaulay: "I incline to think Johnson the greatest writer in the language next to the poets and philosophers. The style of the Lives is very superior to Macaulay's. . . . Johnson says finer things in a finer way. His grammar is often incorrect—to my surprise. But I know not any English writer whose grammar is correct—curious. . . . Macaulay makes fewer slips than any I can remember, but the niceties and elegancies of construction and style are little known to him."

* "The Life of Lord Lytton," by the second Earl, reviewed in THE ACADEMY, December 13, 1913.

Gibbon, Jane Austen, Voltaire, Victor Hugo, Alfred de Musset, Dickens, Thackeray, Matthew Arnold, and others are subjected at length, or in passing, to the all-encompassing judgment. There are digs at critics who dare not go against the public taste: for ten years of their lives—till, that is, they become popular—most authors, he says, ought to consider critics their natural enemies. Lytton was apparently not prepared to endorse Swinburne's view that "the appreciation of friends like myself" more than outweighed failure to obtain "the favour of journalists." And this brings one to the gem of the collection. Swinburne, with Poems and Ballads, in 1886, had stirred such a hornet's nest that Moxon, his publisher, withdrew the volume in deference to an outraged public taste. Swinburne had been brought into touch with Lytton about this time, and his letters are full of angry resentment with both critics and publisher. When a little later he republished the volume he issued a pamphlet in which he attributed the attacks on his morality to the pruriency of minds which would find impurities in the purest art. "The sudden thunder from the serene heavens of public virtue" was a storm he at least was prepared to brave. He went to stay at Knebworth, and Lord Lytton had only one view of the censure passed on his work: he hoped Swinburne would "purge his volume of certain prurientes into which it amazes me any poet could fall. If he does not he will have an unhappy life and a sinister career. It is impossible not to feel an interest in him. . . . In him is great power, natural and acquired. He has read more than most reading men twice his age, brooded and theorised over what he has read and has an artist's critical perceptions. . . . Perhaps he has overinformed his tenement of clay. But there is plenty of stuff in him. His volume of poems is infested with sensualities, often disagreeable in themselves, as well as offensive to all pure and manly taste. But the beauty of diction and mastership of craft in melodies really at first so dazzled me, that I did not see the naughtiness till pointed out. . . . He inspires one with sadness, but he is not so sad himself, and his self-esteem is solid as a lock. . . . And he seems to me as wholly without the moral sense as a mind crammed full of æsthetic culture can be." The personal "appreciation" here is surely as dynamic as the force of the poetry which left Lord Lytton unconscious of the "naughtiness" till some less subservient literary judgment drew his attention to it. So does Art play Puck to Morality's Lysander.

EDWARD SALMON

Mr. Walter van Noorden, managing director of the Carl Rosa Opera Company, has recently added to an unusually extensive répertoire Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffmann." A special cast, including Mr. William Wegener, Mr. Hebden Foster, Miss Sybil Conklin, Miss Beatrice Miranda, and Miss Ina Hill, has been selected, and the opera is conducted by Mr. van Noorden.

REVIEWS

Ancient Mysteries

The Occult Arts. By J. W. FRINGS. (Wm. Rider and Son. 2s. 6d. net.)

"THERE is nothing supernatural—nature is the sum of content. But to many minds there is much that is supernormal to them. The further up the side of a mountain one ascends, however, the greater is the prospect which appears in view. The more widely one extends the mental vision by the review of further human knowledge the more easily does the supernormal become the normal."

With this paragraph in the author's preface we thoroughly agree. There is much of man's experience in nature that he is unable to explain. And the easy way to propound an explanation is to attribute the phenomenon to supernatural causes—hence the old-time beliefs in Magic, Witchcraft, Spirits, Devils, and what not; much of which has been consigned to the limbo of burst bladders, as Science has marched; and the rest in time will follow.

In the first two chapters of this book the author endeavours to show, and we think with some success, that the old Alchemists and Astrologers were the fathers of Modern Chemistry and Astronomy, that, though groping in the dark, they were working on the right lines, and that some of their theories, such as the possibility of transmuting metals, have been confirmed by the latest discoveries of Science.

In his subsequent chapters, however, he deals with necromancy, divination, horoscopes, and possession, the phenomena of which he indeed shows to be explicable by telepathy and suggestion. If he had stopped at this point, we could have gone with him all the way, but he goes further than this, and endeavours to justify the old superstitions by the acceptance of the modern phases of Occultism, of Esoteric Buddhism, and of Spiritism.

Amongst other things he tells that "Thought" is a force. "The astral, or etheric shell is material and composite, or at least organised, like that of the grosser material body of flesh, muscle, nerve and bone. This etheric shell remains for a time, like the physical body, a more or less completely organised structure after death has taken place on the physical plane. It is the persistence of this etheric double which has given rise to the evidence for phantasms after death." "The Etheric world has its inhabitants." "Ether is ceaselessly in motion," and "this eternal motion we may call spirit." "At death the mind, wrapped for the time in its astral envelope, passes out of the physical body on to the next plane." Occultism "postulates a continual ascent of man to a spirithood, and eventually to Godhead, and omniscience," and "It will render man practically independent of our three-dimensioned space."

These quotations are given only to show some of the conclusions at which the author arrives. But his argument is ingenious, subtle, and worth reading, though in our opinion unsound. The key to the whole is the assumption, first above quoted, that Thought is a Force, "a form of energy as real as light or electricity." "The materialised expression in the phenomenal world of the Will." Deny this postulate and the whole argument falls to the ground, and may be relegated to that absurdest of conceptions "the fourth dimension," to jostle the inhabitants of the "Etheric World."

Now what is the will? The will is like "the mind," a convenient expression for a natural phenomenon. Let us consider the conscious machine which we call the nervous system. This machine was a living but unconscious entity prior to birth. It drew its life from its original constituents—Life which has always been and always will be in the constituents of matter. At birth this live machine, if properly adjusted, acquires an elementary state of consciousness enabling it by degrees to exercise its capacity for receiving and comparing impressions, for storing memories, for formulating desires, for exercising its muscles.

This elementary consciousness continues to develop, and with it continue the operations of the machine itself till its eventual dissolution. To the operations of this conscious machine we give the convenient name of "mind." The Conscious Machine realises its individuality, it recognises its limbs and organs as belonging to itself. It differentiates between itself and the things not itself. It grows to exercise what it is pleased to call its will. What is this operation? It has instincts, principles and desires inherited from its forbears. For every cell which helps to form its bones, muscles, nerves and nerve-centres has something in itself of all its millions of ancestors. It has stored in addition thousands of ideas derived from its education and experiences. It is closely affected by yearly, daily, momentary influences from its environment. These impulses from within and without act, some together and some in conflict, and when action comes, it follows the line of least resistance, the resultant of all the impulses. This process it is pleased to call the exercise of its Will. It may have been conscious or unconscious. If conscious, what we call "thought" has been involved in the process; if unconscious, no thought has been involved. "Thought" then is merely a form of procedure, and "Will" the demonstration of the result of conflicting impulses; neither the one nor the other can be placed in the same category as light or electricity.

But it will be said how do you account for the admitted phenomena of telepathy, hypnotism, suggestion, auto-suggestion, and somnambulism? The answer is that we do not know enough about it to formulate anything beyond guesswork.

Late in time these phenomena are now admitted facts. They are doubtless governed by natural physical laws of which we as yet know nothing. We may hazard that as floating bodies are drawn towards each other some law of attraction inter-acts between the great nerve centres of individuals. Possibly so-called animal magnetism exists, which can be brought to bear by one individual on another, in analogy with wireless telegraphy. It is certain that other stimuli than light and sound can affect the seats of sensation, which are ordinarily stimulated only by light and sound, in which case the brain mistakes the one stimulus for the other, and conceives that the eye had seen, or the ear had heard. It is possible that these stimuli may act over great distances, and that the seats of sensation may, under some such circumstances, be intensely and subtly receptive, especially if the temperaments of the individuals are especially so adapted as to be in tune with each other.

Whatever the influence may be, and however it may be exercised by one person on another—and that everyone does influence everyone else, more or less, is common experience—the influence must be that of one brain on another brain where the phenomenon is that of suggestion, and of the brain upon itself in the case of auto-suggestion. The brain of a healthy man is in a state of delicately balanced equilibrium. The balance is easily disturbed, it may be by a lesion, it may be by the action of drugs or of alcohol. May not the equilibrium be disturbed by the subtle influence above referred to, so as to produce the hypnotic or somnambulistic sleep? And would not this account for the phenomenon of multiple personality? The personality of a person depends on the arrangement, so to say, of his brain; a slight disarrangement of the brain would destroy that personality, and introduce a different or second personality; a further disarrangement would produce yet another or third personality, and in each case the patient would have no recollection of his previous personality. Cases are common where through shock, or injury, or illness, a person is found wandering and forgetful of his past. It surely is not necessary in such cases to postulate a subliminal self, or an astral body?

As to the proposition that a medium is actuated by a disembodied or any other spirit, the cases recorded are of so futile a nature, and so many explanations can be offered, that we may confidently leave them to be elucidated by some hypothesis of a purely physical character like other phenomena for which we are at present unable to account.

The recent correspondence in the Times on "the theory of Ghosts" and "Impressions on matter" is a healthy sign of the decay of the belief in the supernatural. The subject is most interesting, and we need here only refer to the quotation from Sir Oliver Lodge, viz.: "I have reason to believe that a trace of individuality can cling about terrestrial objects in a vague and imperceptible fashion, but to a degree sufficient to enable those traces to be detected by persons with suitable faculties." If this is so, though it is difficult to follow out the idea, it would account for many apparently authentic cases, of which one hears, with regard to so-called haunted houses. Perhaps the experts in finger-prints at Scotland Yard could render assistance. Something other than light and sound must in such cases stimulate the seats of sensation, for there is nothing present to cause the sound or excite the vision. The brain is deceived by the abnormal stimulus, and judges that it sees and hears when there is nothing to see or hear. There must be something in the nature of suggestion, but of what it is which presents the suggestion, we are at present hopelessly ignorant.

Poets—Sooner or Later

Rose Windows: Book I. Poems by ROBERT V. HECKSCHER. (George Allen and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

Flowers from a Poet's Garden. By J. HAROLD CARPENTER. (G. Bell and Sons. 2s. 6d. net.)

Early Poems. By M. A. (Elkin Mathews. 3s. 6d. net.)

Later Poems. By EMILY HICKEY. (Grant Richards. 1s. 6d. net.)

Poems and Miscellaneous Verse. By J. WELLS THATCHER. (Chas. Taylor. 3s. 6d. net.)

THERE has been a peculiar pleasure in reading Mr. Heckscher's "Rose Windows." Some two years ago we reviewed a previous volume of his work, and, in spite of judicious puffs on the fly-leaves, found very little of intrinsic merit to commend. We have been all the more gratified to discover a new and refined quality in these pages. The poems are, for the most part, less ambitious in form; they evince a simplification of expression and a much enhanced clarity of emotion. They are by no means all of equal merit, but there are at least half a dozen real lyrics of a very commendable substance, to have produced which is no mean distinction. We would instance "Sunrise," "Sunset," "Music, Going Home," "The Soul," "Surfeit," "To a Vision of the Virgin," and "Genius." Any of these would justify quotation; we choose the last named:

Along the mountain ledge I tread,
Alone in joy and woe;
I brush the heaven with my head,
And I have looked below!

I do not meet with anyone—
No sound is in the air;
Within an arm's reach of the sun,
But one step from despair!

That is remarkably well considered; more could scarcely be expressed within such narrow compass. At the back of the volume Mr. Heckscher ventures a specimen of more sustained work in "The Legend of the Christmas Tree," which occupies nine pages. The subject is highly fanciful, but it is handled in such a way—with such nicety of detail and happiness of phrase—as awakens some expectation with regard to the author's future work. And the title of the present volume suggests a continuation.

Sooner or later love makes every man a poet; and it is a rather graceless business to let loose the critical pruning-knife in Mr. Carpenter's pretty garden. His arrangement of it in clumps or plots of so-called "Roses," "Narcissi," "Daffodils," and so forth, strikes one as a little arbitrary; but there are some pleasant blooms, call them what he will. We like the "roses" best, and here it is one pauses, doubting the right to desecrate such a garden, surely cultivated for one especial pair of eyes. For these roses are love-poems, tender, sincere, and full of that awakened wonder which lends them something of the sanctity of a shrine. In the verses that succeed, Mr. Carpenter evinces a quiet, thoughtful spirit; he cannot delight with the rarer shock of surprise, but he would fain please with the music of a shaded, limpid, gently-moving stream. And yet—how many more times must we groan over the falsity of the poetic ear that can rhyme "dawn" with "morn"?

"M. A.'s" poems have a peculiarly youthful charm; and, unless we are greatly mistaken, a feminine origin. Even a sophisticated reader must confess the spell of a romance so consistently and so ardently hymned. For "M. A.'s" visions are all of—

Enchanted mountains peaked and pinnacled, Spired cities by dim reaches of the sea;

where high-prowed galleys disburden their outlandish merchandise, and armoured knights ride to deeds of chivalry. It is a world of dreams, not grey and shadowy, but vivid with bright-hued birds and flowers, its waters and meads coloured like jewels. Now and again we are jarred by a false rhyme; occasionally the fancy is a trifle extravagant, as:

And the tears which fell from his throbbing soul
Glowed to an opal aureole, and sometimes there is a warning of the fascination of mere rhyming; but we take these for "early" blemishes. In general, the mastery of the poetic medium both commands respect and makes promises. One or two irregular sonnets, such as "Graves" and "On a Bust of Queen Mary I," touch a sterner note, but the more familiar song runs to this tune:

Quiet almond-orchards, petal-strewn and sweet,
Where lingers the long clear gold-dusted gloom,
Where opalescent skies and blossoms meet,
Till twilight stars entangle with the bloom,
And fallen stars lie scattered round the feet.

Friend, shall I weave these stars to broideries,
With gracious tears and glad-souled gratitudes
For love's submissions and sweet servitudes?
For wisdom's ways and faith's divinities,
And lantern lights in desert solitudes?

Blessings on all weavers of fair dreams! Nevertheless, when she comes to realities, "M. A." should do something even better.

We believe Emily Hickey has done some good work, but these "Later Poems" are hardly likely to make a wide appeal. The greater part is frankly religious, much of it very slender from a poetic standpoint, though "After Our Lady's Presentation" is informed with a tender human quality above the rest. Another element of the book is Irish, of the legendary school. A long poem on Mider's wooing of Etáin the Queen has passages of real beauty, but there is really small satisfaction in such an example as "Amairgen," with its run of verses constructed after this pattern:

Amairgen the White-kneed sang;
I am a Tear of the Sun,
And of Plants the fairest one,
And the Vulture upon the rock.

There are other perversities, such as a "Ballad of the Judas Tree," which weaves a monotonous length of close on a hundred lines to a uniform rhyme in "ee." There remain some two or three poems of a less equivocal character: "Eld to Youth," "In the Day of Understanding," and a pleasant sonnet on "Ox-eyed Daisies." For our part, we would keep these and let the rest go.

When Mr. J. Wells Thatcher determined on publication he evidently intended to lay up no vain regrets on the score of omission, for we could well suppose this volume to contain almost everything he has ever written with a pretence to rhyme. The result is a most amazing medley: humorous verses, songs, translations from the classics, verses from his Christmas cards, jeux d'esprit left over from a wedding breakfast, a poetical rendering of a chapter from the "Eikon Basilikè," album verses, and a long effusion about the staff of a publishing firm, full of personal allusions—and even now we have not exhausted the varieties. Many of these have neither value nor interest for any save a few personal friends; and, indeed, it would be folly to suppose that Mr. Thatcher has had any intent to challenge comparison with laureates in bringing this book to birth. A piece about an airship and a series of verses called "The Angler" have merit, but the translations from Horace, from Ovid, from Propertius, come nearest to poetry of anything in the book. That is not to say they are perfect translations—or even perfect poems—as a single comparison will show:

hic generosior
Descendat in Campium petitor;

Adown the slope
To Mars' wide field, with high-born signs,
A candidate for office strides, with Hope.

But the collection will doubtless please the versatile author's friends.

Mr. Heinemann is publishing, on January 28, a new play by Mr. Israel Zangwill, which is being produced by the Play Actors' Society at the Court Theatre on the 25th, entitled "The Melting Pot." To the English edition Mr. Zangwill has added a lengthy note dealing with the racial and religious problems involved in the play.

Quakers and Quakerism

John Woolman, His Life and Our Times: A Study in Applied Christianity. By W. TEIGNMOUTH SHORE. (Macmillan and Co. 5s.)

ONE of my earliest recollections of anything connected with Quakers is reading as a child in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," the description of the scene when George and Eliza were being helped to escape by Phineas Fletcher, the Quaker, who at a critical moment pushed Tom Loker backwards over the rocks with the remark: "Friend—thee isn't wanted here." John Woolman might probably have acted in the same way under similar circumstances, but he was not put to the test. His whole life was a stern subordination of expediency to principle, and the only man of modern times at all comparable with him on these lines was General Gordon.

Born in 1720 at his father's home in Burlington County, New Jersey, he in very early life adopted to the utmost the faith as laid down by George Fox, Robert Barclay, and other leaders of the sect; and although on various occasions he had great mental struggles he never gave way, always doing what he thought right regardless of the worldly consequences. The present work is founded on the Journal of Woolman kept by himself, written in very simple language but with an eloquence of its own.

Very early in life he was appointed a Minister, although Quakerism does not set apart those who teach or preach, and very early also he openly stated that slave-keeping was a practice inconsistent with the Christian religion. As he grew older this conviction increased, and he laboured with great earnestness among friends and foes to bring about its abolition. The fruits of the seed sown by him and others took over one hundred years to ripen. Woolman lived in a curious age; the Quakers practically governed the State of New Jersey, and no doubt after the persecution their forefathers had endured in England, first at the hands of the Puritans, and later at the hands of the restored Church party, they in turn were severe when in power. One enactment issued by the members of the Assembly may be noticed:

That all women, of whatever age, rank, profession or degree, whether virgins, maids, or widows, who shall after this Act impose upon, seduce and betray into matrimony any of his Majesty's subjects by virtue of scents, cosmetics, washes, paints, artificial teeth, false hair or high-heeled shoes shall incur the penalty of the law now in force against witchcraft and like misdemeanours."

We must leave the reader to follow the life of John Woolman through his journeys among the Indians and to his death in England in 1772 of smallpox with all its then horrors—a pattern of resignation and patience.

It may be interesting to note in connection with this life of a perfect specimen of the Quaker a few facts about the sect generally. George Fox, a Leicestershire peasant was its founder about the year 1648, and Dr. Thomas Hodgkin in an article on the Society of Friends forming part of a book "Our Churches and Why We Belong to Them" (1898), tells us that Calvinism was dominated when Fox started the new faith—"the universal light of Christ in the souls of all men"—and of the persecution from all sides that followed. This continued until the Toleration Act of 1689. From 1689 to 1740 the Quakers flourished and founded many of the private banks, some of which still survive. They were esteemed as men of their word and had the public confidence for their honest trading.

The next period runs from 1790 to the present day. The early part of it marked the change to "Evangelical" Quakerism, and was noteworthy for the Gurneys and the magnificent work done in connection with prison-reform by Elizabeth Fry. One could wish that Elizabeth Fry might see a modern prison with its cleanliness and luxury compared with those of her own time.

Of the early literature written for and against Quakerism and its doctrines, one may mention a book written by William Penn; but the most celebrated was by Barclay, the "Apology for the True Christian Divinity" (1678). This brought in reply a book called "A Confutation of Quakerism or a Plain Proof of the Falsehood of what the Principal Quaker Writers (especially Mr. R. Barclay in his apology and other works) do Teach." The writer was Thomas Bennet, M.A., Rector of St. James's in Colchester, and late Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge (1705).

The preface to this book is a splendid illustration of Christian charity, and we are likely to see some of this same spirit in the present Kikuyu controversy. Mr. Bennet wrote: "I cannot but think Quakerism one of the vilest and most pernicious heresies that our unhappy nation has ever been infected with. And wherefore I am heartily grieved, that although my brethren the Clergy of the Established Church have written with great learning and accuracy upon most other points, yet the Quaker controversies have been almost (wholly) neglected by them"—and much more in this strain.

A word on the other side. Lamb, in the Essays of Elia, "A Quaker's Meeting," written between 1820 and 1833, heads the essay with a poem by Richard Fleckno:—

Still born silence? thou that art
Flood-gate of the deeper heart—and pays an eloquent tribute to the peace passing understanding. Lamb knew the writings of John Woolman and advised his readers to get them by heart. His own essay is certainly worth reading; so is a modern one, "John Woolman the Quaker," by George Macaulay Trevelyan in a book of essays on various subjects published last November; quite short but excellent, particularly on the slavery question.

We opened our review by a reference to "Uncle Tom's Cabin," so let us see what the authoress of that book says of the Quakers in the "Key" to it published in 1853, giving "the original facts and documents upon which the story is founded":—

The character of Rachael Halliday was a real one. Simeon Halliday calmly risked fine and imprisonment for his love to God and man. He had many counterparts among the sect. Richard Dillingham was sentenced to imprisonment for three years for helping slaves to escape, and died of cholera caught whilst nursing other prisoners. Whittier, always sympathetic, wrote a poem on his death.

To summarise, it is clear that Quakers have never been guilty of oppression, that the tenets of their faith are simple, and that the world would be much better if the principles they profess and carry out were more general. That it is possible, as John Woolman's career shows, to live a pure and simple life even in this work-a-day world; but it is very difficult and requires a strong courage and devotion to one's principles to do so. Finally, that until the world is differently constituted, "when wars shall cease and all mankind be kin," the present-day Quakers must be in the minority, and be prepared to suffer for their faith.

W. N.

The Bayreuth Letters of Richard Wagner

The Bayreuth Letters of Richard Wagner. Translated and Edited by CAROLINE V. KERR. (James Nisbet and Co. 6s. net.)

MISS KERR has done a useful work for the more modest race of Wagnerian enthusiasts, those who can spare neither the money nor the time for making acquaintance with the enormous mass which exists of Bayreuth literature, in compiling a short history of the Bayreuth enterprise. This is told by means of a copious selection from the "Bayreuth" letters which she has translated afresh, with explanatory notes and running commentary by herself. Almost all, we suppose, of these letters have appeared before in an English version, but Miss Kerr, using Glasenapp and Finck for her historical narrative, has so interwoven them with it that the whole book affords a clear picture of the most remarkable episodes in Wagner's career. The letters, as everyone who has read them in former editions knows, are not letters whose interest derives from style, or thought, or cunning terms of expression. Wagner was not in the class of the great epistolers. These are, for the most part, specimens of the business correspondence of a genius, whose genius did not prevent his absorption in the organisation and the practical details of his great scheme.

For this extraordinary man could not only write huge dramas and put great music to them; he could hold in his hands the many threads of a most difficult and laborious enterprise. He has to finish and make ready the four great operas of the "Ring" while he is building his theatre, maturing his plans, selecting artists, and collecting the gigantic funds necessary for his Festival. He has to inspire antagonistic natures with will to work together, to make lions lie down with lambs, to compose differences, foresee and remove difficulties, while never once letting the reins in his hands become slack for an instant. His letters written during this period, business letters though they may be, have always attracted readers, not only because they tell the story of a marvellous enterprise conceived and carried out by the brain and the indomitable will of one man, but because they show their author as he was, not as he is described by idolaters. The world is recovering from the fit of idol-worship which penitence for an earlier scepticism helped to make unreasonable, and, grown calm after its delirium, can think and speak of Wagner with a sobriety which would have seemed impossible twenty years ago. The present generation, then, should welcome a book like this of Miss Kerr's, which, within reasonable limits, tells them a very wonderful tale, and tells it in the best possible manner.

The inhabitants of Chicago, for aught we know, may have built for themselves a temple consecrated to Wagner such as they offered to build and endow when the Bayreuth plans seemed doomed to failure. Other equally wealthy and enlightened cities may yet do the same; but Bayreuth, one would think, can never lose its unique place. It may come to be no more than a ruined temple, but men could never see it for the first time without something of that breathless feeling with which one sees the Forum or the Parthenon for the first time. It must remain one of the wonders of the world, and people will always want to know the story of its conception and realisation. The book is well printed, and there are several illustrations. It would serve admirably as a present to any young musician or ardent amateur who hopes some day to go to Bayreuth—yes, and also to those who have made that pilgrimage: for these may have forgotten the details of the great legend which they learnt in their few days there, and be very thankful to have it all lucidly put before them in a handy volume.

The Council of the Royal Anthropological Institute has made arrangements for an address by Professor Baldwin Spencer, C.M.G., F.R.S., on the "Life of the Australian Savage," to be given by kind permission of H.M. First Commissioner of Works in the theatre of the Civil Service Commission, Burlington Gardens, W., on Tuesday next, at 8 p.m. To the magnificent volumes of Professor Spencer the scientific world owes its present knowledge of tribes who with the Andamanese stand at the bottom of the scale of human culture. Professor Spencer is a master of the science of anthropology and of the art of descriptive ethnography. He proposes to illustrate his address by means of cinematograph films and by phonograph records, so that in the heart of civilisation will be portrayed, as realistically as modern inventions will permit, the life of the most backward people of the Empire.

More Blackstick Papers

From the Porch. By LADY RITCHIE. (Smith, Elder and Co. 6s. net.)

THE Fairy Blackstick is with us again; her judicious blending of the fairy-like and the edifying proclaims her to be of the good old-fashioned fairy race of a generation ago. This volume might have been entitled "Blackstick Papers Continued," thus recalling Lady Ritchie's delightful book of a few years back; but the Fairy Blackstick is more resourceful in the matter of titles, and she gives us something that is happy indeed, though a trifle solemn—for a fairy. It seems matter-of-fact enough at first glance—is there not a photograph of the porch itself?—until suddenly, with a little shock of awe, we gather its symbolism, and realise, sighing regretfully, that Lady Ritchie lives in her sunset. Here are memories of the Victorian giants such as only those who have drunk at the fount of immortal youth can set down. Here is the kindly smile over the ancient fashions and faded pomposities of a still earlier period. All is gentle and informative, having that true relish for life and books which belongs to an age before literature had become the whole duty of writers.

The aim of the book might be stated in the words of page 196:

This is an age of pictures. There are few people who do not love them. Besides the actual representations of things that we see with our eyes, and the images of the benefactors we have actually known, there are also those pictures which we paint for ourselves, memory-pictures, hope-pictures, wishing-pictures, all depicted upon that mysterious atmosphere which surrounds our life as it passes. It sometimes happens that these visions show us men and women who never knew us, who died long before we were born, and yet who are actually a part of our lives and in some way still with us and full of help and sympathy and encouragement.

Lady Ritchie has a happy way of reviving half-forgotten memories. The gentle ghost of Sainte Jean Françoise de Chantal haunts the ancient streets of Annecy as we wander through them with her. With what affectionate laughter is "the Swan of Lichfield," Anna Seward, recalled. Did she ever dream of the amusement she would provide for a future and less precise generation? A sentence from the "Swan," such as "May never the blight of disease, the vapours of folly, or the canker of vice shed baneful influence over the children of such care," is a pass-word admitting us to the spacious days of Johnson. The essay entitled "L'Art D'Etre Grandpère" tells us of "the first great English geographer," Major James Rennell, and of the letters he wrote to his grandson, which reveal him as something other than explorer and soldier—a delightful and unconventional page from a worthy man's history.

Among better-known names, Dickens appears as a splendid and vivid memory. And even more precious are the few reminiscences of Thackeray and of his connection with the founding of the Cornhill. "The Discourse on Modern Sibyls" is not too modern, as their names will show—George Eliot, Mrs. Gaskell, Currer Bell, and Mrs. Oliphant. Of all Lady Ritchie has something illuminating and often something personal and first-hand to say. Her reminiscences of Mrs. Oliphant are peculiarly interesting. The article on Alfred Stevens is a tribute to a great artist to whom the world has meted out a tardy recognition. The last three papers in the book show Lady Ritchie's interest in philanthropy: "A Meeting in a Garden," telling of an encounter with Canon Barnett, while "Upstairs and Downstairs" and "In My Lady's Chamber" concern the founder of the Metropolitan Association for Befriending Young Servants, Mrs. Senior. There are other papers which we have not touched on, and the same charm is in all. We trust that Lady Ritchie may dwell in the porch for many years yet.

The Cubit and the Span

The Early Weights and Measures of Mankind. By GENERAL SIR CHARLES WARREN, G.C.M.G. (The Committee of the Palestine Exploration Fund. 7s. 6d.)

THIS volume is a further contribution by the author to the study of an interesting subject. Notwithstanding the proverbial leisure of very busy men, it is difficult to understand how the writer, in the course of a really arduous career as soldier, administrator, engineer, and police commissioner, has managed to spare time to accumulate the materials which make the substance of this and his earlier work.

The present book will appeal perhaps to the antiquarian and the historian rather than to the average layman; but to those students whose inclinations or necessities direct them to the kind of inquiry undertaken by Sir Charles Warren, we can confidently recommend it. In many respects the work follows the lines of the classical treatise* of Professor Flinders Petrie. A large part of the volume is devoted to the statement, in tabular form, of the relations existing between the weights and measures of the different geographical units of antiquity; and it is made clearly apparent that the majority of these weights and measures had the nexus of a common derivation. To literary style there is little pretension, and, indeed, literary style would hardly have been appropriate to so condensed a presentation of the facts.

The philosophic background of the study provides its main source of interest to the general reader. The author points out how early systems of measurement, whether of length or weight or capacity, depend upon two factors, of which the first was some dimension of the human body, and the second was some simple system of counting. The use of the latter to express convenient multiples and sub-multiples of the primary measurement must have been a very early, as it certainly was a very important, achievement of human intelligence.

The development of the idea of length into ideas of area and volume is indicated. The last was obviously associated with capacity. Capacity was found to be susceptible of easy measurement in terms of seeds or grains: for seeds and grains had this advantage (over water, for instance), that their number could be counted. The rati or gunga seed (wild liquorice, Abrus precatorius), by its uniformity of size and weight, and by its comparative freedom from change due to desiccation, possessed a special suitability for estimations of capacity; and so originated a most interesting series of numerical relations between various systems of measurement and the weight of the rati. In this connection it is interesting to remember that the relation between bulk, weight and number has been very exactly and scientifically developed in later times. It has been applied to such diverse purposes as physical and chemical measurement, the telling of coin, and the counts of the Census.

Experiment has fixed approximate limits to the weight of the rati, which ranges from 1.31 grains Troy (Sir W. Jones) to 1.91 grains Troy. Sir Charles Warren's estimate is 1.7044 grains Troy. The margin of variation or error is thus still large. The evolution of the successive units, and their connection with and relation to this original measure, form the chief matter of the book, which elucidates much that is important and interesting in the civilisations of the earlier nations of Europe and the East.

General Sir Charles Warren's work should be in the library of all whose interests take them in the direction of antiquarian research. It is a mine of information, and students of metrology will find in it much suggestive and valuable material.

Enemies of the Race

The Snakes of Europe. By G. A. BOULENGER. Illustrated. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

SOME twenty-eight different kinds of snakes, venomous or otherwise, occur within the limits of Europe and on the Western borderlands of Asia, and of these, three only are found in Britain and other Northern countries, the majority, to the number of seventeen, being credited to the Balkan region and neighbouring islands. It is further worthy of notice that not only are the venomous snakes more numerous and more varied in the hotter portions of Europe, but that a fatal sequel to their bite is least frequently recorded in the colder latitudes.

Pre-eminently, Dr. Boulenger is, in the best sense of the words, a cabinet naturalist, and his official position at South Kensington gives him opportunities of comparing reptiles from every part of the world that not even travelled naturalists can hope to emulate. In this compact hand-book he presents, as might be expected, an exhaustive and masterly account of such few snakes as are found in European countries, and he has invoked the aid of illustrations which, while on technical grounds leaving nothing to be desired, undeniably lack much of the attraction that would have belonged to coloured plates.

* Inductive Metrology.

Although the structure and classification of his subjects are his chief concern, the author by no means neglects the popular aspect of their life-story, and he devotes adequate space to an account of their manner of feeding, biting, moving, feigning death and uttering those familiar sounds of hissing or rattling which, however useful they may have been in the forest primeval, must, since the coming of man, have proved a source of danger to them, since, but for this advertising of its whereabouts, many a snake would easily escape notice. The author is severe on the fable of snakes fascinating small birds by the glint of their eyes, a popular superstition to which he denies even a basis of truth, pointing out that keepers in menageries are actually afraid to give live rats as food to valuable snakes because they know that the chances are equal whether the snake devours the rat, or the rat the snake. There is an analogous belief to which Dr. Boulenger makes no reference, and that is the supposed deception of birds by the quivering tongue, which, according to some writers, they mistake for a wriggling worm. Of snake-charmers the author entertains no very high opinion, though he bestows grudging praise on the indifference with which they handle such deadly playthings, attributing their courage to conscious immunity earned by gradual inoculation. As for the potent spell which they claim for their music, Dr. Boulenger dismisses it with the contemptuous remark that anyone can, without the aid of music at all, obtain precisely the same result by sitting in front of a cobra and swaying his body from side to side. The cobra is, however, geographically outside the scope of the present volume; and so also, if we except its supposed occurrence in a viper indigenous to the Island of Cyprus, is the famous bezoar stone, or snake stone, the medicinal virtues of which have been held in such high repute by many nations, ancient and modern. To this matter the author accordingly devotes only a few lines, else, with a wider range of survey, he might have drawn attention to the presence of bezoar stones in the wild goat of the Himalaya, which sportsmen know by the Persian name of "markhor," which means "eater of snakes."

One of the most important popular errors which he takes the timely opportunity of correcting is the danger of attempting to identify dangerous snakes by any such easily recognisable external character as the flattened head commonly associated with the venomous kind. It is true that many deadly snakes have this depressed type of head, but, on the other hand, some of the most dreaded of all, among which mention may be made of the cobra and krait, have not, and would therefore, probably with disastrous consequences, deceive anyone relying on the display of such means of identification.

Taking into due consideration the limitations imposed by his geographical rubric, Dr. Boulenger may be congratulated on having written a very interesting and attractive hand-book.

A Hint on Saving Money

HOW A SHILLING A DAY WILL BE WORTH £300, WITH UNSURPASSED SECURITY.

MANY people could save money and accumulate a modest competence by merely putting aside the money they waste because it does not seem worth while investing it.

For instance, a shilling a day represents over £18 a year, but most men will not bother to accumulate that sum annually because it does not promise a good enough return from investment. As a matter of fact, it represents a capitalised sum of considerable magnitude—a sum, moreover, which increases in value from year to year, and is always available for use upon specially advantageous terms.

As an instance, to a man aged thirty less than this sum represents an immediate capitalised value of £300, which becomes his own property absolutely at the age of forty-five. In the meantime, should he die, that amount is payable to his family, or to anyone else he may appoint to receive it. Also during those fifteen years he can borrow money at the most advantageous terms upon the sums he has invested in this way, so that during the fifteen years in question his savings are earning him money, and he is providing for his own wants in the future and for the welfare of those dependent upon him.

If he decided to invest his savings so that the capitalised value were payable either at death or at the end of twenty-five years, the man of thirty paying £20 5s. 5d. a year would receive £500 at the age of fifty-five, plus any bonus or profit added to the sum assured. Profits at present rate of distribution would be £218, making total sum payable £718—provided, of course, that the bonus is maintained at its present figure—a very good investment result.

These are merely examples of a large number of attractive ways of investing small amounts, and those who wish to take advantage of the new way of saving and investing money with absolute capital security and the many other advantages indicated should write to the North British and Mercantile Insurance Company, 61, Threadneedle Street, London, E.C., whose funds amount to the gigantic total £23,000,000, for Endowment Booklet No. 14. This company, which, according to the Statist, "deservedly enjoys a world-wide reputation for financial strength and liberal treatment of its policy-holders," specialises in all kinds of insurance, and in reply to inquirers will submit for consideration a number of attractive proposals on the lines indicated above. It is, of course, distinctly understood that the sending of such an inquiry to the company in no way implies any obligation on the part of the sender.

Shorter Reviews

Masonic Papers. By JIVANJI JAMSHEDJI MODI, B.A.
(Published by the Author, Mithi Lodge, Colaba, Bombay.)

THE author of this book is a well-known Parsi writer in Bombay, and evidently also an ardent Freemason. His first paper on "The Legendary and the Actual History of Freemasonry" does not, he admits, pretend to be anything more than the notes of a student: it contains a brief summary of the History of Freemasonry as given by Dr. A. G. Mackay in four volumes. It will thus save any student the labour of looking through a mass of material. The "Legend of the Craft" goes back to such ancient names as Lamech, Nimrod, the Tower of Babel, Abraham, Euclid, Egypt, Judæa, Solomon's Temple, Charles Martel, St. Alban, Athelstan, and Edwin, and many more are mentioned. The Legend appears to rank no higher than an Historical Myth, but it has been examined critically by Mr. Modi, and is at least as interesting as many legends to which no historical value can be attached. In dealing with the actual or authentic history of Freemasonry, Mr. Modi goes back to the Roman College of Artificers, where Masonry or Architecture began, and through the Roman connection with Britain treats of early Masonry in Britain, and its later history after the downfall of the Roman Empire. The paper on Zoroaster and Euclid does not aim at comparing their lives, which were separated by centuries. Mr. Modi's object is to show that the study of an exact science like that of Euclid's geometry prepares a young man to be a good and true Zoroastrian as well as to be a good and true Mason. Euclid's teaching and Zoroastrianism he regards as similar to a great extent. In writing of King Solomon's Temple and the ancient Persians, the author has collected a quantity of Oriental lore and learning, and claims a connection, through Judaism, between Christianity and Zoroastrianism. The volume is, on the whole, a remarkable production, which it is profitable to appreciate for its wide range and ambitious aims, though its historical value may not be very great.

The Secret Doctrine in Israel: A Study of Zohar and its Connections. By ARTHUR EDWARD WAITE.
Illustrated. (Wm. Rider and Son. 10s. 6d. net.)

AMONG non-Jewish students of the Kabbalah, or Jewish mysticism, Mr. Waite certainly holds a high place. Of Englishmen he is the first to treat that extraordinary literature of Jewish mysticism—the Zohar—as a whole, and those readers who are interested in such subjects will doubtless extend a hearty welcome to this volume, which is the second of a series of three. Mr. Waite has devoted many years of his life to this study. Twelve years ago he published "The Doctrine and Literature of the Kabbalah." After the lapse of more than a decade comes the second volume. After a further interval—"it may well be that several years will elapse before the task is finished"—a third is to come, the decoding of "the Hermetic side of transmission, properly so called, by which I mean the great texts of alchemy." The present volume must not, however, be considered a sequel to the earlier one. It approaches the question of Zoharic tradition from an entirely different point of view. Among the subjects to which whole chapters are devoted are "The Hidden Church of Israel," "The Majesty of God in Kabbalism," "The Myth of the Earthly Paradise," "The Fall of Man," "The Coming of Messiah," "The Soul in Kabbalism," etc. Mr. Waite also writes of the early students of Kabbalism, the occult sciences, developments of later Kabbalism, and the alleged Christian elements. Jewish mysticism undoubtedly dates from very early times, earlier than those of the Apocrypha, and Mr. Waite is well justified in holding this view as against that of other authorities who consider the Zohar but a mediæval forgery. Ancient or mediæval, however, Jewish mysticism is of the slightest interest or value now, and to the ordinary layman it seems that Mr. Waite and those who share his labours are wasting much time and study which might be devoted to a far better object.

Two Useful Books

IN a few years' time probably it will be necessary to extend some of the reference books to more than one volume; each year they continue to increase in size. "The Literary Year Book" for 1914 (Heath, Cranton and Ouseley, 6s. net) has again extended its pages, and although some details with reference to Public Library returns have been omitted certain additions have been made in the list of Periodical Publications. This list is very good, particularly the section devoted to the Canadian, American, and Indian journals, where the detailed information must be most useful to all writers who have any dealings with the publications of foreign countries.

The division of the book into different parts while still keeping the paging consecutive is an improvement upon the system adopted in previous years, when each section began with page one.

We note that Mr. G. H. Thring still allows to pass uncorrected the wrong spelling of Prince Edmond de Polignac's name in connection with the Nobel Prizes, and the revision we suggested last year in connection with authors' names and publications does not yet appear to have taken place.

"Willing's Press Guide, 1914" is unaltered so far as general appearance and form are concerned; although, of course, it is brought up to date with regard to its information. The scope of this book is very wide; it must be useful to everyone connected with the newspaper world in any capacity, whether as proprietor, contributor, publisher or merely the ordinary seller in shop or street.

Fiction

Dust from the Loom. By EDWARD NOBLE. (Constable and Co. 6s.)

WITH the exception that it would have been advisable occasionally to shift the scene of this novel from the island of Santa Lucia and the training ship Silver Cloud, and to have let us hear a little more about a few other persons in addition to Captain Grant, Señorita Chasca and her chaperon Liseta, the story is very good indeed. In fact it is quite interesting in spite of the small complaint we have made above. Liseta, a thoroughly kind and considerate gentlewoman, makes such a complete muddle of the little English she knows, that she affords great amusement. Her intentions are excellent, but it is doubtful whether she really aids at all the lovers she is so anxious to befriend. There are no very serious complications in the way of the love-making of Captain Grant and Señorita Chasca; another suitor makes his appearance, but as he loves the lady's fortune more than the lady he is quickly disposed of. Don Pedro acts the stern parent, but is quickly brought by the two ladies to see the error of his ways. The story is enjoyable and the setting attractive. Readers in search of a pleasant relaxation should order "Dust from the Loom."

The Vaudevillians. By an Anonymous Author. (John Long. 6s.)

THE inner life of the music-hall world has not hitherto been very fully exploited by the writer of fiction, and we are not quite sure that the present book carries out that idea, for it reads rather as a transcript from life than as a work of imagination based upon the observation of facts such as, we suppose, the novel should be. But from our personal point of view, the present author's method is, however, admirable. Observation and photographic exactitude should be relieved by art and the refinements of literary fancy, of course; but suppose one does not possess these qualities, then to write clearly of a world well known to you and of people with whom you have been intimate is, we readily own, a perfectly sound undertaking. The anonymous author of "The Vaudevillians" is obviously well fitted for her work. She has studied the world of which she writes with infinite care, unsuspected, we presume, by the many personages in the midst of whom she must have wrought her vivid, candid story. If her book is read by the music-hall world we can imagine their surprise would be much the same as when Miss Burney's friends first realised the gifts of the author of "Evelina." Since Mr. Gleig's powerful book on the life of the musical comedies' people, "The Woman in the Limelight," no such clear and boldly truthful picture of real happenings behind the scenes has been given to the public.

The heroine of the book, Coralie Wilson, is an example of a well-known type of music-hall singer who has been bred to the business and knows very early in life all that the world has to tell. She is curiously attractive and sage, yet wildly foolish on occasion: impassioned, kind, wrong-headed and good-hearted all at once. The author makes us see her and understand her every mood and action; indeed, all of the very many characters live and have their being after a fashion by no means common in modern fiction or in novels of any period. The only person who does not quite convince is the devoted Dr. Nicholson, who, after many adventures, is eventually rewarded with the somewhat difficult hand and heart of the music-hall heroine. All readers who care to find themselves in a little-known world, and wish to see the life therein depicted with sympathy, clearness, and an abundant sense of humour, will enjoy "The Vaudevillians"; whether the personages of the novel who are so fearlessly drawn, we should think, from the life, will take equal pleasure in the book is doubtful. But, after all, such well-made caps fit a thousand people, and is it not always our neighbour who is the real owner?

Splendrum. By LINDSAY BASHFORD. (Chapman and Hall. 6s.)

THE object of writing a novel such as "Splendrum" is not easy to imagine. A very large number of the passages will be quite familiar to readers of the daily halfpenny Press; for they would do nicely for the political leaderettes in which cheap journalism indulges. And as these are within reach of every possessor of the modest copper it is not too much to expect that the writer of a romance should refrain from offending his readers' ears with everyday matter of the kind he proffers. The main idea of the story appears to be to show how a son of a rich and self-made man imbibes Radical ideas and in the end turns Tory. The working out, however, is not good. It is crude and unconvincing, and, towards the end is hurried to a climax. Splendrum, senior, as the hard business man, is a more living figure—a type of the person who overcomes all obstacles in his desire and determination to succeed in his business career, and at last is overtaken by a weakness in his own disposition. The book should be read soon, for the events recorded are topical, and not likely to excite much interest a few years, or even a less time, hence.

Mr. J. H. Weeks, the author of "Among Congo Cannibals," has written another book, entitled "Among the Primitive Bakongo." He has spent practically the whole of his life in Equatorial Africa, and has made a careful study of the languages, customs, habits, and beliefs in witchcraft, sorcery, fetishism. The book is well illustrated with extremely interesting photographs, and will be published immediately by Messrs. Seeley, Service and Co.

"The Immortal Memory"

ON the day of publication of this week's issue of THE ACADEMY, or on Monday, tens of thousands of Scots, members of Burns clubs and kindred societies, will meet in banqueting halls to celebrate the one hundred and forty-eighth anniversary of the birth of the author of "A Man's a Man for a' That." There will be the usual perfervid outpourings of dubious eloquence, in which amateur orators will repeat the stale laudations of bygone biographers, and wax sentimental over the trials and privations of the bard. Ninety-nine per cent. of the speakers will refer to the poet as "Robbie," and pat their audiences upon the back in an excess of mutual congratulations at having been born north of the Tweed. Quotations from the poems will be liberally made by men, of whom not one in a thousand could repeat correctly two verses of the song, the chorus of which will terminate their proceedings. The occasion will be made the excuse for bibulous excesses; staid citizens will unbend at the remark, "Ah! Rantin' Robin was a de'il among the lasses," and swap experiences of their own, of which their wives had never heard, of course. So the old, wearisome farce will go on, the memory of the luckless poet debased by the unintelligent enthusiasm of those to whom his name is a catchword, the significance of which is lamentably misunderstood. Were Burns to revisit the glimpses of the moon, one can imagine him looking on at all this merry-making in his name with a mingling of sadness and disgust, turning mournfully away at last, determined never to return.

It is not the memory of the man who wrote "Willie Brew'd a Peck o' Maut" and "The Lass that Made the Bed to Me" that will benefit the world by recollection; it is by nurturing the influence of the prophetic spirit who saw the coming of the day when "man to man the warld o'er shall brithers be" that the real worth of Burns is to be perpetuated. The accepted manner of celebrating him is utterly at variance with the spirit of the lesson that Burns taught the world, and bears as much relation to that lesson as would the wearing of ear-caps by students of Herbert Spencer's philosophy, or the indulgence in opium by admirers of the genius of Francis Thompson. It was the misfortune of the bard that his heart was too tindery, and his stomach unsuited to the bacchanalian demands of his period, and the consequences of this misfortune reflected in his poems are items to be understood and then forgotten. It is not intended to belittle the perfect drinking songs which Burns has bequeathed us, or to find unpleasantness in his more amorous compositions. These have their literary value; but certainly they do not reveal the best that Burns had in him, nor is it upon these that his claim to immortality rests.

His spirit outsoared these trammels of temperament, and sang songs that hold in their words the authentic music of eternal truth. To him it was given to illumine the darkest corners of the human heart; to his inspired yet simple mind came the vision out of which he was to paint for us the likeness of a practicable Utopia, towards the building of which we have already progressed far since his day. The seed he sowed was one of revolt, but it contained growth and sustenance as well, and much that makes for the amelioration of the conditions of the poor, though attributed to other men, is due directly to the echoes of his battle-song of individual independence. Life, whether manifested in a mouse, or a wounded hare, or even a common flower, lay revealed to him in all its aspects, care ever jostling gladness, misfortune treading on the heels of prosperity, beauty and purity smirched by ugliness and filth, laughter mingling with bitter tears. Contemplating the mystery, he saw and understood and spoke, giving new impulse to the doctrine of love by expressing it in terms of universal brotherhood. Despite his occasional excesses, his indiscretions, and his follies, Burns was a pattern according to which any man might safely shape his character, and never do aught but gain.

Every man has his weaknesses; none can hope entirely to escape the distortions of nature resulting from regulated social existence; but these things are easily forgiven when honour and integrity of spirit shine with such splendour as in Robert Burns. His influence is immortal; even though every line he wrote were burned and forgotten, it would remain undiminished; it is to be felt in every movement towards the essential uplifting of the race. Lord Morley has said that six lines from a poem of Burns have done more for mankind than all the leading articles that have been written since newspapers came into being; and this is no exaggerated statement. Eighty-six years ago Carlyle foreshadowed this truth, and the pity is that those who pretend to revere the memory of this rare and mighty spirit should be content and even proud to celebrate that memory by a pitiful annual outburst of roystering.

It is time that this indecent mockery were brought to an end. Rather than that it should continue, let all the Burns clubs and societies be flung into the limbo of exploded anachronisms; the memory of the poet would not suffer. For all practical and ennobling purposes it is enshrined in the bosoms of thousands who treasure it with a reverence only less sensitive than religion, and who endeavour by action, not oratory, to urge mankind forward by example towards the ideal for which the poet bade men pray. A. H. D.

Mr. Erskine MacDonald proposes to publish a series of "Modern Playbooks," to be edited by Mr. Stephen Phillips. He will make his selection from unacted plays for the most part, and the series will be confined to new English dramatists, who have had less encouragement to appear in book form than their Continental brethren. Writers of this form of literature should communicate with the publisher (and not the editor), in the first instance, at Malory House, Featherstone Buildings, London, W.C.

Some New French Books

M. ETIENNE REY is a young author who has already written what he considers quite definite things on love. He has just published a small, elegant volume called "Maximes Morales et Immorales" (Bernard Grasset, 3fr. 50). Some of these reveal him as being certainly very young, for they are presumptuous and have a tendency towards definitiveness—two very youthful characteristics. In others, he has discovered with much satisfaction some rather too evident truths. However, we cannot reproach him with this too much, as precisely the great inconvenience of writing thoughts and remarks is that many other people have thought and remarked them before you! M. Rey also tries to disguise himself in the garb of a blasé Don Juan, whilst in truth he simply shows that he is specially subject to the usual naïf masculine cynicism. He strives towards originality. He is not shy of paradoxes, and is not averse from a certain voluntary and cold scepticism, which evidently in his eyes is the stamp of perfect modernism. His book reveals a very precocious experience of life, and it does not lack a certain audacity in treating of subjects which have furnished matter of reflections, remarks, and "Pensées" to such writers as La Bruyère, La Rochefoucauld, Stendhal, and Balzac. Nevertheless, M. Rey has the merit of saying certain things with a frankness, with a cynicism, which are often lacking in the above-mentioned authors. For, in the past, it was not the fashion to treat sentimentality and sensuality with such frankness.

Women will especially appreciate the "Maximes Morales et Immorales," for women often like to be spoken to, and also to be spoken of, with a tranquil brutality, as it gives them a pleasantly exaggerated idea of the importance of their little persons; they will certainly be delighted when M. Rey says: "Il ne faut jamais battre une femme avec une fleur. Il faut la battre avec un bâton." They will no doubt fully approve the masculine egotism of this remark: "Il ne manque aux femmes pour être tout à fait charmantes que de savoir souffrir en silence." They will sorrowfully acknowledge that he is right when he observes that "La vertu des femmes tient pour beaucoup à l'ignorance où sont les hommes de leurs moments de faiblesse." And, of course, all women know in their own hearts that "La pudeur est une question d'éclairage"!

M. Rey's work is not, however, limited to reflections on the eternal question. It contains some really original ideas, which denote certainly rare facilities of observation, and real possibilities of humour. One cannot help laughing when he affirms that a husband has no need to avenge himself of his unfaithful wife. The other man will do so for him. In short, his book contains a pretty lesson of scepticism and indifference for the use of such persons who have not yet found out that those are the only ways of staying the many blows of life.

M. Marc Elder has had the pleasure of obtaining the prix Goncourt for his last book, "Le Peuple de la Mer" (Oudin, 3fr. 50). This work contains some fine, vigorous sketches of the psychology, and even of the physiology, of the fishing population in Lower Brittany. The crudest and most elementary of passions seem to lurk in the hearts of his heroes. They are envious, malevolent, jealous and bestial. A goodly part of the couleur locale of the "Peuple de la Mer" is furnished by scenes of drunkenness, which are, unhappily, very exact. It is divided into three parts: the first, called "La Barque," describes the envy of the fishers for their luckier comrade who, by his thrift, has been able to buy a fine new boat—and this simply conducts them to murder. The second part, "La Femme," is the picture of the rude passions of these weather-beaten, bronzed men. It is as melodramatic as the preceding, and is further rather licentious, and even slightly puerile. Fisherwomen of Lower Brittany are not in the habit of bathing in the costume of Eve, thus provoking men to kill each other for the beauties they espy amidst the cool, blue waves! Women of Lower Brittany rarely take any baths at all—and this lack of cleanliness is perhaps just as much to be deplored as M. Marc Elder's striving towards voluptuous evocations! The third part is devoted to "La Mer," and describes the insatiate craving of the sea for victims, and this is rather roman-feuilleton. Nevertheless, M. Elder possesses some real gifts of strength, sobriety, and fitness of expression, and no doubt will succeed, in his future works, in avoiding the above defects.

Amongst the latest French publications, one of the most interesting is "François Villon," by M. Pierre Champion, the son of the well-known publisher. He has not contented himself with drawing the life of Villon, but has endeavoured to make us know all the different milieux he passed by, the society in which he found his protectors and his victims, the Paris which he dearly loved. M. Pierre Champion goes on to say, in his preface: "I have tried to guide my reader through the Paris in which he used to wander, showing him the particularities of the street and of the life of Paris which the poet has mentioned, and showing him also what a student of that time would have seen in Paris." It is therefore not surprising that, having composed his work according to this plan, M. Champion's "François Villon" should prove the most diverting, instructive and captivating of reading. He has remarkably analysed the genius, sentimentality, and sensibility of Villon, and some curious illustrations greatly add to the interest of this fine book.

M. Léon Werth has undergone, or has imagined himself as having undergone, an operation, and this incident has led him to write a book, "La Maison Blanche" (Fasquelle, 3fr. 50), prefaced by the virulent Octave Mirbeau. The latter, with his systematic exaggeration, declares that M. Léon Werth, "with his soft yet ferocious eyes, is a wild beast." Do not, however, be alarmed. The "wild beast" appears very quiet, for he has been chloroformed and operated upon; and, far from roaring, he is perfectly content to lie for days in his bed, very occupied in getting well again. M. Léon Werth, in this book, which is his first, depicts the life in a private nursing-home; he positively revels in the description of his impressions during his stay at "La Maison Blanche," which has nothing whatever to do with the residence of the President of the United States of America, as one might think. After having endured innumerable hardships, after having known only the sadder aspects of life, the home, the "maison blanche," appears to him as a sort of haven; even his illness, his operation, seem real godsend, and the quiet, regular, methodical days of his convalescence fill him with an ever-increasing wonder and interest. During his stay at the home he discovers himself, he discovers life, he discovers how to draw from his illness "a lesson of serenity and joy." He learns to care for his illness, and that is rare, "for nobody loves illness for what it contains of the unexpected, of the comical, of the joyous." He notes carefully each detail of his daily life whilst within the precincts, and he does so after the manner of Charles Louis Philippe and of Marguerite Audoux. His style is simple, and concise—perhaps a trifle laboriously so. Each little incident takes a really exaggerated importance; this too close dissection of a sick body and brain is astonishingly irritating, and at length becomes almost unbearable. "La Maison Blanche" is a great deal more the autobiography of a névropathe than that of a wild beast.

MARC LOGE.

Musical Comedy—and After

BY ALFRED BERLYN.

WHAT is to follow musical comedy? The question has been asked a good many times at intervals during the last two or three years; and thus far the only practical answer has been, "More musical comedy." But the time is near at hand when a better answer will have to be found. Our little systems, even of light entertainment, have their day; and the day of musical comedy, prolonged as it has been, cannot last for ever.

The first warning of its wane was given some time ago, when its patrons, until then quite content with its meandering inconsequence, developed enough of the critical spirit to demand of it something in the nature of a coherent plot. That meant that the thing in its original form had begun to pall, and was a reminder that in the world of amusement, as in other worlds, change is a law of life. In response to the new demand, plots thickened to a certain extent, and the introduction of the languorous valse-theme, since worked to death, added for a while a fresh element of attraction. But all that only helped the public to the discovery that the more musical comedy changes, the more it is the same thing. The deadly monotony of its simpering chorus-girls and their idiotic squad of attendant "nuts," the antics of its low comedians, the stereotyped stupidities of its amatory imbroglios and eternal interchanges of sweethearts and wives, were bound sooner or later to get on the nerves of the least exacting of playgoers; and there are not wanting signs that the last stage—the stage of public boredom—will be reached in a future which is perilously near. Then, having outstayed its welcome, musical comedy, as we know it now, will go.

There is little reason to hope that a lasting successor has been found in the hotchpotch which, with scant respect for one of the most characteristic products of the lighter French theatre, we have the hardihood to call a revue. If we possessed in this country the special bent of genius and temperament that go to the making of the delightful but essentially Parisian brand of entertainment to which that name rightfully belongs, it would be a different matter. But our home-made revue, so called, is at its worst a sorry show from any point of view; and at its best not much more than a vehicle for the exhibition of negroid dances, daring draperies, and go-as-you-please buffoonery. But for the timely assistance of the "ragtime" craze, the English revue would already by this time have been as dead as mutton; and its chance of surviving the extinction of that craze is not worth calculating. But, in any case, the revue, with its spectacular trappings and its frankly music-hall appeal, is a thing of the variety theatre, and is in no way qualified to supply the place of musical comedy in what have hitherto been, and still for the present remain, its recognised shrines.

What, then, ought the purveyors of our theatrical light refreshment to do? It is "up to" them not only to anticipate the inevitable demand of their patrons for a change of menu, but to be ready to meet that demand by the provision of acceptable fare. Theirs is the duty of looking forward; but some of us, who cherish memories of jocund hours spent in the theatre in days when musical comedy was not, may be tempted to wonder why it never occurs to them to look back. If they did, they might become impressed by the fact that the old-time burlesque-extravaganza at its best—and even at its second-best—was an infinitely brighter, wittier, more sparkling, and more humorously satisfying entertainment than its present-day successor. They might be influenced by the witness of playgoers who revelled in those joyous orgies of really droll fooling—those burlesques that actually burlesqued something, and did it with cleverness and point—whereby the Gaiety of former days made itself the hub of laughter-loving London. They might ponder the secret of the unflagging sprightliness and spontaneous "go" of a "Little Dr. Faust," a "Little Don Cæsar," a "Bohemian Cyurl," and a "Young Rip van Winkle," and remind themselves of the scope which those gorgeous nonsense-revels gave to the comic genius of artists of the calibre of Edward Terry, Fred Leslie, and the inimitable Nellie Farren. And then it might occur to them to wonder whether it was not possible and profitable to "try back"—in short, to make the bold experiment of reviving burlesque.

Of course, if the thing were done at all, with any hope of recapturing the old spirit, it would need to be done superlatively well—and there, no doubt, would be the rub. So far as the players are concerned, it ought not to be impossible to find the right people among those whose comic talent is at present employed in eking out the banalities of the Anglicised revue and the up-to-date musical comedy. But, should the hour strike for the revival, would it bring us the writers—the competent successors of Byron, Farnie, Reece, and Burnand? As to that, there has grown up among the younger playgoing generation a false tradition that nothing more admirable than a perpetual jingle of puns and word-twistings went to the work of these supreme burlesque-makers. That, as their elders know, is a libel. Puns, indeed, there were in plenty, some of them welcomed for their genuine wit, others extorting the tribute of a howl of laughing protest by their ingenious enormity. But there was a good deal more in it than that. The rhymed couplets and the incidental songs were full of real humour and point, and the “books” of these merry burlesques were as exhilarating as champagne, charged as they were with the spirit of fun and impish parody. Let us get “books” like them to-day—even omitting the puns, if necessary, as a concession to latter-day taste—and the revived burlesque would be a revelation to the surfeited and yawning habitués of the musical comedy theatres.

It would be better still, no doubt, if it were possible to find successors to the gems of light operetta and opera-bouffe which Paris used to send us in such profusion two or three decades ago. But Offenbach and Lecocq, Audran and Planquette have unhappily left no heirs, and we may look as vainly to-day for another “Grande Duchesse,” another “Madame Angot,” another “Olivette,” or another “Cloches de Corneville,” as for a new “Pinafore” or a new “Mikado.” But, meanwhile, the successor to musical comedy has to be found; and, failing the invention of a new form, there might be many less hopeful experiments than a revival, with the necessary modern improvements, of the old burlesque. Is there any among the managers who will have the enterprise to lead the way, and put the matter to the test?

In the Learned World

IN the current number—an unusually large and interesting one—of the Hellenic Society's Journal, Mr. K. T. Frost deals at length with the explanation of the Atlantis legend which he foreshadowed some five years ago in a letter to the Times. His view is briefly, that the story told in the Timæus and Critias of Plato about a great island beyond the Pillars of Hercules or Straits of Gibraltar, the inhabitants of which tried to conquer all the countries about the Mediterranean until overwhelmed in “a day and a night” by a catastrophe which sank it under the sea, is in fact a reminiscence of the sea-power of Crete. He shows with fair conclusiveness that the silly people who have tried to see some mystic revelation in this story have failed to notice that it implies the existence of a civilisation in Greece at least as advanced and perhaps better equipped than that of the fabled Atlanteans, that Crete did possess a sea-power little inferior to our own at the present day and made use of it to attempt to raid Egypt, and that the great catastrophe of the sack of Cnossos and the burning of Minos' palace was brought about by raiders from Greece, whose leader may have been the legendary hero, Theseus. Its weak points, of which Mr. Frost makes no secret, are that when Plato wrote the Mediterranean world remembered a good deal about Minos and the luxury of his Cretan capital, and that neither Plato nor Solon, whom he drags into court as his witness for the Egyptian traditions on the point, ever seem to have connected him with the Atlantis legend. There is also the likelihood, which Mr. Frost fully acknowledges, that Plato invented the whole story ad hoc, and one would like some scientific authority for the statement which he says is “geologically certain” that no great subsidence in the Atlantic or Mediterranean has taken place since palæolithic times. Yet Mr. Frost's theory is certainly taking, and it is much to be hoped that some archaeologist—Sir Arthur Evans for choice—will tackle it seriously.

Those interested in magic—I mean from the archaeological and not from the charlatanic point of view—will also do well to read the account which M. A. Delatte gives in the last number of the Bulletin de Correspondance Hellénique of a marble sphere of about a foot in diameter now in the Museum at Athens. It is covered with scenes and inscriptions in low relief, which evidently have some magical meaning or intention, and which M. Delatte tries to connect with the many Magic Papyri in a mixture of Greek, Hebrew, and Egyptian, now scattered among the different museums of Europe and generally assigned to the early Christian centuries. It is certain that such of the words in Greek characters appearing on the sphere as are legible seem to be constructed on the same principle as the galimatias or gibberish to be found in these papyri; but none of them, I think, is exactly the same, and their appearance in both places may be accounted for by supposing them to be corruptions of some forgotten language such as Hebrew. One of the most extraordinary things about M. Delatte's sphere, however, is the art of the figures there carved which, debased and degraded as it is, is so like that of the corresponding figures on the small coffers or boxes coming from the Duc de Blacas' collection and now in the British Museum, that it is hard to suppose they are not from the same hand. The British Museum coffers, which von Hanmer declared were “baphometric,” or in other words were used by the Knights Templars to enclose the little idols which the Inquisitors accused them of worshipping under the name of Baphomet, have been pronounced forgeries, and therefore withdrawn from exhibition. Is the marble sphere of Athens a forgery also? If not, what was its use and how did it come into Athens? If genuine, it is almost the only material, as apart from literary, relic of the sorcery of the ancient world which has come down to us.

In the Revue des Etudes Grecques, M. A. de Ridder examines at some length recent attempts to explain and restore the sculptured groups of the Parthenon friezes which have of late exercised many Hellenists, including Professor Studniczka, M. de Boissonas-Collignon, and our own Mr. A. H. Smith. He leans, however, most to the theory of the Greek scholar, M. Svoronos, who thinks that the Western frieze was filled with the dispute between Poseidon and Athena, or rather her triumphant march after her coronation by Nike or Victory directly after her coming-forth from the head of Zeus. The lost part, according to him, must have included figures of Poseidon and Hera on one side, and Dionysos and his spouse Cora on the other, with the rising and setting sun beyond all. This seems to accord fairly with the account of Pausanias, and ought to be borne in mind by everyone visiting the ruins or studying any of the now numerous reproductions of them. M. de Ridder sums up the situation fairly when he says that if M. Svoronos' views are not well-founded, he has at any rate shown the traditional interpretation of the groups hitherto current to be a good deal less so.

In the same Revue is to be found the representation of a headless female figure in ivory coming, we are assured, from the excavations of M. Tsountas at Mycenae. It shows someone, perhaps a goddess, seated on a rock and dressed in a semi-transparent garment reaching to her heels in loose folds, but fitting closely to the body above the waist where it terminates in a kind of corset leaving the breasts exposed. A large necklace with ray-like pendants completes the costume which is, as may be seen, that worn by the so-called serpent-goddess whose figurines were discovered by Sir Arthur Evans at Cnossos. That she was the same goddess who was worshipped in the early Christian centuries at Laodicea and elsewhere in Asia Minor as shown by Sir William Ramsay seems very possible, and it is probable from the pose of such arms as remain in M. Tsountas' ivory that they originally brandished snakes. But what is the symbolism of this figure? Do the snakes represent, as they did to the Semites and perhaps the older nations from whom they borrowed after their fashion their earliest beliefs, the powers of evil overcome by the good, or are they merely symbolical of the earth into which the serpent creeps? The answer to this, if a satisfactory one could be obtained, would be a key to many of the most pressing problems of archæology at the present time.

F. L.

Chief Kenlon, of the New York Fire Brigade, faces day by day the most difficult problem of any fire chief in the world. He is probably the greatest expert on the question of fire-fighting at this moment, and his volume, entitled "Fires and Fire-fighters," which Mr. Heinemann publishes this week, contains some most exciting stories.

Notes for Collectors

THE dispersion of the gathered treasures of other days has begun more vigorously than ever this year—in London, at least.

At Sotheby's there have already been more than a dozen important sales, and an equal number are already advertised—sales which will contain many rare books and fine prints, such as the Americans are now so keen in purchasing.

At Foster's, in Pall Mall, there are the weekly picture sales of old and more recent masters, in which many an attractive work by the now fully appreciated Etty, or Bonnington, or Morland, may come up. Each Thursday, too, will be found all sorts of antiques, furniture, china, old silver, and Sheffield plate, and all the delicately wrought wares of the eighteenth century. The same auctioneers are selling, on January 27, part of the contents which have been removed from Walmer Castle to the Grange, at Walmer, by direction of Earl Brassey.

If you care to go further afield, a collection of rare domestic pieces will be found at Sandhill Park, Somerset, where Morris, Sons, and Peard are selling the antique furniture, books, and so forth from the collection of Sir Wroth Lethbridge, on February 10 and following day.

Puttick and Simpson have a valuable library to offer on January 29, and so on, until we might make a list of thirty or so interesting dispersions now about to take place.

With the renewal of the sales and the general activity of collectors come several books likely to be of great service in this connection. Those with which we deal for the moment will prove of most use to the amateur who desires to fill his cabinets and his rooms rather than to the accomplished connoisseur, who generally holds his own views, right or wrong, upon such matters.

"MORE ABOUT COLLECTING," published by Stanley Paul at 5s. net, gives us the latest work of Sir James Yoxall upon a subject about which he used to write so agreeably in "London Opinion." His taste includes every form of decorative antique, from brasswork even unto the lacemaker's bobbin. On each and every topic he has some little experience to tell us, often humorous, often useful, always clearly stated, and usually illustrated with pleasant line drawings or reproductions of photographs, so that all who read must learn something from his light and cheerful dissertations. He prides himself on original research, and, although his conclusions are such as many collectors have long since arrived at, there is a personality and pleasure in the way he tells of his adventures, which will make his book interest very many readers.

"THE CHINA COLLECTOR."

In this work, published by Herbert Jenkins, Ltd., at 5s. net, Mr. H. W. Lewer sets forth a whole host of useful facts in regard to the earlier porcelains of the English factories. His method is in no way affected by the previous publication of a considerable number of books which cover the same ground. He approaches the matter with considerable courage, and, if he tells us no news, he certainly very clearly and compactly states a number of important points which all collectors of our native ceramics would do well to bear in mind. Mr. Lewer is particularly fortunate in the reproductions of the photographs and the distinguished outward appearance of his book.

As to the full collection of marks, these have, of course, been shown us more or less correctly many times before. But they are now set forth in so convenient a form that all who desire this sort of guide in their collecting would do well to keep this volume ready to hand. Of course, it is recognised that marks are the first and easiest part of an old piece of china to forge, yet other matters have proved genuine the various designs used by potters and potteries are of intense value and highly informing.

"THE FIRST STEPS IN COLLECTING."

The two excellent books we have mentioned appeal to the beginner in the art and craft of collecting, but Mrs. Grace M. Vallois' work is candidly addressed to those who can hardly stand alone in the complicated world of antiques. T. Werner Laurie, Ltd., publish the volume at 6s., so, like the others we have mentioned it is well within the reach of all those who are interested in the subject. We remember the time, not so long ago, when it was impossible to turn to any inexpensive volume for the slightest information on the subject of antique domestic decoration. But that has changed. Books such as the present, with its sixty-one illustrations, are now rapidly issued from the press. If there still be any persons of taste who are not collectors already, we would say, "Courage, mes infants, and begin at once." There are many other admirable guides still on our bookshelves which call for later notice.

E. M.

Cloven Tongues

THERE is an insect which people avoid, whence is derived the verb 'to flee.' This etymology, though advanced by a Fellow of Christ Church, Oxford, is not strictly accurate. It is true that the noun and the verb are connected, but not in the way Lewis Carroll invites us to believe. The real connection is one of common ancestry; for both the verbs "to fly" and "to flee" and the nouns "fly" and "flea" are from the same Anglo-Saxon root found in fleogan, "to escape."

We have selected this word to exemplify a process which we will call the cleaving or divarication of sounds, a process which has played a most important part in the evolution of language. When the genius of humanity set himself the task of finding names "for all cattle and for the fowl of the air and for every beast of the field," he was faced by the difficulty of shortage of material. A few names existed ready to hand, fashioned by nature herself; but what were they among so many? It is true that one name may serve for many things, yet there is a limit to the principle of communism in nomenclature. Words are surprisingly elastic, yet they have a breaking point. If a name is required to mean too much, it will end by meaning nothing at all.

That the difficulty was solved in due time we know, and also that no name was ever arbitrarily attached to its nominate; yet by what miracle have the few score of names provided by nature been multiplied so as to suffice for every animate and inanimate object of which man can think?

The multiplication of names was effected by slow degrees, through the alternate segregation and congregation of parts of the same nation. When some tribe of nomad humanity became so numerous "that the land was not able to bear them that they might dwell together," it became necessary for the community to break itself into two, and for these to lead forth their flocks in different directions under different leaders. There would now be two tribes speaking the same tongue, yet holding no communication. Hence would arise differences of speech; for the children of each tribe, mishearing the sounds uttered by their parents, or failing of that complete co-ordination of the nerves of ear and tongue by which adults can exactly reproduce the sounds heard, would alter them, sometimes in the same, sometimes in different directions; and, when in the course of time these two tribes, abandoning their nomadic life and with it the need of separation, became united once more, they would find many words in use among them sounded in two different ways. Now, if it chanced that any of these names was already performing the functions of two, these functions were now accommodated with two functionaries; the separate forms acquired separate uses, and the divarication of sound was used to signify a divarication of meaning. Thus, for example, the Anglo-Saxon race, at some period of their history, were released from the necessity of calling all fugitive insects "fleas," as children still do, since for the winged kind they had one name and for the unwinged another.

This example illustrates the process of divarication in its simplest form. Sometimes, however, the various shapes of a word are far more numerous. Thus of the word grave, we have the collateral forms groove and grove (properly "a cutting through trees"), also the Greek graph and the Latin scribe. But undoubtedly the most highly divaricated word in the language is the Anglo-Saxon sceran "to cut." This word appears in its simple form in scar, score, shear, shire, share, shear, shore, sheer, and, with dental suffix, in skort, shirt, skirt, and sherd.

In view of these facts, we must beware of speaking carelessly of any change in the pronunciation of words as decay or degradation. A very striking example of this fault is to be found in Mr. Bridges' recent book on "The Pronunciation of English." In this work, the writer makes frequent references to the degradation and deterioration of English, yet in no part does he give an adequate definition of the meaning he attaches to these terms. If he means that all change in the pronunciation of words is decay, then the decay of the language and the growth of the language are identical processes, which is absurd. If, however, he means that some changes are for the better and some for the worse, then he should make clear his standard of excellence. Thus, of the two current modifications of the word mistress, namely, Mrs. and Miss, he may hold one to be the result of decay and the other of growth. But which does he believe to be which? Here he leaves us in complete uncertainty. Or, possibly he may hold that any change involving contraction or loss of sounds is decay and deterioration; yet this view would lead him to unwelcome results; for, if loss of sounds be deterioration, then acquisition of sounds must be amelioration, and we must believe that the English trousers is a better word than its ancestor the French trousses, since it has acquired an additional sound; or that the English cellar is better than the Latin cella, for the same reason. Yet this belief we know that Mr. Bridges does not hold since he protests against the pronunciation of Victoria as "Victorier."

It is Mr. Bridges' avowed intention to arrest the changes which are taking place in the contemporary pronunciation of English by the introduction of a new phonetic alphabet. We have nothing to say against his alphabet, which has many excellent and attractive features, but against the end which the writer hopes to achieve by its introduction. The whole of Mr. Bridges' argument is based upon an assumption which he makes no attempt in any part of his book to demonstrate, namely, that all changes in the current pronunciation of English are from the better to the worse. That there are reasons for doubting the validity of this assumption we have attempted briefly to indicate.

It would, indeed, be possible to argue that language has now grown far enough, having found names for all things in heaven and earth and under the earth, and that all further growth must prove useless and unfruitful and had better be checked. Just as the gardener clips off the tops of his beanstalks when they have reached the extremities of his beanpoles, so we might propose to clip off the excrescent shoots of language now that its branches have extended in all directions to the confines of reality. But have they? Is not this an audacious and unwarrantable assumption? How dare we assert of the future what has never been true of the past, that no new thought will be born to seek utterance, that the brain of the creator has grown tired, and that the springs of evolution have run dry? Is reality indeed a dead beanpole, or is it not rather a living tree, whose form can only be followed by a language itself living and growing?

JOHN RIVERS.

Mr. Bertram Forsyth has arranged for "The Shepherdess Without a Heart" to be played at the New Theatre every afternoon, Saturdays included; extra special evening performances will be given every Wednesday and Saturday at 8 o'clock.

France and Humanity

THE inaugural lecture given on Monday, January 19, at the London School of Economics and Political Science, by Professor Mantoux, was an exceptionally interesting one, both for its subject and for the manner of treatment. The title of the lecture was "Le Rôle de la France dans les Grands Mouvements Européens du XIXe Siècle." The chair was taken by the French Ambassador, who briefly introduced the lecturer. M. Mantoux responded to the initial applause in the true spirit of the title he had chosen; that applause, he said, he must share with the great French historical school, represented in the past by such names as those of Fustel de Coulanges, Sorel and Gabriel Monod, and in the present by Ernest Lavisse; but chiefly it belonged to the native-land of all fertile thought, to France herself. The English sympathy for France was not due to mere vicinity, nor even to the interest inspired by a stormy history. It went out to the embodiment of a civilisation and an ideal. France may be loved or hated; she cannot be ignored.

M. Mantoux proceeded to expand the thesis that France is the work-shop of ideas. She does not always invent them, but she gives them that human and universal touch by which they survive and become efficient. The French Revolution may have been full of dangerous mistakes, but it presented mankind with certain principles, which till then had been the property of a few isolated minds, but were to be thenceforth living, universal and irresistible forces. One of these was the principle of nationality, with its two component principles of liberty and unity. Conquered Europe used the indiscreetly lavished gift to defeat her conqueror. But the fruit of the Revolution is still coming to birth—in Egypt, China, and wherever civilisation has lagged or rested. England is changing before our eyes, beneath the unspent buffetings of 1789.

Socialism began in Germany, and in that country to-day counts its largest number of adherents. France, however, is the land that is watched by the world to see if Socialism can regenerate society. Frenchmen can carry out a doctrine to its remote consequences; they dare experiment; they can state a thesis clearly and give it universal application. Romanticism, which is much more than a literary doctrine, began with Rousseau and impregnated the whole nineteenth century. Victor Hugo's Napoleon III was a creature of romance, Alexander I made his own romance; the revolutionaries of the period, such as Blanqui, come straight out of plays or novels.

Clearness and universality, the distinguishing marks of the French spirit, have their dangers and disadvantages. Great questions—of faith, for instance—are not shelved; the contradictory theses are clearly stated, "la question est abordée de front" and "not peace, but a sword" results. France has been rent and torn; she has suffered the most terrible of catastrophes in the search for truth. The revival of the old conflict between rich and poor, in its universal aspect, belongs to France.

In one direction the French qualities have nothing but advantages. If France has not invented everything in science, she at least supplies us with our conception of the world; her contributions to knowledge are never isolated phenomena, and their destination is made plain when they are presented. To philosophy, as to diplomacy, France has given its language: "la langue de la philosophie est pour toujours cartésienne."

M. Mantoux was not afraid to quote Lord Morley's dictum that the essential French characteristic is vanity. Frenchmen are not afraid to praise France, and, while they do it with knowledge and delight, we are never tired of listening. M. Mantoux has praised France with charm and sincerity, and we have listened with delight.

The Valley of the Shadow

THESE are no rueful portals at the Valley of the Shadow; you enter it unawares, and are already deep within its recesses before its embrace is felt. Life, which is normally an unrealised medium, becomes by imperceptible gradations first a labour and then a combat. Hour after hour the wheels of action move more and more stiffly, and clog and interlock as you drive your jaded brain through its daily task, until at last you know that you are beaten; and with a feeling almost of relief you cast all responsibility aside and fling yourself down upon the bed and give up the struggle. In the torpid interval that follows you drift incoherently through a world with which you have no concern. Someone must have brought a doctor; for you remember being asked questions; and there was an operation; for you recall the thin sweet taste of the anæsthetic under which you died. You were sure of death and rushed gladly towards it, as to the way of escape; time ceased; and you dwelt abandoned but free from pain at the bottom of some abysmal depth of space.

By some means unknown your sense of numb contentment began to give way to wonder at your own continued identity. The body, of which you are most literally tenant for life, reasserted its claims upon the soul; and you sped upwards to the surface of consciousness as a diver returns from the deep. The roar of the ocean died away to a far-off murmur; it ceased utterly; and you awoke to torment.

"In the morning thou shalt say, 'would God it were even,' and at even thou shalt say, 'would God it were morning.'" When you reach that stage, nothing matters; the scanty minutes of drugged sleep and the endless hours of waking pain, with doctor and nurse moving dimly across the field of vision like figures in a nightmare, lead inevitably to the first great lesson to be learned in the Valley of the Shadow. Will you live? You neither know nor care. Pain has destroyed, fear; and you understand why the pathway of death becomes easy to the dying.

The mere habit of living helps you over the worst phase of convalescence, when you exist without volition, simply because it is easier to keep on than to stop. Your attitude towards the world is purely negative. From time to time you think of the things in which you once found pleasure and wonder how you came to take delight in them; the delirious explosion of energy in the cricket field when you jumped out to the fast ball and hit it high over the bowler's head to the canvas; breezy days on Welsh mountains and Scottish lakes; nights at the opera when your nerves tingled with an exquisite joy as the laughing cascade of the Figaro overture rippled from the violins. These also are vanity and vexation of spirit.

The first sign of the turn in the tide is a prosaic interest in food; you think long and seriously of dinner. With appetite comes hope, and with hope, laughter. Once more you are glad to see the faces of your friends, and the sound of their voices is pleasant. You begin to read again, and approach old books with new eyes.

A little experience is the strongest basis of sympathy. We talk glibly of the horrors of war, but our vocabulary is more vigorous than our thought, and we fail to realise the horrors of which we speak. After all, wars are a long way off and the tales of the special correspondent are mellowed by distance. We like to believe that the worst things never happen, so that the pages of a Crane or a Zola awake in us no acute repugnance. But when we have once seen our own flesh cut by the knife of the surgeon and bedaubed with blackening blood, a revulsion seizes us. Thereafter, when we think of a battle we see more than the smoke and the splendour and the excitement; we see the mangled soldiers helpless in the sodden grass and trampled upon by flying horses. We remember how hard it was to support our own share of misery, although made easier by all that love and skill could do to help us; and a passionate anger rises in our hearts.

But this insight into the meaning of anguish is a gain for the future rather than the present. In the early dawn of health the mind is purely receptive; you have lost the alert contradictory attitude which leads a man to wrest authors to his own purpose, and you desire only such books as you can appreciate at once. That modern form of psychological novel in which the story revolves endlessly upon itself, and the interest depends upon subtle analysis of character, is entirely incongruous with your mood. You need something with progress and an outlook in it, and fall back upon the brisk narrators of fiction, to learn how much merit can exist in a pot-boiling novel by Dumas. The magnificent cheerfulness of Dickens compels you to enjoy even the dull parts of "David Copperfield," just as the true Wordsworthian enjoys the ecclesiastical sonnets. Scott, too, is a sure refuge, although with a difference; when you were at large in the world you liked him better in his life than in his works; but when your horizon is bounded by four walls, the sombre close of Lockhart's prose epic seems to throw its shadow backward over the whole book, and you turn away with relief to the crisp rattle of Quentin Durward and Ivanhoe.

At last the day comes when you are allowed to sit up at the window to envy the men who are walking about alive in the streets unconscious of their own happiness. Particularly do you envy the people going past in motors; not so much those who sit on the cushioned seats behind and submit to be blinded by dust and stupefied by the roar of the engine in their irrational desire to get from point A to point B; but rather the driver, the only man who is not plainly wishing he were somewhere else. He alone is entirely satisfied to be there, to drive at a speed bordering ever more closely upon the suicidal, to cope with faulty ignitions and slipping gears, and to "burn with a hard gem-like flame." He may be wearing out, but he is not rusting out; and after a few weeks of stagnation, you have no doubts as to which process is preferable.

Your first time "up" soon comes to an end. When you are lying down you feel so vigorous that you would willingly undertake to climb mountains, but a single flight of stairs makes you realise your impotence, and you are glad to get back to the bed you were so impatient to quit. Still, you have gained something, and will gain more day after day, until the time comes when you can walk unattended in the streets and thrill with the contact of humanity, and expand to the warm welcome of the sun; and then the Valley of the Shadow is past, and once more fearing no evil, you wander gladly down the paths of life. F. C. M.

The Theatre

"The Darling of the Gods" at His Majesty's Theatre

THE test of ten years of time is rather a severe one for such a dramatic piece as the Japanese romance in five acts by Mr. Belasco and Mr. Long. But, thanks to the care with which it is now produced and the ability and sincerity shown in the acting, "The Darling of the Gods" has doubtless started on one more long span of success.

The tragedy of the passing of an antique and out-moded method of government, as shown by the personal misfortunes of the doomed representatives of the old order, is a legitimate and inspiring subject for a stage play, but it requires to be treated with infinite dignity and poetry and beauty. On again seeing this story of the extinction of the Samurai of old Japan, we felt the fine conception, the grand idea of the play, but we missed to some extent the simplicity and tenderness and grace and bravery we had imagined inherent in its action. Memory is apt to play us these tricks, and we set out expecting more than we have a right to do, even when the theatre is His Majesty's and the manager so accomplished a protagonist as Sir Herbert Tree.

It will be remembered that the period is said to be that of 1860, and that Kara, the outlaw prince and leader of the Samurai, Mr. George Relph, and his small band are being hunted by the Government, led by Zakkuri, a famous Minister of State, Sir Herbert Tree. Although the love interest which brings about the final misfortunes of the Samurai is intended, and deserves, to engage our interest, it is the craft of Zakkuri which holds our attention most completely. In this character Sir Herbert has a magnificent chance to display a subtle, dignified, cruel, and lustful, but also pusillanimous, Oriental personage of a type which has passed during the flight of the last fifty years. The actor takes the fullest advantage of his part, and presents us with a wonderful and supremely clever study of the powerful, blackhearted, yet fearful Zakkuri. The representation is an immense improvement on that of ten years ago, far more effective, truer, deeper, and instinct with a cynic comedy which has not hitherto been shown us. If the beauty of the Japanese scenes, the ability of the company generally, and the grace and gaiety, the pathos and agony, of Miss Marie Löhr as Yo-San had not made for victory, the Zakkuri of Sir Herbert would in itself have been enough to assure a triumph for the revival.

"The servant of the Emperor has a thousand eyes," says Zakkuri, and not only is he all-seeing but greatly felt. When Kara, breaking his Samurai oath, loves the beautiful Princess Yo-San, the Minister feels that he can tell the Emperor that the outlaw is within his grasp. We know the final tragedy is only a question of time, but the plot is cunningly developed, and the life of Japan as one may suppose it to have been in 1860 is laid before us in a series of beautiful pictures and exciting episodes.

Mr. Yoshio Markino has supervised the manners and customs of the characters, thus many historic touches are added to the elaborate production, and a result is arrived at which is rich both in terror and tragedy, as well as in æsthetic charm and grace. But above all the beauty, all the passionate love, the romance and pleasantries looms the colossal shadow of the mighty Minister of State. It is his peculiar power which gives particular distinction to "The Darling of the Gods" in her present avatar.

EGAN MEW.

More than ordinary interest attaches to the new edition of Professor L. W. Lyde's Text-Books of Geography which Messrs. Black announce. These text-books, issued some fourteen years ago, were practically the first to introduce into schools the modern method of teaching geography, and their ever-growing sale (over a million copies) is an indication of their value and popularity. A feature of the new editions are the problems and exercises illustrated by diagrammatic maps.

Notes and News

Messrs. John Long, Ltd., will shortly publish a new novel entitled "A Bespoken Bride," by Fred Whishaw. Mr. Whishaw's description in this novel of the gallant little nation, Finland, fighting against inevitable absorption, is moving and holds the reader.

Mr. Andrew Melrose will publish immediately "Blind Eyes," a new novel by Margaret Peterson, who won the £250 prize with her first novel, "The Lure of the Little Drum." The second book in Mr. Melrose's list to be published this month is "Jehane of the Forest," by L. A. Talbot.

Another new volume from Mr. Ernest A. Vizetelly is to come from Messrs. Chatto and Windus in the spring, entitled "My Days of Adventure: The Fall of France, 1870-71." As this book will be concerned chiefly with the author's personal experiences during the Revolution of 1870 and the Franco-German War, it should be exceptionally interesting.

In order to make way for their long-promised production of "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Miss Lillah McCarthy and Mr. Granville Barker terminate their present season of repertory at the Savoy Theatre this evening, January 24. Perhaps it would be more accurate to say that they will suspend it, for it is their intention to produce another repertory programme as soon as ever opportunity permits.

The National-Liberal Kölnische Zeitung for January 5, in a very thoughtful review of the political situation during 1913, lays special stress on external relations, and regards the improvement of Germany's relations with England as the most important outcome in this respect. As to the British-German negotiations the Kölnische Zeitung says: "They are not yet so far advanced that any details can be made public, but it is known that we have come to a clear understanding in the matter of the Bagdad Railway and all questions in connection therewith, and that a clear definition of the German and English spheres of interests has been reached in regard to the commercial opening up of the Portuguese Colonies in Africa."

The synopsis of the next lecture in the series of eight being delivered by Mr. R. A. Peddie at the St. Bride Foundation Printing School, Bride Lane, Fleet Street, is as follows:—The great change in printing during the early years of the nineteenth century; rapidity of output; development of machinery; further decline of artistic spirit; types; revival of Caslon old face in 1844; increasing speed of production; decreasing artistic character; revival of hand press work; the Kelmscott Press; other presses; effect on general book production; the position of to-day; simplicity begins to be considered the keynote of good workmanship. This lecture will be given on Monday evening next, at 7.30 p.m. The lecture on the following Monday evening will deal with:—The earliest decoration; the 1457 Psalter; colour printing in the fifteenth century; the first woodcut illustrations; Albrecht Pfister of Bamberg; the woodcuts of Augsburg and Ulm; Italian illustration; Aldus; French work; the Books of Hours; the rise of copperplate engraving; chiaroscuro and other colour and tint processes of the sixteenth century. Admission to these lectures is free, and each is fully illustrated by lantern slides, books, and prints.

"ROYAL YORK" HOTEL, BRIGHTON

Supreme Comfort in a Warm and Sheltered Position. Excellent Sea Views

SOME PRESS OPINIONS.

"To the Cuisine particular attention has been paid, and no expense spared, whilst the service is absolutely perfect."

"And in the Royal York you have the perfection of an English hotel and English cooking."

AND—

Colonel NEWNHAM DAVIS says:—"The Chef makes soup like a Frenchman, grills like an Englishman, and fries like an Italian."

Telegrams:
"Presto, Brighton."

Telephones: 206 Post Office, Brighton.
293 Brighton.

THE KARSINO and NEW ISLAND HOTEL HAMPTON COURT.

Propri.: Mr. FRED KARNO.

Tel.: MOLESEY 1.

*The only Residential River Hotel open
all the Year round.*

THE RIVIERA OF LONDON
THE FAVOURITE RESORT OF LONDON SOCIETY.
LUXURIOUS PALM COURT.
DANCES & ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

For Illustrated Brochure & Tariff, apply Manager.

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

BY LANCELOT LAWTON

THE PLIGHT OF JAPAN.

AT the present time there is no more afflicted land on the face of this earth than Japan. Some weeks ago we described the terrible ravages of the famine now devastating the northern island of Hokkaido, and in alluding to the apathy of the Government in the presence of a similar calamity nine years ago we expressed the hope that no considerations of false pride would again prevent them from accepting the practical sympathy of the world. Unhappily, with that fatal coincidence frequently to be noted in times of stress, disaster has quickly succeeded disaster. Volcanic eruption, with all the catastrophe that such a visitation brings in its train—earthquake, tidal wave, and conflagration—has swelled Japan's death roll, already great by the wastage of privation and starvation. Yet, we are sorry to say, the attitude of the Government in the face of these overwhelming calamities, remains as before, cool and calculating. Here, once again, let us frankly admit that we are wholly unable to comprehend how it is possible to reconcile a state of affairs manifest to our eyes with the existence of that mystic Bushido which is generally supposed to animate the descendants of the two-sworded samurai who rule over modern Japan.

The people, like all peasant masses in the presence of those tremendous upheavals of nature which they cannot understand, have proved themselves to be patient and brave. But these communities are composed of humble tillers of the soil, the non-humans of pre-Restoration days, not members of a warrior class privileged to submerge their emotions in a strange code of morals in which not unfrequently self-complacency is mistaken for self-abnegation. As we have remarked, the members of the Administration are in the latter category. And this Administration has published official statements asserting that the disasters have been exaggerated in the newspapers, and that more than sufficient funds are in hand to cope with the prevailing distress. In the circumstances no benevolence from outside is permissible, and, while deploring the fact, we would be inclined from motives of taste to let the matter rest there were it not that the events under discussion throw an illuminating light upon Japan's position in the political horizon of the Far East. Her plight also is illustrative of the argument that incalculable evil attends a victorious nation no less than a defeated nation in the vast scheme of modern war. Needless to say we do not pretend that the volcanic eruption and famine are traceable to the Russo-Japanese campaign. But certainly we are justified in asserting that the general poverty of the country and the inability of the Government to alleviate on an adequate scale the existing misery, is due to that campaign and its sequel—pressure of taxation for the purpose of maintaining the grand aspirations of the Imperial Japan of to-day.

Naturally it would be out of place to embark upon a controversy that might be held to bear relation to world conditions. Japan is altogether a separate case. She is confronted with economic problems different from those which trouble Europe, and, were these handled boldly, far easier of solution. Also she enjoys an isolated position of strategical strength well without the vortex of the armament competition which oppresses Europe. In neglecting the greatest resource which any State can possibly possess, the rearing and maintenance of a happy and contented people, she is losing the value not of one, but of a number of Dreadnoughts, and, by permitting the withering process of human wastage to continue, is diminishing a national exchequer already in an extremely precarious condition. Yet Dreadnoughts Japan continues to construct, with the inevitable result that in periods of gloom like the present her people perish in peace as rapidly as would be the case were the nation at war. For in spite of official denials we believe that the accounts of calamity in the Press are substantially true. Impartial foreign investigators who have made it their business to visit the stricken region of the north declare that no fewer than ten million individuals are suffering the agonies of starvation and hardship in a climate that is Siberian in rigour. The Government ignores these figures, however, preferring a general statement of denial, and adds that twenty thousand families are now in receipt of relief. In like manner the Government reports that whereas impartial eye-witnesses say that many thousands of people lost their lives through the volcanic eruption in the south, the roll of victims actually numbered only a few hundreds.

To anyone acquainted with official procedure in Japan the policy thus disclosed will not come as a surprise. It has many historic precedents. The most notable instance, apart from the last famine, was that of the Russo-Japanese War. To this day the Japanese have never accurately revealed the extent of the casualties which they then sustained. Nevertheless, it is known that, though victorious, they suffered in this respect in a greater measure than did the Russians. Nor, as the campaign progressed, could they bring themselves to confess to a single reverse, and on occasions even went so far as to lend the weight of official sanction to the denial of unpleasant incidents which foreigners knew had taken place. It is doubtless true that dependent as she was upon the European money market victory meant much for Japan. It is equally true that at the present time, when Japan is verging upon bankruptcy she is tempted to convey the impression that the stories of domestic calamity are exaggerated.

That she has long been anxious to obtain a foreign loan and has hitherto been thwarted in her desire is not denied. A business intellect brought to bear on her position might conceivably reason that she is pursuing a sensible policy in throwing dust in the eyes of the world. Along these lines it would be urged in the first place that no calamity, no matter how great, among a section of the people, justifies a State in neglecting the welfare of the people as a whole. Then, in the second place, we can imagine the easy conscience which is the twin accompaniment of the business intellect suavely contending that in order that securities for possible loans may remain unimpaired it is the duty of Japanese statesmen not to shrink from minimising the disagreeable truth. In reply, from the point of view of fact, we may object that when so considerable a proportion as one-fifth of the population is in a pitiable plight from starvation, and when another large section is decimated by a volcanic eruption, the outlook is so bad as to show official complacency in a somewhat despicable light. After all, the dictates of humanity impose limitations upon the demands of business convenience. From the point of view of State policy we are justified in doubting the wisdom, acquainted as we are with the Far Eastern situation, of sacrificing thousands of valuable lives in time of peace for the building of Dreadnoughts only to be used for purely aggressive purposes. And finally, from the point of view of ethics, we are entitled to complain of the dishonesty of the Japanese Government which seeks refuge in misrepresentation as a means of inducement to foreign investors to subscribe to its loans. Were an individual to be involved such misrepresentation would be called fraudulent, and we see no reason why a Government should escape some censure.

MOTORING

IT is now a year since the increasingly serious outlook with regard to petrol stimulated the leading spirits of the representative motoring organisations into a show of activity, which culminated in the formation of a joint committee for the specific object of investigating the possibilities of benzol as a petrol substitute. A little later, the scope of the inquiry was enlarged so as to include all other spirits which might prove useful as motor fuels, and a good deal was expected by the motorist in view of the fact that the committee consisted of some of the most distinguished experts in the kingdom. But, as our contemporary, the Autocar, points out, the net results of the committee's work up to date, so far as the public know, may be summed up as follows: The inspection of a gas-works, an examination of a process for impoverishing town gas for the purpose of obtaining a greater yield of benzol, the publication of a pamphlet containing hints on the use of benzol, and, finally, the "discovery" of a process by which 40 million gallons can be obtained annually from home-produced material. This discovery, by the way, was no discovery at all, inasmuch as it referred to a process already known, although the vague and mysterious terms in which it was announced led everybody to suppose that it foreshadowed the imminent solution of the whole problem of cheap motor fuel. It is, of course, possible that the committee have done some really valuable work the nature of which they do not deem it advisable to disclose at the moment, but the motorist would vastly like to have some assurance on the point. Looking matters frankly in the face, the probabilities seem that matters are as they were. Petrol maintains its exorbitant price, whilst the supplies of benzol, the only practicable substitute available at present, remain inadequate to satisfy even a fraction of the growing demand for motor fuel. Apparently we are still as far off as ever from that great desideratum, the home-produced spirit which is to be manufactured at a price and in quantities sufficient to render us independent of foreign supplies.

Probably many of the members of the Automobile Association and Motor Union are themselves unaware of the extent and variety of the advantages to which their membership entitles them. It is not universally known, for example, that one of the features of the Association is a "Lost Property Department," which

Vauxhall
The Car Superexcellent

FIFTY-TWO PAGES OF INFORMATION (with fifty-five illustrations) about this splendid machine compose the newly published Vauxhall catalogue, which every motorist should possess, and is invited to send for.

THREE YEARS' GUARANTEE

VAUXHALL MOTORS LTD.,
174-182, GT. PORTLAND STREET, W.

is engaged solely in tracing the owners of property of every description lost on the road and found by the A. A. patrols. It is quite a common thing for this department to receive in the course of one month over a hundred articles such as lamps, horns, trunks, spare wheels, motor clothing, portions of car mechanism, and even hoods, and in the great majority of cases the rightful owners are found and the property restored to them. As an instance of the promptitude and thoroughness of the department in dealing with these cases, it may be mentioned that on December 29 a member reported having found on the road a cape cart hood cover. On January 1 a description of the article was circulated by the Association in the Press, and on the 6th it was claimed on behalf of a member who had sailed for Cape Town. On the 9th the finder was put into communication with the claimant, and the hood cover restored to the owner's representative. Many similar cases of recent date are specified in the report issued by the Secretary, all of which serve to indicate the practical value of A. A. and M. U. activity.

Motoring by night should be shorn of many of its perils if the new flashlight lamp, which is said to have been devised and perfected by a London firm, proves practicable in every way and is taken up by the motor-ing associations as an adjunct to the warning posts they have erected at the top of steep hills, at awkward corners, and at dangerous cross-roads. The lamp, which is called the "Aga," is constructed on the light-house flicker principle, flashing about sixty times to the minute. The light is supplied by compressed acetylene gas, a single tubeful of which is stated to afford adequate and continuous illumination for a whole year without requiring any attention whatever. One of the advantages of this "land lighthouse" is that its object could not be misunderstood, owing to the distinctive nature of its light from that of all other signalling lamps. As the initial cost is only a little more than that of an ordinary street lamp, and the yearly cost of maintenance only 30s., there is no doubt that the motor organisations, especially the A. A. and M. U., will investigate the possibilities of the new invention.

R. B. H.

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THE tone of the City has been much better during the past week. The reduction in the Bank Rate seemed to put heart into everybody, and there has been quite a brisk buying of Consols. It is said that the Government is in the market, and is making large purchases on account of the Sinking Fund. There is also no doubt that many of the purchases are purely speculative. People have at last come to realise that we are in for a period of cheap money, and that all gilt-edged securities will go up. I have been preaching this in season and out of season for a long time past. There is no doubt that huge sums have been lost in these so-called bond issues—issues which promised 6 per cent. and 7 per cent., but gave no security. To-day people see that it is much better to have a definite 4 per cent. income than a certain loss of capital, even if you are promised 6 per cent. on your money. The Victorian Government offered one million 4 per cent. stock at 97, and it was immediately subscribed. Here again the success of the loan had a wonderful effect upon the market. The Chesham Supply Company offered £150,000 6 per cent. preference shares at par. This company sells motor cars to chauffeurs on the instalment plan, and has been making large profits on the deals. The certificate for 1913 showed £24,902 profit, and for the half year ended July 31, 1913, £23,635. Big dividends have been paid, but the company requires more capital. The preference shares are a reasonable commercial risk. Forestal Land has once again been in the market and asked us for £1,200,000 5 per cent. debentures, the issue price being 96. Forestal owns nearly five million acres of freehold and 630,000 acres of leasehold. It has its own railways, factories, steamers, and about 100 head of livestock. The money is needed to provide the Santa Fé Land Company with the funds to pay off its debenture debt, and for other purposes. The directors state that the average net profits of Forestal and Santa Fé Land companies are £498,913, and that an additional profit of £107,000 a year is anticipated. Forestal is one of the most important companies in South America. The debentures are a good security, but it is doubtful whether the ordinary shares will keep their value.

MONEY.—As this article is written before the directors of the Bank of England meet, I am making a shot in the dark when I say that I think that a reduction in the Bank Rate is certain. The money position is very good. New York is shipping gold to Paris, and it is clear that the Secretary of the Treasury does not intend immediately to call in the funds which he recently loaned out to New York bankers. It is quite certain that unless anything unforeseen occurs, we shall get a gradually reducing money rate during 1914.

FOREIGNERS.—At last the Banque Victor has met with misfortune. This is not at all surprising considering the bold manner in which M. Victor speculated, and the very curious deals he took on, deals that very few people in London would have cared to handle. His most famous coup was made when he acquired the controlling interest in the Pekin Syndicate and purchased the Rothschild holding of Shansi shares. These he placed amongst investors throughout France, and bitterly must these unfortunate people regret their gamble. They thought that they were going in for a dividend-paying security. Victor is a man of remarkable energy, but his gambles were uncontrollable, and it is a good thing that his energies have been stilled. The position in France will probably clear now that this trouble has been removed, but we must not expect higher prices, for all the Victor securities have merely changed hands. They have not been sold. He was very largely interested with the Empain group, a Belgian crowd of almost equal courage to himself. Empain himself took up large deals in Egypt, but whether he made any money out of them is more than doubtful. Tintos have hardened a little mainly because the "bears" have been buying back. The latest news is that the strike at the mines still continues. Everyone has been trying to explain the American copper figures to which I alluded last week, but no one can give any reason for the astounding statement. Copper remains weak.

HOME RAILS.—The Home Railway market has been moved up, not before it was necessary. Even the friendless Great Eastern are now back at their make-up price, and Great Northern deferred have had a smart rise. Great Western, London and North Western are both harder, and may be safely bought. The principal buying in the Railway market has, however, been in the prior charge issues, all of which were very much under-valued. The dealers are all short, and the least demand frightens them. Underground Electric Income bonds are now up to 94.

YANKEES.—The American market has taken on a good tone. The excuse given for the rise is cheap money and the New York Bank figures, which are certainly exceptionally good. The "bears" have been buying back, and this is evidenced by the sharp rise in Steels, which have been up as high as 65. No one had a good word to say for the Steel Trust, and as the trade in the United States is falling away very fast, it is considered a safe thing to sell Steels. But when it was rumoured that Wilson intended to abandon his suit against the Steel Trust, all these "bears" scrambled to cover. Hence, the sharp improvement in values. I think myself that Unions at 163 are definitely over-valued, and I should not be surprised to see a small reaction occur. The "bears" have also been buying back Canadian Pacifics, which have had a big rise. Investors should certainly unload this stock. The news from Canada is not good. It is quite certain that the dividend can never be raised above 10 per cent., and therefore Canadas at 200 are very reasonably valued. "Bears" have also been actively buying back all their Mexican securities. Indeed, throughout the whole of the Foreign Railway market there has been a steady marking up of quotations, the unfortunate Brazil Railway being the only exception.

RUBBER.—In the Rubber Market prices remain dull. Yam Seng report is very disappointing. The final dividend is passed, and it is clear that unless the company can very largely increase its output and considerably reduce its working costs, it will have hard work to pay 5 per cent. for the current year. Yam Sengs are, therefore, very much over-valued. Raw rubber is a shade harder, but business is limited.

OIL.—In the Oil market the rig in Venezuela Oil Concessions still continues, and the shares, 17s. 6d. paid, are quoted 35s. premium. The chairman made a very grandiloquent speech which caused much laughter on the Stock Exchange. The crowd behind the company are not considered strong enough to talk in millions, and as far as anyone knows, the concession is at present practically unproven. It is stated that the Asiatic Petroleum, one of the Shell subsidiaries, has made an agreement with the Anglo-Persian. This was not unexpected, as it is well-known that the Burmah Company, which controls Anglo-Persian, has great influence with the Shell. The Anglo-Saxon would appear to be having good luck in Mexico, and Royal Dutch and Shell have been harder in consequence.

MINES.—In the Mining market prices are firmer, and Russo-Asiatics have been bid up to 5 on specially good news. Kaffirs are better now that the strike in the Transvaal is over. The Rayfield report was not liked, and it would appear that this company must reconstruct. Cobalt Townsite figures are not particularly satisfactory, but the shares have hardened. Much fun has been caused in the Canadian market by the issue of application forms for shares in Tough Oaks, a company which is to purchase the control of the Canadian Co. Twenty per cent. allotment is promised, and as Tough Oaks are quoted at $\frac{1}{4}$ premium, a good many shares have been sold on this promise. Indeed, Mr. Latilla no doubt hopes to catch some of the bolder of the "bears." The whole deal is peculiar, and I strongly advise my readers to stand on one side or they may burn their fingers.

MISCELLANEOUS.—In the Miscellaneous market, Liptons have recovered a little, the directors having sent out a circular. Nevertheless, I think it safer to sell than to buy. The announcement that Messrs. Morgan had secured the Cuban loan in competition with Messrs. Kleinworts, had a bad effect on Cuban Ports, which are certainly overvalued. Breweries have been very steady. They seem to me fully priced to-day. Marconis have also been bought, and it is said that Mr. Heybourn has gone to the United States and proposes to boom up American Marconis. If any rise occurs, I advise holders to take advantage of it and get out. Electrics are steady. Holzapfels have had a good year, and pay 12 per cent. Indeed, nearly all the Industrial reports that are coming out now show improved results and increased dividends. Both Van den Berghs and Maypoles have hardened, and there has been some bidding for Whiteley's preference and ordinary on the news that this firm has purchased another business.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

The Cobalt Silver Mines in the North-East of Canada are being brought to special prominence at the present time by reason of their excellent profit-earning prospects. Three of the companies in this group are dividend payers. Last year Townsites paid 7s. 6d. per share, besides purchasing a mill of its own for £25,000 out of its profits, Cobalt Lakes 3s. per share, and Casey Cobalts 1s. per share, but there is good reason to expect that the profits already earned will be considerably increased during the current year, inasmuch as the three mines will be working at their full capacity with increased stamping power, which will enable larger quantities of ore to be treated. It is anticipated that Townsites will earn 100 per cent. on its capital during the current twelve months, and Lakes and Caseys from 40 to 50 per cent. Townsite Extensions, the other member of the group, owns 59 acres situated near the best paying mines on the fields, whose veins are working up to the company's boundaries. There is already an active market in the shares of all four companies and a considerable rise in price is confidently predicted in the near future.

The Industrial market is destined to play an important part in the Stock Exchange revival which has now set in. Amongst the shares of the leading motor manufacturing companies which for some time past have proved popular with investors by reason of the good profits earned and the prospects of larger profits in the future, is that of Straker-Squire (1913). Although the company was only formed in November last, it has already justified the anticipations contained in the Prospectus, and there is good reason to believe that the shareholders will receive an interim dividend shortly. At the Statutory Meeting last week it was announced that the sales both for cars and heavy vehicles, including omnibuses, had increased by 30 per cent. as compared with the corresponding period of the previous year. The profits estimated at the flotation of the company for the current year were £18,000, and the prospect of this sum being exceeded is particularly promising. The company's shares are being confidently talked up in the market.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE MIDDLE COURSE IN SPELLING REFORM.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Dear Sir,—You had an excellent unsigned article in your paper, issue of March 9 last year, entitled "Spelling and Sophistry." In it you criticised the scheme of Spelling Reform adopted by the Simplified Spelling Society, and you referred in particular to the use of "z" to indicate some of the plural forms.

This is one of the features which have induced me to offer in the enclosed leaflet some suggestions for a reform on much less drastic lines. Though much more moderate than the scheme you have already criticised, these suggestions are intended to be complete, and are quite sufficient to fulfil the necessary purpose of indicating clearly the sounds of our speech.

By a simple and perfectly English method, it is shown how the final "z" may be satisfactorily avoided. Further, the hard-and-fast doctrine of the Simplified Spelling Society, which says we must have either all k or all c, is disposed of in a simple and reasonable manner. Yours truly,

J. W. BANKS.

Sheffield.

PRINCIPAL FEATURES.

COMPARE SIMPLIFIED SPELLING
SOCIETY.

	(1) No "z" to indicate the plural:
praiz	Hee prays,
praiz	„ givs praize.
praizez or	„ praizes.
praiziz
fenz	In the fens.
fens	On the fense.
defendz	Hee defends the defenses.
defensez
	(2) Reversion to the old value of "u" (as in "put"):
pool, shood,	Pul, shud, wud, put, instrument,
wood, poot,	influse.
instrooment
infloovens.
	(3) Preservation of "obscure" vowel:
intimit	Intimat (adj.), intimait (vb.).
	(4) "Long" i="iy" (by combination of "i" in "mind" and "y" in "my"):
het	Liyt, miytier.
mietier	(this is tantamount to double i, on same principle as double e.)
	(5) Nearer relationship between short and long "u" (impossible with the notation "oo"):
	Pul, puul
	(Thus rumor or ruumor, and gud or Scotch guud.)
	(6) Retention of both "k" and hard "c":
contact, ceen	Contact, keen, paket, forsaik, silk.
pacet
forsaic, silc

N.B.—The scheme contains only one irregularity—the soft c. Although this letter may need to be eliminated "officially," it will undoubtedly maintain its position for a long period.—J. W. BANKS.

BOOKS RECEIVED

VERSE.

- A Ballad of Men, and Other Verses.* By William Blane. (Constable and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Sonnets from the Trophies of José-Maria de Heredia.* Rendered into English by E. R. Taylor. (The Author, San Francisco.)
- Rubáiyát of a Minor Statesman.* By G. W. S. Sparrow. (Heath, Cranton and Ouseley. 1s.)
- The Rose of Ravenna.* By Edward A. Vidler. With Frontispiece. (George Robertson and Co., Melbourne.)
- Patriot or Traitor.* By Charles G. Fall. (Elliot Stock. 4s. net.)
- Intimations of Heaven.* By H. E. Walker. (Elliot Stock. 1s. 6d. net.)
- Willow's Forge, and Other Poems.* By Sheila Kaye-Smith. (Erskine Macdonald. 2s. 6d. net.)
- Barham Beach, a Poem of Regeneration.* By Julia Ditto Young. (Floyd-Genthner Press, Buffalo, N.Y.)
- The "Bacchæ" of Euripides.* A Translation by F. A. Evelyn, B.A. (Heath, Cranton and Ouseley. 1s. 6d. net.)
- Short Poems.* By Gertrude de la Poer. With Portrait. (A. C. Fifield. 1s.)
- Dislikes: Some Modern Satires.* By Charles Masefield. (A. C. Fifield. 1s. net.)
- The Mark of the East, and Other Verses.* By J. M. Symns. (W. Thacker and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Lyrics and Poems.* By Edith Rutter-Leatham. (Erskine Macdonald. 2s. 6d. net.)
- The Fame-Seeker, and Other Poems.* By Janet Jeffrey. (Erskine Macdonald. 2s. 6d. net.)

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Place-Names of Gloucestershire.* A Handbook by W. St. Clair Baddeley. (John Bellows, Gloucester.)
- Animal Sculpture: Suggestions for Greater Realism in Modelling and in Pose.* By Walter Winans. Illustrated. (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Supplement to the New Punto Tagliato Embroidery.* By Louisa and Rosa Tebbs. Illustrated. (Chapman and Hall. 7s. 6d. net.)
- In Far New Guinea.* By Henry Newton, B.A. Illustrated. (Seeley, Service and Co. 16s. net.)

FICTION.

- Idylls of a Dutch Village (Eastloorn).* By S. Ulfers. Translated by B. Williamson-Napier. (T. Fisher Unwin. 5s. net.)
- The Power of the Duchess.* By Edward Quarter. (Chapman and Hall. 6s.)

PERIODICALS.

- The Eugenics Review; Literary Digest; Cambridge University Reporter; Constitution Papers; Land Union Journal; Bookseller; Review of Reviews for Australasia; Journal of the Imperial Arts League Incorporated; The Theosophical Path; Cambridge Magazine; Socialist Review; Dublin Review; Quarterly Review; Publishers' Circular; Revue Critique; Mercure de France; La Revue.*

THE ACADEMY

A JOURNAL OF LITERATURE, ART, FINANCE & POLITICS

No. 2178

[Registered as a
Newspaper.]

JANUARY 31, 1914

PRICE THREEPENCE

SHEFFIELD SIMPLEX

PRESS OPINION:—

*"The highest point to which motor design
has yet attained."*

The "TIMES," 8/11/13

The Connoisseur

who demands smart appearance, and the experienced motorist who desires chassis efficiency, have their ideals in the present 30 h.p. six-cylinder Sheffield-Simplex chassis.

Write for Illustrated List of complete cars, with beautiful bodies by Vauden - Plas, or better still, arrange a trial. Both are free.

Sheffield-Simplex Motor Works, Ltd.

20, CONDUIT STREET,
LONDON, W.

Works : Tinsley, Sheffield

30 H.P. 6-CYLINDER CHASSIS. STANDARD EQUIPMENT INCLUDES U. S. L. ELECTRIC SELF-STARTER AND LIGHTER, ALL LAMPS, ELECTRIC HORN, SPEEDOMETER CLOCK, COMPLETE SCUTTLE DASH, WITH ALL INSTRUMENTS, £8 8s. TAX.

PRICE £885.

LATEST DESIGN TORPEDO — WITH CONCEALED HOOD.

NAPIER

LORDS AND COMMONS AGREE

THAT THE

NOISELESS NAPIER IS THE CAR TO OWN

FRONT BENCH OWNERS of NAPIER Motor Carriages include :

The Duke of Norfolk, K.G.
The Duke of Bedford, K.G.
Viscount Curzon.
Viscount Churchill
The Earl of Portsmouth.
The Earl Minto.
The Rt. Hon. H. H. Asquith, K.C., M.P.
The Rt. Hon. A. J. Balfour, M.P.
The Rt. Hon. D. Lloyd George, M.P.
The Rt. Hon. Winston Churchill, M.P.
The Rt. Hon. Sir John Simon, K.C., M.P.
The Rt. Hon. F. E. Smith, K.C., M.P.

DISTINCTIVE AND DISTINGUISHED.

Please write for new 1914 Catalogue and Alpine Souvenir giving Particulars of the Historical Official R.A.C. Test of the Napier.

D. NAPIER & SON, LTD.,

14, NEW BURLINGTON STREET,
LONDON, W.

Telegrams—
"Nitri fier, London."

MOTORS

Works—
ACTON, LONDON, W.

BARGAINS IN BOOKS.—

Kipling's Complete Works, 25 vols., half calf, gilt, fine set, £12 12s.; Hamilton's Parodies, 6 vols., £2 10s.; Jesse's Historical Works, 30 vols., Nimmo, 1901, £7 17s. 6d.; Thackeray's Centenary Biographical Edition, 26 vols., £6 6s.; Barrington's Graham of Claverhouse, 30s. net, for 10s. 6d.; Purchas's Voyages, 20 vols., £9 9s., Glasgow, 1905; Slaters' Engravings and their Values, 1912, 18s.; Chaffer's Marks and Monograms on Pottery and Porcelain, 1912, 42s.; Baily's Magazines of Sports and Pastimes, 64 vols., £7 10s.; Grimm's Fairy Tales, large paper, illus. by Rackham, £2 2s.; Proc. Inst. Civil Engineers, 142 vols., cloth, £16 16s.; Pinkerton's Voyages and Travels, 17 vols., 1808, £5 10s.; Porter's Knights of Malta, 1858, 2 vols., £3 3s.; Burton's Arabian Nights, 17 vols., illustrated, £17 17s.; Gould's History Freemasonry, 3 thick vols., morocco binding, £2 2s., cost £6 6s.; James' Painters and Their Works, 3 vols., £3 3s.; Habershon Records of Old London, Vanished and Vanishing, coloured plates, folio, £2 2s.; Fea's Secret Chambers and Hiding Places, 7s. 6d., for 3s. 6d.; Oscar Wilde, by L. E. Ingleby, 12s. 6d., for 4s. 6d.; Ditchfield Vanishing England, 15s., for 6s. 6d.; London's Lhasa, 2 vols., new., 42s., for 14s.; Spenser's Faerie Queene, 2 vols., Cambridge University Press, £3 13s. 6d., for 32s. Will take any good books in exchange for above.—BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

To UNIVERSITY WOMEN GRADUATES.

A POLITICAL League (Women's), newly organised, is prepared to train or engage, if experienced, young University Women Graduates who are desirous of having a Political Career. The work is of an extensive kind and affords wide experience. Degrees in Political Science, Economics or Philosophy would be preferred, though not essential. Graduates trained by the League would have special opportunities for thoroughly good posts. Apply, P 3, "ACADEMY" Office, 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields.

REMINGTON No. 7 Typewriter. New condition. Cost over £20. Sacrifice £5 10s. Free approval, carriage paid. No dealers. Write, Arcade Chambers, Northampton.

"SUNNY CAPRI." Two paying guests desired for Palatial Villa; spacious apartments, electric light, fine library, absolute quiet, magnificent views, healthiest climate, literary society. Terms 7/- per day.—Apply, "Colonel" Mezzomonte, Capri, Italy.

JOURNALISTIC and SECRETARIAL TRAINING FOR LADIES.—

Rapid systematic coaching. Special course in Journalism. Excellent introductions given.—Telephone or write, THE TRIANGLE SECRETARIAL OFFICES, 61, South Molton Street, W.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MEASER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Fourteen years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE AND ART
PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION: Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free.

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Offices of
THE ACADEMY, 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

To

Please send me THE ACADEMY for the next..... months.

I enclose remittance value.....

Name.....

Description.....

Address.....

CONTENTS

	PAGE		PAGE
Notes of the Week	131	Shorter Reviews	143
A Dreamer's Epitaph	132	Fiction	145
The True Essayist	132	Unbeaten Tracks	147
Criticism Astray	133	Of Good and Bad Luck	148
Homage to Utamaro	134	Indian Reviews	150
Reviews :		The Theatre :
A Royalist in Two Coun-		The Play Actors' Society
tries	135	at the Court Theatre ...	151
Some Ancient Villages ...	136	"Hullo Tango!" at the
An Amateur Vagabond ...	137	Hippodrome	152
The Primrose Path	138	Variety at the Coliseum...	152
A Prophet and His		Notes for Collectors	153
Honour	138	Notes and News	153
Synge, and Irish Drama	139	Imperial and Foreign Affairs	154
The Civil Service	140	Motoring	156
Another M.P. in India ...	141	In the Temple of Mammon	157
In Unknown Africa	142	Correspondence	158
		Books Received	160

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magasine rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post-free.

The EDITORIAL AND ADVERTISING OFFICE is at 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

Notes of the Week

HERE is rather a disposition, as we think, to treat too lightly the grave speech which Mr. John Redmond delivered at Waterford. There is no useful purpose in eternally banging the drum and making an exhibition of the bunting. Owing to the indiscretion of the late Mr. Gladstone and the corruptibility of the present Government, the Irish question has arrived at a point where the order of things must of necessity be changed. The position is wholly lamentable, but it exists. Having reached such a conclusion, the reasonable man asks what course common-sense and constructive capacity suggest. In our issue of October 4 we put forward an idea which we believe is perfectly sound, and which offers the only tolerable exit from a position which is now intolerable. We wrote:—

The only possible solution—if the status quo is to be departed from, which we do not admit—is an assembly for Catholic Ireland and another for essentially Protestant Ireland. The two countries might conceivably get to know and trust each other in time. We think the time will more probably be measured in centuries than in decades, but there is just an off-chance of success. There might be an arrangement for joint sessions and conferences, with the British Government as ultimate arbiter. Especially in matters of finance, such a scheme seems to be indispensable. We leave Members of Parliament to digest the proposal, and, if there is anything of value in it, to elaborate it. The lion has never yet laid down with the lamb without absorption, but we live in a progressive age, and miracles are commonplace.

Can any reasonable man suggest that in the position of affairs on the Continent we can afford to risk civil war at home? We put it to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is sorely harassed to find a method of balancing the results of his disastrous finance, whether he is prepared to provide the funds for the vanquishment of Protestant Ireland, whether in Ulster or throughout the South and West of that portion of the United Kingdom.

There is much to admire in the legislative proposal which Lord Willoughby de Broke will introduce into the House of Lords in the coming session, the object of which is to enforce upon the well-to-do or comparatively well-to-do classes the duty of taking their share in the defence of their country. In Lord Roberts's proposal for universal service there is the obvious difficulty that men of very divergent classes will not readily associate in the circumstances of training in camp. We have no preference for one class over another; and in time of war all classes mix cheerfully with each other, and find out what good fellows they are. When, however, there is not the spur of necessity or the call of urgent patriotism, many influences occur to prevent men of the higher class mixing on equal terms with those who belong to a lower grade. We believe in certain countries where conscription is the law there are selected corps where indiscriminate association is automatically obviated. We have not had the opportunity of seeing Lord Willoughby's scheme in extenso, but if it proceeds on some such lines as those to which we have adverted it augurs of success and is wholly admirable.

The annual dinner of the Bacon Society, held at the Trocadero Restaurant on January 22 "to celebrate the 353rd Anniversary of the Birth" of "the greatest human being God ever made," as Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence said, was very successful. We confess to becoming gradually more and more puzzled over this eternal question of the authorship of the works attributed to Shakespeare. Twelve months ago we reviewed a book by a French writer who held the theory that Roger Manners, Lord Rutland, should thus be honoured; and in the current issue of a Sunday paper the indefatigable Mr. Tom Jones announces that "the Shakespeare plays might with greater plausibility be assigned to the Earl of Southampton than to Bacon." Between all the prophets, what shall we believe? At any rate, the Baconians, under the charming presidency of Sir Edwin, are enthusiastic and convivial, and earnest enough withal to convert any half-hearted visitor. Mr. Kendra Baker made a careful and exhaustive speech, Miss A. Leith proposed the Bacon Society, and Mr. Crouch Batchelor waxed eloquent over the health of the guests; to this toast Mr. Herbert Jenkins made a neat response. Mr. W. T. Smedley proposed the President, and this, with the reply, concluded a most interesting evening. The Baconians, as the President pointed out, have passed the stage of being sneered at; they have to be taken seriously. And, while doing this, we reserve, as we said last year in commenting upon a similar function, our own opinion.

A Dreamer's Epitaph

THE Light that lit the sunless hill,
 And shone above the barren leas,
 The Life that moved when leaves were still,
 And quickened in the dying trees;
 The Power that with my weakness grew (Mature in my unripened youth!)
 Could still the disproved hope renew,
 And turn to naught the foolish truth:

The Spirit that so loved my dust
 That with the dust it feud could wage,
 And all the alien glory thrust
 Upon me as a heritage;
 The Strength which with my frailties wed,
 And for my cause so strangely schemed,
 That I, whom it had made and led,
 Its maker and its leader seemed:

The days when in each cup of shame
 I saw the gleam of hallowed wine,
 Nor feared the beast, nor felt the flame,
 Because my Comrade was Divine—
 These things are my eternal store,
 Eternal is my joy for them,
 Though He should show His face no more,
 And draw from me His garment-hem!

G. M. HORT.

The True Essayist

IT must be admitted that in the golden age of the essay, when men had more leisure for thought, and when it was not necessary always to be topical in order that work should become printed, much was written that is hardly worth remembering save for the student of history and literary tendencies. Perhaps the plentiful time at the disposal of the essayist had something to do with this; he had no need to write as one who burns with a message or a story; he could, if he wished, sketch out a plan of campaign and roam from hill to hill of his selected country, giving a lengthy account of his views from each summit, taking the patient reader with him—and some readers must have been admirably patient in those days.

In spite of the fact that a large number of these dissertations were models of style and of that peculiar quality known as "finish," not many of us now have the time or endurance to go perseveringly through their supremely elegant pages. We feel, often, that it is a labour to read them; the brain wanders away on some more attractive by-path of its own, and has to be jerked back every few minutes by the string of attention; presently even that breaks, and we set the essayist and his polished periods aside for the spare hours that never come.

Yet, rather later than the age which is sometimes termed Augustan, there arrived other writers who were less concerned with the niceties of language, less overloaded with the weight of toppling phrases, and more desirous of relieving their hearts than unpacking their intellects. The Addisonian period was passing; the peculiarly careful handling of English which we now find "stilted" and tedious was avoided by some of the newer writers as a method which failed, somehow, in elasticity. They had sometimes the directness of Swift without his bitterness, the clarity of Addison with no hint of the rostrum or the teacher. To these, whom even now we can read with pleasure and thrills of response, we return again and again; we realise their personality, their absolute sincerity, their inspiration.

The secret of personality, which gave such charm to the work of Charles Lamb, of Hazlitt—who is too little read nowadays—and of many others, is an elusive thing. Analyse the "Dream Children," the "Old Margate Hoy," and it is probable that no especial method, no definite skill in phrasing, will appear to gratify the legitimate curiosity; each essay is a complete little creation, not to be disturbed or dissected. And, as a rule, the essay of a recognised master is a consideration of its subject from one point of view in one style. The humorous, as with Lamb, may lie very near to the springs of pathos; quite possibly two consecutive sentences may touch laughter and tears; yet there will be no incongruity, no clash—not, certainly, the deliberate shock of contrast. It is as though two colours, instead of being exhibited boldly and largely for the sake of a startling effect, were woven together quietly and patiently into the beautiful, general pattern, where, as nothing can be added, nothing can be spared.

Such closeness of structure, such restful unity, is attained by no assiduous practice of literary tricks; it is a matter of the vision of the man himself. Style is a poor thing without vision. It pleases eye and ear, perhaps, by skilful cadence or harmonious arrangement; but it stimulates no urgent thought, rouses no emotion, brings no flush to the face, no quicker heart-beat. Eagerness, wistfulness, wonder, courage, all the splendid shining desires that are dulled by the burden and heat of the day—who shall awaken these save the one who is hot and bright-eyed from victory, or maybe even angered by defeat, staying not to choose pretty words? Ardour brings expression in speech; and its flame may burn so steadily, whatever the theme, that even the cold printed page may convey the secret emotion miraculously across strange distances, into future ages. Only thus is the essayist a poet, though he may never write a line of verse, and immortal, though he dies as other men; and only thus, when the final reckoning of his work is taken, does he confront, with equal serenity, the threatening sword or the proffered laurel of criticism.

W. L. R.

Criticism Astray*

IT is a good thing that wise and thoughtful critics should occasionally write about the work of other men; especially so in the literary world, where books, unlike music or painting or sculpture, are accessible, as a rule, to all. Many of us have read Browning's poems with a new delight since Mr. G. K. Chesterton wrote his keen monograph in the "English Men of Letters" series; many of us turned with fresh pleasure to the Wessex novels after reading Lionel Johnson's discriminating estimate of Mr. Hardy; many of us felt anew the spell of George Meredith when Mr. G. M. Trevelyan, scholarly and dignified, told how the spell had fallen upon him, and interpreted for us certain things that hitherto had been hidden. Each mind, if it be independent and worthy, forms its own outlook; but by that very act it may shut from itself aspects that lie outside its field of vision. Then comes the wise and thoughtful critic, and with a word, a phrase, sets a light shining here and there, and in a moment we see a different beauty, a renewed charm.

We took up this volume on the work of Mr. Henry James, therefore, with a certain amount of pleasure, knowing that Mr. Hueffer is a strong admirer of that work, hoping for illumination, sensitive appreciation, vision; we set it down with discontent, having found blank carelessness, tedious verbosity, incompetence. Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer has taken a header into the crystal pool of Mr. Henry James's fantasy, splashed about awhile, and left the critics to pull him out, dripping, and to clear up the mess. Rarely have we been so disappointed, so resentful, as at this mishandling of a masterly writer; and yet the intention was so admirable! If any author needs careful, leisurely, persuasive exposition, it is Mr. Henry James; he has received the hasty, slap-dash comments of an incorrigible egotist. Mr. Hueffer's views on every subject that happens to cross his mind, relevant or irrelevant, are stirred in with his opinions on some of the novels of Mr. James, interspersed with plentiful quotations, and the whole tasteless conglomeration is elaborately presented as—a "critical study"!

All the finer points are missed. No allusion is made to those subtle, individual touches which we may surmise gave Mr. James immense pleasure in the making, and which give his readers such pleasure in the tracing: the grouping of peculiarly fitting adjectives or phrases, so often in threes, to take but one instance. We remember "poor foolish, generous, precious Valentin" in "The American"; the great scene between Charlotte and the Prince in "The Golden Bowl"—"Something in her long look at him now out of the old, grey window, something in the very poise of her hat, the colour of her necktie, the prolonged stillness of her smile, touched into sudden light for him all the wealth of the fact that he could count on her"; or Charlotte again, so finely braving her conscience: "It had ever been her sign that she was, for all occasions, found ready, without loose ends or exposed accessories or unremoved superfluities." We remember the magnificent passage towards the close of the same book, where Maggie Verver, calm and resentful, realises the situation, and realises also why she has never been able to give herself to "the vulgar heat of her wrong":

She might fairly, as she watched them, have missed it as a lost thing; have yearned for it, for the straight, vindictive view, the rights of resentment, the rages of jealousy, the protests of passion, as for something she had been cheated of not least; a range of feelings which for many women would have meant so much, but which for her husband's wife, for her father's daughter, figured nothing nearer to experience than a wild Eastern caravan, looming into view with crude colours in the sun, fierce pipes in the air, high spears against the sky, all a thrill, a natural joy to mingle with, but turning off short before it reached her and plunging into other defiles.

The beauty of description which occurs here and there in detached passages in nearly all the books is passed over in silence by this "critical" student. There are a few phrases in "The Sacred Fount"—a book which is not mentioned by Mr. Hueffer—that impressed us as framing a particular conversation with wonderful delicacy:

There was a general shade in all the lower reaches—a fine clear dusk in garden and grove, a thin suffusion of twilight out of which the greater things, the high tree-tops and pinnacles, the long crests of motionless wood and chimnied roof, rose into golden air. The last calls of birds sounded extraordinarily loud; they were like the timed, serious splashes, in wide, still water, of divers not expecting to rise again.

Mr. James's genius for the description of persons is also ignored—those little sentences or phrases that make so many of his hundreds of characters live; Colonel Assingham, for instance—"the hollows of his eyes were deep and darksome, but the eyes, within them, were like little blue flowers plucked that morning." A score of such touches could be quoted by any student of the novels; here is another: "The point at which the soft declivity of Hampstead began at that time to confess in broken accents to St. John's Wood."

These, and a hundred other points, not only should be noted, but must be noted, by anyone who professes to expound the work of the most deliberate and conscientious artist of our day. The voiceless interchanges; the intense concentrations; the occasional annoyances of double negative or involved suspensions; the abrupt, effective use of slang and colloquialisms now and then; the persistent, amazing play on a single metaphor, sometimes through a whole chapter, with cumulative effect; the names, which often fit the characters as neatly as did those chosen by Dickens (who can forget poor, dull, decent Mrs. Bread in "The American"?—these things, for all the inquiring stranger can know who may wish to learn something of the style of the great author, do not exist for this critic. He prides himself, we think, on the fact that he has read practically everything that Mr. Henry James has written. We have no doubt of it; we believe, quite seriously, that he has read the cream of the world's literature. Why, then, in a "study" of pretensions, omit mention of the author's best books? "The Tragic Muse," and its elaboration of Peter Sherringham's predicament with Miriam Rooth and Nick Dormer's dilemma between art and politics; "The Sacred Fount," with its truly bewildering subtleties; "The Ambassadors," full of humour and with a perfectly delightful plot—one of Mr. James's most fascinating novels; "The Better Sort," that collection of stories, two or three of which must rank as among the score or so of the world's best—"The Beast in the Jungle," for instance, wherein sheer terror and remorse and agony of spirit are shown in the tremendous calm climax as probably none other could have shown them; "The Other House," a story of a beautiful and delicate situation; "The Bostonians," a detailed presentation of American life; "The Outcry," one of the most recent books; we believe we are right in saying that not one of these is even alluded to. The short stories alone should have had a brilliant chapter to themselves—and what opportunities are here lost for comparisons and contrasts! Nor is any notice taken of Mr. James's infrequent appearances as a dramatist. Mistakes are even made in the names of characters; Milly Theale and Merton Densher in "The Wings of the Dove" become Milly Strether and Morton Densher; while Dickens' Uriah Heep is given as Uriah Heap.

* Henry James: A Critical Study. By FORD MADOX HUEFFER. (Martin Secker. 7s. 6d. net.)

We are unfeignedly sorry thus to dismiss as almost useless a volume by Mr. Hueffer; but what other conclusion is possible? The chances are so lamentably missed at every turn; even in the section entitled "Methods," after a couple of excellent pages which lead us to hope for something memorable at last, all Mr. Hueffer can manage is to quote lengthily from Mr. James's own revealing prefaces to the collected edition; perhaps, however, this was really the wisest thing he could have done. He discusses the society pictured in the novels rather well, and his references to Balzac and Turgeneff are in the picture; but more than this is needed for a "critical study." We came across one paragraph, however, which struck us as illuminating:

I can't myself, for the life of me, see that a writer's subjects concern any soul but himself. They have nothing more to do with criticism than eggs with aeroplanes. A critic may like a class of subject or may dislike them—for myself I like books about fox-hunting better than any other book to have a good read in. I would rather read Tilbury Nogo than Daniel Deronda, and any book of Surtees than any book of George Meredith—excepting perhaps Evan Harrington, which is a jolly thing with a good description of country house cricket. . . .

This paragraph, which will serve as a fair sample of the author's style and grammar, explains a great deal.

W. L. R.

Homage to Utamaro

THE life of Utamaro Kitagawa was a strange compound of pathos and triumph. Dissolute while still a boy, he was early ejected from home in consequence; and thenceforth his strength was slowly consumed, year after year, by the dread disease of nympholepsy, the result being that, when imprisoned for issuing a print libelling the Shogun, he had but a feeble constitution wherewith to confront this new reverse. Only fifty-two years of age though he was, his days were numbered; yet long before this he had become famous, not only throughout the whole of his native Japan, but even in China; and now, while he lay dying, the publishers thronged to his bedside, striving eagerly to acquire works from his hand. Throughout many years after his death, moreover, his style was copied persistently, some of the emulators going so far as to counterfeit the signature of the deceased; and it is strange that he should have won all this homage from his own generation—as strange as Goya's triumph in holding a place as court-painter under three successive kings—for, like the Spaniard, the Japanese was a rebel, beginning his career by opposing public opinion. At the date of his advent the wood-engravers of Japan were mostly engaged in delineating actors in character, and the man who eschewed this theme was apt to find slender market for his output; but the master refused to tread the broad road of pleasing the vulgar taste, and instead he chose paths of his own wherein to wander.

It were fulsome to write of Utamaro as a man of exceptional versatility, for, true nympholept that he was, he concerned himself mainly with doing endless studies of filles de joie; while certainly it was in this field of work that he achieved his finest triumphs, notably in the pictures he did for a very rare book called "Kuruwa Nenchiu Gioji," which is, being translated, "Annual of the Courtesan Quarter." Indeed, this is probably the loveliest volume ever issued, far transcending anything done by the Kelm-scott, Vale, or Eragny presses; and, turning the fragile pages, one is constrained to vow that whoso has not looked upon them has no conception of Utamaro's genius, perhaps no conception of the heights to which the craft of wood-engraving sometimes soared in old Japan.

Utamaro is the Mozart of the graphic arts, being like that composer a positive emblem of mastery over delicate harmony and rhythm. A few of his prints are as richly coloured as a passage in Gautier or Ruskin, but in general he deals exclusively with soft, dreamy shades; and these shades of his, so exquisitely unified always, are as subtle, as tender as those in the inner petals of a flower. And the lapidarian workmanship in the Japanese master—those intricate and fairy-like embroideries on the kimonos of his courtesans—these have their surest counterpart in the deft cadences of Die Zauberflöte. Many men have drawn with greater power than he, yet, just as Mozart constitutes a richer mine of varied melody than any other composer, so too Utamaro is the most melodious of all draughtsmen, nearly every one of his prints being replete with lines which seem to ripple like waves on the shore, and almost tempt the hand to beat time. The most graceful of his draperies have a look of absolute naturalness, the folds of the kimonos seeming to have fallen of their own accord into the shapes wherein they are seen, and betraying no signs of studious arrangement on the artist's part; while though his composition is always so eminently eurythmic, and though one marks, on examination, that each separate factor is as vitally important to the whole lovely design as every note is in a symphony by Mozart, these factors invariably appear to stand just where they naturally would in life itself. Sometimes the various girls are grouped into a pattern nearly as intricate as those on old Celtic crosses, yet even on these occasions nothing reminds of the hand of the arranger; for the girls look as if they had been taken unawares and sketched precisely as they stood; they might have grown up like flowers or risen by an incantation, and the entire scene has that semblance of inevitability which characterises great tragedy.

Waiving altogether the aforesaid element in Utamaro, is he not essentially a tragedian? a minor tragedian, of course, yet perhaps as great a one as ever was produced by Japan, the land where a diet of lotus roots perforce begot a race incapable of art of real might. For though, like most of his compatriots, Utamaro eschewed depicting the human form realistically with the aid of modelling, and though sometimes no corporeal presence is indicated within the draperies he shows, these facts do not vitiate the foregoing contention that he combines truth with beauty, his studies of courtesans being singularly true to the actual spirit of the subject. It was part of his genius to evolve from this a refined art, a feat compassed by hardly any Europeans save Crackanthorpe and Baudelaire; while, again in contradistinction to most Occidentals, he was never tempted into being sentimental about this theme of his, courtesanship being in his native land a legitimate and reputable institution. Yet even in Japan the Yoshiwara has its tragic aspect—just the little tragedy of a faded flower, or of a theatre seen by daylight the morning after a glittering performance—and is not this little tragedy enshrined with divine certainty in Utamaro's achievement? Triumphant where divers other sufferers from nympholepsy have failed—Raphael, for instance—he crystallised his malady in his art, charging all he did with an aroma of world-weariness, a pensiveness which is strangely winning. The burthen of each of his works is—

That music and splendour

Survive not the lamp and the lute, while the girls move with a certain drowsy languor, seeming to say with the imperishable poet of "London Nights":

And now we are a little tired

Of the eternal carnival.

W. G. BLAIKIE MURDOCH.

REVIEWS

A Royalist in Two Countries

Ombres Françaises et Visions Anglaises. By COMTE D'HAUSSONVILLE. (Bernard Grasset, Paris. 3 fr. 50.)

THE Comte d'Haussonville has given us in "Ombres Françaises et Visions Anglaises" a work that divides accurately and symmetrically into two self-contained halves. There would, at first sight, appear to be no reason why the two halves should not form two separate books. But there is a thread; invisible to the casual beholder, it yet, with the tenacity characteristic of invisible bonds, binds together the author's observations into a consistent whole. For M. d'Haussonville is a Royalist. The shades he calls up are the shades of French Royalists, of the last men who truly believed that it was possible "to restore at this time the kingdom to Israel." The question that M. d'Haussonville came to England to answer was: "Do monarchy and the passion of loyalty exist anywhere in modern Europe as living realities?" The answer he feels able to give is a triumphant affirmative.

Though we have reasons of our own for finding the English part of the book the more interesting, the French part has its fascination. The author is in a position to know many things that have not been noised abroad. His long and loyal service of the Comte de Paris, the important part he played in many Royalist campaigns, and his intimate knowledge of two generations of French politics, give his words a rare and imposing authority. Moreover, we may quote, as unimpeachable witness to character, a fellow-Academician of his—M. Anatole France: "M. d'Haussonville n'a pas de souci plus grand que celui de la justice." Sometimes, however, we are driven to wonder whether the very nearness of the throne may not have been an obstacle to perfect vision. For instance, M. d'Haussonville was constant in his disapproval of any abetting of Boulanger; he seems to have been repeatedly assured and more or less convinced that no material assistance had been given. Yet certain recent evidence seems to show that the General was largely subsidised out of Royalist funds.

The portrait of the Comte de Paris is a work of piety. The pathos of exile is never so poignant as in the case of an able and patriotic Prince. We have met many excellent Frenchmen who are incapable of separating the ideas of "la France" and "la République Française." It is a pity, for there are many worshippers of "la France" for whom the two expressions are not synonymous, and many rare and great gifts of patriotic devotion have thus been wasted and thrown away. Portraits of princes are sometimes unsatisfactory; the pen of the courtier is apt to be a leveller of the most pernicious and indiscriminating type; the panegyrics of a Henri IV and a Louis XV have been known to be almost interchangeable. But M. d'Haussonville has the vision of love as well as the vision of loyalty. Another interesting feature of the French part is the life of Duke Albert de Broglie, wisest and most patriotic of the Royalists who have endured the French Republic.

The English part of the book is a kind of trilogy in three "visions." They describe three visits, each lasting about a week, made in 1910, 1911, and 1913, respectively. Our distinguished visitor had been much distressed by the "sombres pronostics" that he had heard about the future of the English State; he went away reassured. He finds that the English still believe in their kings, and that their kings still work for England. The ideal of the Comte de Paris, which included Henri IV and excluded "le Roi Soleil," is here almost satisfied. The English aristocracy still means something, and the English parties are grappling with modern problems in a true constructive spirit. Yet there is Mr. Lloyd George, and M. d'Haussonville is somewhat disturbed by the reflection. But there are many other statesmen to redress the balance, and our visitor finds them in both the principal parties. The end is certainly not yet.

In 1910 M. d'Haussonville came to see England suffering from a General Election; in 1911 he came to see her rejoicing in a Coronation; in 1913—"j'ai voulu la voir dans sa vie normale." On all three occasions he was extraordinarily thorough. In election-time he heard most of the leading orators of both the principal parties, though he somehow failed, in spite of frequently expressed aspirations, to hear Mr. Lloyd George. We suspect a lack of resolution; Liberal-Conservative opinions and the French Academy were a bad starting-point for the adventure. In 1911 he "did" the Coronation—including the decorations, the Naval Review and the Shakespeare Ball—exhaustively. In 1913 his tireless gaze swept the horizon of our institutions with incredible success.

M. d'Haussonville claims to be "un des rares Français qui aiment Londres." He certainly knows our great city, and he sees many things in her that we are apt to miss. He was especially anxious to get at the bed-rock of modern conditions—"die Sache der Armen." He uses a characteristic short cut to obtain this knowledge. "Jamais je ne vais à Londres sans rendre visite à l'Armée du Salut." Well, the Salvation Army is a great agency for good, even if it does seem to claim a monopoly in philanthropy, and, when time presses, "l'Agence Cook" can show you in a week more of a city, even of the city of Misery, than the oldest inhabitant and the most philosophical guide. Our guest is terribly impressed by our lowest strata. "Je constate" (à propos of the sandwich-men) "combien la misère est différente d'aspect et plus dégradée à Londres qu'à Paris." This reflection is repeated on many occasions. It is, after all, the bed-rock problem; may it be solved by Liberal-Conservatives like our author, and not by the Socialists!

M. d'Haussonville can never see an English public speaker with his fingers "dans les revers de sa redingote" without astonishment. The presence of lady relatives of the speaker on the platform is another permanent joy: "à la prochaine réunion je m'attends à voir aussi les enfants avec leur bonne." He is agreeably surprised to find that Cabinet Ministers do the round of the country, whereas in electioneering France "chacun ne s'occupe que de sa petite affaire." The Coronation decorations are dismissed as crude, but the comfort and elegance of our taxis receives high praise, and are assigned as the reason why French manufacturers lost this market. There are some sound considerations, from a French point of view, on Protection, and the visitor thinks that the English rule of fair play was somewhat violated during the attack on the House of Lords.

We will conclude with the opening words of this most entertaining book: "Je crains bien que ce gros volume ne soit le vingt-et-unième publié par moi. Au moins devrais-je promettre que ce sera le dernier. Mais, si Dieu me prête vie, je ne m'engage à rien." A sturdy and most praiseworthy resolution! May M. d'Haussonville long avoid the fate of the "petit poisson," and may we be there to read his twenty-second volume!

Some Ancient Villages

Villages of the White Horse. By ALFRED WILLIAMS.
(Duckworth and Co. 5s. net.)

IN days when so many people rush through the land in motors, seeing so much, but knowing so little, of real country life, of the people or of Nature, it is quite refreshing to read the work of a genuine observer of men and things, the harvest of a thoughtful mind. Evidently Mr. Alfred Williams possesses the rare gift of penetration beyond the well-known reserve of the rustic peasantry, who appear to converse with him almost as readily as with each other, judging by the freedom with which they have told him delightful stories of their lives and doings. He wanders from cottage to cottage and seems welcome everywhere. The theatre of this fascinating book is laid among the villages which cluster under both ridges of the Wiltshire Downs, from Wroughton, south of Swindon, to the famous White Horse Hill, along the Icknield Way. Mr. Williams claims that "these villages are some of the most ancient in the world, having been first of all inhabited by remote prehistoric peoples, then by the early Britons in their fortified camps, next they were Roman stations, afterwards Saxon villages, then Danish settlements, and, finally, as we know them here, strongly and typically English, second to none in the land."

The author is a master of local dialect, so much so, that at times the dialogue becomes almost unintelligible to the ordinary reader. He says that, wherever he has gone, he has found "the villagers industrious, sturdy in principle, breezily optimistic, cheerful, philosophic, and exceedingly kind-hearted, but poor—much poorer, in fact, than they ought to be in this wonder-working age of ours.” Yet he himself admits that, though wages may be low, there are many perquisites and compensations unknown to the artisans of cities and towns—a fact which we have often observed, and one which is invariably neglected and overlooked by statisticians and Socialist statesmen. It must not be supposed that this book consists of essays—far from it. It is rather a series of dramatic pictures and sketches, full of life, anecdote and humour, together with charming Nature-studies. It introduces us to the people in their homes and in the field. It gives the most vivid impression of how they live, of what they think, and of what they say. We have known country life for many years, but we are bound to confess that we have not known it as this observant writer knows it. It would be quite impossible in a short notice to give extracts which would do justice to the great amount of interesting information contained in this very interesting book, which we heartily commend to all who care about the ways and doings of remote villagers. The last chapter gives an account of White Horse Hill, Uffington Village, and Tom Brown’s School. The famous scouring of the Horse, the revels, sports and games have long since passed away. The cleansing and renovation is now done by workmen of the estate. There are very few survivors left of those who took part in the great Revel of 1857, though there are two or three—one man who is nearly ninety, who can relate most of what happened then, and who knew many of those mentioned by Judge Hughes in his book. Times are changing, but long may these villages and villagers retain their attractive characteristics.

An Amateur Vagabond

The Friendly Road. By DAVID GRAYSON. (Andrew Melrose and Co. 5s. net.)

IF ease in writing were a prime virtue in literature, Mr. Grayson would stand very high. And who shall say, in these days of self-conscious art, that it is not? Certainly it is a delight to discover a book in which there is no pose, no striving after effect, no “precious” use of words. The spontaneous naturalness of Mr. Grayson’s style is as refreshing as his unconventional matter. His previous book, “Adventures in Contentment,” described how a weary townsman, feeling the artificiality and bondage of his life, escaped to the country and lived on a small farm. It is a very idyllic story, and it loses none of its romance from the fact that it is American. After some years of this experience the writer begins to feel that even farm-life may have its bondage. In his own words, “So often we think in a superior and lordly manner of our possessions, when, as a matter of fact, we do not really possess them; they possess us.” He could not get free all at once—“it required several days to break the habit of cows and hens”—but he starts off on a pilgrimage of uncertain length, careless of destination, and with a minimum of cash. His money is soon exhausted, but he continues his wanderings and lives by his wits—from which point his book becomes extraordinarily interesting. Yet he is never put to any mean or unworthy shifts; and in each of his devices to obtain food and lodging he manages to point a moral in an unobtrusive and therefore very effective fashion.

In his brief preface Mr. Grayson says: “If you chance to be a truly serious person, put down my book.” We disagree with this; rather, if you chance to be a truly serious person, take up this book, provided that you have a sense of humour, for that is necessary. Indeed, we believe that if any flippant folk get hold of this volume they will soon be found in a very serious frame, for, with all its ease, it induces thought. Mr. Grayson has an eye for the symbolism of his adventures, and in the course of his book nearly every great problem of human life is hinted at. This propensity is seen at its best in the chapter entitled “I Play the Part of a Spectacle-Pedlar,” but it is so amusing that we laugh and cogitate in the same moment.

Mr. Grayson’s method of procedure in his hour of need is to go and work alongside the person or persons from whom he decides he will get the necessities of life. This leads to some strange encounters, but, in his pages at least, it never fails. As a method it may be successful in the great Western Continent, but we fear that in our more insular life it would not always lead to such happy results. The only suspicion of unnaturalness appears in the two encounters with the Vedders. On the first of these he discovers them living the simple life in a house by the side of the road, and endeavouring to forget their wealth. Their confronting him with his own earlier book and his compulsory acknowledgment as the blushing author is almost too good to be true. And Mr. Vedder appears almost too much as a deus ex machina in the strike episode near the end. True, stranger things have happened in real life, so we absolve the author.

For the rest, his book is like a breeze of springtime, as we hope this passage, which shows him of the true vagabond order, fully attests:

Now I usually prefer the little roads, the little, unexpected, curving, leisurely country roads. The sharp hills, the pleasant, deep valleys, the bridges not too well kept, the verdure deep-grown along old fences, the houses opening hospitably at the very roadside, all these things I love. They come to me with the same sort of charm and flavour, only vastly magnified, which I find often in the essays of the older writers—those leisurely old fellows who took time to write, really write. The important thing to me about a road, as about life and literature, is not that it goes anywhere, but that it is livable while it goes. For if I were to arrive—and who knows that I ever shall arrive?—I think I should be no happier than I am here.

The Primrose Path

Reminiscent Gossip of Men and Matters. By JAMES BAKER, F.R.G.S. (Chapman and Hall. 6s.)

THE author is here seen as the most casual go-as-you-please writer that we have met for many a long day. Versatility is generally accepted as a curse to the literary man; if it be a vice, it is one to which we are particularly kind, but Mr. Baker carries the matter a trifle beyond the borderland of reason. It is all very well with an essay, as in "The Epistle to a Young Friend" of Burns, to find that—

Perhaps it may turn out a song,
Perhaps turn out a sermon.

but to be scared and guided by the ignis fatuus of the author's recollections throughout some thirty chapters is a weariness to the mind.

It would appear that Mr. Baker prepares his essays with the aid of old note-books in which he has written down any odd matter that seemed at the moment of interest to himself. These often trite and obvious memoranda he now develops into short articles freely sprinkled with marks of exclamation and interrogation, which leave us rather cold. His exegesis on these texts are not very enlivening.

He boldly states that "there is a subtle charm in looking over old note-books, wherein, as the years have flown on, facts have been commented on, striking incidents noted, travel hints preserved, books culled from, and thoughts inscribed." We wish we could share this simple faith with Mr. Baker, but it is too courageous and general a statement for us. If the present book of reminiscent gossip be an example of such a method, we own that the result is disappointing—but not, of course, to the writer of the book. He, at least, has the memory of a thousand adventures behind his written word. The kings of the earth supply him with what he considers amusing stories; the philosophy of all the races of men engages his interest and delight. Just how it happens that a writer of such wide experience, and, doubtless, great achievements, should produce a book which, notwithstanding its light and varied method, remains dull and futile, is something of a psychological mystery. We have tried to solve it in the reading of Mr. Baker's book, and our conclusion is that the fault must lie with us. The primrose path of reminiscent dalliance which has so often given us pleasure appears on this occasion barred against our best endeavours; the casual quotations and the extracts from older writers, which might well be of value, appear as a twice-told tale. But other readers may find the pleasure we have missed.

Mr. Baker thus explains what is before you in one of his essays: "Facts and persons, extracts from books under notice at the moment, notes for expeditions, a perfect olla podrida are these little note-books. Not a review of the times, but glimpses into some of the great events of the world's history for many a year." And if you like that kind of thing, and Mr. Baker's style generally, "Reminiscent Gossip of Men and Matters" is just the book to get from the library.

A Prophet and His Honour

Hector Berlioz (1803-1869). Sa Vie et ses Œuvres. By J. G. PROD'HOMME. (Ch. Delagrave, Paris. 3 fr. 50.)

THE "Grand Siècle" still hangs heavy over France. The mother and grandmother of Academies has not lost her ancient power of chastising the solitary artist. In two of the arts the modern right of private combination has partially redressed the balance; "cénacles" and "salons des refusés" have shown that organised revolt can make quite comfortable homes for the unorthodox of poetry or of painting. Independent genius may still starve, if it will, but simple unorthodoxy, tempered with sociability, is assured of subsistence. For music the hour of deliverance has not yet struck. Perhaps it will never strike. Music is the most individualistic of the arts; it abhors coteries. Revolt has often prospered, but generally through the sheer force of a creative personality. We may say that for the last century and a quarter music has done nothing but revolt, and that at the present moment the revolt is spreading. The Futurists seem even to be forming the first musical Trades Union.

When Berlioz fought for his revolutionary music, which he himself regarded as merely in the tradition and as opposed to Wagner's "musique de l'avenir," there was no "foyer de révolte" round which miscellaneous rebels might rally. The artist must either storm the doors of the academies or pass a contract with Mæcenæ. For the latter our particular artist had an unqualified respect. Unfortunately, the Mæcenæ of Berlioz' day was as elusive as Proteus, being the successive creature of many revolutions, and when found he was not always easy to command. Political revolutions are not kind to artistic revolutions; they have no time. Berlioz based great hopes on Napoleon III, and was not long in seeing them collapse.

The chief result of Berlioz' difficulties, or the result most pertinent to the matter in hand, is that Berlioz' life is uncommonly interesting. The lives of artists, of musicians especially, may or may not "oft remind us" of various important matters, but they are apt to be rather dull. The career of Berlioz was by no means dull. A good deal of it was mere squabbling, but in its essence it was a fight for the good against the bad—for truth against conventions and for the dignity of art against the mercenaries. Sometimes the indefatigable fighter struck rather blindly and wounded friends with his blows. He quarrelled absurdly with Wagner, after a long friendship distinguished by extraordinary forbearance on the part of the Bayreuth master. It is true that there were fundamental differences in the points of view of the two composers. In Berlioz' accomplished work Wagner saw only platitude and promise; to Berlioz Wagner represented anarchy in art, and "la musique de l'avenir" was a pretentious puzzle. Wagner regarded the theatre as the temple of the highest music; Berlioz said "les théâtres sont à la musique sicut amori lupanar."

It is no very rash assertion to make that Berlioz is the greatest of French musicians. Leaving out of the question some of the moderns, such as Debussy and Ravel, there is no name in the history of French music that stands more emphatically for an ideal and for a progress. What that ideal was and in what direction that progress tended the composer has not explicitly told us, and could probably never have told us. We find it ourselves in the somewhat negative ideal of freedom. However that may be, Berlioz suffered something very like martyrdom in the cause of his art. From the day when his Symphonie funèbre et triomphale was drowned on the Place de la Bastille by the untimely accompaniment of regimental drums, to that on which, leaving his bed to vote for a friend at the Institute, he signed his own death-warrant, his life in France contained little but mortifications and sacrifices. Abroad every honour awaited him: in Germany, Russia and England he was acclaimed and adored; princes, cities and orchestras vied with each other in their homage and their gifts. But his glance always wandered back to his ungrateful Parisians. France had seen but one great native musical genius in several generations, and she rejected him. It is true that she has since built the sepulchre of the prophet, but the prophet had to be killed first.

Adolphe Adam was foremost among the detractors of Berlioz, and his criticisms are monuments of what criticisms ought not to be. There is a passage on a newly-heard composition that might do for an almost literal paraphrase of the famous "Bab Ballad":—

It was jerky, spasmodic—of that I'm aware;
But still, it distinctly suggested an air!

The best excuse for Berlioz' critics was that their quarry was also a penman—"le seul musicien qui écrit," says Adam. He filled countless columns of the Débats with his feuilletons, and only desisted when he had secured a competence that made him independent of them. Nor did he omit to praise himself.

The sentimental life of Berlioz is a mixture of farce and tragedy. He married twice, an Englishwoman—Harriet Smithson, the great Shakespearean actress—and a Spaniard, and he had countless love-affairs. The taunting visit of the second to the first Mme. Berlioz is a most unpleasant and chilling episode. On the other hand, it is impossible not to smile at the picture of the original Mme. Berlioz trying to keep pace with her husband's infidelities. "Le cœur de Berlioz allait si vite qu'elle ne pouvait pas le suivre; quand, à force de rechercher, elle était tombée sur l'objet de la passion de son mari, cette passion avait changé."

Berlioz' work is best represented by passages from the "Damnation de Faust" and by the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"; but his life and his effort were greater than his achievement. He deserves the special remembrance of Englishmen as one of the real creators of the Philharmonic Society and a pioneer of musical taste in England.

Synge, and Irish Drama

John Millington Synge and the Irish Theatre. By MAURICE BOURGEOIS. Illustrated. (Constable and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

Irish Plays and Playwrights. By CORNELIUS WEYGANDT. (Constable and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

IT is inevitable, perhaps, that every significant movement should be arrested, should be hindered from going forward and discovering the natural outcome of its intention, by the presence of those who have been attracted by its first success, and who come, not as workers, but as critics, with their baneful gift of self-consciousness. There is no doubt—there are many in Ireland to deplore it—that the first fine promise of Irish drama has been hindered in this way; and that the cause of it has been the presence of something that is well indicated by these two books. It is worthy of remark that both writers should be students coming from other countries. In each case the whole of the literature has been covered with a thoroughness that has left nothing unread: not even the remotest articles in the remotest journals. M. Bourgeois especially has been indefatigable; and his book is, indeed, a remarkable achievement for a young writer in a strange tongue. But the symptoms remain. And the result in Irish drama is only too manifest.

We have said that the evil this larger and merely critical interest has brought has been premature self-consciousness. Obviously this is so; and it is best seen when Synge becomes, as he has now inevitably become, the centre of interest. The present writer yields to none in his admiration for Synge's genius. He felt this from the beginning, and has expressed it frequently. But there is no disguising the fact that Synge, more than any other, has arrested the movement of which he was a part—or, rather, not Synge so much as the indiscriminating attention a certain purely fortuitous set of circumstances has created about his name. The quaint anomaly that now has come about is this: that if dramatists do not write like Synge they are not conceived as Irish, and if they do they are conceived as disciples. His brutality of outlook—not an expression of strength, but a revolt against his physical weakness—has made a vogue of mere photographic actualism. When men write, as the Western people speak, English in the Gaelic syntax and idiom, it is said that they, in M. Bourgeois' words, "write in 'Syngeese.'" Presumably, An Craoibhin wrote the "Love Songs of Connacht" in "Syngeese." Of course, the truth is that Synge derived the hint of the possible uses of the Gaelic idiom as much from Dr. Hyde as from anyone. He himself admitted so much in words that M. Bourgeois is careful to quote, but which we think he has not heeded as much as he might have done. Synge's individuality inevitably came into play: as, for example, when, failing to catch the abrupt cadence with which the people give hardness to their speech, he attempted to gain the same end by holding to the monotony of sweetness and loading it with a brutality of metaphor more proper to the revolt of his mind than to the speech of the people. But these are incidental considerations. The main fact is that the praisers of Synge have come to crush the movement that Synge himself would have wished to carry into newer fields. When he died, the newer fields were, as M. Bourgeois points out, in his immediate vision; yet they seem incalculably remote now from the point of view of Anglo-Irish drama.

It will seem churlish to speak of M. Bourgeois' book in this way, in view of the inexhaustible patience with which it has been accumulated, and particularly churlish in face of his kindly references to the present writer. Moreover, his own frankness is disarming. He says that Synge himself would not have read books upon himself, least of all the present one. We may believe that such books that fasten on one adventitious success in a wide movement, marring the movement in a chorus of ill-considered acclamation which demands the conformity of the movement to that one outstanding success, can work nothing but harm; but when we are faced by M. Bourgeois' particular book it is difficult to be hard. Synge's work, as too many writers forget altogether, was but half done—the cadences of verse-drama lay ahead; but that cannot be said of M. Bourgeois' book. He has gone about with attentive ear, and, undoubtedly, an attentive pencil; hearing everything, noting all things. Some of the conversations that have been recorded are possibly of discomfort to his interlocutors of the past—the present writer has one slight grudge on this account, which is of small moment; but everyone and everything has been called upon to subserve the book. Moreover, M. Bourgeois has woven them together, if not always with judgment, yet certainly with skill. Therefore, the book is an invaluable storehouse of information, and should be extremely serviceable. We were surprised, knowing his extensive information, to note that he has perpetuated the false impression that the Abbey Theatre and the Irish Literary Theatre were coextensive, one being the flower of the other; and that W. B. Yeats and Lady Gregory were at the beginnings of both. The truth, of course, is that the movement was started before either by a number of playwrights, including Mr. Padraic Colum; and that it was Miss Horniman's money that gave Mr. Yeats, and through him Lady Gregory, the ascendancy in a movement they did not originate—one of the results of which ascendancy may be seen in the fact that the plays of the original circle are not included in the present repertory, whereas plays by such Continental writers as Strindberg are. M. Bourgeois has been wise in avoiding any hint of the contentions that have occurred; but in this instance his facts have not been altogether justly presented.

Mr. Weygandt's book is concerned with a wider subject, and is an excellent example of American journalism bound in covers. If one laments the inevitable distortion that a book like M. Bourgeois' means, despite its patience, its care and its labour, we can only resent "Irish Plays and Playwrights." It is, as we have said, pure journalism, and sycophantic journalism at that.

It adds little to our store of actual historical information, and makes no attempt at critical examination, though it is liberal of appraisal. Those who have had any experience of American professional literature will know precisely what to expect, and they will not be disappointed. The more general reader, to whom a book is something beyond his morning paper, both in substance and virtue, will be both disappointed and puzzled. He will be puzzled at an element in the book which simply is this, that Mr. Weygandt, no doubt unconsciously, has been influenced into writing a partisan work without making that partisanship so evident that the looker-on may judge. This is not his fault: it is the fault of writing of a movement from the outside. It is not for nothing that his best chapter deals with a personality that has always remained outside all movements of a purely literary sort: "AE." His examination of "AE's" work and influence, without a doubt the greatest single influence and the best sustained of the whole "literary revival," does indeed advance one's information, though it, too, is immersed in the spirit of the reporter out for copy. In conclusion, both of these books are characteristic of a tendency that we cannot but conceive to be bad: M. Bourgeois' is well and capably done, whereas Mr. Weygandt's enforces the necessary evil by the pure spirit of the reporter.

The Civil Service

How to Enter the Civil Service. By E. A. CARR.
(Alexander Moring. 2s. 6d. net.)

THERE was a time when the would-be humorist was accustomed to put to his friends the conundrum, "Why are Civil Servants like the fountains in Trafalgar Square?" and expect the reply, "Because they play from ten to four." If the joke ever had a point that point has certainly long been blunted, for the hours of Civil Servants are not nowadays from ten to four, and, whatever they do during the working day, they certainly have no time for play. One may say, even, that Civil Servants are among the hardest workers in the country. The amount of their work varies with the different offices, but in some, such as the Post Office, the Civil Servant has to spend a very strenuous official day. Differing from the members of other professions, his work is by no means finished when he leaves the office at the end of the business day. The Civil Service is probably the worst remunerated of all the professions. In very few cases, apart from the members of the Higher Division, is an adequate salary paid, and in the case of the Higher Division the salaries offered are not such as are likely to tempt the best brains in the country. As a consequence, most Civil Servants, especially those who are married, are compelled to supplement, or even double, their official incomes by means of writing, teaching, and other occupations. As a result, the whole of the energies of Civil Servants are seldom at the disposal of the State. Apart, however, from the inadequate salaries, common to all ranks—for instance, the Secretary to the Post Office, the head of a business which dwarfs its nearest rivals almost into insignificance, receives only £2,000 a year, about a fifth of the salary of the manager of a bank or a railway company—the caste system, which governs all staff questions in the Service, serves as an ever-present discouragement to all below the level of the Higher Division.

The Second Division clerk, no matter how intense his zeal on his entry, sooner or later realises the hopelessness of his position, the life sentence of helotry which he has to serve. His enthusiasm is soon crushed out of him; his ambition, if it survives, is directed into non-official channels. As a consequence, the State he is willing to give the best that is in him receives but the dregs. His freshest energies are reserved for other masters. His only hope is to attain to the fortunate position of being able to resign his membership of H.M.C.S. In this manner is explained the dead level of mediocrity to be found throughout the Civil Service, the inert hand of precedent supreme everywhere, and, as consequences, the gross incompetences which led to the War Office muddle during the course of the South African War, and the procrastination and negligence at the Board of Trade which made that Department a participant in the tragedy of the Titanic. A Royal Commission on the Civil Service is at present considering the terms of its report. It is to be hoped that the Commissioners have found some means of reinvigorating the army of Civil Servants and of restoring to them the encouragement and the hope, without which no one can work with satisfactory results, of which the present system has deprived nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand.

Mr. Carr, in writing a guide for the Civil Service aspirant, has painted the colours of the Service in the liveliest possible hues. Between the lines, however, one can read that he is by no means unmindful of the very many serious blemishes which tend to spoil the beauty of the profession of which he is a member. It is obvious that Mr. Carr feels how much room there is for improvement in the organisation of the Service. He is, however, not concerned with Civil Servants so much as with would-be Civil Servants. For these latter, his guide fulfils its purpose as well as any book can do so.

It is nearly two and a half years since a MS. entitled "Pot-Pourri Parisien," bearing several addresses, was left at Mr. Murray's office by the author, who promised to call for it in a few days' time. He has not kept that promise, and communication with every address has proved futile. If the author sees this paragraph, will he kindly make his whereabouts known to Mr. Murray?

Another M.P. in India

India of To-day. By E. C. MEYSEY-THOMPSON, M.P. With a Map. (Smith, Elder and Co. 6s. net.)

INDIA should be kept out of party politics, and Mr. Meysey-Thompson, the Conservative member for Handsworth, might well have omitted his occasional "digs" at the Liberal Government. This book is apparently meant as a corrective of the works of Radical visitors to India, with which we are familiar. Where they generally disparage the Indian Civil Service as a selfish bureaucracy, Mr. Meysey-Thompson records his entire appreciation of the present system of administration, and suggests strengthening that Service. He does not explain how this would be compatible with the lavish donation of appointments to natives of India which he advocates, and he does not meet the practical difficulties when he proposes selection by preliminary nomination, followed by competitive examination. His assertion "that rank is, at least in India, a necessary concomitant of ability" cannot be accepted as correct. In fact, Mr. Meysey-Thompson is generally so inexperienced an observer that his deductions can hardly be relied upon. His admiration for Lord Curzon and the latter's educational reform is so great that he thinks, "as their effect is gradually felt, so will decline the numbers and influence of that discontented crowd of unemployed 'intellectuals' without discipline and without paternal reverence." The contrary is more likely. The "intellectuals" form a microscopic minority. As education expands, the crowd of semi-educated, unemployed, discontented will increase, not decline.

Mr. Meysey-Thompson has rightly diagnosed certain facts which he could hardly have missed—namely, "the enormously increasing prosperity of the country under the present administration, caused by the security to life and property, the certainty of impartial justice in the English Courts, the opening-up of the country by roads and railways, the great extension of the systems of irrigation, and the protection to life afforded by the splendidly organised system of providing relief in case of famine." And he has endeavoured, though with varying success, to probe beneath the surface in various directions, such as the Administration, Local Self-government, Education, the Partition of Bengal, Land Revenue, Taxation, Social and other grievances, and Political Reforms. Some important subjects—Military and Frontier affairs, and the relations with the Native States, he has apparently not studied. His conclusions cannot always be accepted: for instance, when he asserts that "on all sides the necessity for some partition—of Bengal—was admitted." The increase of population was almost entirely in the numbers of the cultivating classes. Decentralisation and devolution would have relieved the highest authorities. The matter is too complicated to discuss further here. Mr. Meysey-Thompson is hard upon Secretariats and the Bengal administration. There is nothing to show that he has heard both sides of the questions he touches upon.

This is the error of itinerant M.P.'s. Being on the search for information, they are receptive: being pressed for time, they accept statements without sifting them. Nor can they always read correctly, or know what to read, though certain excellent Handbooks to India supply the information required. Mr. Meysey-Thompson has made some strange mistakes. Any schoolboy who has read Macaulay's essay on Clive knows that Clive captured Arcot and (with the aid of Admiral Watson) recaptured Calcutta: but Madras was not "brilliantly recaptured" by him, as Mr. Meysey-Thompson mistakenly writes, or by any other commander. Clive had not a roving mandate to recover lost cities. Madras was restored after peace was declared, not recaptured. Mr. Meysey-Thompson has summarised Indian history from Plassey to the Mutiny, exactly a hundred years, in ten lines, with the satisfactory conclusion that "thus by degrees the greater part of India came under our beneficent rule, and peace and prosperity were found to follow the British flag."

Such a summary is too brief. The prosperity is manifest. The peace is not so certain, when so much is heard of unrest and outbreaks. Mr. Meysey-Thompson has picked up a valuable hint or two, on which it would be easy to dilate, such as the unsuitability of the legal system; but he might have added that, as law is indispensable, the remedy lies in adapting the law to the requirements. The natives can, and do, resort to the Courts, not to obtain justice only, but to wreak vengeance on their enemies by legal process: and the executive administration is paralysed by the subtleties of acute lawyers arguing to weak tribunals. It is impossible to supply here all Mr. Meysey-Thompson's deficiencies or correct his various errors of fact. He is entitled to his own views; but it may be permissible to suggest to him a longer stay in India, to make further inquiries, hear both sides, verify his history, and then write promptly before an interval of some years has damaged the value of his narrative: he will perhaps learn to discredit the alleged proverb that "in the British Rāj the sweeper is king," as insulting as it is incorrect.

The Annual General Meeting of the Royal Meteorological Society was held on Wednesday evening, January 21, at the Institution of Civil Engineers, Great George Street, Westminster, Mr. C. J. P. Cave, M.A., president, in the chair. The president presented to Mr. W. H. Dines, F.R.S., the Symons Gold Medal for 1914, which the Council had awarded him in recognition of his distinguished work in connection with meteorological science. Mr. Cave in his presidential address dealt fully with the subject of upper air research. He pointed out that research in the upper air may be by means of manned balloon with observer and instrument, or by self-registering instruments sent up in kite, captive balloon, or free balloon, and discussed each method in a most interesting manner.

In Unknown Africa

Through Jubaland to the Lorian Swamp. By I. N. DRACOPOLI. (Seeley, Service and Co. 16s. net.)

FAR distant, we believe, is the day when Africa will cease to provide fresh fields for conquest by the explorer, the sportsman, and the naturalist. However old in fact, there is still much that is new to the modern world to be found in huge tracts yet untrodden by the foot of the white man. Great Britain has not even had time in twenty years of occupation to survey and map out her Protectorate in East Africa—which is hardly astonishing when one considers the extent of country lying between Abyssinia and German East Africa, and between the Indian Ocean and the Albert Nyanza. Otherwise, Mr. Dracopoli would not be able to describe his book as an account of "an adventurous journey of exploration and sport in the unknown African forests and deserts of Jubaland to the undiscovered Lorian Swamp." We do not agree that in a few years the opportunity for adventurous exploration in what not so long ago was the Dark Continent will have passed. Mr. Dracopoli's own record shows how little we really know of Jubaland, and books such as his and Colonel Stigand's "Land of Zinj" will sharpen the desire of heroic spirits who are not satisfied to follow in the wake of the Churchills and the Roosevelts along the almost hackneyed route of the misnamed Uganda Railway, through Uganda to the Nile. Mr. Dracopoli evidently anticipates developments in the deserts and bush-land which he succeeded in crossing without serious mishap—a remarkable proof of the reality of British influence, however little it may seem to be in evidence in Somali or Borana villages, hundreds of miles from Kismayu or Nairobi.

The state of affairs Mr. Dracopoli found in Jubaland cannot, he says, last very long. "Its inhabitants are living to-day in the same fashion that their forefathers lived centuries ago. Its wild animals roam undisturbed over its wide and silent plains, or lie unmolested in the shadow of its bush." Except to the explorer who will face the Arctic terrors of Labrador or the tropic terrors of a Sahara with equal indifference in order to discover the secret of the unknown, and to the sportsman or naturalist who is prepared to go anywhere and endure anything for the sake of big game or a new specimen, Jubaland can have no peculiar attractions. To be quite frank, the country for the pioneer who was not a sportsman, as Mr. Dracopoli is, would be appalling in its chequered monotony. Its long stretches of desert and wilderness are relieved by few geographical features of interest; and progress through its scrub and thorn-bushes seems often to have been pretty much what one might expect if one went hunting through barbed-wire entanglements. Its population is more or less nomad, driven from place to place by the necessity of finding pastures for its cattle, and villages of any importance are as few and far between as the rivers and water-holes. Yet it is a British possession, and as such ought not to be left indefinitely in the primitive state in which we took it over. Perhaps when the sportsman, for whom at least Joreh has been called a paradise, elects to pay it serious attention, it may begin to move forward to that doubtful goal of civilisation from which some would preserve it. Whether developments are possible on economic lines, in the way of agriculture and of forestry, aided by irrigation and water-storage, we do not gather. Mr. Dracopoli thinks much might be done to encourage trade with the natives. They have sheep and cattle in great numbers, which they might well be encouraged to exchange for rice, cotton and iron. It is, however, difficult to see how transport difficulties are to be got over, and Mr. Dracopoli does not seem to have taken them into account.

His twin object in going to Jubaland was geography and sport, and he accomplished much in both directions. Hunter's hartebeeste, Grant's gazelle, Grévy's zebra and the rest afforded plenty of occupation and excitement, whilst lion, elephant, and rhino' are about, though they did not come within Mr. Dracopoli's range. The interest of his book is on the side of sport: the value is in its contribution to geographical accuracy, if, as we must assume, his observations have correctly located places as to which the sketch-maps hitherto available were misleading. "The position of the Lorian Swamp varied on the different sheets by nearly one degree," but this is not strange, seeing that the natives themselves did not know the country between Gulola and Lorian. A good deal of misapprehension appears to exist with regard to the meaning of native names. "Lak" and "Lagga," for instance, both mean a river that runs only after rains. "Lak Guranlugga," given on some maps, is equivalent to saying "River Guran River." We hope Mr. Dracopoli's information on the scientific side is more precise than in some other respects. He says Jenner was murdered in 1905 by the Somali whilst attempting to make the journey to Lorian Swamp: Jenner was killed in 1900 or 1901. He tells us that the Maribou storks have certain feathers under the tail worth £12 an ounce, but that six birds have to be killed to secure one ounce. Under the picture of the bird, he says that three yield an ounce. The book would have made much better reading if it had been revised by someone with an eye to redundancy and repetition: these, however, are small points, and do not seriously detract from the value of a work which seems to us to be a real contribution to our knowledge of Africa. Mr. Dracopoli may at least claim the credit due to one who has trodden a part of the country in which no white man was ever seen before. The book is well illustrated from photographs.

Among the books published in January is Colonel Roosevelt's "History in Literature and other Essays," a volume that illustrates another aspect of his multitudinous interests. The main thesis of this work, which Mr. Murray publishes, is that the domain of literature must be ever more widely extended over the domains of history and science. Colonel Roosevelt's treatment of his subject is highly characteristic.

Shorter Reviews

Friends of the Riverside. By R. E. GREEN. (Murray and Evenden. 1s. net.)

THE angler, like the poet, is born. The amateur, like the versifier, may, perhaps, be made. There is no mistaking the category to which Mr. Green belongs. He is of the true brotherhood of the line. There is, too, something infectious about his enthusiasm, as he tells you of the marvellous trout that he has landed while fishing in those wonderful Yorkshire streams. But, for the most part, Mr. Green has chosen to remain modestly in the background. It is about the people he has met—his fellow-anglers up and down the country—that he prefers to chatter. (We use the word "chatter" advisedly, for this book has the quality of a casual and dismissive conversation.) They are drawn from all classes—schoolmasters, clergymen, men from the manor-house and men from the mill; nondescripts, foreigners, shepherds—but, anglers all. Perhaps the pleasantest of them is the person, who divided his enthusiasm between his religion and his rod. He came up to Mr. Green one morning, waving a letter. "This has been forwarded to me from home," he said; "it is an invitation (a call, I suppose I ought to say) to another church, and the place is within three miles of a bonny trout-stream." That little touch helps one vividly to realise what manner of being this fisher of men was. It is a pleasant little book that Mr. Green has written. "The rod, net, and basket," he tells us, "constitute a passport into the kingdom of a large and kindly friendship." All who belong to that kingdom—of which old Izaak Walton, of blessed memory, still remains the supreme sovereign—will extend a kindly welcome to this little volume. Its value, we are reluctantly forced to add, would not have been seriously impaired by the absence of the illustrations.

The Mending of Life. By RICHARD ROLLE, of Hampole. Edited in modern English by the REV. DUNDAS HARFORD, M.A. (H. R. Allenson. 1s. 6d. net.)

RICHARD ROLLE was born in Yorkshire about the year 1300. He was educated at Oxford at the expense of Archdeacon Nevile, of Durham. Here he imbibed that peculiar mystical influence which eventually made him one of the greatest of a famous group of mystical writers of the spiritual era of the fourteenth century. Hence arose, he tells us himself, his conversion, which meant his leaving Oxford scholasticism and taking to the hermit life in the neighbourhood of his old home. He made a hermit's costume for himself from two dresses of his sisters, and then fled to the woods. He there persuaded one John de Dalton of his sanity and sanctity, who provided on his estate a cell and means of subsistence for the young enthusiast. After a period of three years passed in spiritual contemplation, he seems to have spent the remaining twenty or twenty-five years of his life in constant efforts for the spiritual teaching and help of his "Even-Christians." Finally he settled down as spiritual adviser to the Cistercian nuns at Hampole, near Doncaster, where he died in 1349.

"The Mending of Life" was probably written after the experience of years, when he had learnt the value of systematic instruction. It is at once a deeply spiritual and a practical treatise. It is evidently, too, a picture of the ordering of his own life. Mr. Harford gives an interesting and exhaustive introduction, in which he compares Richard Rolle with Thomas à Kempis. And he sums up the value of Rolle's work in the following words:—

"The phenomena of the unitive life seem to have been henceforth displayed in him—occasional times of rapt ecstasy, constant Practice of the Presence of God, with creative and inspirational influence over the lives of others."

In order to produce this excellent version, the first in modernised English, Mr. Harford has spared no pains in collating various MSS. This valuable treatise will appeal to men of all schools of thought, Anglican and Roman Catholics, or Protestants, for it deals with realities of the soul, which are common to all spiritually minded and devout Christians.

Psychical Research and Survival. By JAMES H. HYSLOP, Ph.D. (G. Bell and Sons. 2s. 6d. net.)

THE author of this interesting volume of "The Quest Series" considers that "the controversy about psychic phenomena is between those who sympathise with materialism and those who sympathise with the desire for a spiritual interpretation of the world." The attitude of both sides is carefully discussed. The weakness of telepathy as an explanatory conception is exposed. It is merely a process of mental action. Spiritualism, to some, connotes superstition; to others, incredulity. The really important question, to which Dr. Hyslop devotes his attention, is whether personal consciousness survives or not. He believes that the evidence for survival is sufficiently conclusive to satisfy all intelligent people. In estimating the value of scientific objection, there are two points often forgotten. One is that the materialist is unable to prove that consciousness is a function of the brain. Normal experience tends to show that death annihilates consciousness, but scientifically this cannot be proved. The other is that it is an axiom of science that energy is never destroyed. Of this, a simple illustration will suffice. If a ton weight is elevated one hundred feet, and then falls to the ground, at first sight it seems to have lost all its energy, whether of motion or position. But science demonstrates that its energy is not destroyed, but simply transformed into another sort of motion—namely, heat.

We may conclude that the energy of consciousness is not destroyed by death, and there is a fair ground for presumption that it is translated to another sphere of action. For the purpose of this inquiry the writer practically dismisses the emotional religious conceptions of a spiritual world, and confines his attention to scientific and philosophical ideas and activities. He considers that the conflict between science and religion is something deeper than one between dogma and beliefs. It is rather between temperaments and desires, between realism and idealism, though science is not necessarily opposed to the existence of God and the immortality of the soul. This short treatise will interest all who believe, with the author, that the "fact of survival is the only one that will in any satisfactory way co-ordinate and explain the phenomena of spiritism."

List of Annual Subscriptions. (Wm. Dawson and Sons.)

Handy Newspaper List. (C. and E. Layton. 6d.)

IN these two handy booklets we have a mass of information which will be of considerable use to all who have to deal with periodicals, either as advertisers or subscribers. Messrs. Dawsons' list, which is in its twenty-fifth edition, gives, in addition to alphabetical lists of English and foreign publications, the rates of subscription to each. Messrs. Laytons' list is indeed "handy," as its name implies; but it only covers the Press of the United Kingdom, and so anyone wishing to go farther afield will have to consult other lists. Nevertheless, this "Handy Newspaper List" is a most useful one for our own home papers.

The Drama Society will present three new plays at the New Rehearsal Theatre, 21, Maiden Lane, on Sunday, February 8, at 8 o'clock: "Poudre d'Amour," by Aldon Roen (produced by Mr. Tripp Edgar); "Damages," by A. von Herder; and "Barn y Brodyr" ("The Voice of the Brethren"), a Carnarvonshire play by T. R. Evans, which will be acted in Welsh, with a full English synopsis on all programmes. Miss Edyth Olive and Mr. Rathmell Wilson will recite. Among those in the casts will be Miss Eve Balfour, Miss Rose Yule, Miss Megan Williams, Miss Janet Evans, Miss Cordelia Rhys, Mr. Miles Malleson, Mr. Ronald Hodgson, Mr. Stanley Roberts, and Mr. Gwilym Aeron. Tickets and all information may be obtained from Rathmell Wilson, International Club, 22a, Regent Street, S.W.

"The Eternal Maiden," by T. Everett Harré, which met with instantaneous success in America, going through four editions the week of publication, has just been brought out in England by Messrs. Duckworth and Co. Few books of recent years have elicited such praise from notable people.

Fiction

Chance and her Victims

Chance. By JOSEPH CONRAD. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

AS the author states, the story of Flora de Barral—otherwise the story of “Chance”—was imparted to him instages. None of the chapters, or even a page, must be missed, for there is many a breaking-off and a continuing of the narrative by a different person from the one who starts to relate a particular incident. The book is concerned with ships, and they that go down to the sea in them, and right royal, hearty, and true are the captain and his mates. But to imitate Mr. Conrad and return to previous happenings, Flora de Barral is the child of a speculative financier, whose reckless handling of other people's money brought him within reach of the law. At the time of the crash, Flora, a girl of sixteen, was living in a luxurious house at Brighton in charge of a governess. In his description of this terrible woman Mr. Conrad gives a glimpse of the kind of writing the reader may expect to find in the story. Disappointed, envious, and furious at having her plan of securing the de Barral thousands—which she thought to gain by throwing her scamp of a nephew into Flora's society—frustrated, she turns on her innocent young charge. Flora stood, a frail and passive vessel into which the other went on pouring all the accumulated dislike for all her pupils, her scorn of all her employers, the accumulated resentment, the infinite hatred all these unrelieved years of—I won't say hypocrisy. . . . No! I will say the years, the passionate, bitter years, of restraint, the iron, admirably mannered restraint at every moment, in a never-failing perfect correctness of speech, glances, movements, smiles, gestures, establishing for her a high reputation, an impressive record of success in her sphere. It had been like living half strangled for years.

From this terrible onslaught Flora emerged thoroughly stunned, broken-hearted and quite ill.

It is not possible to relate the whole of the happenings Fate had in store for the luckless girl, but before her marriage and the tragedy of her father's release there stand out prominently Mr. and Mrs. Fyne. “They were commonplace, earnest, without smiles and without guile. But he had his solemnities and she had her reveries, her lurid, violent, crude reveries.” Mrs. Fyne was also a feminist, although her doctrine was neither political nor social, but took the form of strange advice to many girl-friends she gathered round her.

Such were some of the influences on the early life of this daughter of the once great de Barral, so that when Captain Anthony—Mrs. Fyne's brother—tells her he loves her, asks her to marry him and promises a shelter on his ship for her disgraced parent, the only reply he receives from the poor child, now so utterly hopeless

WILL BE PUBLISHED ON THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 5th,

THE CANDID QUARTERLY REVIEW

Of Public Affairs, Political,
Scientific, Social and Literary.

CONDUCTED BY THOMAS GIBSON BOWLES.

No. 1. - - FEBRUARY, 1914.
Price, Five Shillings Nett.

The aim of this Review is to deal with Public Affairs faithfully and frankly, and to treat them with candour, having sole regard to the Public Welfare.

The attempt, often promised, rarely made, and yet more rarely continued, to review Public Affairs impartially and without Party bias will here be renewed. The effort will be to search out the quality, character, and fitness for the Public Welfare of things done or proposed, whether in the political, the scientific, the social or the literary domain, and to present them on their merits without partisan prejudice.

To do this is not easy. But the effort to do it will be honestly made by candid men writing for candid readers.

In Politics it will be remembered that the men of to-day are as well sons of the past as fathers of the future, and that from the past we have inherited a settled system of governance, which, having endured and survived the stresses of time, is not to be put away without a certain assurance of something better.

To Science, whose widening domain touches with increasing success and rapidity every part of life, will be assigned the place that has now become due to the great deeds already done and the greater soon to be expected. Social and Literary Subjects, so far as they belong to Public Affairs, will also have their due recognition.

To sincerity will be extended respect and sympathy. But wherever there may appear insincerity, dishonesty, corruption, or aught that may bring danger or dishonour to the State, every effort will be made to discover, display, and denounce it, and to destroy it, together with its originators.

CONTENTS of No. 1:

The Kingship.	National Finance, 1914.
The New Corruption—	Expenditure—Debt—Accounts.
The Caucus—The Sale of	Our Trade in Our Credit.
Honours.	The Insurance Act.
The Paid Parliament.	Federalism.
The Parliament Act.	Labour and Parliament.
The Home Rule Bill.	Science—
	Man and His Surroundings.
	Etc., etc., etc.

SUBSCRIPTION: 20s. per Year, Post Paid.

Single Copies 5s. 4d. Post Paid.

All communications, Cheques and P.O.'s to be addressed to—

F. H. GARRATT, Publisher,

THE CANDID QUARTERLY REVIEW
26, Maiden Lane, LONDON, W.C.

and so thoroughly desperate at the unkind treatment meted out to her on all hands that she had even contemplated suicide, is:

"Nobody would love me," she answered, in a very quiet tone. "Nobody could."

The Captain wins in so far as he makes her his wife, and has both father and daughter on the ship with him. Here now comes the crux of the story. De Barral hates the idea of Flora being married and claims all her attention. The generous Captain, believing that the girl really does not care for him, stands aside until a crisis arrives and he wins to happiness at last.

The story is good right through. The minor characters are drawn with as much care as are Mr. and Mrs. Anthony and the terrible old man. One knows them thoroughly, and they are all necessary for the development of the story. The descriptions, as we have said, are excellent, but Mr. Conrad's style is not perfect. There is a little carelessness over the repetition of the same term, when by a little thought another could have been substituted, and from the continual use of the word "devil" in the first twenty-five pages it would almost seem that the author regards it in the nature of a superlative—which perhaps it is. But these are trifling matters and do not lessen the interest of the story, which should not on any account be missed.

The Power of the Duchess. By EDWARD QUARTER. (Chapman and Hall. 6s.)

THE power of the Duchess was not so great as the power of love, the author would have us believe. Johnny, the Duchess's would-be son-in-law, was of distinguished though not respectable parentage, his father, Lord Carlston, having buried one wife, divorced two more, and finally married a music-hall artiste—which for the purpose of fiction is very ancient history indeed.

There is a deus ex machina in the person of Lady Elizabeth Ringshaw, who lived opposite the castle of the Duchess (surprisingly like Arundel, by the way) in middle-aged comfort, having kept her own lover trotting at her heels for nearly a quarter of a century. She smooths matters for Johnny and the Duchess's daughter to an amazing extent, and is, in fact, a thoroughly mid-Victorian busybody. Her portrait, as that of a meddling, tiresome, and even exasperating old chatterer, is excellently done, and her devoted lover is an equally good sketch of masculine vacillation and weakness—his only strong point being his devotion to the lady who played at ducks and drakes with the best years of his life. In spite of these two irritants, the book is cloying. The author uses the word "sweet" with some frequency, and it is typical of the whole work, perusal of which resembles a meal of wedding cake. The prolix conversations of county and sub-county people form a drag on the action of the story, and incidents are few and far between. The lady of the halls whom Lord Carlston married is the author's most interesting creation.

The Price of Conquest. By ELLEN ADA SMITH. (John Long. 6s.)

IN spite of such a profusion of adverbial phrases as would almost shatter belief in the existence of a standard of English, and also in spite of infinitives arrestingly split, this book compels attention. The opening is distinctly unpromising, for in the first part Sigismund Wirth, a great violinist, goes, under an alias, to stay at a west country farmhouse, where Daffy Huish, artless and unsophisticated, lives with her grandparents. There is, however, no sordid intrigue to follow, for Wirth, convinced that the girl has great talent if not genius, becomes her guardian, and after her father's death has her trained by one Waldemar, who, having just missed greatness as a performer is yet great as a teacher—and hates the artist in Sigismund because that artist is greater than himself.

Under Waldemar, Daffy climbs to great heights, and accomplishes the inevitable by marriage with Sigismund. Then Waldemar sets out to gratify his hatred of Sigismund—a hatred that has always been carefully concealed—by suggesting that one day Daffy will outshine her husband, whose youth is passing while her popularity is growing. Herein lies a psychological problem of the finer sort, and the deft manner in which it is handled leads us to hope great things of the author, when experience has taught her what to avoid. For, having admitted rich promise and no small performance in the book, we feel at liberty to cavil at its faults. The chief of these is a rank disregard for the decencies of language; sentences here and there are clumsy and amateurish in construction. This, we hold, is a legitimate grumble, for manner makes matter, and it is a pity that so excellent a story should be marred by unhandy phrasing. We welcome the book, however, for its originality and high promise.

The Master of Merripit. By EDEN PHILLPOTTS. With a Frontispiece. (Ward, Lock, and Co. 6s.)

MR. PHILLPOTTS lays the scene of his latest novel in a wild part of the West Country dotted here and there with certain venerable farms dating from mediæval days, one of which is occupied by four generations of a family named Rowland and another by their neighbour, John Coole, the Master of Merripit. The story is a breezy one of a hundred years ago, with the usual highwaymen, murders, and love rivalries, and is told in the author's well-known pleasing style; and, as was to be expected, the local colouring and delineation of the characters are excellent. A word of praise is due to the publishers for the get-up of the volume. The type is excellent, and the three hundred pages can be comfortably read without recourse to a microscope.

Messrs. John Long, Ltd., will shortly publish a new novel entitled "Why She Left Him," by Florence Warden, author of "Love's Sentinel." Miss Warden's gipsy heroine forms a very interesting study.

Unbeaten Tracks

TRINIDAD

OVERNIGHT the word goes round the ship that we are to pass through Boca Monos at daybreak. The captain is about, according to the usual legend, to make this passage for the particular behoof of his passengers. So in the grey of the dawn they crowd the deck in varying degrees of déshabille, pleased by the illusion that their coming experience is one rarely afforded.

The wonderful tropic night wanes quickly; the Southern Cross hangs faint and dim on the horizon; the air is eager and nipping. Above the ship, which speeds like a busy little insect toward its goal, towers a bastion of bluffs crowned by three peaks, from which Columbus named this island "Trinidad." Let it not be forgotten that the Indians had of old called it Iere, the Land of Humming Birds. When one considers how in the wake of the Spaniards marched every detestable atrocity, how they turned the beautiful New World into an Inferno of wickedness, how every nameless abomination was in the main wrought under the cloak of religion, one longs to blot out the name Columbus gave the island and rechristen it as of yore, "The Land of Humming Birds," a beautiful, poetic name, reminiscent of "this Eden of the western wave," before it was wrecked by lust and rapine. The Indian, be it remembered, worshipped and still worships the humming bird as a god in visible shape; the civilised society woman wears its corpse on her head as an ornament.

The passage of Boca Monos is a wonderful sight. Vast pyramids of Silurian rock front the eternal wasting Atlantic surge. The Gulf of Paria, into which we emerge, is a great inland sea rapidly shoaling under the flow of the mud-laden waters of the Orinoco. Now and again in these waters may be seen a hapless monkey, drifting down to meet his fate on a forest tree which has fallen with some remote landslide in the interior of the Continent. His bones, lapped in alluvion, will be fossil some day, when this great area of water has become a marshy jungle. In England we read of geological transformation; in the New World that transformation is a panorama unrolling before our eyes. Through the gateway of the strait looms up Port of Spain.

The topsy-turvydom of Trinidad has been veraciously summed up thus: "This is a land of wonders. We have lakes of pitch—streams of tar—oysters growing on trees—animals with pouches to shelter their young—one fish, or animal resembling a fish, that produces its young alive and gives suck—crabs that mount on and feed in fruit trees—other fish that entertain us with a concert—and, lastly, one kind of fish clad in an elegant suit of armour."

Trinidad has been described by Kingsley at white heat. During his stay in the island his enthusiasm knew no bounds; he was accomplishing the dream of his life. Those who came after him can but glean where he has gathered in the harvest.

The Caroni River is a muddy stream which sluggishly debouches through swamps into the Gulf of Paria. About it hovers an atmosphere of malaria. Now the rise of tide in the gulf is but four feet or so, and the mouth of the river is hemmed in by a vast bar. We started off a party of six—two Englishmen, two Americans, and two boatmen—to bag alligators on its banks. The police lent us magazine rifles, and we hoped to reach the river and its shelter of virgin forest in the cool of the morning. Instead of doing so, we were afforded a useful object-lesson in physiography. Our boatmen had calculated their time of start to give us the few inches of water requisite to scrape over the mud flats into the deeper pools beyond. In default of this, we but drove our way into shoals, on which at length the boat lay fast. There was no help for it. We were forced to watch the tide creep down, as the fierce heat of the day leapt up. The glitter of morning sunshine on tropical waters is as trying as its dazzle on freshly fallen snow, and similarly is apt to produce nausea and dizziness. Our eyes were, however, so busily drinking in the novel scene about us that we forgot all else. Vast flocks of flamingos—scarlet, blue, and white—and clouds of other wading birds paraded before us at a respectful distance. Idleness breeds mischief. We had rifles in our hands, "our matches burning." The gayest bird of the flock in plumage was picked out, and a bullet at 300 or 400 yards brought him down. His murdered carcase, drifting toward us on the current, revealed the fact that, after two or three hours' imprisonment, the flowing tide was with us, setting us free.

Thus we scraped over the bar and pulled between walls of mangrove—surely the most fantastically dreary of all tree growths. A few yards off they resemble a wilderness of petrified snakes, their roots being thrown down stilt-fashion into the mud. Thus the tree holds the soil together and acts as a veritable pioneer, conquering and absorbing the poison of the deadly swamp. One realises the sinister meaning of the old stories of escaped slaves taking shelter in these awful places. Now a wonder came to pass. By one of the truly amazing partnerships of the animal kingdom, the alligator has a companion bird, whose cries forewarn him of danger. With the exception of this troublesome biped, all feathered fowl disappeared with the coming of the heat of the tropical day, which thus made its own solitude. Gorgeous butterflies flapped lazily along the edge of the stream; reptiles and snakes were active; but for the most part birds and beasts lay perdus in the dim recesses of the forests, to emerge in the cooltide of the day. Nearly everything in which is the breath of life thus hides away from the tyranny of the sun.

Shooting alligators is a pastime calculated to test the smoothest temper. These brutes' speciality in perversity is the fact that, when mortally hit, they immediately plunge into the mud of the river bed and there bury their carcasses. The faculty by which the wounded or dying saurian buries himself in mud doubtless explains the prevalence of his fossil remains in deposits such as those of the Lias and Bracklesham. One chance you have, and one only; shoot him in the eye or under the armpit, and he has no time for his favourite manœuvre; he turns belly uppermost. Yet look out after hauling him into the boat; like all torpid creatures, his long-drawn "muscular contractions" are wont to be exciting. The alligator is at once one of the cunningest and most inquisitive "beasts of the forest." His habitual pose is to float with the snout awash, keeping a wary eye on any intruder. Thus will he lie hour after hour, like a drifting log. His impassivity is a conjuring trick. As your boat creeps up the stream, an insignificant log silently sinks, leaving a trail of bubbles. The chance of a shot is gone. Exposed mud banks and spits caused by the eddying deposit of leaves and refuse afford the best opportunity for a palpable hit. One of our party, a demon photographer, secured a good snapshot of an alligator basking in the sun, when the click of the camera sent our prey splashing into the water within a few yards of the boat.

Writhing in and out of the mangrove stilts, we watched the iguana, whose gaudy colours make him one of the most brilliant of the minor reptiles. His flesh is looked upon as a delicacy by gourmets. The preternatural stillness of the forest-shrouded mangrove swamp is broken now and again by a sharp report, like that of a pistol. This is caused by the sudden bursting of the seed-case of the sand-box (Hura crepitans). We had a singular instance of the life-tenacity of this seed. We brought a seed case home as a paper weight, the centre having been cut out and filled with molten lead. Three years later this same case burst like a bomb in our drawing-room.

In the next article we hope to describe a visit to the famous pitch lake at La Brea.

A. E. CAREY.

Of Good and Bad Luck

"It is better to be born lucky than wise."

HERE is matter for dispute. Some folks believe in luck, while others laugh at it. According to Emerson, only shallow people talk of it; and if he was right, then Horace was shallow and Ovid and Seneca. It is only the egoist, who is his own Providence, with no belief in the smiles and frowns of Fortune, whom we can regard as deep. Perhaps this is hardly fair paraphrase of the seer of Concord, yet it seems a reasonable deduction. One man scouts the notion of luck; another is even credulous of the virtue of odd numbers "either in nativity, chance, or death." The fisherman, alone among his neighbours, makes a personal matter of it, and strict regard for the truth compels the admission that my brothers of the angle are not always consistent in the business. Your gentle angler, that is to say, is rarely backward in acknowledging the bad luck of which he believes himself the victim and of which he recognises probably ninety-nine varieties. Why, you ask, did he come back from the river empty-handed? My dear Sir, how could anyone, even he, catch fish in such wind, rain, frost, fog, sunshine, hail or thunder? How could anyone expect sport from a river ruined by herons, otterhounds, launches, lumber mills or chemical works? Such is his virtuous indignation that he would sooner blame Christabel Pankhurst for his empty creel than himself. He never wearies of bemoaning the circumstances, wholly beyond his control, of which he is the sport. One would think, to hear him, that the very fish themselves, cold-blooded and callous creatures that they are, were in a conspiracy to go hungry rather than take his well-thrown fly or appetising bait. He is ever more sinned against than sinning, the plaything of a cruel fate that withholds the success to which his skill and patience alike entitle him. Such, with more in keeping, is the burden of the unsuccessful fisherman on a day when everything goes wrong. Compared with him, Jeremiah was an optimist with a mind of sunshine; and so eloquent is that maltreated sportsman in his own defence that some among his audience must marvel how, with so much to fight against, anyone can be fool enough to go a'fishing.

Yet, if you meet the man at the end of a red-letter day, when he proudly displays the silvery burden of his full basket, his face wreathed in smiles, his gloom forgotten, who more surprised, more hurt, more taken aback than he if you should be so tactless as to congratulate him on his good luck? The very man who gratefully accepted your condolence in other circumstances is the first to resent this view of his success. Luck? Nothing of the sort, my dear fellow. Fortune favours the brave, and this magnificent catch of trout is the reward of science, art, patience and every virtue that goes to the making of a good fisherman. The man who argues from such a standpoint is above all the laws of mere logic. His is the happy, the enviable temperament that can take the ups and downs of life serenely, claiming all the credit of success and repudiating all the blame of failure. Happy are those who can apply this comfortable argument to their fishing days. To myself, every kind of fishing has seemed to depend on nine parts luck and one part skill.

There were the two large trout that together took my inartistic wet flies on a still glide in a Black Forest river, where by rights the dry fly only should have killed. If this was not a case of unalloyed good luck, what was it? Cleverness on my part in striking out a new line? Pooh! There was neither authority nor precedent for the experiment, which was but a desperate effort to relieve the tedium of prolonged failure. The whole business was a fluke. It was as when a man aims at a pigeon and brings down a crow.

Again, there was that tarpon that fell to my rod on the first morning I fished in the Pass, the only tarpon caught that day among a dozen boats, some of the occupants of which had fished for a fortnight without killing a single fish. What was that but luck? I knew nothing of catching tarpon, beyond what I had read in days when the literature of the sport was very meagre, and there is, in fact, up to the moment of hooking the fish, nothing to know. The preliminaries are even easier than in the case of salmon. It is the fight itself that counts. How different on the trout stream, where all the angler's art goes in tempting the fish to take the hook and so little of it is needed to bring it to the net! Mention of tarpon recalls a curious contrast of good and bad fortune attending a man on two consecutive days. A friend of mine, arriving in Florida a day or two after myself, also caught a fine fish on his first day. He was elated by such good fortune and looked forward to catching many more within the fortnight that he had allowed for his stay. Next day, the Gulf was in one of its rages, and the Pass was unfit for fishing, so we amused ourselves by catching sheepshead, ladyfish and other small game from a little jetty on the island. The best bait for this miscellany was a small crab that swarms in the shallows, and while wading in search of more bait, my friend trod barefoot on the upturned edge of a broken bottle, inflicting so severe a gash on his instep that he had no choice but to return to civilisation and put himself under surgical treatment. Did ever the Jade smile and frown on a man so quickly!

I remember hooking a noble bass, a fish exceeding eleven pounds and as full of mettle as any I ever caught before or since, close to a bridge which spans an estuary a little way above the bar. At spring tides, the water races madly beneath the bridge, and I had my work cut out to keep the fish from going round the posts. All was going well, and I had already recovered sufficient line to give me control, when my hopes fell to zero at sight of a great bunch of weed firmly attached to the line thirty or forty feet above the fish. Obviously, I could do nothing. A few more turns of the reel would bring the obstruction to the top ring of the rod, and in such heavy water the hook might come away any moment. As I pondered on these unattractive probabilities, the bass decided for me by a timely shake of the head that dislodged the weed and sent it running down the line. Five minutes later, the bass was in the net. There had been no skill whatever in getting round a seemingly impassable difficulty, merely luck.

The circumstances in which I recovered an even finer bass, a fish of seventeen pounds, in a backwater of the Sea of Marmora were different, for in this case victory was due not to luck, but to the ready wit of my Greek fisherman. The fish was sufficiently exhausted to make its capture an apparent certainty when, with one of those sudden inspirations characteristic of bass, it made a dive beneath the caique. Fortune favoured it, for the line caught round a nail in the stern. The bass and I were both helpless, and I stood foolishly looking at it, so near and yet so far, as it kicked feebly in a couple of fathoms of water. Of a sudden, with a leap that all but capsized the boat, my man was over the side with the landing net, in which he had the bass safe and sound before it had sufficiently recovered from its surprise to make good its escape.

Of good luck I have, in fishing and otherwise, had enough to be grateful for, and of bad less than enough to resent. Perhaps the worst of my fortune as a fisherman has been a world-wide pursuit of the tunny, lasting over nearly ten years, without even hooking one. The first of many failures, round the beautiful island of Madeira, was a matter less of bad luck than of the excessive depth of the Atlantic, which thereabouts renders the capture of tunny on rod and line a dubious venture. The same may be said of a later attempt in the swift depths of the Bosphorus, another water in which tuna-fishing is not, I imagine, lightly to be attended by conspicuous success. Yet it was bad luck only that took me all the way to California during one of the very finest summers in which the tunas have altogether stayed away from Santa Catalina, and the same ill-fortune pursued me to the colder seas of Cape Breton. There I fished for three weeks in company with two others, both of them, though they failed to kill, had at least the satisfaction of getting strikes. Here, as in tarpon fishing, there was no question of skill, since it was just a question of towing the bait astern across the vision of the shoals for the great fish to take or leave. Mine they left. This was bad luck. When, however, I had got my flies hung up in a tree, or pulled the hook out of a trout's mouth, or lost a good fish in getting the net under it, it was not bad luck, but bad fishing.

Bad luck is essentially made up of factors wholly beyond the fisherman's control. Any sudden and unforeseen change in the weather that makes the water too high or too low, too thick or too clear, too slow or too rapid, is bad luck, and no one will blame the victim of such mischance for his empty creel any more than they would blame him for being struck by lightning. Unfortunately, the fisherman most often fails in graceful acknowledgment of the many occasions on river or lake on which he has none but himself to thank for his failure to catch fish. He is not expected to take all the blame of every blank day, for such an admission would be mock modesty. All that is in reason asked of him is the confession that a full basket is as often the result of luck as an empty one, and he who can bring himself to concede so much has at least the comfort of remembering that, in fishing more even than in shooting, the lean days predominate. The unsportsmanlike attitude, to which exception has already been taken is that which, on the easy principle of "Heads, I win; tails, you lose," takes all the praise for the fish that are caught and none of the blame for those that are left in the water. Such a point of view is unworthy of any man, and is fit only for spoilt children.

Some men are born lucky. If you throw them in the sea, they would be no more likely to drown than Arion or Jonah. Yet only a fool trusts to luck, for muddling through is a policy which, occasionally successful with nations, is fatal in the individual. The soldier fears God and keeps his powder dry, and my Arab fisherman, Abdullah, though always praying to Allah for more fish, was careful to keep shifting the boat to new grounds till we got them. There is luck in most games, else what of a dropped catch and a new life at cricket, or a break off a fluke at billiards? Even in bridge, which, without playing it, I take to be more of an exact science than a game, there is surely hazard in the deal, though skill may win against it by making the most of bad cards. The only exception, in which skill is everything, with nothing left to chance, is a game like chess, the ideal recreation for anyone who wants to forget his own wickedness.

Fishing, if not exactly a lucky dip, is always something of a lottery, and the greatest artist that ever swung a salmon rod is liable to the mortification, while drawing blank in every salmon pool, of seeing a tyro on the other bank catch fish after fish. Far from resenting this element of chance, we should realise that it is no small part of the charm of our sport, since, when we speak of the glorious uncertainty of fishing, we only mean the good and bad luck to which every angler is subject. Good luck sometimes comes in strange disguise. So it came to Joseph, who was sold into bondage by his brothers that he might become Pharaoh's vizier. So, at times, it comes to most of us. As a friend of mine once remarked, "I've had a deal of worry in my life, but most of it never happened!" I well remember how on one occasion a sudden and unlooked-for summons to London made me lose two of the best days of covert-shooting that winter. All the way to Paddington I was filled with righteous self-pity. Yet it was on that visit that I met the man who, a little later, gave me some of the best shooting that I ever enjoyed in my life, with better sport and greater variety of game than any I had missed at home. Such are the not unkindly buffets which playful Fortune sometimes deals us.

Gratitude for good luck is as proper a sentiment as acceptance of bad, though, in the fisherman, at any rate, resignation must stop short of the lazy fatalism of the East. It is in this that the fisherman's persistence differs from the patience of his neighbours. We cannot be lucky in every venture, whether it be dealing in Marconis or catching trout. When, however, we are out of luck, there is no need to have recourse to sack-cloth and ashes. Then is the time to beat the goddess who handles the rudder of our destiny. F. G. A.

"The Lonely Dancer," by Richard Le Gallienne, at 5s. net, will be published this week by Mr. John Lane. Several of Mr. Le Gallienne's finest lyrics may be found in this new volume of poems. Mr. Lane also issues immediately "Food and Flavour, a Gastro-nomic Guide to Health and Good Living," by Henry T. Finck; with illustrations, at 6s. net.

Mr. Werner Laurie is publishing a cheap edition uniform with his "Cathedral Series" of "A Dictionary of Ecclesiastical Terms," by John S. Bumpus. In this work terms used in liturgiology, hymnology, music, ritual, cathedral constitution, architecture, ecclesiology, are clearly and concisely explained, both from a descriptive and an historical point of view. Price 6s. net.

Indian Reviews

THE Wednesday Review (Trichinopoly) for December deals rather with old subjects than new material. Prominence is given repeatedly to the treatment of Indians in South Africa. Lord Hardinge's speech at Madras, in which he expressed sympathy with the Indian cause, is never forgotten; he should now retire before his popularity suffers a reaction. The whole case possesses all the elements for grave indictments, of which an Indian writer gladly avails himself. The charges of ill-treatment, of unnecessary violence, of broken faith, of want of veracity, are forcibly made; and Mr. Botha has entirely failed to satisfy India by the constitution of the Commission of Inquiry which has been set up, and by the terms of reference to it. The demand for an Indian member of the Commission is reiterated. No doubt the South African question has gone far to exacerbate the existing discontent in India; the mismanagement of the problem by the Imperial Government is fully recognised.

The editor regards it as only a question of time when the All-India Moslem League will be merged in the Indian National Congress. He opposes any idea of provincialism or communism in the Congress; but any real rapprochement between Hindus and Mahomedans is impossible: any coalition on their part under the veil of Indian nationality will be a measure of their antagonism to British rule. The Government having resolved, in compliance with demands, to give advances freely to Trade from the Treasury balances, a protest is now raised against the experiment on the ground that the Chamberlain Commission is sitting; at the same time, the Commission is depreciated before it has reported. Not even a patriot paper can offer an excuse for the banking crisis in which native-managed banks in Lahore and Bombay have failed. By their gross mismanagement native credit has received a deadly blow. The attention now being paid to the cultivation of cotton and sugar is a hopeful sign. The Governor of Bombay has, with little experience, further liberalised his Legislative Council. Such bids for popularity always bring their Nemesis.

The Collegian and Progress of India (Calcutta, October to December) is always interesting as a record of educational advancement, which is making remarkable strides in India, under the patronage and financial assistance of the Government. At the Bombay University the important question has been discussed whether a branch of Oriental Studies, with teaching arrangements and corresponding degrees, should be established; in other words, whether students should be trained as pandits or maulvis on traditional lines. The proposal was first carried and subsequently defeated on a compromising amendment. In Bombay, too, a Government College of Commerce has commenced work to prepare students for a University degree in Commerce; a building for the college is contemplated. There are said to be many Hindustani students in America, one of whom has written in an American journal some well-meant advice for his countrymen.

A series of ten lectures on cricket, delivered by an Indian professor to a youthful audience, the "Aryan Excelsior League" of Bombay, is something of a novelty. Delhi, the new capital, is said to be educationally backward: more, more money, as for everything at Delhi, will be required to improve matters. In the new Province of Behar there has been unusual activity in education, commencing with a stock-taking of the present position. The policy in favour throughout India is to endow education with ever-increasing grants, in the hope of future good resulting—will it do so? The Hindu University project drags on. The meetings, reported throughout these journals, of literary and students' societies, and prize distributions presided over by high officials, are very numerous, and betoken intellectual life, though the fruits may not be immediately conspicuous. An elaborate paper on the "Paradox of Oxford," by an American, is quoted at length and is worth reading; the paradox is apparently the inconsistency between the present and the traditional past of the University. The publication of an Encyclopædia Indica of Hindu literature at Allahabad promises to be a large undertaking. Convocation addresses of several Universities contain much valuable discussion of educational subjects. The Lecturer in Persian at Oxford has described at length in this journal the Persian studies there; his letter ought to help Indian students proceeding thither for degrees. The Indian Science Congress to be held in January in Calcutta promises well. A working-men's institute for Indians in that town shows the progress of the times. A long paper on Lycidas should be useful to this journal's readers.

The Popular Scientific Journal (Madras) for October. This is a curious medley, and cheap at the price, four annas. It ranges from the advocacy of scientific education, "the imperative need of India," to a few words on snakes, spiders, and bats, with miscellaneous notes and a course of lessons in elementary science. Much cannot be expected for two rupees a year, but this popular journal may attract beginners in science, and, if it survives, may be improved.

Mr. Heinemann is publishing this week a new novel entitled "The Business of a Gentleman," by Mr. H. N. Dickinson, author of "Keddy" and "Sir Guy and Lady Rannard." This novel is rather political in character, for the hero is an ardent Tory, plunged by the force of circumstances into the labour unrest in a Lancashire cotton centre.

Mr. George Ives is an acknowledged authority on criminology, having devoted himself to its study for twenty years. He has now written, for Mr. Stanley Paul, "A History of Penal Methods," which although primarily a history of punitive systems from early mediæval times to the present day, has also much sound criticism on the scientific classification and treatment of criminals.

The Theatre

The Play Actors Society at The Court Theatre

THIS association has done so much interesting work since its foundation that we always look forward with hope to its productions. Unfortunately, Mr. Israel Zangwill's long drama in four discursive acts, "The Melting Pot," is not a great opportunity, nor is the principal actor particularly well suited to make the best of a distressing and impossible character. One of the main reasons for the author's failure to produce a work of art is that he desires to use his experience as President of the Emigration Department of the Jewish Territorial Organisation for the foundation of his play; another is that he does not trouble to observe the conversations of human beings, but is content to fit his leading characters with rhetorical speeches which are difficult to deliver and sound absurd when they finally get over the footlights.

"The Melting Pot," says a small note kindly given us with the programme, "needs no recommendation; it has been played thousands of times in America and has sold nine editions in book-form." Such being the case, it is not necessary to mention the good points in Mr. Zangwill's serious drama of Jewish life as it was in Russia and is in America; it is enough to state that in a Western London theatre it would be played to roars of laughter from the exceedingly few people who would pay to see it.

David Quixano is the young Hebraic hero who believes that America is the melting-pot of the universe, and that when the process is completed, all the races of the earth, including, we suppose, the black and the yellow, will be merged in one resplendent whole, and the result will be as near perfection as man may hope to get.

Perhaps Mr. Zangwill's play is intended to aid this desirable end. If so, he has not followed a very helpful or convincing method.

Mr. Harold Chapin is the protagonist of the new heaven and the new earth that is to arise in the United States. As David, we are led to understand that he is a brilliant violinist and the writer of an American symphony which is to stir the hearts of men and rejuvenate our squalid world. But he is much more than a Jewish genius: he is a tremendous talker, who is loved almost on sight by the beautiful Russian Baroness Revendal (Miss Gillian Scaife); but then he happens to be an undistinguished-looking person to whom everyone is devoted. He wins, at once, the full support of the famous conductor, Herr Pappelomeister (Mr. Clifton Anderson); a good supply of his winged, but laboriously delivered, words convince the Catholic servant of the Jewish household that she must serve his grandmother and be interested in Hebraic affairs; a few of his speeches change the whole life and mental attitude of the bureaucratic Russian Baron Revendal—who has had a good part of the family of Quixano shot down in Kischineff—so much is the Russian's spirit changed by speech that he offers the immaculate David a revolver and stands awaiting to be shot. The hero's good uncle, who does not believe much in America, loves David as only such a character can on the stage love. The elder Quixano (Mr. Hugh Tabberer) even goes the length of saying that "a sunbeam took human form when David was born." The result of this peculiar transmutation is a super-human bore who expects the mixing of races in America to produce the superman. Fortunately, he tells us that he is "nothing but a simple artist," and uses all sorts of theatrical phrases, such as "prating of" affairs, and so forth; otherwise, we feared that, having put Jewish things from him, he would put on Americanism and declare, in a lengthy speech, that he was himself the fine flower of the melting-pot.

However, we were saved this outburst, and Mr. Zangwill permitted us to see something of the hero's love affair with the beautiful Russian lady, something of the intimate life of the poorer Jews in New York, and a good deal of the conductor with the awkward name of Pappelomeister, who supplies, with Kathleen, the servant, Miss O'Connor, the quality of the play which is intended to be humorous. The real fun was in the enormous literary speeches of the hero and the method in which Mr. Chapin gave them, and in his addresses to the armorial bearings of the Northamptonshire family of Washington, which hang upon his wall in the form of the American flag. As the stepmother of the troublesome Russian heroine, Miss Scaife gave an excellent performance, and Miss Inez Bensusan played splendidly, and made us regret that Mr. Zangwill had not taken the trouble to give her a more human and agreeable and natural part.

EGAN MEW.

"Hullo Tango!" at the Hippodrome

THE revue as a London entertainment has been enormously discussed of late, and we have been told finally that we have had the ideal performance given us, and also that that desirable end is still far to seek.

Our own view is that in the first revue at the Hippodrome we had a delightful, gay, and irresponsible sort of thing that might have gone on for ever but for the fact that many of the performers had to go out of the cast. The present vast undertaking has the advantage of including such amusing and clever people as Miss Ethel Levey, Mr. Harry Tate, and Mr. Morris Harvey, and a hundred beautiful ladies; many of the wonderful costumes are designed with all the grace of which the gifted M. Leon Bakst is capable; many of the scenes are elaborate beyond the dreams of pantomime; and yet there is one essential missing. The revue is not written. There are odds and ends of caricature, slight scenes of a more or less burlesque character; but although Mr. Max Pemberton and Mr. Albert de Cour-ville are said to be the authors, there appears to be next to nothing to act. It is true that the accomplished Miss Levey is enabled to give us a vivid and amusing Countess Zicka from "Diplomacy," but throughout the whole of the revue that is almost the only scene that possesses life and wit. Mr. Tate we have seen and enjoyed so often before; his "Upside Down Airman" with Miss Levey ought to be funny, but somehow it is merely tedious, just two exceedingly clever people unprovided by the authors with anything worth doing. There are plenty of songs and dances, but none of them is very wonderful. Miss Shirley Kellogg's "Who's the Lady?" when she comes among the audience, is an awkward and not very worthy piece of hard work. Everywhere throughout the revue we feel that the scene is perfect, the actors equal to any fun, the singers in good voice, the dancers ready to enthrall us, but very little opportunity is given to them. It would seem that it is enough to throw half a dozen comedians on the stage, provide beautiful dresses and gay scenery, and, lo and behold! the revue is made. However, in an entertainment of this sort it is so easy to add and to subtract that no doubt before this is printed changes will have been made and the cleverness of the actors and the grandeur of the production will have been helped by the wit and cunning of the authors.

Variety at the Coliseum

THE most amusing thing here is "Humpsti-Bumpsti," as performed by Pipifax and Panlo. Their performance is fairly well known, but it goes to more applause than ever. Their acrobatic antics appear to infect the rest of the programme, for the performance of "Wild Australia, or Fun in the Stockade," is crowded with the sort of knock-about fun indulged in by Panlo and his partner, and even Mr. Seymour Hicks, in "Always Tell Your Wife," is inclined to the wildest and rashest movements in his desire to race through his part at top speed. Miss Ellaline Terris and Mr. Hicks are immensely popular in Mr. Temple Thurston's little farce, but, as a matter of fact, we have never seen them in anything that suited them so badly and was so little worthy of their talents. On the night we were at the Coliseum "The Follies" revived their "Pantomime Mixture," but all the life and merriment and freshness and satire had gone out of it; one only saw the shadow of what had been amusing, and heard the echo of music which once was gay.

E. M.

"The Ways of the South Sea Savage" is the title of a forthcoming book by Mr. R. W. Williamson. This author has travelled widely in the South Seas, and has recorded his experiences and observations in a work full of interesting information concerning the customs and characteristics of little known tribes. The book will be published by Messrs. Seeley, Service and Co., Ltd.

Notes for Collectors

THESE have been many vague rumours lately that the famous £10,000,000 Pierpont Morgan collection might come upon the market. We think it hardly likely, but American collectors and dealers are greatly interested in the matter, and the present Mr. Morgan is bothered on all sides as to exactly what he means to do. At present we fancy he means to do nothing in particular. There is no doubt that the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York is not prepared for all the treasures which were taken to the States from South Kensington, but there are plenty of other museums and galleries wherein the vast collection of paintings, miniatures, porcelains, bronzes, and so forth could be held until the Metropolitan had made ready its splendid house, so that a want of a home is not likely to cause a sale. In any case, it is said the Morgan collection will be on view in New York for a year, and after that we feel certain it will be at the service of the nation in one way or another until all museums pass away.

Failing such extensive sales as this great American gathering of things of beauty, we can turn to our own minor affairs. In King Street, Christie's is now in full working order, and many interesting collections of objects of virtu are being shown to an eager public of connoisseurs. Especially old English silver is bringing large sums in all those rooms wherein it is sold. Old silver and antique furniture are of continual interest, and the mere fact of the London season not yet having begun makes little difference to the large prices such things bring under the hammer.

One of the most interesting branches of old furniture is, of course, to be found in the remarkable clocks which have survived from the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. As an aid to collectors in this direction comes an admirable volume from George Routledge and Sons, Ltd., at 31s. 6d. net.

TIME'S RECORDERS.

Old clocks have an especial attraction for the connoisseur, for they carry within one case, as it were, a dozen arts and crafts. Palaces of princes have been rich in them; the cottages of the poor have been—until these days of the American artless contrivance—well provided with decorative examples.

The whitewash'd wall, the nicely sanded floor,
The varnish'd clock that click'd behind the door.

It is in the period of this style of work, mentioned by Goldsmith, that collectors are now most happy. But that the field is broad and reaches through the centuries is made very clear for us in the excellent volume by Mr. Herbert Cescinsky and Mr. Malcolm R. Webster, entitled "English Domestic Clocks." This elaborate and useful book supplements Mr. Cescinsky's work on "English Furniture of the Eighteenth Century" for the consideration of clocks in those volumes was somewhat curtailed. With the aid of Mr. Webster, however, a very complete and valuable consideration of all classes of these interesting examples of man's handicraft is placed before us. While the technical side of the matter is dealt with, as only a competent craftsman such as Mr. Webster can, the historic and decorative portion of the work is fully and ably handled by Mr. Cescinsky, who is a devout student of all that belongs to the subject. With some hundreds of fine drawings and photographs by the authors, this excellent volume forms a guide and informed friend to every collector of clocks. No branch of the subject is neglected, no detail allowed to pass unnoticed. But all is clearly stated; nothing is set down that is dull, and nothing that is doubtful. Many an enthusiast of the subject will, on reading this admirable book, regret that the work of Mr. Cescinsky and Mr. Webster had not appeared before he completed his collection. But there are always new-comers in this field of connoisseurship, and to them "English Domestic Clocks" will prove an absolutely necessary volume to have close to hand beside the other works which have already done so much to make this subject one of the most clearly understood and therefore most interesting in the world of collecting.

E. M.

Notes and News

The Swiney Prize for Jurisprudence has been awarded to Mr. John W. Salmond, K.C., Solicitor-General for New Zealand, for his work "Jurisprudence." The prize consists of a sum of £100 contained in a silver cup of the same value. It was founded in 1844 under the will of Dr. George Swiney, a somewhat eccentric medical man, who left £5,000 Three per cent. Consols to the Society of Arts in order that the prize might be awarded on every fifth anniversary of his death to the author of the best published work on the subject. Although the bequest was made to the Society of Arts alone, Dr. Swiney appointed as adjudicators the members of the Society and the Fellows of the Royal College of Physicians. An arrangement was made that the award should be given alternately for Medical and General Jurisprudence. The cup is made after a design prepared in 1849, for the first award, by Daniel Maclise, R.A., and the execution has been entrusted to Messrs. Garrard. The prize has been awarded on thirteen previous occasions, among the recipients being Sir Henry Sumner Maine, K.C.B., D.C.L., for his "Ancient Law"; The Right Hon. Sir Robert Joseph Phillimore, D.C.L., for his "Commentaries on International Law"; Thomas Erskine Holland, D.C.L., for his "Elements of Jurisprudence"; and Sir Frederick Pollock, Bart., and Professor F. W. Maitland, for their "History of English Law before Edward the First." It may be mentioned that in addition to this bequest to the Royal Society of Arts, Dr. Swiney also left a similar sum of £5,000 to the Trustees of the British Museum for the establishment of a lectureship in geology.

We regret to record the death, at Richmond, on December 13, last year, of the younger of the two poets who wrote under the name of "Michael Field." Of their first published work, "Callirrhoe" and "Fair Rosamund," which appeared in 1884, THE ACADEMY wrote: "It will be seen that here is a young writer with plenty of convictions and plenty of courage. In addition, we may credit him with the fresh gift of song, a picturesque and vivid style, as yet without distinction or reserve." Since then there has appeared a long series of dramas of high quality, many through the sumptuous medium of the Vale Press, and three volumes of lyrics, "Sappho" (1889), "Underneath the Bough" (1893), and "Wild Honey" (1908). In all there is a complete fusion of two personalities. Nevertheless the elder and surviving poet wishes it to be known that the famous Faun song in "Callirrhoe," which has found its way into many anthologies, the fairy songs in "Fair Rosamund," and the whole of the "Father's Tragedy," were the work of the younger writer while still a girl. Their definitely Catholic work is represented by two volumes of devotional verse, "Poems of Adoration" and "Mystic Trees," of which it is now known that the first is the work of the poet lately dead. It is possible to detect in these two books a diversity of gift and temperament of which no trace appears in the earlier writings.

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

BY LANCELOT LAWTON

A DECADE OF WORLD PROGRESS.

SOME eight or nine years ago remarkable symptoms of national re-awakening began to manifest themselves throughout the countries of the East. Japan successfully challenged Russian domination in the blue waters of the Pacific, the movement that was to result in the overthrow of the Manchu dynasty in China perceptibly quickened, Persia clamoured for a Constitution, Egypt exhibited an ominous state of unrest, sporadic anarchy troubled India, and the Ottoman Empire, with a German trained army generally believed to be equal in efficiency to any European force, was looked upon as a rising and formidable Power. It is interesting now to return to the opinions then expressed as to the future relations of East and West, examining these at the same time in the light of subsequent events. Such task need not be approached in any spirit of despair arising out of the limitations of human judgment. For at the outset let it be frankly admitted that so impressive, so widespread and so sudden was the upheaval which occurred during the period under review among the teeming millions of Asia, that students inclined to indulge in a prophetic vein found themselves carried away by the sheer enthusiasm of their pessimism. Thus we were told on all sides that the arbitrary cycles of the world's civilisation, that of East and that of West, which take many centuries to perform a revolution had again reversed, the Eastern turning towards progress, the Western towards decline. Veritable panic agitated the pens of not a few publicists. With Japan as a guiding star the nations of the East were to find a common enemy in the nations of the West. What the Island Empire of the Pacific had done in half a century the rest, with her example before them, could accomplish in far less time.

Amid the muffled din of all this pessimism could be heard the alarm of a Yellow Peril at the portals of the West. Men actually saw visions of another Mongol invasion, one more awesome than any in the past in that it would be reinforced by hordes from India, Turkey, and Persia, and would unite all the savagery of a still barbaric Asia with the smooth science of the machine-making West. Contemporary thinkers who in the nature of things are confused by environment and prejudice do not create history; and only after the lapse of years, when individual opinion sinks into insignificance, can it be said that any semblance of truth rises to the surface. In the decade that has elapsed since the fierce contest in Manchuria much has happened, and the course of events has so shaped itself as to completely falsify views vigorously advanced at the time to which we have alluded. The outstanding fact has emerged, contrary to all gloomy forebodings, that the nations of the West have not lost their vitality. On the other hand it is plain that the nations of the East have not made the most of their opportunities. The state of Japan to-day is one of sterility; China moves, though slowly and not along popular lines; Persia is rent with anarchy; the Ottoman Empire is in the melting-pot; Egypt is no longer dangerously assertive; and India remains an enigma which assuredly the passing of years will solve, though more years than most people allow for.

In the West, altogether a different picture is presented. If we free our minds of political considerations which, in engendering bias, distort the vision of world affairs, we are bound to say that in the last ten years Europe has undeniably progressed. The pacifist may perhaps object that the vast armaments maintained are opposed to this assertion. But failing the practice of universal brotherhood no alternative than that of power by the sway of the sword has been devised for the protection of a community. It is perfectly true then that the millennium of permanent peace resulting from subjection of rivalry among nations organised to compete with each other is not in sight. Because of that circumstance, however, we cannot agree that, compared with the East, the West is on the decline, more especially, too, when we reflect that the former also is arming with aggressive intent. Civilisation is not the monopoly of any single country, and civilisation will always move forward independently of national jealousies so long as these are not permitted the excess of war. Within practical limits we may even with reason join issue with the pacifists. We welcome the fact that during the period of peace which Europe has enjoyed, international intercourse has grown to a remarkable extent. It is an interesting circumstance that all the capitals of Europe are to-day rather international than national in character. International congresses are now more than ever the rule. The intellectual thought of the nations is in closer constant communication and, on the whole, in harmony. To deal adequately with this development alone would require an article in itself. Our simple reference is merely intended to show that though progress has necessarily been slow, the nations of the West at least attempted to understand each other.

If we take the standard of commercial success to guide us, then we find that Europe is enjoying unparalleled prosperity. Altogether no sign can be detected of that swift decay which the prophets declared awaited the peoples of the West. Yet, in spite of the record of disaster of which we have spoken, it would be an error to assume that the peoples of the East have not appreciably advanced. In their efforts to appraise the exact degree of this advancement we fear that many authorities have started from false assumptions. One school, for example, has erred in the belief of a common ideal existing among all Asiatic races. So vast is the region embraced within the term Eastern that it contains problems no less grave than those which have obstructed enlightenment in Europe. Too often it is forgotten that the nations of the East have rival religions, rival policies, both political and economic, and, in many important instances, even conflicting ideals. Again, too much reliance is frequently placed on that latent power supposed to be hidden in the mysticism of the East. But mysticism fails completely in the presence of modern problems, the problems which baffle sorcerers and only statesmen may solve.

And finally the idea became fixed in the purview of many students that the wholesale importation of Western institutions would impart fiery vigour to the slumbering peoples of Asia. Constitutional government has so far failed completely throughout the East, but on that account there is no reason to despair. The limbs of the masses are still stiff and sore from the chains which encumbered them in the barbaric past. That they are free at all from these chains is welcome progress, and in time they will accustom themselves to walk with the easy gait of men of conscious freedom. Nothing is more fallacious than this habit of imagining that Western institutions are an immediate panacea for all the ills that afflict the East. For these self-same institutions are in a state of evolution in the very region to which they owe their origin. For example, the Duma and Press in Russia are in a subservience to authority that is almost Oriental in rigour. In Germany, as we have seen lately, Constitutional Government is almost a farce. In England there is certainly wide divergence of opinion as to the merits of parliamentary control. In France governments change as quickly as do the seasons. In Hungary the Diet is very frequently the scene of discreditable brawls. Nevertheless, constitutional government is certainly to be found a reality in the West, whereas, in the East, with the exception of Japan, it is altogether non-existent; and even in Japan the parliament has been described by an eminent Japanese politician as comparable only with an "assembly of devils." If without dwelling too critically upon its manifestations we regard progress among the

"ROYAL YORK" HOTEL, BRIGHTON

Supreme Comfort in a Warm and Sheltered Position. Excellent Sea Views

SOME PRESS OPINIONS.

"To the Cuisine particular attention has been paid, and no expense spared, whilst the service is absolutely perfect."

"And in the Royal York you have the perfection of an English hotel and English cooking."

AND—

Colonel NEWNHAM DAVIS says:—"The Chef makes soup like a Frenchman, grills like an Englishman, and fries like an Italian."

Telegrams:
"Presto, Brighton."

Telephones: 206 Post Office, Brighton.
293 Brighton.

THE KARSINO and NEW ISLAND HOTEL HAMPTON COURT.

Propri.: Mr. FRED KARNO.

Tel.: MOLESEY 1.

*The only Residential River Hotel open
all the Year round.*

THE RIVIERA OF LONDON
THE FAVOURITE RESORT OF LONDON SOCIETY.
LUXURIOUS PALM COURT.
DANCES & ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

For Illustrated Brochure & Tariff, apply Manager.

nations as merely slow advancement towards the grand ideal of universal comprehension, and at the same time make full allowance for the historical and geographical disabilities of our less fortunate rivals, disabilities from which we have in an incalculable measure derived profit, there is surely no room for arrogant self-complacency. Were there to be a wider realisation of this truth, the peoples of Europe would learn intelligently to appreciate each other's struggles and, in turn, the still more uphill task with which Eastern nations are confronted. For all alike have started from the same point, and are proceeding along the same road, though the stages which they have reached are widely set apart.

MOTORING

IN the opinion of the delegates from all parts of the Empire who attended the Imperial Motor Transport Conference held in London in July of last year, alcohol will be the motor fuel of the future, and this view as to the ultimate solution of the motor fuel problem seems to be steadily gaining ground among those qualified to gauge the limitations of the present sources of supply and the requirements of the future. It may reasonably be assumed that the astonishing development of mechanically propelled locomotion will continue rapidly and uninterruptedly to supersede every other form of locomotion or traction; and it is abundantly clear that to meet the continuously increasing demand for the necessary motor fuel it will be imperative to develop some other and practically unlimited source of supply. The most promising of these potential sources is undoubtedly alcohol. It has been demonstrated to be a perfectly efficient motor fuel, and it is a matter of common knowledge that it can be manufactured at a small cost from commodities and materials of which we have, or can produce, an inexhaustible supply. The obstacles to its immediate utilisation as a motor fuel are two-fold: firstly, its artificially enhanced price resulting from the imposition of the heavy Government duty, and, secondly, the necessity for somewhat important modifications of the existing standard type of engine. To overcome the first-mentioned difficulty, without involving any diminution of the revenue at present derived by the Government from the sale of alcohol as a beverage, all that seems necessary is that the spirit, when intended for use as a motor fuel, should be "de-natured," and thereby made unpalatable—a process which is perfectly simple. The other obstacle, namely, that of engine modification, is perhaps not quite so easily overcome. In fact it is not easy to ascertain precisely the nature and extent of the alterations which would have to be made in the present type of engine before pure alcohol could be used with perfect satisfaction; but it may be taken for granted that the car manufacturers will not be eager to introduce costly alterations of engine design. It is to deal with these difficulties mainly that the Alcohol Motor Fuel Committee has just been formed by the Imperial Motor Transport Council. The committee is of a very influential and authoritative nature, among its fourteen members being the Hon. Arthur Stanley, chairman of the R.A.C., Mr. S. F. Edge, Dr. Hele-Shaw, Professor Vivian B. Lewes, Dr. Ormanby, and Sir Boverton Redwood. Its practical work is to commence at once, and there is every reason to hope that the results will be of great importance to the whole community.

At a dinner at Edinburgh on Tuesday last, Lieut.-Col. Matthew, president of the Scottish Motor Association, stated that he had sounded members of the association with regard to the ear-marking of motor vehicles for the use of the Government in the event of war, and had received eighty-six favourable replies. In any time of crisis, these firms would be able and willing to place at the disposal of the Government 739 motor cars, 96 motor lorries, and 800 qualified drivers

Vauxhall
The Car Superexcellent

FIFTY-TWO PAGES OF INFORMATION (with fifty-five illustrations) about this splendid machine compose the newly published Vauxhall catalogue, which every motorist should possess, and is invited to send for.

THREE YEARS' GUARANTEE

VAUXHALL MOTORS LTD.,
174-182, GT. PORTLAND STREET, W.

for the transport of troops, supplies, and ammunition. It would be interesting to know what would be the result of a similar plebiscite of the whole of the firms in the British motor industry.

According to the Autocar, at the recent New York Automobile Show 87 per cent. of the American cars had an electric engine starting equipment as a standard fitting and as an integral part of the chassis; 1 per cent. of the cars had acetylene starting outfits and 4 per cent. air starters. As an optional extra, electric starters could be fitted to 2 per cent. and mechanical starters to 1 per cent. The most striking point in connection with the above is that in only 5 per cent. of all cars shown was no provision made for some form of engine starter. At Olympia and Paris the percentage was probably the other way about, i.e., possibly 5 per cent. of the cars had some such provision. The above particulars are furnished by the United Motor Industries, Ltd., the British selling agents for the North-east starter-generator. This equipment, we learn, is fitted as standard to fourteen models of six different American makers, seven of these models being similarly equipped last year.

Those motorists who are fond of statistics may be interested to know that of the eight hundred tyres fitted to cars at the Scottish Motor Exhibition at Edinburgh, five hundred and fifty-five are Dunlops. At the three officially recognised motor shows held in this country—London, Manchester, and Edinburgh—the respective figures of Dunlops and all other makes combined have been 2,372 to 1,646.

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

CHEAP money is almost bringing about a boom. The banks have reduced their rate of interest on deposits to a figure which renders it unprofitable for the public to keep their money idle any longer. Consequently, investment brokers are quite busy purchasing gilt-edged securities. The rise has not yet come to an end. I will not go as far as most people and say that we shall have a boom year. This does not seem in any way probable; but it is clear that the City will do well. Trade continues to fall away. Consequently, money which is used in business is coming to London. The new issues have many of them gone extremely well. The City of Concepcion was over-subscribed in a few hours. On the other hand, the Forestal debentures failed to meet with approval. Associated Provincial Picture Houses offered 470,000 shares for the purpose of building cinematograph shows. It is doubtful if the issue was subscribed, in spite of the success of the parent company. Plymouth Consolidated propose to revive an old mine on the mother lode in California. This is a sheer gamble. The same may be said of the Trinidad Silverstream Oilfields. Trinidad may be full of oil, but, unfortunately, up to the present the companies exploiting it have not been lucky. Lord St. Davids has brought out

ROYAL ALBION HOTEL, BRIGHTON.

THE NEWEST HOTEL.

Closer to the Sea than any other Hotel
at Brighton.

Magnificent Dining Room and Lounge with
beautiful Sea Views.

The Academy and Literature says:—"We have tried all the hotels in Brighton and none can compare with the Royal Albion for beauty of position, comfort, and personal attention to visitors' wishes."

For Illustrated Brochure and
Tariff, apply to
THE MANAGER.

Telephones :
903 Post Office (2 lines).

Telegrams :
"Brilliancy, Brighton."

a new Trust and asks the public for £250,000. He will probably get it as no one knows better how to run a successful Trust than the group with whom his Lordship has surrounded himself. The Birmingham Aluminium Casting Company is a small affair of only local interest. The Bengal-Nagpur Railway offered two million 4 per cent. debentures at 97½, and they were immediately snapped up. The Anchorage Life offered 100,000 shares and proposes to start a new Insurance Society. It is difficult to see how such a company can succeed. The Melbourne Electric Supply asked for £150,000 5 per cent. debentures at 97½. This is a reasonable commercial risk.

MONEY.—The Bank Rate was reduced to 4 per cent. as everyone anticipated, and we are now all talking of a 3 per cent. rate, though when this will come about is perhaps doubtful. However, money is cheap all over the world, Paris being the only capital in which the rate has not been reduced. The French banks want all the money they can get for the new loans, and they will probably maintain their rate in order to attract gold from both London and New York. Sir Edward Holden's oration to the shareholders of the City and Midland Bank has attracted a great deal of attention. He was extremely pessimistic in regard to the Post Office Savings Bank, which he thinks should publish a balance-sheet and keep a reserve. Everyone in the City agrees with him. The Post Office Savings Bank was established at a time when Joint Stock banks were in their infancy. It is now an anachronism, and sooner or later the big banking institutions of Great Britain will come to an agreement with the Government to take over the deposits. The Savings Bank holds £185,000,000 of deposits, and the only security against panic is the credit of the country. This may be good enough in times of peace, but it would fail during a war.

FOREIGNERS.—The Foreign market has not improved pari passu with other markets. If we are to get any trouble at all it will be in Paris. The French bankers are haggling with Greece over her million loan and they are discussing a 20 million loan with Turkey. For this loan they expect concessions over the whole Turkish Empire; but Turkey is so hard up that she will have to consent. The Russian loan should be out within the next few weeks. Servia finds that she needs more money, and she will probably once again ask the French for a loan. There appears to be no end to the borrowings of the Near East, but we hear very little of Bulgaria and her needs. Then there is the Uruguay loan, which is to be offered in Brussels and London, and should be readily subscribed. The Cuban loan, which has been secured by Morgans, Kuhn Loeb, and the two leading banks in New York, will probably be kept away from London. The Foreign market will be busy for months with its new issues, but I cannot see how they will affect the money position, as such loans do not destroy credit. On the contrary, they create it, and most of them, so far from making the banks tighter, will release a large amount now locked up in unnegotiable securities.

HOME RAILS.—The Home Railway market hangs fire. Everybody has got labour on the brain, and the strikes certainly do not help people. Also, the whole energy of the investing public is directed to finding out some cheap gilt-edged stock. It is not the fashion at the moment to consider Home Railways a gilt-edged security. However, their time will come, and those who buy to-day will make money before the year is out. I am not suggesting a speculation. On the contrary, I think that Dover "A," Little Chats, and all the deferred stocks of the English railways are fully valued. Underground Electrics do not hold their own. But we must remember that they have had a very big rise, and a year ago, when they were being boomed with great enthusiasm, they were only quoted at 95.

YANKEES.—The American market is quite lively. The principal dealings have been done in Steels. From information I get from New York, I cannot help thinking that the rise has been overdone, and it is mainly due to a "bear" squeeze. Certainly, the Iron and Steel trade in the United States is definitely bad. The St. Louis and San Francisco is all the talk on Wall Street, and the Inter-State Commerce Commission has published a very bitter attack upon the financial operations of the railway, and, incidentally, they blame the house of Speyers for having offered the last issue of the bond in Paris. They say that this house should have informed themselves of the financial position of the road. I do not think that we have heard the end of this business. There is some talk of the Government proceeding with a suit against New York Central with the idea of separating that road from the other Vanderbilt lines. It seem to me that this is carrying persecution to an extreme, as the Michigan and Lake Shore roads are actually part of New York Central, and do not in the least interfere with anybody.

RUBBER.—Rubber, probably out of sympathy with the rest of the market, has hardened up a little. Only two small reports have made their appearance during the week, the Val d'Or and the Escot. The latter, under the Presidency of Mr. Malcolm Cumming, has always been looked upon as a sound little concern, but the report is very unsatisfactory and the chance of a dividend next year remote.

OIL.—In the Oil market there has been some buying of International Russian in the hope that the bore hole now down 2,000 feet will strike a rich horizon. Maikop Premiers hold their own, but candidly, the Oil market, is rather dull. It is said that there is further good news in from Egypt, but the market has not responded. Shells keep hard. We are promised a prospectus for the Pacific Petroleum which will probably be out before this is in print.

MINES.—Kaffirs have moved up all along the line, and although the public is buying with great caution, the dealers think that we may get a considerable rise. But everything depends upon the magnates. They killed the last little boom by too rapidly unloading their shares. We must remember that practically all the shares are now held by the big houses, and that they are determined to get out of the Rand as quickly as possible. It is uncertain whether the big men will be able to exercise sufficient self-restraint. Russians are all fairly hard, and it is now said that Russo-Asiatics have acquired options on further good properties. Wheeler Cornwallis-West are said to have a Kirkland Lake mine ready for flotation, and Mr. Latilla is also preparing another proposition. The Jos report is reasonably good, but not much information is afforded us. Two more Cobalt reports are out, but they add little to our knowledge. On the whole, the Mining market looks like going better.

MISCELLANEOUS.—The event of the week in the Miscellaneous market has been the Maypole Dairy report. The House did not like the reduction in profits and sold the deferred shares. It is clear that you cannot have your cake and eat it too, and the deferred shareholders, having had their bonus distribution, must now look for very much reduced profits in the future. Indeed, it is doubtful whether they will get more than 80 per cent. or 90 per cent. dividend on the new shares. However, the balance sheet is very strong, and the company one of the soundest in Great Britain. Cuban Ports remain weak in spite of puffs telling us that the common stock will be paid off at 70. The Cuban Government has no information on the subject, and insiders are evidently unloading. The Egyptian market is showing signs of movement, and the South American Meat Fusion has put life into this section. Breweries keep hard and Watney, Combe announcement of an interim dividend of 2 per cent. was liked. Maple's dividend remains unchanged, but the profits are slightly lower. The quotation of the shares did not alter. RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

PAINTERS OF ANIMALS, ANIMAL PAINTERS, AND OTHER MATTERS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—It seems, from a footnote in THE ACADEMY of January 17, that we now have a Society of Animal Painters, and that they are holding their first exhibition—good!

But from the point of view of art—and nothing else whatsoever matters—is this a cause for congratulation; rather, is it not a retrogressive step? We all admit that the dear painters of cats and dogs, cattle and horses, are painstaking, worthy people; and to be painstaking we know, is to possess a prime British virtue. But in art—and nothing else whatsoever matters—to take pains is either a very great virtue or a very great vice. With the Royal Academy and all it stands for in British art it is a very great vice. The prime vice, the besetting sin of the Royal Academy is that it sets the mechanical, the obviously painstaking part of Art before art itself. They grasp at the substance and miss the spirit. And in this new society, it seems to me, we are to have this policy still further enshrined.

To paint animals is to glory overmuch in technique, in difficulties to be overcome. All artists know that it requires long training, patient study, infinite self-discipline, and a thousand other virtues, all worthy of regard, successfully to set on canvas, say, a troop of horses galloping towards the spectator. Yet what have we when all is said and done? We have the thews, the bones, the flesh and the muscles of a picture, but the soul—Art—is lacking. There is nothing represented but what everyone can see—even the untutored ploughboy. Therefore I say, admitting, as all artists will admit, the horrible difficulties, the hours of seemingly futile effort, the tears of vexation that have gone to achieve such a work—is it worth while? Is it right that any noble soul (and all painters who are not noble ought to be doing something else honester, and more suited to their soul station) should so waste its powers for an end so comparatively ignoble? Your mechanical operators of the camera, cinematograph, or other mechanical device can do this better and with less wasted energy. Yes, I hear superior sighs—"poor fellow, he misunderstands the whole meaning, the traditions and the teaching of art." And, too, I know that sufficient argument from antiquity, with its so dead ideals, can be brought forward utterly to bury me and a city full of "me's." Yet I maintain that with the huge advances in the mere representation of objects by purely mechanical processes, artists before many decades are past, will be as ashamed as any poet of his work if, beyond it being mechanically right, clever in design, and of perfect technique—and, of course, all these are absolutely necessary—it is nothing more, if it does not speak from a soul to a soul. Who but a pedant would read poetry for its mere technical perfections, be they ever so great? Similarly, with pictorial art: a picture which does not "speak" to me, does not interest me in the least. Indeed a gallery of animal painting would be more boring than a museum.

If art is advancing, art is no longer mere representation of objects, no longer even art for art's sake, but as has been said before art for soul's sake. Thus, en passant, it seems to me Futurism, Cubism, concerning themselves with pseudo-scientific problems, are utter rubbish and will dismally fail. Indeed, all "movements" giving themselves a name, and being self-conscious, come to naught. To me all painters of animals and those who hold kinship with them, that is, all those over-concerned with the mechanical side of art, are real animal painters. With them, as with so many artists, it is not as was said of old, "the spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak," but "the flesh is strong: the spirit is weak."

It is quite true that the whole spirit of official art in England, with the great Academy at its head, is on the side of these muscular artists. A year or two ago, for instance, the Chantrey Trustees bought for the nation a faultless, beautifully exact reproduction on canvas of a middle class suburban interior. Thereby did they who are set on high to direct the taste of the people, declare to the great public of England, transposing, in their worldly wisdom the words of much greater spiritual wisdom: "Man liveth by bread alone."

Of course one cannot expect anything better. The whole teaching of art in England is wrong at the very core. I will illustrate what I mean: At a town not far from where I write, about nine hundred pupils (I have forgotten the exact figure, but it is of no consequence even if you have it) have passed through the municipal art school within the last ten or fifteen years. Out of these not more than one has done anything to speak of in the real art world. Think of that, British tax-payers! Had not this money, utterly wasted in teaching the mechanism of art, better be devoted to the building of Dreadnoughts or to offering better inducements to muscular men, totally unfitted for the practice of art, to don a uniform and carry arms in defence of their country? Why, if our city fathers must lay their heavy, but patronising, hand upon the head of meek, god-like art, do they not fetch to their respective boroughs men versed in the ultimate meaning of art, who feel its innermost pulse and speak with its spirit, instead of setting up municipal schools to teach its dry mechanism to pupils who comprehend not art's true significance?

The whole basis of art is expression—self-expression. A man enters art in order that he may so express his soul that another soul may understand and receive with gladness and great joy, his message. Imagine a child kept from birth in a darkened room, fed, but having no communication with human beings or human things. Then, say, at ten years of age, some benevolent individual engages a more or less expensive professor to teach it language, to teach it to speak, to express itself when it has nothing to express! Would it not be wiser, first to let that child comprehend the appearance and meaning of things before it is taught to babble?

Therefore, before the so-called art pupil is allowed to enter any municipal or other art school, let him understand clearly whether within him he has anything worthy of expression, know if he has any real desire so to express himself. Nay, before he attempts to express himself in sacred art (as one speaks of sacred poesy) let him study Nature, great literature and poetry, learn the Bible and his Shakespeare: then mayhap he will know whether he has a soul all desirous to express great and noble things, or merely an itch to gain that praise which is given (and rightly so) to all painstaking effort, all work truly undertaken and with self-sacrifice nobly accomplished. But—and this is the difference—an artist should be above that praise: this is for the artisan, not for the artist. If, however, he approaches art in the right spirit, and would be a true artist, he will somehow find means to attain proficiency in technique and in mechanical skill—neither bolts nor bars, wild horses or false teachers, will keep him from it. He, have no fear, will soon learn the science of perspective and find out, if necessary, how to treat a telegraph pole artistically!

Meanwhile, I often wonder what becomes of the dear, painstaking, but quite uninspired young ladies who attend municipal art schools, and receive nice, gratifying certificates and even scholarships from their South Kensington heaven. They—the S.K. gods know it—are turned out by the hundred gross—what does become of them? Perhaps they might tell us something at the W.S.P.U.!

I write not arrogantly, but with all meekness. Yours faithfully,
C. R. M.
Lincoln.

THE GREATEST BAR TO HUMAN PROGRESS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—The warlike expenditure of Europe amounts to £500,000,000 per year, and is rapidly increasing. About 5,000,000 people serve permanently in the European armies and navies, and as these might earn £500,000,000 in civil life, armaments practically cost Europe £1,000,000,000 per year in time of peace. The British Empire spends £100,000,000 annually on army and navy. About 500,000 white British men are kept permanently under arms, and as these might earn £50,000,000, in civil life, preparations for war cost us £150,000,000 per year. The nations of Europe and civilisation itself threaten to break down under the intolerable military burden.

What is the cause of the mad armament race? The real cause, in my opinion, lies in the unfortunate political organisation of Europe. The European Great Powers are divided into two groups: the Triple Alliance and the Triple Entente. They distrust one another. As both groups are approximately equally strong, each group tries to get the advantage over the other by increasing its armaments.

What is the remedy for this state of affairs? As the reduction of armaments by mutual agreement has proved hitherto impracticable, and would in any case only be a temporary remedy, the ruinous armament race can be stopped only if we abolish the division amongst the Powers, if we unite the Triple Alliance and the Triple Entente into a Sextuple Alliance. The writer has closely studied the political problems which at present divide the nations. He has discussed the matter with the leading European rulers, statesmen, and politicians, and has come to the conclusion that it is possible to unite the European Powers in an Alliance or a Federation. France and Russia were once our enemies, and we have been at war with both. Our present agreement and friendship with them shows that apparently irreconcilable differences may be overcome by friendly discussion and adjustment, provided there be goodwill on both sides. Therefore, the greatest need is the enlightenment of the people. Only popular pressure can bring about the unification of Europe. This will lead to a gradual reduction of armaments and a great increase of prosperity, for the economic waste of £1,000,000,000 per year will then enormously decrease.

In the hope of promoting the unity of Europe I have founded the European Unity League. Its name explains its object. I will gladly explain to all who write to me to the temporary offices, 39, St. James' Street, Piccadilly, London, my aims and proposals at greater length than I can in this letter. I invite your readers to become members of the European Unity League, and to aid me in my propaganda. Membership of the League involves no financial or other liability whatever. I am, sir, your obedient servant,

MAX WAECHTER.

London, January 23, 1914.

SCOTT AND LYTTON.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—Mr. Salmon is evidently not acquainted either with that very scarce book, "Letters of Edward Bulwer, Lord Lytton, to his Wife," or my own little work entitled "Bulwer Lytton: An Exposure of the Errors of his Biographers," for both show that Lytton's earliest estimate of Scott was very unfavourable. The dedication to him of "Eugene Aram" shows Lytton in a different frame of mind. It is dated December 22, 1831, and the novel was published in the same month, although dated 1832.

In Mr. Salmon's article "1886" is evidently a mistake for "1866," as is also "lock" for "rock." Lytton's death occurred in 1873.

16, Amwell Street, E.C.

W. A. FROST.

TRAFFIC IN ADVOWSONS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—The recent publication of a Parliamentary Return giving particulars of registered transactions in Advowsons between the years 1904 and 1912 has aroused considerable interest amongst the laity who, for some time past, have endeavoured to draw attention to the grave scandals connected with the sales of advowsons, some of which are in reality, by evasions of the purpose of the law, sales of incumbencies and the cure of souls.

In this connection the "Benefices Act, 1898," Amendment Committee has been collecting data showing the wanton injury inflicted upon parishes by the induction of unfit incumbents, and we should be obliged if any of your readers will communicate any particulars of cases of this character which may be known to them. It is hoped that remedial legislation may be secured by the consent of all political parties in order to put an end to a traffic which every honest and religious man should regard as scandalous.

Letters should be addressed to Mr. Edward Atkin, 5, Pump Court, Temple, E.C. We are, yours faithfully, HUGH CECIL,

A. D. PHILLIPS.

London, January 12, 1914.

A TRANSLATOR OF THE ILIAD AND THE ÆNEID.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—The Catalogs of the British Museum and the Bodleian Library mention "The First Six Books of Homer's Iliad, with an interpagated translation, line for line, and numerous notes. 'By the author of the first six books of Virgil's Æneid on the same plan. London: Printed for Taylor and Walton, Upper Gower Street. 1841.' This book of 271 pages was produced by 'J. Walford, Printer, Whitchurch, Salop.' Is it known who was 'the author' of these translations?

P.S.—Two misprints which occur in my letter on p. 831 of THE ACADEMY for December 27, 1913, must be rectified by reading "is isarrak," and "its comarca." I remain yours,

EDWARD S. DODGSON.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION.

The Lost Road. By Richard Harding Davis. Illustrated. (Duckworth and Co. 6s.)

The Flying Inn. By G. K. Chesterton. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

Gillespie. By J. Macdougall Hay. (Constable and Co. 6s.)

The Three Trees. By Guy Rawlence. (T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

Why She Left Him. By Florence Warden. (John Long. 6s.)

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS.

Our Navy. By Archibald Hurd. With a Preface by the Earl of Selborne, K.G. (Fred. Warne and Co. 1s. net.)

Paul Verlaine. By Wilfrid Thorley. (Constable and Co. 1s. net.)

THEOLOGY.

The Meaning of Christianity. By Frederick A. M. Spencer, M.A. (T. Fisher Unwin. 2s. 6d. net.)

PERIODICALS.

The Women's Industrial News; Mind; Bookseller; Cambridge University Reporter; Colonial Life; Windsor Magazine; Wm. Dawson and Sons' List of Annual Subscriptions; C. and E. Layton's Handy Newspaper List; Bulletin of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, N.Y.; Bookfellow; Revue Critique; Revue Bleue; Cambridge Magazine; Publishers' Circular; Literary Digest; Wednesday Review; Collegian.

THE ACADEMY

A JOURNAL OF LITERATURE, ART, FINANCE & POLITICS

No. 2179

[Registered as a
Newspaper.]

FEBRUARY 7, 1914

PRICE THREEPENCE

SHEFFIELD SIMPLEX

PRESS OPINION:—

*"The highest point to which motor design
has yet attained."*

The "TIMES," 8/11/13

The Connoisseur

who demands smart appearance, and the experienced motorist who desires chassis efficiency, have their ideals in the present 30 h.p. six-cylinder Sheffield-Simplex chassis.

Write for Illustrated List of complete cars, with beautiful bodies by Vauden - Plas, or better still, arrange a trial. Both are free.

Sheffield-Simplex Motor Works, Ltd.

20, CONDUIT STREET,
LONDON, W.

Works: Tinsley, Sheffield

30 H.P. 6-CYLINDER CHASSIS. STANDARD EQUIPMENT INCLUDES U. S. L. ELECTRIC SELF-STARTER AND LIGHTER, ALL LAMPS, ELECTRIC HORN, SPEEDOMETER CLOCK, COMPLETE SCUTTLE DASH, WITH ALL INSTRUMENTS, £8 8s. TAX.

PRICE £885.

LATEST DESIGN TORPEDO — WITH CONCEALED HOOD.

ALLIANCE ASSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED.

Head Office:

BARTHOLOMEW LANE, LONDON, E.C.

ASSETS EXCEED £23,500,000.

Chairman:

The Right Hon. LORD ROTHSCHILD, G.C.V.O.

Business transacted by the Company:—

- (1) LIFE INSURANCE, with and without Profits, with special provisions for the payment of Estate Duties.
 - (2) FIRE INSURANCE of every description.
 - (3) INSURANCES TO COVER LOSS OF RENT, Interest and Profit consequent upon Fire damage to property.
 - (4) MARINE INSURANCE.
 - (5) BURGLARY, THEFT and PLATE GLASS INSURANCE.
 - (6) ACCIDENT, including PERSONAL ACCIDENT, Motor Car and Employers' Liability Insurance.
- Fidelity Guarantee and Sinking Fund Policies are also granted.

Applications for Agencies are entertained, and Prospectuses with other papers may be had on written or personal application.

ROBERT LEWIS, General Manager.

THE KARSINO and NEW ISLAND HOTEL HAMPTON COURT.

Propr.: Mr. FRED KARNO.

Tel.: MOLESEY 1.

*The only Residential River Hotel open
all the Year round.*

THE RIVIERA OF LONDON
THE FAVOURITE RESORT OF LONDON SOCIETY.

LUXURIOUS PALM COURT.

DANCES & ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

For Illustrated Brochure & Tariff, apply Manager.

BARGAINS IN BOOKS.—

Kipling's Complete Works, 25 vols., half calf, gilt, fine set, £12 12s.; Hamilton's Parodies, 6 vols., £2 10s.; Jesse's Historical Works, 30 vols., Nimmo, 1901, £7 17s. 6d.; Thackeray's Centenary Biographical Edition, 26 vols., £6 6s.; Barrington's Graham of Claverhouse, 30s. net, for 10s. 6d.; Purchas's Voyages, 20 vols., £9 9s., Glasgow, 1905; Slaters' Engravings and their Values, 1912, 18s.; Chaffer's Marks and Monograms on Pottery and Porcelain, 1912, 42s.; Baily's Magazines of Sports and Pastimes, 64 vols., £7 10s.; Grimm's Fairy Tales, large paper, illus. by Rackham, £2 2s.; Proc. Inst. Civil Engineers, 142 vols., cloth, £16 16s.; Pinkerton's Voyages and Travels, 17 vols., 1808, £5 10s.; Porter's Knights of Malta, 1858, 2 vols., £3 3s.; Burton's Arabian Nights, 17 vols., illustrated, £17 17s.; Gould's History Freemasonry, 3 thick vols., morocco binding, £2 2s., cost £6 6s.; James' Painters and Their Works, 3 vols., £3 3s.; Habershon Records of Old London, Vanished and Vanishing, coloured plates, folio, £2 2s.; Yeats' Collected Works, 8 vols., £3 3s.; Walpole's Letters, large paper, 16 vols., £6 10s.; Oscar Wilde, by L. E. Ingleby, 12s. 6d., for 4s. 6d.; Ditchfield Vanishing England, 15s., for 6s. 6d.; London's Lhasa, 2 vols., 42s., for 14s.; Spenser's Faerie Queene, 2 vols., Cambridge University Press, £3 13s. 6d., for 32s. Will take any good books in exchange for above.—BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

FOR SALE.

Several Hundred Copies of a Specially Prepared Map of South America

Printed in Colours, showing the Produce and Chief Characteristics for which each District is noted.

For particulars apply

ACADEMY OFFICE,
63 LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

"SUNNY CAPRI." Two paying guests desired for Palatial Villa; spacious apartments, electric light, fine library, absolute quiet, magnificent views, healthiest climate, literary society. Terms 7/- per day.—Apply, "Colonel" Mezzomonte, Capri, Italy.

JOURNALISTIC and SECRETARIAL TRAINING FOR LADIES.—

Rapid systematic coaching. Special course in journalism. Excellent introductions given.—Telephone or write, THE TRIANGLE SECRETARIAL OFFICES, 61, South Molton Street, W.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MASSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Fourteen years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE AND ART
PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION: Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free.

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Offices of
THE ACADEMY, 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

To

.....

Please send me THE ACADEMY for the next.....months.

I enclose remittance value.....

Name.....

Description.....

Address

CONTENTS

	PAGE		PAGE
Notes of the Week	163	Fiction	177
A Winter Hymn	164	Among the Eskimos	179
Children	164	Music	180
Lapses of Memory	164	In the Learned World	181
Does Home Rule mean Rome Rule?	165	The Theatre :
The Self-Sacrifices of Travel	166	"The Music-Cure" at the Little Theatre	183
Reviews :		"The Queen's Champion" at the Aldwych Theatre	183
Verse — Humour and Satire	167	Mr. H. B. Irving at the Palace Theatre.....	184
Shakespeariana	168	The Little Theatre	184
North African History ...	169	Notes and News	185
A Fellowship in Poetry ...	170	Imperial and Foreign Affairs	186
New Lamps for Old	171	Motoring	187
The Haunted Palace	172	In the Temple of Mammon	188
A Religion and an Empire	172	Correspondence	191
Journalistic Science	173	Books Received	192
Shorter Reviews	175

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post-free.

The EDITORIAL AND ADVERTISING OFFICE is at 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

Notes of the Week

WE notice with great satisfaction the statement made in the Budget Committee of the Reichstag by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Herr von Jagow said that the relations with Great Britain could be described as very good, and that the rapprochement was making progress. So far as words go, we welcome this utterance, but there should not be the slightest deviation from the line of defensive policy which the deeds of the German Government have rendered indispensable. Sir Vezev Strong is the leading and most distinguished advocate of World Friendship. We are deeply impressed with the sentiments which he has expressed. The ideal is perfect, and would be capable of realisation if Germany would co-operate with those of the Powers which desire to preserve peace. We think that this prospect, greatly to be desired, is nearly in view. Having regard to the ruinous results of warfare at the present day, reasonable and sensible statesmen must put the question to themselves whether, even in the contingency of a successful issue, war is worth while. As we do not belong to the peace-at-any-price party, we shall continue to support necessary expenditure in the region of armaments, and we shall do so in the interests of the preservation of peace. We might quote the well-worn adage on the subject—an adage of which everyone, except cocoa-millionaires and Swiss alkaline manufacturers, is able to realise the essential truth.

It is obvious from Sir Edward Grey's speech at Manchester that Mr. Lloyd George's fireworks have failed, and that the Cabinet have decided to uphold Mr.

Churchill and the Sea Lords in the demands which they are making in the interest of our naval supremacy. The view which we honestly hold is that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has always favoured the expenditure which his colleague at the Admiralty has demanded, and that he only made an empiric display of opposition against the First Lord. He was so sure in his last year's Budget that a surplus would be realised as the result of his proposals—which we think will not be the case—that he is naturally disinclined to meet the House of Commons with a tale of largely increased national expenditure. The bias attaching to his office, and his own desire—and legitimate desire if exercised at the right moment—to provide funds for the betterment of social conditions, tend, in quite an honourable way, to render him averse to increased outlay on armaments. He will have to propose new taxation, and we are genuinely afraid that the poorer classes must of necessity bear their share of the burden. Such a position is, we admit, wholly lamentable, but it is the result of rushing blindly into social changes which are really of no value except for the purpose of the showman, but which must, after the manner of the boomerang, hurt those who are deluded into the belief that the changes would ameliorate their condition.

We have many times said that THE ACADEMY is open for the expression of all opinions, and to-day we give a proof of that position in the article entitled "Does Home Rule Mean Rome Rule?" We need scarcely say that we are not responsible either for the statements or their expression. For the benefit of our readers we feel it just to say that the writer is a well-known Irish author in close touch with Irish affairs. The subject is admittedly very controversial, and we invite correspondence on the subject, especially from Irish authorities and readers. We have arranged with the writer to continue in two further articles; but there will be a lapse of some weeks between each in order to give him an opportunity of dealing with any views which may appear in THE ACADEMY in the interval. The subject is of capital importance, and, if those who are not habitual readers of THE ACADEMY take part in the discussion with those whom the journal usually reaches, the range of interest promises to be wide.

The first number of a new weekly paper published at Madras by the Theosophical Society, and edited by Mrs. Annie Besant, has reached us. It is entitled The Commonweal, is termed in a sub-title "A Journal of National Reform," and bears the ambitious motto, "For God, Crown, and Country." Its chief characteristics seem to be a plentiful use of the ready-made phrase—several things are "pregnant with significance" or with "great issues"—and a "Book-Shelf" page that is in need of severe supervision as regards its use of English and its critical power. We wish it well, while hoping that the second number will show a little more originality.

A Winter Hymn

WHERE'ER the snow's mosaic falls
Round driven sea-birds' muted calls,
While vast ice-laden water crawls—
There God broods.

In every little flower of white,
Which struggles up to kiss the light,
And breathe a prayer 'gainst winter's night,
There God sings.

In every child whom frosty days
Suffused with vigorous life's flushed praise,
In eyes a-dance with sunny rays . . .
There God smiles.

J. H. STABLES.

Children

CHILDREN go tripping over the meads
In a land of Romance,
Greener than Ireland, wilder than Scotland,
More smiling than France.

Light as the air-borne clouds that float
Over the hills,
Children go racing with joy in their eyes
By leaping rills.

Woodlands echo the songs they sing
Eagerly listening:
Woodlands all bathed in diamond dew
Trembling and glistening.

Hills and valleys a-dreaming lie
Morning-tinted:
Each moss-girt pool is a silver coin
In heaven minted.

Oh for the heart of a child, to find
A land of Romance,
Greener than Ireland, wilder than Scotland,
Fairer than France!

R. B. INCE.

Lapses of Memory

AS one grows older, one realises more vividly the complex structure of the human organism. Perhaps in no other respect is the remarkable want of equilibrium more clearly seen than in the vagaries of memory. The young man who attempts to address a dining assembly of about twelve persons is usually absolutely overwhelmed, and can only stammer forth a few words, whereas if he were speaking to one man, next to him, he might be quite eloquent, so far as a man without experience can be eloquent. No rule is universal, and it is not unusual to find examples of precocity in either sex. We think, however, that what we have said is true of young persons of the normal standard.

In the course of my experience I have heard some of the most expert speakers fall into the pit. The most remarkable instance which I can call to mind was at a house dinner of the Eighty Club, when the Orator of Empire rose to make a speech. The audience were on the tip-toe of expectation, and the fare which was provided for them was extremely unsatisfying. Lord Rosebery, of whose convalescence we delight to hear, resumed his seat in a chilling atmosphere, which must have been quite unusual for him. Another speaker of no particular importance intervened, and then, to the surprise of everyone, Lord Rosebery again stood up, and apologised to the assembly for having delivered only half of the speech which he had intended. He then proceeded to discourse brilliantly, and sat down amidst enthusiasm.

A front-bench member of the House of Commons, whose name has escaped me for the moment, came down with a sheaf of notes in his hand, and in the course of a speech which promised well failed to find the note which he required to finish his discourse and to elicit the plaudits due to an impromptu peroration. Needless to say, he collapsed in confusion. The same fate on one occasion overtook Mr. Winston Churchill, who suddenly stopped while speaking in the House and frankly confessed that he did not know what he intended to say. The House of Commons, always sympathetic in circumstances such as these, perhaps because the members know a similar fate may overtake them at any moment, cheered Mr. Churchill sympathetically.

It is not only in the realm of politics that these extraordinary lapses take place; I have heard them again and again in literary and artistic assemblies, and it has been rumoured, I do not know with what truth, that a very eminent actor-manager is habitually unable to remember, or, in a latter-day language which I do not like, to "memorise," his lines. No doubt a well-known writer would, in his favourite phrase, assert—"and the most extraordinary thing is that it is true!" That gentleman is, we regret to say, at the present moment languishing in the glades of Brixton; that, however, is by the way.

To come to a more personal matter: although I am no practised speaker, I was guilty myself of a lapse of memory at a public dinner recently held. I was called upon to respond for the Press, and was going along quite nicely until the climax of my speech arrived, when I said: "The Press is not—" and entirely forgot the encomium which I had intended to bestow upon the Fourth Estate; I therefore repeated "The Press is not—" and stuck again; when a friend opposite most kindly suggested to me "modest." I said, "Thank you—I could not think of the word at the moment"; and after that had no difficulty in concluding the speech more or less to the satisfaction of the audience. Of course an apology is due for introducing a personal reminiscence; but the question is, why do these lapses of memory occur in the case of speakers who have mastered diffidence, and who usually may be said to be fluent? It is a curious psychological problem, and we should much like, and invite, opinions upon it.

CECIL COWPER.

Does Home Rule Mean Rome Rule?

FOR myself I may say that to ask whether Ireland should or should not attend to her own governance is much as if our neighbours over the way should ask if we should be permitted to kiss our own wives. The wonder is that the question should ever seriously be put forward. The wonder would be, the question having been put forward, if the result were not a considerable amount of angry resentment and ill-feeling. Yet, not only is the question raised (with the serious self-importance habitual to the Englishman, that always touches the Irishman's sense of the ridiculous), but it is discussed; and that discussion proceeds on the basis of a most puzzling tissue of misinformation. There is no better argument in favour of Irish self-government than the peculiar way in which all our conditions are misapprehended, our problems mistaken, and our ways of thinking misunderstood. The result is not merely a misconception; it is actually a complete inversion—so complete that it is exceedingly difficult for anyone familiar with the make-up of Irish life to recognise the result. It is as though English journalists, the public, and publicists had invented some entirely new island over which to be puzzled. And the basis of misconception is as complete in our friends as in our foes.

An instance may be chosen. It is very gravely suggested that the inevitable result of Home Rule in Ireland would be that the priests would have and would hold a complete ascendancy in that island. The Englishman is a slave to phrases; and the catch-words, "Home Rule is Rome Rule," has hypnotised him into the belief that no rhyme could be so perfect as that if there were not something in it. One wonders a little what would be the result in England if France were to discuss the advisability of conquering England lest she came too much under the power of the tub-thumper in the tin cathedral—but that is by the way. The more immediate matter is whether there is any kind of foundation in this fear of priestly ascendancy. Is there any ground for fearing that Catholic persecution would succeed upon the introduction of Home Rule? Will the Catholic priesthood, that is to say, achieve and utilise a power that they have not now?

Before entering into that question it will be well to say one thing; and that is, that there has never been Catholic persecution in Ireland; whereas to Protestant persecution there has been no limit. I write as a Protestant, and as one who has some knowledge of Ireland to-day; and I say that this is not only true of historical Ireland, but as fully true of Ireland to-day. That, however, is another matter; and I come to the immediate question. I have put the above questions fairly, as they are put in English newspapers, whether in assertion or denial; and there is no supposition in any of the questions that is not the opposite of the simple facts of the case as they are to be experienced in Ireland to-day.

Let me set out these suppositions; and then, against them, set out the actual position. Firstly, it is supposed that the present Government from Westminster through Dublin Castle limits the power of the priest. The simple fact is that English rule is through the priest; and that, in order to make that rule more effectual, it puts the priest in absolute power over some of the most vital parts of the national life, making his will so arbitrary in essential matters that the Catholic laity, together with an increasing number of Protestants, long for Home Rule just because they may thereby be enabled to put a limit to that power. Secondly, it is supposed that the Catholic priesthood desires Home Rule. The simple fact is that the Catholic priesthood, as a priesthood, is opposed to Home Rule. I say, as a priesthood, deliberately. There are a large number of priests who are strong Nationalists at heart. This is a matter of individual conviction; and I know of cases where such priests have had their advancement debarred, and even their immediate position injured, because of such conviction. I do not mean to say that the organisation publicly avows its anti-national conviction; but that such a conviction prevails is a fact that any worker in Irish national or parochial affairs will confirm. None will confirm it more readily than the Catholic laity. Thirdly, it is said that the result of a Parliament in Dublin will be to enforce the civil discretion of the priest. The simple fact is that the priesthood fears a Parliament in Dublin just because it will without doubt mean the departure of civil power. In all this let me be clearly understood. I do not allude to any matters of faith. The Irish people are, for the major part, Catholic by conviction. They are so now; and they will be so after Home Rule. Indeed, as a well-known Irish Catholic put it to me, the faith will be easier after Home Rule because there will not then be the covert hostility between the lay and cleric points of view.

It will no doubt come as a surprise to many Englishmen that Downing Street should control Ireland through Rome; and should enforce the priesthood for the better control; though that fact is no strange experience to Irishmen. Such Englishmen have possibly never considered the periodical journeys between Rome and England indulged in by a certain well-known English peer: a peer as notorious for his dislike of Ireland as he is for his influence at the English Court and the Vatican. Moreover, there are certain Irish priests who are trained for what is known in clerical circles as "the English Mission"; and who, after their stay in England, return to Ireland on what is often spoken of sardonically as "the continuation of the English Mission." Such priests are always opposed to the revival of the Irish language; and are anti-Nationalist almost to a man. They are not openly so; they are so in secret opposition; and that is what makes their attitude so significant. It needs no very susceptible imagination to perceive the tendencies at work behind these simple appearances; and their impact on the world of affairs needs to be felt before their force can be known.

However, it will be said that these are, after all, only tendencies; and therefore, whatever their total effect on those in touch with them, that they are of little worth in convincing others. Yet hard, uncomfortable facts are not lacking. In the curious ignorance prevailing in England with regard to Irish matters it is assumed (even in circles, such as editorial offices, where the uninitiated would expect to find exact and careful knowledge) that the Irish economy is the same as the English, seeing that its governance is English. For example, it is supposed that the Irish educational system is similar to that of the English. I have known it surprise, and even shock, a good many to learn that in Ireland the parish priest is the supreme authority with regard to all the schools in his parish. It is he who has the appointment of all teachers; and he can refuse schools to any, whatever their qualifications, if they fail to satisfy his conception of orthodoxy. He can, subject to slight restrictions that are never enforced, dismiss them; and it is understood that they shall subscribe largely to his annual receipts, however small their salary. It is to him that all dilapidation grants are made; and there is no supervision whatsoever to see that such grants are spent for their appointed purpose. He is, in fact, absolute arbiter for his parish, representing Dublin Castle in that capacity, with his hand on the very beginnings of the people's life.

Through the school he rules the life (even if he had not the other powers that come into his hand); and neither Catholic nor Protestant can escape him, however they try. But the point is that this power of his has been made over to him by English rule; and it has been used towards the specific end of crushing out the national desires of the people. It is the present state of affairs, not the problematical state of affairs under Home Rule, that makes the priest absolute, that gives him an unrivalled opportunity for persecution; and the result in recent history would make a long, painful, and puzzled tale. Some of its chief heads may be given. The language question is a symbol of the rest.

In that remarkable revival (that has attracted some of the most noteworthy scholars in the world, and has enlisted Irishmen irrespective of their creed, religious or political) how came it about that Irish priests fought fiercely, and bitterly, against the introduction of the Irish language into Irish schools as an auxiliary subject, even though that language was the habitual speech in many districts? How came it about, moreover, that the English point of view was always inculcated in the schools, in pursuance of Archbishop Whately's declared policy of using them to this end? The picture of a Catholic priesthood carrying out a Protestant archbishop's policy is an ironical comment on the combination against which Irishmen are rising. And who is it that has protested against this arbitrary governorship of schools? The Catholic laity, that is Nationalist without exception. And, finally, when some years ago they voiced their protest (in which not a few individual priests joined), and sought to have this arbitrary governorship of schools revised in favour of local committees on which the priest should ipso facto be represented, in order that thereby the national point of view should have a better opportunity of expression, who was it that intervened in reply? A Catholic cardinal, by banning the paper in which the proposal was made.

Thus it is seen that it is the present regime that gives the priest the power that so many profess to dread—and so many actually do dread—under Home Rule. What would be the likely state of affairs under Home Rule can best be judged by seeing the recent drift of national opinion. But that belongs to a subsequent paper.

EOCHAIDH.

The Self-Sacrifices of Travel

ARE the places that one visits ever as enchanting as the places one "passes through" without stopping at? I think almost every traveller would admit that they are not.

The train, perhaps, slows down because of some defect on the line, the sun shines with a gentle radiance, and, emerging from a cutting, the world seems suddenly transfigured. Just below the railway track runs a swift river, leaping down its boulder-strewn course; and a thin suspension bridge bears a road to a tiny, red-roofed city nestling under a hill. The train gathers speed, but not before one has caught a glimpse of crumbling walls and gateways, of the square tower of an ancient church. The air is indescribably fresh; the trees of an unheard-of green. The train is now racing on again, a little station flashes by: one cranes one's neck to catch its name—Vic-le-Comte! It is gone now; in a second it has disappeared for all one's life, but how the memory of it remains! Engraved in one's brain is a vignette of the small city one has seen only for thirty seconds and will never see again—unforgettable, unattainable. As time passes, Vic-le-Comte—or is it Le Breuil or Thiers or Aigueperse?—acquires added virtues; its radiance grows. That vision, it was as though the heavens opened, disclosing the desired and unattainable city. If one is wise one makes no plans to revisit it, for such illusions are better unshattered.

There is an element of conscious self-sacrifice, however, which enters into the travels of all wanderers with scant leisure, which is different from these glimpses of the unattainable, but always lends the little tour a taste of bitterness. You are going, perhaps, to spend a fortnight in the South of France. You have hardly time to go to the places you have set your heart on seeing. Shall you stop at Dijon for two days en route, or shall you go straight through? On the way, passing up the valley of the Yonne, up the slopes of the Monts Dore, you pass places like Nuits and Tonnerre, which recall all the good Burgundy you have ever tasted in your life. Their aspect smiles at you. The Yonne slips down temptingly under its shading trees, the opulent country, with its vine-clad slopes, its red-roofed houses, calls to you to stay there for a summer—a single week would be ridiculous. You decide to give up what you are doing, your absurd "occupation" of being busy about nothing, and to go there next May, having reduced your possessions to the smallest possible extent. You will have a suit-case with half a dozen indispensable books in it, besides your clothes; some money (not too much), and that will be all you will have in the world. You will then stay in the comfortable inn—and become the friend of the family. You would be so inoffensive and mad and desirous of being amiable that, even if they thought you rather absurd, they would not be unkind. The Patronne would find a corner for you in her capacious heart; she would remember the things you liked to eat. And you would never, never leave Tonnerre. By the time you have reached this decision you have also reached Dijon. Everybody rushes to the buffet where the wines are famous. You rush too; but probably you are not French enough to drink Chambertin in a hurry. To drink a bad wine in Dijon, however, is more difficult than not! There is a crowd at the buffet; you have only just time; you hurry back to the train. But what about stopping here for a day or two before going farther? The crowds of people getting back to their compartments block up the gangway, the contrôleur is yelling, "en voiture"; you decide too late, make an ineffective dash at your luggage on the rack, become entangled with corpulent people who want to enter your compartment; give it up. After all, you can spend a couple of days in Dijon on the way home. But on the way home you are already three days late; you have also no money, not even enough to be prodigal at the buffet. You lean out of your window and purchase little, sweet, yellow grapes, and pass on sorrowing, the flavour of the little grapes inducing in the mind the contemplation of all you have missed. And now, you want so frightfully to go to Dijon!

The places one has had to pass by on the other side—alas! the world, while man's imagination exists to colour it, will never show us anything like them!

DOUGLAS GOLDRING.

John Napier's "Logarithmorum Canonis Mirifici Descriptio" was published in 1614; and it is proposed to celebrate the tercentenary of this great event in the history of mathematics by a Congress, to be held in Edinburgh on Friday, July 24, 1914, and following days. The celebration is being held under the auspices of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, on whose invitation a general committee has been formed representing the Royal Society of London, the Royal Astronomical Society, the Town Council of Edinburgh, the Faculty of Actuaries, the Royal Philosophical Society of Glasgow, the Universities of St. Andrews, Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Edinburgh, the University College of Dundee, and many other bodies and institutions of educational importance. All who are interested are invited to communicate with the general secretary of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, 22, George Street, Edinburgh, and to announce their intention of being present.

REVIEWS

Verse—Humour and Satire

Sa Muse s'Amuse. By WILFRID BLAIR. (Blackwell, Oxford. 3s. 6d. net.)

Magenta Minutes. By SANDYS WASON. (Max Goschen. 2s. 6d. net.)

Aids to the Immortality of Certain Persons in Ireland. By SUSAN A. MITCHELL. (Maunsel and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

Book-keeping in Verse. By W. H. ARCH. (Effingham Wilson. 1s. net.)

Rubáiyát of a Minor Statesman. By G. W. SPARROW. (Heath, Cranton and Ouseley. 1s.)

Dislikes: Some Modern Satires. By CHARLES MASEFIELD. (A. C. Fifield. 1s. net.)

SEVERAL large and impressive volumes have been written by inquisitive and persevering psychologists in order to explain why we laugh, but most of us are more grateful to the man who shows us how to laugh. Whether he achieves this in prose or verse, by the art of the stage or in solitude, he leaves us warm-hearted and more in tune. If he is an unconscious humorist there will be a little disappointment in our laughter; but if he deliberately sets out to amuse us and succeeds, it will be unalloyed.

Mr. Blair's book, thus tested, is admirable. We shall regard it as twin-brother to "Dum-Dum's" little collection, "A Fool's Paradise"—and that, Mr. Blair will know, is extremely complimentary. He has the true Punch vein—a step above the level, shall we say, of the Westminster problem page?—the knack of the clever, unexpected rhyme which is part of the fun; and his blank verse on the theme of cricket is thoroughly entertaining. The story of "Bacchus and the Rabbits"—of an eleven that took the field after a tremendous lunch—is the best:

Mighty deeds were done,
And men told wondrous tales of glaring suns
That danced within their vision as they sought
To catch the ball (and yet they caught it oft),
While in the deep field's dim and distant bounds
They toiled amid strange foothills or were plunged
'Mid desperate clogging sands, and evermore
Pursued wild balls (imaginary most),
And collared them, and hurled towards the place
Where far-off multitudinous wickets stood.

The section entitled "Potted Parnassus" is good; it might give a hint upon how to spend a reprehensible but side-splitting evening when we find the following lines "made up" from Tennyson:

'Tis better to have loved and lost
A bitter barmaid waning fast,
Whose eyes are homes of silent prayer,
Than never to have loved at all
A daughter of the gods divinely tall
With a stony British stare.

Such things, we feel, ought not to be printed. "A Tennis Romance" and the epigrammatic stanzas on politics are capital, and there are many other good things, all raising the imp of laughter.

The sub-title of "Magenta Minutes" is "Nonsense Verses," and that best describes the book. But, alas! there is no magic in them—none of the fascination of the classic absurdities which prick us into irresistible chuckles by elevating the art of nonsense to genius. The best things in the book are not suited by the title; one is the story of "Binns" and a perambulator with "a brace of placid twins," the other is "Matthew Mark Boz"; both these are humorous verse and really funny. The interspersed "limericks" do not justify their composition.

In a defiant and fairly witty preface Miss Mitchell reviews her own book, which, we understand, is a new edition with added poems. "Certain Persons in Ireland" ought to be very interested in these pungent, satirical pages, but many persons in England will set them aside. The general appeal is hardly possible, as a few of the titles will serve to explain: "George Moore comes to Ireland"; "The Irish Council Bill, 1907"; "George Moore becomes the Priest of Aphrodite"; "Nursery Rhymes for Co-operative Babes"; and so on. The rhymes, however, are good, and occasionally the author hits the mark in quite a deadly fashion.

"Book-keeping in Verse" is rather a formidable little brochure. There are 150 stanzas in this style:

Again on line 2 you will trace
Liabilities all in their place;
There too you'll exhibit
Your gains without limit,
And then you'll fill in the next space.

We realise, of course, that this is a serious contribution to commercial education rather than humorous verse, but the result of reading it has been to ourselves fearful mental bewilderment. To the mathematical mind it may present fewer difficulties; but we would rather "keep" twenty books than have to commit this one to memory. There is not much more complimentary to say about Mr. Sparrow's parody of Omar. It is amusing for a moment; but it is very easy to write, and only genius could now be permitted to add another imitation, political or sentimental, to the tempting Oriental's numerous flock. Here is one quatrain which must serve as an example:

Come, fill the cup, and in the fire of spring
Th' election-garment of Repentance fling:
The Bird of Time has but a little way
To flutter—and your salary's on the wing.

Mr. Charles Masefield is on the wrong track in some of his "Dislikes"; he is too uncontrolled in his bitterness. Take the lengthy "Song for English Gentlemen," for one instance, with ten verses on this model:

We don't care much for moral worth,
Nor yet for powers of mind;
Respectability's all we ask—
If the purse be snugly lined;
Our standard's cash,
And who cuts a dash
He must be a gentleman.

In public all our virtues shine
As bright as the morning star,
But a woman compelled to go out by night
She finds what we really are;
Ah, well, one can't
Be a maiden aunt,
Though a chivalrous gentleman.

No reader needs to be told that this is libellous and wrong-headed. At the same time, the little book contains some very smart things. When the author restrains himself, or allows his keen sense of humour full play, he does excellent work; the ode to "The most widely read Poet of the day" (Miss Ella Wheeler Wilcox), interspersed cleverly with quotations, is really a piece of sharp and salutary criticism. And here is a neat comment on the restricted outlook:

I asked you "What do you think of Smith?
Has he a brain and has he a heart?
Is he a fellow of marrow and pith,
And what are his notions of Nature and Art?"

You stroked your hair, and you sleeked your clothes,
And you shuddered again as you made reply:
"I took no heed of such things as those;
He came to dine in a made-up tie."

Other first-class items are a remonstrance in blank verse on the receipt of a letter of condolence couched in conventional religious tones, and "A Musical Comedy Alphabet"; both of these are brilliant. We congratulate Mr. Charles Masefield on this volume; he should write more on the same lines, reserving his bitterest derision for offences that deserve it.

Shakespeariana

Shakespeare: The Man and His Work. By MORTON LUCE. (J. W. Arrowsmith. 3s. 6d. net.)

WE once met a man who had never written a book about Shakespeare. The reasons he gave for this omission were utterly unconvincing, but the pathos of his situation, which he himself felt as acutely as anybody, commanded our respect, so we shall draw a veil over the incident.

Mr. Morton Luce has given us some excellent essays on Shakespeare. There is a good deal that is new and a good deal that is old in his theories. He echoes the cry, "Back to the text," with heartiest conviction, and manages to act upon it efficiently himself. We use the word "echoes" advisedly; nobody nowadays sets out to write commentaries on Shakespeare without pre-missing, explicitly or implicitly, that the "text's the thing." Personally, we do not see the possibility of any other starting-point. Who would listen to theories notoriously built on other theories?

One of the essays is devoted, more or less exclusively, to the famous "Dark Lady." We have always found this personage singularly elusive, and it neither increases nor decreases our sum of happiness to learn from Mr. Luce that she was (as like as not) a wrinkled and unsightly old hag.

We are considerably more interested in the question of Shakespeare's morals and religion. Why it should be so we are uncertain. Mr. Luce appears to agree, as we certainly do, with Browning's dictum about Shakespeare unlocking his heart. But Mr. Luce shows such utterly sound sense on the subject of Shakespeare's philosophy of life that we recommend some of his essays even to those who have forsworn Shakespearean criticism for ever. Shakespeare said one thing one moment and the other the other. "Which did he mean?" asks Mr. Luce, latest adherent to the queue of questioners. "That which he says oftenest—that which the highest judgment of humanity has most repeatedly sanctioned"—is substantially his answer. "Nobody can be a Christian all the time," says a character in Mr. Shaw's last presentable play; but Shakespeare is a Christian the greater part of the time—that is, he is essentially a Christian; he mostly believes in morals and he mostly believes in free-will—therefore he essentially believes in them both. "When our friend," says Mr. Luce, "whom we know to be right-minded and stout-hearted, says, 'I feel as though I should like to put an end to myself,' we do not take him seriously; we are sure that an hour or two later we shall be hearing his 'Thank God for a good dinner,' which comes from his prevailing habit of mind." We would suggest that both elements are necessary; the man who could only make the second ejaculation would be only a degree less objectionable than the man who could only make the first. But Mr. Luce will probably agree.

Our latest Shakespearean critic gets plenty of fun out of his predecessors—their "hybrid ethics" and their glaring self-contradictions. We do not know how they could help themselves; the best minds, like the best races, are a mixture of many elements, and it is impossible to define Shakespeare. But we not only laugh, but agree, when Mr. Luce, at the close of a page or two of impaled inconsistencies, concludes: "The impression we seem to receive from these contradictions is that Bacchus was a teetotaller."

On the vexed question of the intrusion of morality into art Mr. Luce is by turns suggestive and bewildering. If we were to attempt to comment on his comments on former commentators who have tackled the subject we should merely be the latter. We will content ourselves with expressing our gratitude for the observation that, if certain premises were carried to their logical conclusion, Lady Macbeth would have to yield the palm of heroic greatness to "a pious and loving washer-woman."

North African History

Histoire Ancienne de l'Afrique du Nord. Tome I. By STÉPHANE GSELL. (Hachette and Co. 10 fr.)

IT is not given to everyone to be at the same time agnostic and entertaining. The latter is perhaps a poor word to apply to the first of six volumes destined to form a serious and definitive history of North Africa, but we must leave it for want of a better. If we have no views at all as to the true function and definition of history, we have, at least, very decided opinions as to the kind of history we want to read. M. Gsell makes us read him—that is to say, he is entertaining; and he is agnostic, as agnostic as can be, for he is not in the least afraid of saying, "I don't know"; in fact, he appears to be very considerably afraid of saying, "I do know," even when the train of induction seems to be impeccably laid. M. Gsell's "Nescio" is a triumphant refrain, recurring, on an average, once in every five pages of his learned five hundred. It takes all shapes, "from Máh to Máhi," but its essence is unchanging. "Nous pouvons le supposer, mais, à vrai dire, nous n'en savons rien"—is a typical conclusion; "c'est déjà beaucoup de pouvoir constater ces liens" between the North African and other populations—we must not attempt to build any sort of theory on these connections.

The present volume is divided into three books, of interest varying with the interests of the reader. The first deals with the physical geography of North Africa. It consists of five chapters, of which the first two, discussing respectively the national divisions of the country and its relations to Mediterranean civilisation and history, give rise to some interesting general considerations. M. Gsell, by an illuminating comparison with France, shows how North Africa suffers from its lack of cohesion and consistency. Its violent transitions make of it a country impossible to understand as a whole. In the history of civilisation, North Africa—Egypt being, of course, excluded from the discussion—is nothing but the parasite of the rest of the Mediterranean. Two of the remaining chapters deal with agricultural conditions and with the flora and fauna of the region. The latter chapter is full of interest, though some of it has overflowed into a neighbouring chapter on the climate of North Africa. It is curious to note that the buffalo was probably indigenous, likewise the elephant, whose disappearance is due to war, gladiatorial shows and the ivory trade, while the camel is a late-introduced exotic. We should like to dwell on that fabulous beast, the catoblepon, whose gaze was deadly, though, luckily, he kept it for the most part directed to the ground; that his breath was almost equally fell a slight knowledge of the camel tempts us to believe; the mention of this latter detail gives a certain probability to the existence of the animal.

The chapter on the climate of North Africa is an admirable example of M. Gsell's methods. The records of animal and vegetable life are minutely examined from every point of view, as well as historians of repute and disrepute. At one moment we seem to have caught the eminent author drawing a final conclusion—that the climate has changed; that, at any rate, from two to three thousand years ago, there was more moisture—with its consequences. But we read on for a dozen pages, and this is what we find: “Tels sont les arguments invoqués en faveur de l’hypothèse d’un changement de climat. On voit qu’ils méritent l’examen, mais qu’ils n’entraînent pas la conviction. En tout cas, ils ne prouvent pas que ce changement ait été profond.”

The second book deals with the primitive ethnology of the country, and carries us through the palæolithic, neolithic, and other obscure periods of humanity. It abounds in rejected conclusions. A most interesting question, propounded and examined, but not solved, arises out of the sporadic but pretty general existence of “blonds” among the semi-indigenous races of North Africa. In the matter of the Arab horse, M. Gsell hints at a disagreement with Professor Ridgeway, but it is only in a note, and he does not join issue.

The third book reaches historical ground. It deals with the Phœnician Empire and the foundation and rise of Carthage. M. Gsell distinguishes two clearly-defined periods of trade and colonisation—the Phœnician and the Carthaginian. The Phœnician seems to have been the dumper of the ancient world, and the story of his economic struggle with the Greek,

The young light-hearted master of the waves, has a curiously modern ring. M. Gsell thinks that much confusion has been due to a failure to understand that “Sidonian” was a generic term for the inhabitants of the Phœnician cities of the Levant. With pleasant perverseness, after all his sacrifices to the inexorable gods of historical criticism, he is disposed to leave us Dido as a living and historical figure. The famous voyage of Hanno is examined stage by stage, and the explorer is allowed, with almost startling generosity, to reach the neighbourhood of the Equator.

M. Gsell does not know who were the first inhabitants of North Africa—he does not know where they came from—he does not know what climatic conditions they lived under—he knows nothing about their language and little about their customs—he is vague about the Carthaginians—but behind this scaffolding of universal ignorance he has reared a palace of sound and desirable knowledge, and it is henceforth possible for us all to know a great deal, or, at any rate, all there is to know, about the mysterious origins of a mysterious country.

Among the early February books to be published by Mr. Murray is “Ten Minute Stories,” a collection of the best tales and sketches which Mr. Algernon Blackwood has written recently. Creepiness and quaintness, comedy and tragedy, are among the notes of this varied book.

A Fellowship in Poetry

Coleridge and Wordsworth in the West Country. By PROFESSOR W. KNIGHT. (Elkin Mathews. 7s. 6d. net.)

LITERARY geography is one of the most fascinating of studies, especially when it can be carried out in practical fashion by means of pilgrimages to the places studied. To read a poem in the midst of the surroundings which inspired its writing must add something to one's understanding, even if it does not help one to recapture “that first fine careless rapture.” The true literary pilgrim will need to be a poet himself, though but a mute, inglorious one, if he is to extract full profit from his pleasant travels. When one so well equipped as Professor Knight sets out on such a journey we expect the results to be more than usually profitable. Nor are we disappointed; for this book, though somewhat of a compilation, has both relevance and completeness. Readers of this journal will be interested to learn that one chapter originally appeared as an article in THE ACADEMY.

We have so long and so loosely used the term “the Lake poets” in speaking of Coleridge and Wordsworth that it is well for us to be made to realise that much of the earlier and most formative work of both was actually done in North Somerset. And but for the ludicrous and Gilbertian suspicions of their neighbours, who attributed to them the wildest revolutionary intentions, very much more might have been inspired by that district. Those who have not visited it will be enabled to realise something of its quaint beauty from the excellent illustrations of Mr. E. H. New, which are in his best well-known, daintily-clear manner.

All the available information concerning the period of the two poets' association, from 1795 to 1798, has been gathered into this volume, which will form a necessary addition to literary history. Here is recorded the beginning of that wonderful friendship between William and Dorothy Wordsworth, which has, says Professor Knight, “no parallel in the recorded literary history of the world. Where else is there the record of a tie so intense, so disinterested, so mutually helpful—unbroken by a single domestic incident or accident—so full of restful solace and inspiring stimulus, with an indebtedness the one to the other, that was scarcely a conscious possession, but a permanently abiding treasure? Their contemporaries—Charles and Mary Lamb, with Henrietta and Ernest Renan—are the only ones that approach them; but they follow at a very easily measurable distance.” The portion of Dorothy Wordsworth's journals reproduced in the volume helps us to understand how she was able to add her knowledge and observation of Nature to her brother's, so that both became available for his poetic work. The great events of her world were the budding of the first snowdrops, or some new aspect of the “horned moon.” Practically the whole of the journal at this time consists of a loving observation of Nature; and, strange to say, there is only one direct allusion to books.

One is glad that the memory of so worthy a man as Thomas Poole is not allowed to fade altogether. It was through his munificence and kindly offices that both poets were able to enjoy their association, while his library proved a most valuable aid to them. The whole story of the cottage at Nether Stowey is told here, including its purchase for the nation. Here, too, is an account of the genesis of "The Ancient Mariner," which, though recorded elsewhere, is conveniently added for the sake of completeness. Reminiscences by Hazlitt and others of these years are also given; and there are lists of the poems written in Somersetshire by both poets. A word of praise must be added for the style of the volume.

New Lamps for Old

Problems of Empire, The Faith of a Federalist. By VISCOUNT HYTHE, D.C.L. (Longmans, Green and Co. 5s. net.)

THE word "Federation" bids fair to become as blessed as the word "Mesopotamia." In these pages Lord Hythe has brought together speeches and essays, dating mostly from over ten years ago, bearing on the subject of Federation of the British Empire. It is evident that the point of view must have changed in some particulars since the earliest of these deliveries in 1892. Constitution-making is the easiest thing in the world—on paper, as the Abbé Sieyès showed at the time of the French Revolution. It is only when theories are reduced to practice that difficulties arise, and, the more complex the life of the community, the greater the difficulties when organic changes are made. The topics dealt with by Lord Hythe have become familiar to all newspaper readers since the problem of Irish Home Rule became acute, but it is right that they should be restated and insisted on, for it is only by constant iteration that the great mass of the public can be brought to think for itself, instead of taking its opinions ready made.

According to Lord Hythe, Federation of the Empire must be preceded by the creation of a federal system for England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales, though he fails to adduce any cogent reason for this view. Nor is it possible to agree with him that the two processes are identical. Federation of the Empire is a centripetal movement making for closer union and greater strength. A Federal system for the United Kingdom is centrifugal in its action, and makes for weakness and disunion. It was the union between England and Scotland in 1707 that enabled Great Britain to become a world-power, not the bringing together of the two kingdoms under one Crown a hundred years earlier. The first necessity of a Federal system is the financial independence of each unit in so far as its internal affairs are concerned; without financial independence there can be no political equality. But Wales and Ireland can never pay their own ways in internal matters and bear their proportionate share in the expense of Imperial affairs. Any arrangement that contemplates the permanent financing of Ireland and Wales by England and Scotland, together with the grant of an equal voice in the affairs of the United Kingdom, is doomed to failure.

It is true enough to say, as Lord Grey does, that our Parliamentary system has broken down; but no system, however perfect, will be a success without goodwill on the part of those who have to work it. How long would cricket continue to be a popular game if players claimed the right to alter the rules whenever they found the game going against them? The most urgent necessity at the present moment is to restore the Constitution with proper checks and balances; to put a stop to the corruption that has made so deep an inroad into public life of late years; to curb the extravagances of the party system which threaten to endanger our national existence; and for a resumption by the House of Commons of its proper functions as an assembly for the control of expenditure and for legislation. Lord Grey and Lord Hythe both rightly insist that no sound scheme for the Federalism of the United Kingdom can be evolved except by co-operation of all parties, a fact that the people of Great Britain and Ireland are likely to have brought home to them before long. The success of the framers of the United States constitution was entirely due to the fact that they were a gathering of men where "none were for a party and all were for the State," and to their recognition of the necessity of a system of checks and balances in a democratic as well as in a monarchical government.

"Don't go to Australia" is the advice given to his fellow public school-men by Mr. C. E. Jacomb, in a volume called "God's Own Country," which is about to appear through Mr. Max Goschen. Mr. Jacomb was educated at Harrow, and has been engaged in fruit-growing at Mildura, Victoria, for the past six years. He writes, therefore, with exceptional knowledge of his subject.

NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE

INSURANCE COMPANY.

Funds Exceed £23,000,000.

"An old and first class office. Low rates a distinctive feature."—The Times.

Chief Offices :—LONDON : 61 Threadneedle Street. EDINBURGH : 64, Princes Street.

The Haunted Palace

The Greatest House at Chelsea. By RANDALL DAVIES.
Illustrated. (John Lane. 10s. 6d. net.)

THE story of the house in which Sir Thomas More lived so happily and wisely with his many relations is a little like Edgar Allan Poe's poem—made material.

In the greenest of our valleys
By good angels tenanted,
Once a fair and stately palace—
Radiant palace—reared its head.
In the monarch Thought's dominion—
It stood there!
Never seraph spread a pinion
Over fabric half so fair.

Thus, allowing a little for hyperbole, the house seemed in the brave days when all its sixteenth century inhabitants were one sane, disciplined, and happy community. Its end was blank and tragic. Round about Sir Thomas' home

. . . . the glory
That blushed and bloomed,
Is but a dim-remembered story
Of the old time entombed.

The human interest that clings to the ruins or site of a vast building, once the home of generations of clever, important, lively, vicious, and seductive personages is a legitimate subject for the making of a book. But for this purpose a sympathetic and active imagination is as necessary as cautious historical research and abundant labour. In "our old house at Chelsea," as Mr. Randall Davies patronisingly calls the famous building which Sir Thomas More caused to be set up in the days of his greatness about 1520, and which that remarkable personage, Sir Hans Sloane, had demolished in 1740, lived many gay and important personages. Their histories are sketched, in little, by the author, who has, doubtless, worked hard with the intention of giving us of his garnered knowledge, and yet his result is not very engrossing.

The subject is hardly at fault, but it is possible that in dealing with some fourteen personages who have owned or lived in the house Mr. Davies has attempted to force too wide an area of interest into the limits of less than two hundred and fifty pages. His research is highly praiseworthy, but his subject has obliged him to pass so rapidly from one set of circumstances to another that we lose something of that sense of homogeneity which is essential to a work of art. This is not a serious drawback to the pleasure of reading "The Greatest House at Chelsea." But the desire of the author to quote at length the many unpublished letters which have been placed at his command occasionally suggests that the book is still in the stage of elaborate notes rather than the accomplished result of one who, fully informed on his subject, has set out to make it doubly interesting to his readers by passing his knowledge through the processes of his own mind. In reading his work we cannot but feel that Mr. Randall Davies might return again and again to the crowd of characters and points of history which he has so carefully studied, and give us many lighter and more engaging works upon an historic place and a long period with which he is evidently familiar. His volume is unusually well illustrated, particularly with reproductions of the well-known Holbein portraits of the More family. But the many owners who followed the famous founders of the "Greatest House" are well represented, and the plans and drawings of the building itself are of great interest. When one considers the large number of families who lived in this long since vanished mansion it will be realised that Mr. Davies has undertaken a very heavy work in writing its history, but that he is fully equal to the more material side of his adventure is proved again and again in many of his fascinating chapters.

A Religion and an Empire

Histoire des Arabes. By CL. HUART. Tome II.
With a Map. (Paul Geuthner, Paris.)

WE had occasion some time back to notice the first volume of Professor Huart's "Histoire des Arabes." The second volume, which completes the work, is considerably bigger than its predecessor. The whole forms a solid and valuable, if rather difficult, contribution to history. The difficulty is, no doubt, inherent in the subject, but it cannot be said that M. Huart has made our path smooth and easy. He is (again "no doubt") right in preferring as accurate as possible a transcription of Arab names to current European usage, but the result is depressing for the unlearned in Orientalism. Saladin, for instance, might easily be missed altogether by the rapid reader, so effective a disguise is his true clothing. It may be added that there is very little about Saladin at all, and less about Averroes, to mention only two of the great men we had expected to meet in these pages. The regiment of the obscure, or, we might almost say, of the irrelevant, so few of them have exercised any influence on the course of history, is, by compensation, immense. The style is difficult and the co-ordination of the different parts of the narrative defective.

The magnitude of M. Huart's task may best be realised by supposing a history of Christianity, or of Christianity mildly circumscribed in some particular way, say a history of European and Asiatic Christianity, written on the same lines. It would be a history of the world, with certain parts of the world left out; the omission would not decrease the labour, and it would add enormously to the danger of obscurity. Then, if we suppose, on the top of that, that every ruler in the Christian countries discussed is to have his share of mention, we have a glimpse of the terrors M. Huart has had to wrestle with.

The history of the Arabs is crowded with incident, but, except for some brilliant patches, it is not interesting. It has a sameness that European history can never emulate. Set aside the great moments of the Abbaside dynasty at Bagdad, or of the Abd-er-Rahmans at Cordova, and there is very little left but a succession of dynasties, and a succession of rulers within dynasties. From most of the Moslem world the idea of progress has been too rigidly excluded to allow much room for what we call history. The history of the Arabs has only a relative interest; when it comes into contact with European history it is interesting, sometimes passionately interesting. Islam, by its negation of the European ideal, has defined that ideal. Without Islam, quite apart from the influence of the Crusades and Arab services to the cause of learning, there might be no Europe.

Dwelling together in unity has never been a European virtue; nor has it been a Moslem virtue. The history of the Arab political system and of the Mohammedan religion is a record of differentiation. Moslem Revivalists and Moslem Protestantism are endemic. Struck by this consideration, a Mohammedan theologian has taught a doctrine that may be parodied into "With Whom (Allah) is perpetual variableness."

M. Huart's work is not to be recommended to the casual reader, but it will be a valuable recruit to the library. The whole subject is contained in it, and the index is very thorough. The single map appended is rather inadequate, and might have been supplemented.

Journalistic Science

Harmsworth Popular Science. Edited by ARTHUR MEE. 7 vols. (Educational Book Co. £3 2s. 6d.)

THIS work deals with the twelve sufficiently important subjects of "the Universe," "the Earth," "Life," "Plant Life," "Animal Life," "Man," "Health," "Power," "Industry," "Commerce," "Society," and "Eugenics." It does so, however, not by exhausting one subject before going on to the next in the ordinary way, but, so to speak, serially, every one of the first six volumes being divided into twelve compartments, each dealing with its particular subject. The effect of this is that if the reader wishes to know what the authors have to say about Life—which seems in their opinion to be something differentiated from Plant Life or Animal Life—he must run through the whole six volumes before he is seized of their lucubrations upon it. The reason for this stratification, which extends even to the Index, is not difficult to guess, but it cannot be said that it makes the task of the reader, or a fortiori, of the reviewer, an easy one.

We have said authors, because it is not immediately apparent by whom the articles are written. The title page contains a list of eleven names besides that of the editor, who are there described as "on the Contributing and Consulting Staff of Popular Science," and are, we gather, assisted by others. With the possible exception of a Radical Member of Parliament, who is supposed by his friends to be an authority on finance, and a professor in a veterinary college, these gentlemen are all more distinguished in the world of journalism than in that of science, and can hardly expect their remarks to be received as coming ex cathedra. Moreover, they have not hampered themselves, as writers in encyclopædias and other forms of "potted" knowledge generally do, by constant references to authorities or by bibliographies which may help the student to pursue further the sciences to which it is supposed they wish to introduce him; and, it may be said without want of charity, that they seem more attracted by the picturesque side of their subjects than by any profound investigation of them. The result of this is pretty much what may be expected. Stridency rather than accuracy or patient explanation seems to be the result aimed at, and what some would call fine writing and others gush abounds. One writer—or perhaps it is a syndicate—of the contributing staff succeeds repeatedly in accumulating four adjectives on the back of one wretched little noun; and the keynote is perhaps struck when the miraculous intervention of Providence is scouted with the remark, "as if everything were not miraculous!" It reminds us of Charles Kingsley's "old cock grouse" who, when disturbed by a boy running through the heather, rushes out shrieking that the end of the world has come, and when the supposed danger has passed, struts back to his wife and children announcing that the end of the world will certainly come to-morrow.

The general effect of this point of view is rather unequal. The anatomy and the physiology in the book are for the most part extremely well done, and in many places amount to a clear and careful explanation of facts. Nor does there seem much fault to be found with the astronomy and the geology, in which the vastness of the subjects excuses a few purple passages. On the other hand, there are many other matters quite as important as these which are either treated from one side only or slurred over altogether. Thus all notice of the neurones or brain-cells with which we are supposed to think is omitted, and while the theory of spontaneous generation, which now possesses but one distinguished supporter, is treated at some length, we hear very little about the latest investigations into the cause and cure of cancer. Gravitation, again—surely one of the most important problems before us in view of the development of flying-machines—is dismissed, so far as we can see, with the remark that it "is suspected by the leaders of modern physics to be electrical in origin and nature"; and nothing whatever is said about the equally great problem of the differences between positive and negative electricity, the solution of which might really, and not only in the cock-grouse sense of the phrase, transform the face of the world.

This brings us to the question of the accuracy of the statements made—or to speak by the card—shouted at us in the work. The curse of all encyclopædic writing or attempts to compress knowledge into a nutshell is that, despite all the efforts of the lightning press, most scientific hypotheses are old-fashioned if not abandoned before they have filtered through to the popularisers. Thus some time is wasted here over a description of the ether of space, in doubtless unconscious ignorance that the physicists likely to be best informed are beginning to think that it not only does not exist, but that there is no necessity for its postulation. So, too, we hear much about the unused natural forces at the disposal of mankind in the shape of waterfalls, without any notice that the direct use and storage of solar heat may, in the opinion of many, do away before long with the necessity of resorting to them. These are two instances where the information of the writers appears to be in their own phrase hardly up to date. There are others where it is better described as inaccurate. The statement that consumption "kills one in eight of all mankind" is grossly exaggerated, especially in view of the diminution of the virulence in the type of the disease now beginning to be noticed. Electricity, again, is certainly not, as is said here, "a form of energy," although it may be a form of matter. The electrical articles in the work, indeed, seem to us to be more carelessly done than some of the others, and in one place resolve themselves into an interview with the director of a sufficiently advertised laboratory. Why the author of them, for instance, should always speak of a Crookes tube or tube having a high vacuum as a "cathode tube," we have no idea. On Eugenics, again, there are many words, but no facts. This is, perhaps, not the writers' fault, since the time that has elapsed since the birth of this so-called science has not been long enough for their collection. We shrewdly suspect that, but for Sir Francis Galton's legacy catching the eye of the popular Press, it would hardly have been included in the volumes before us.

These strictures do not mean that the work is useless. We have kept to the last our appreciation of its main excellence, which no sins against taste or scholarship can much diminish. This is the number and scope of the illustrations which abound on every page, and which appeal directly to that great and rapidly increasing class which are desirous of acquiring knowledge rather by gazing at pictures than by reading books. We have, first of all, diagrams showing such matters as the growth of cells in animals and plants, the wrinkling of the earth's crust, and strange forms of life, which can be understood at a glance either with or without explanation. Then there are larger pictures of industries like those of oilfields and mines which save pages of description, and really bring their respective scenes vividly before us. Lastly, we get plates, sometimes in colours, reproducing such incidents as the discovery of the stethoscope by Laennec; others, including the well-known works of Abbey, more strictly historical, and yet others, allegories of the Protection of Life by Science and so on, by pens and brushes as yet unknown to fame. These, like the articles, are of very unequal value, many being of intrinsic worth, while others appear to be merely clap-trap. Yet all are well adapted to their purpose of catching the attention of those with no real attraction to their subjects, and who are too busy, too indolent, or too unaccustomed to study to find out the story they tell from more recondite sources. This work, indeed, bears the same relation to a serious book of science that a "cinema palace" does to a theatre where either the works of great tragedians or problem-plays are performed. Anyone who reads it, and who is thereby attracted to any branch of study of which he or she had before no conception, will, it is to be hoped, be led thereby to turn first to some of the encyclopædias which give more detailed information, and from those to the original works of which some sort of catalogue is attempted in the bibliography to be found at the end of the work. The volumes before us are, in short, a shoeing-horn to knowledge, rather than knowledge itself; and if, as we imagine, this was the conscious aim of their projectors, their purpose is admirably carried out.

F. L.

Mr. Heinemann will publish this week a translation by Mr. Teixeira de Mattos of Louis Couperus' brilliant novel, "Small Souls," describing aristocratic life at The Hague. The book appears at an opportune time, as a committee has lately been formed in Holland to arrange for the official celebration of the distinguished novelist's fiftieth birthday. "Small Souls" will be issued simultaneously in New York by Messrs. Dodd, Mead.

Mr. Herbert Jenkins will open his Spring Publishing Season with "Seaborne of the Bonnet Shop," a novel by R. K. Weekes. On February 12 he will publish "The Heart of the Moor," by Beatrice Chase, to which he has prefixed an introductory note telling how a publisher and four trusty "readers" were deceived as to the truth by a woman living in Devon.

An important Exhibition of Paintings, Drawings, Engravings, and Colour Books by William Blake is opened at the galleries of the Whitworth Institute, Manchester, on Friday this week, at 8 p.m., by A. G. B. Russell, Esq., of London. This is the first occasion of showing a representative collection of the works of the poet-painter in the North of England.

THE Libraries, Museums and Art Galleries Year Book 1914 is the Manual of Professional Practice. But it is more than this. It tells every Bookman; every educationist; every student where special collections of Books on his particular subject are to be found throughout the country, and how to borrow from them. It also tells him where Special Museum collections are to be found, although these cannot be borrowed.

It is a key to unlock the collected,
Knowledge of the country.

Get the Book: get it somehow. You want it.
Buy or borrow the Book: but do not beg for it, nor steal it.

470 p. crn. 8vo. 8/6 net.

Stanley Paul & Co., 31, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

Shorter Reviews

Amazing New York. By MARY M. BROWN. (Andrew Melrose. 1s. net.)

THE impressions of a stay in New York are very pleasantly set down in this little volume by a lady who was observant, fairly critical, and eager to see all that she could in the time at her disposal. The most interesting and most valuable chapters are those devoted to "The New York Woman" and the home-life, with a description of the working of the "Children's Court," where juvenile offenders against the law are treated kindly and judiciously. It is surprising to read of the crimes committed by small boys—one little chap was accused of forging his father's name; another of "holding up" a little girl in the street and robbing her; another of stealing a watch; a fourth of "being found on private premises with burglarious intent." Mrs. Brown is full of admiration for the humanity and good sense displayed by those who have to deal with these difficult matters. Her book may not carry much weight, in the face of so many authoritative writings by those who have had more opportunities and wider experience, but it is well worth reading, in spite of the fact that it originally appeared in the form of articles for the daily Press.

The New Punto Tagliato Embroidery Supplement. Illustrated. By L. and R. TEBBS. (Chapman and Hall. 7s. 6d. net.)

THOSE who are in possession of the previous book dealing with this fascinating and beautiful embroidery will be certain to purchase the present volume. It is, of course, assumed that the details of the many systems have been mastered from perusal of "The New Punto Tagliato Embroidery"; therefore no space is wasted with unnecessary elementary descriptions in the Supplement, the whole of the pages being taken up with new patterns and designs, all of which are profusely illustrated. One great beauty of the work is that a person is not confined to one kind of material upon which she has to work, or limited with regard to the silk or cotton she must use. Cambric, linen, silk, cloth, velvet, or sacking can all be utilised, while, mingled with the many shades of floss, the gold and silver threads give the articles the lovely Oriental colouring. Some of the most beautiful specimens are the "Virginia Creeper Portière" and a "Cover for Sideboard or Oak Chest." In these two examples the stitches are worked with silk the same colour as the background, with very effective results. There are also many illustrations of stitches for insertions, circles, and other spaces, appliqué trimmings and various fillings. The book does its compilers, Misses Louisa and Rosa Tebbs, great credit, and should result in extensive sales.

Régner: Poèmes. By LEON DEUBEL. With a preface by Louis Pergaud and a portrait of the author. (Mercur de France. 3 fr. 50.)

WE are diffident of expressing a valuable opinion on the work of Léon Deubel. The frontier-line between genius and pretension has never been very clearly defined, and foreign arbitration is in this sphere singularly valueless. Moreover the poets who die young rather complicate matters by the "argumentum ad hominem." We have always felt, in this connection, that Chatterton is rather a symbol than a reality; is there any Chatterton that is worth reading? Léon Deubel died last year by his own hand, at an early age. Some of his poems arrest attention at once. They are not revolutionary; their form is almost classical. They are full, of course, of lust and death and the sad lot of the poet. Deubel has himself indicated in his letters to M. Pergaud the two poems that most expect admiration—"Le Tombeau du Poète" and "Souvenir"—both sonnets. The former ends on what seems—we speak as a fool—an undoubtedly fine line.

Il reprit le chemin blasphémé du soleil !

As to the other sonnet, it is Ronsard revised, but "on verra qu'il faut être aussi véritablement poète que je le suis pour avoir trouvé des variations absolument différentes." Is this pride justified? It is another form of the original question.

We are ashamed to say it, but we are always a little shy of the enthusiasms of the Mercur de France. Mercury is what they put on the backs of mirrors, and the Mercur and its contributors live in an atmosphere of self and mutual admiration. Well, perhaps the world suffers most from the opposite fault.

The New Schoolmaster. By "Fourth Form." (Smith, Elder and Co. 6s. net.)

ALTHOUGH "Fourth Form" states that the really important matter in education is in "the power of thought and understanding, and mental equipment acquired for after-life," it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that his outlook is "Fourth Form" still. The schoolmaster appears on every page. This is natural enough, and we should not quarrel with the position if we could determine anything definite of value in his suggestions for reform. He says that a better organisation is needed—that is, "a common authority with a mind of its own and the means of carrying it into effect." This is not supplied by the Head Masters' Conference, which merely expresses pious opinions and suffers from dead inertia. Inspection is therefore put forward as a general panacea, but we hope it will be a long day before the great public schools lose their individuality in co-ordinate organisation ruled by Government inspection. "Fourth Form" would like to see the Head Masters' Conference so reformed that all "resolutions should be mutually binding," while the Board of Education might have "a power of veto on their decisions." A like reform should be effected for the private preparatory schools, supplemented, too, by regular and universal inspection. Then the outlook of public schoolmasters should be enlarged, and, particularly, definite professional training should be established, instead of the present system of taking untrained men because they have a high Honour degree. But it is quite possible for the trained professional teacher to have a narrow outlook, and to work in a narrow groove of professionalism. Of this there is already plenty of evidence. At the same time, the idea of student-teachers is good, but very difficult to carry out in practice. We have not much faith in the psychological teacher, so largely exploited in modern works on education. There is too great a tendency nowadays for analytical self-consciousness to take the place of sound common sense. Of this over-consciousness, not unmixed with some sentimentality, there is not a little in this book. When all is said and done, there is but a small residuum of effective practical reform suggested, though the author's animus against compulsory Greek and Latin is evident enough. Nor can we consider proven the charge against the Public Schools of "constant and systematic failure" in their preparation of boys for the business of life. "The New Schoolmaster's" ideas of education apparently do not include religion.

Stories of India, Moral, Mystical, Spiritual and Romantic. By ROSE REINHARDT ANTHON. (Wm. Heinemann. 6s.)

THESE thirty-one short stories are specimens of the literature in which Hindoos delight. The authoress obtained them from one of the most authoritative teachers of Hindoo wisdom, a gooroo. In many of them there is the vein of religion which dominates the thoughts of Oriental peoples. They are not exactly what we regard as fairy-tales, but they constantly turn on exhibitions of supernatural agency. Chiefly, they tell of Maharajas and Rajas, their doings, lapses, and repentances; of the doctrine of Karma, of Yogis, hermits and ascetics, refugees to the Himalayas; of birds and animals, and simple incidents of Eastern domestic life; of Princesses and other women.

A tribute is paid to feminine beauty and virtue, to the influence and fortitude of women, while their failings are not ignored. In some respects the stories would appeal to children, but there are ideas and allusions above young minds, such as to Krishna and Kali, and pagan beliefs of peoples to whom "miracles are as natural as the air they breathe, and wisdom and poetry is the speech of their daily living," to whom "the doings of the gods are incomprehensible and beyond understanding, and the gods are never far from those who love much and whom they love well." Two points will probably strike the reader. First, the radical aversion of the Hindoo reciter to the Mahomedans, as evidenced in the story of Meera Bai, and in the last of the book; and, second, the racial animosity to "the white Siren," a young Englishwoman who seduced a young Raja from his attachment to his devoted wife, to the ruin of the house. It may be hoped that this was a solitary, if not an imaginary, instance. The regard for Hinduism, on the part of the gooroo, is natural; otherwise, the stories will be appreciated for their novelty and freshness, and for the insight they afford into the Indian mind.

Waves of Sand and Snow, and the Eddies Which Make Them. By VAUGHAN CORNISH. Illustrated. (T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. net.)

MOST people with any qualities of observation have noticed the regular ranks of "waves" or ripple-marks left in the sand when the tide has ebbed from a wide estuary, or even on a quiet beach. They are fascinating—all Nature's patterns are—and many of us have wondered how they are formed, whether they are permanent, and why they should be so regular. To answer these questions has been Mr. Cornish's principal pursuit for several years; in the endeavour he has travelled half over the world, measuring and watching the movements of sand-waves in Egypt, observing the behaviour of snow-drifts and snow-ripples from end to end of Canada, studying the seismic waves of the great earthquake at Kingston, Jamaica, in 1907, and the "gravitation-waves" in volcanic rock on the route of the Panama Canal, making notes on the ways of sand at Bournemouth, and visiting the estuaries of our rivers, always well equipped with keen eyes and a fine camera. The result of all this application is before us in a remarkable book, as interesting as the same author's volume on "Waves of the Sea"—and that is high praise. Some of these phenomena are created by wind-force, others by water; perhaps the most curious pages are those which deal with the variation of height and movement, as the wind rises or falls, in the sand-waves near Cairo.

Mr. Cornish treats of several other matters in this book—the strange "snow-mushrooms" of the Selkirk Mountains, British Columbia, for instance; he is always careful to write lucidly and to avoid technicalities which might bother the reader who has not specialised on the same themes; and his illustrations—88 photographs, 30 diagrams, and two maps—are excellent. The book is a splendid stimulant to the reasoning powers, and whoever reads it will have learned a fresh language—a language which will give him a key to one more of those wonders which hitherto he had passed by either with indifference or with ignorant admiration.

A Memorial Exhibition of the work of the late Sir Alfred East, R.A., P.R.B.A., R.E., will be held early in February at the Leicester Galleries, Leicester Square.

Fiction

Temperaments

Jacob Elthorne. By DARRELL FIGGIS. (J. M. Dent and Sons. 6s.)

THESE are signs of the times in the prevalence of the lengthy novel of autobiography, wherein the hero, or villain—we are not always sure which he is—takes us confidentially through memories of his childhood, button-holes us for a relation of his youthful escapades, reveals to us his sin-speckled middle age, and from the peak of maturity dismisses us with suspicions that we have not really read every word. Sometimes, indeed, he takes one whole book for childhood and threatens us with several others later on. In the present instance one volume suffices; Jacob Elthorne tells his story, for the most part lucidly and carefully, and the result is that we read more than three hundred pages of this closely printed novel with unqualified pleasure.

The school-days of young Elthorne, the fights, the various masters, the grim, unsympathetic head, form a lively introduction; but it is when the raw lad enters the city office of his extraordinary uncle that his development begins to grip the reader. Ramsay, who was to remain his friend through life, gives him a copy of "Sartor Resartus," and that starts his mind on its persistent quest. His marriage is at first happy. Desirous of better things, yet not discontented, he and his Rhoda live in small rooms, he busy at his writing—for he has felt the call of his ideals and answers it—she helping him in many ways, and typing his ambitious semi-philosophical books. The books bring in little, and presently the discovery is made that Rhoda has the knack of writing "popular" stories. This is the pivot of the action. Between them, under an assumed name, they turn out these remunerative novels, he polishing her work and refusing to touch her money. When she can stand alone, he is at liberty to resume his own quiet, introspective books; but her notions are not his; he detests her "sloppy" fiction; taunts, reprimands, reconciliations, and a final quarrel follow. She leaves him, and he returns to Ireland, the land of his birth, to live alone, happy in the friendship of the lowly folk who love him, contented to forget the past.

So far, so good. To this point we read, fascinated; the whole conception is real and convincing. From this, however, for the concluding hundred pages, we follow Elthorne's doings with disappointment. We shall not detail the remainder of the story; suffice it to say that the hero's experiences seem to have changed him into an irritating, turgid person whose "spiritual development" leads him into a rather unpleasant love affair. It is an abrupt descent from the fine level of the previous part of the book. The author possibly meant it to be so; if his hero thus ran away with him, we have nothing more to say.

There are passages of much beauty in this novel; there are brief, keen sentences packed with thought and insight. Sometimes Elthorne is annoying, as when he tells his wife about his fifth book: "it's I, because it's better than I am, more than I am; the substance of what it wishes to deliver will concern man, in my faith, through all the progress of his eternal destiny." He must have been a difficult person to live with. Ramsay is made to say, as Elthorne appears unexpectedly at his rooms one day, "Unexpected pleasures generally contribute in fruition what they lose through lack of anticipation"—which we refuse to accept, for Ramsay, being a thoroughly nice fellow, would have been far more likely to say, "Hello, old chap—how jolly to see you!" However, these are not very important matters; the main thing is that Mr. Figgis has written a good novel, with more thought than action—as is now the fashion—and has made the greater portion of it a clear, convincing study of a difficult type of idealist.

The Flying Inn. By G. K. CHESTERTON. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

IN these latter days the novel—once defined as "a smooth tale, generally of love"—has been put to some strange uses. Many readers gladly accept it as an agreeable substitute for the pulpit. Mr. Chesterton finds it convenient, if not as a pulpit, at least as a rostrum. "The Flying Inn" is the very reverse of a "smooth" tale; and the element of love would appear to have been added as an after-thought. But it is an attack—brilliant, sustained, and relentless—on everything that its author most dislikes. Vegetarianism, teetotalism, Parliamentarianism, the higher criticism, model villages for model workmen, that fantastic fondness for the lower animals which is generally known as "humanitarianism"—all these things, and the things that are like unto them, come in for their due share of castigation. Waving aloft his standard—in this case it is a public-house sign—Mr. Chesterton appears as the prophet of a new crusade. To a wicked and perverse generation, a generation fed upon fads and nourished upon nonsense, he proclaims the new and startling gospel of Common Sense.

The plot of the book—if one may legitimately use the word "plot" in connection with a story whose charm lies largely in its very discursiveness—is characteristic. A member of the governing classes—one Lord Ivywood—has brought home from the East a belief in Mohammedanism. This belief he succeeds in imposing upon the English people with the assistance of Misysra Ammon, a diverting Turkish lecturer. One of the results of the new régime is that the sale of alcoholic liquors is prohibited, except in such public-houses as have a sign-board attached. And the Government have waged a relentless war on sign-boards. There is, in fact, only one left—the sign of the "Old Ship" at the little village of Pebbleswick-on-Sea. Then appears upon the scene that herculean figure, Captain Patrick Dalroy. In Dalroy, England is fated to meet her new St. George. Accompanied by Humphrey Pump (the landlord of the "Old Ship"), a huge cask of rum, an enormous cheese, and the dog named Quoodle, Dalroy tours England in a motor-car, planting the sign-board of the "Ship" before various houses, and dispensing rum to grateful crowds. The story ends with the final overthrow of Mohammedanism and the return of England to a creed of sanity.

By far the best things in the book are the lyrics with which it is freely interspersed. And perhaps the best of these is the "Song of the English Drunkard." Here is the first stanza:

Before the Roman came to Rye or out to Severn strode,
The rolling English drunkard made the rolling English road.

A reeling road, a rolling road, that rambles round the shire,

And after him the parson ran, the sexton and the squire;
A merry road, a mazy road, and such as we did tread
The night we went to Birmingham by way of Beachy Head.

A song like that simply clamours for music. It has the swing and the spirit of genuine folk-verse. But, indeed, the whole book abounds in good things that will be welcomed by all who have come to recognise in Mr. Chesterton an invigorating force in English literature.

The Making of an Englishman. By W. L. GEORGE.
(Constable and Co. 6s.)

IN the closely printed pages—nearly 400—of this novel there is comparatively no description of scenery, no flights into metaphor. Mr. George has required all the space to depict the Englishman as seen through French spectacles, and he has done it well, although in some cases the native-born Britisher may complain that the author has drawn his conclusions from exceptional rather than typical cases. The story is autobiographical; Lucien Cadorese, a hot-blooded, energetic Frenchman from Bordeaux, comes as foreign correspondent to an English shipping firm in London, and from the day of his entry into the business he has one object in view—to become an Englishman. His—may we call it?—evolution is a long but by no means dreary affair. The way he stumbles against custom, tradition, methods of business, and even love-making forms for the reader a series of amusing disasters. And Lucien, with his perseverance, is so ready to acknowledge his failures, so eager to seek advice and try again that it is not possible to feel anything but sympathy for him. At the same time it must be acknowledged that it is in his description of the Englishmen that the author's best work is to be found. Two examples only of English girls are given with any detail, and one of them, the loud, forward, callous, and horribly ungrammatical daughter of the "genteel" people with whom Lucien boards is not at all characteristic of her class. Edith, the gentle, refined, and docile child of the prosperous City merchant, is well drawn; but where is the maiden of courage and resource, of energy and spirit, not only capable of giving the peace of Eden, but also of waging the maddest war when necessary?

The Waters of Lethe. By DOROTHEA GERARD.
(Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

THIS story of the brothers Viktor and Max is that which Ouida told of the brothers Cecil in "Under Two Flags"; it is a story of a weak younger brother that has been told half a hundred or more times since Ouida's novel, and in a great many cases the telling has been better done than it is here. Since this author has so often shown herself capable of giving us work of more than common interest, we feel entitled to an outspoken grumble at such a book as this from her pen, for it is gloomy to a point; it strains our credulity by going beyond inevitability, and it is marked by fictional tricks which destroy its reality. The strong elder brother who suffers in silence, even unto imprisonment, is a far too familiar type; his kind went out with Merriman, who knew how to portray him without making him a puppet. The weak younger brother, again, is not effective; we feel that he has been made to order and turned out before completion, for he fails to convince by reason of his slightness—as a character he needed far more lining-in to make him distinct and real.

There is relief at the end of this gloomy story, after the death-bed scene in which the younger brother lies in the limelight, but, on the whole, it is a tragedy of a machine-made type, and neither tragedy nor comedy will stand the drawback of visible mechanism. Having read far better and more attractive works by the same author, we protest against this lapse into unnecessary gloom, and more earnestly do we protest against such a mechanical plot. And, protesting, we look for better things to come from Mme. de Longgarde's pen.

Dottorressa Maria Montessori (author of "The Montessori Method") has consented—in response to many requests from Italy, England, America, France, Germany—to give an International Training Course for Teachers in her Method of Education as applied to young children. The complete course will take four months. There will be thirty lectures on Theory, thirty hours of practice work and fifty hours of observation in "Children's Houses." The lectures will be given in Italian, but will afterwards be read in English and French. At the end of the course an examination will be held, and diplomas given to those who are deemed capable. This training course will be under the patronage of Her Majesty the Queen Mother of Italy.

Among the Eskimos

ON the roof of the world is the Eskimo country. Few are its flowers; of trees there are none; illimitable are its summer muskegs and its eight-month winter snows. Yet the Eskimo is as jovial a soul as any that ever came from Southern lands where life is a joy. He is a humorist, although he feeds on blubber and rotten fish; a sportsman, although he knows not soap and water; and a good fellow, although the shiftless Cree despises him and calls him, in insult, "husky."

Scattered over a wide area of the North, living in tribes distinguishable to the traveller by slight linguistic differences and local habits and customs, the Eskimos from Greenland to the west coast of Hudson Bay are one and the same people. They have the same physical characteristics, live in much the same way, and think much the same thoughts on hunting and life and their visitors the white men. Even the fierce Nechilliks and Iglulik of the far, far North, with whom the various trading companies deal, as a rule, through other tribes acting as middle-men, have the same taboos, Angekoks, or witch-doctors, and quaint legends.

Stunt, squat men, seldom averaging over five feet and a half, they are muscular and strongly built, but slow of limb and mind. With their curious slanted eyes and inflated nostrils, they are a people of dirt and laughter. The heavy black hair is worn by the males over the shoulders to protect their large ears. Across their thick lips comes the flash of perfect but discoloured teeth. Such is the Eskimo gentleman—the real lord of the North. As for the Eskimo belles, they, too, have their virtues. Beauty is a question of taste, and probably the Eskimo would not exchange his flat-faced, strong and sturdy mate, with dark brown eyes and natural bust, for the fairest chorus girl. Very often, too, when these girls have European blood in them, their looks are far from uncomely.

But to arrive at a real understanding of the Eskimos you must spend a year at least among them; only thus can you arrive at a complete picture of their strange life, wherein trains and banks and offices and telephones have no part. Like all primitive races, they are a nomadic people living under the bright stars. So you may see an Eskimo's health, wealth and content; so, too, you may face starvation and hardship with him; and, again, you may watch the wages of the civilisation that leave him robbed of furs, pillaged of livelihood, and branded with disease.

The Eskimo lives by the chase, for he neither ploughs nor farms. By means of the chase come his food and raiment and the fuel that is to warm him through the long Northern winter. His winter mansion is the igloo, or snow-house; his summer home a tupik, or tent of seal and deer-skins. When the days of the North begin to lengthen in January come the Eskimo's hard times. For two months or more life is a burden, intolerable and bitter, yet fiercely clutched at for all its uncertainty. The ice is storm-seized, and the seals on which the Eskimo depends keep out in the open water. It is in this season the Southern Eskimo strikes his annual trail for the trading post, where he will barter a winter's pelts for ammunition, tobacco and white men's baubles. First, provisions for the way must be found, and at no other time are they so hard to secure. So it comes to pass that, with a little deer-meat reserved over from the autumn, and with a scant stock of seal, the company sets forth. The long, narrow komatiks are lashed, the dogs harnessed to them, and the trail goes on in stages. Generally, two or three families make them together. An old woman leads the way. Then come the dogs and the sleds, while scouting on each side wander the men in search of seal-holes on the ice. The short day wanes, and a small snow-house has to be built from a convenient hummock. A veteran tests the snow of the neighbourhood with his knife. The drift must be a single storm's work, for then the snow is more compact. An oblong hole about five feet long, two or three feet wide, two feet deep is next cut; blocks are then taken from its clean face. Each block is six inches thick, a foot and a half deep and about two and a half long. One man wedges the blocks and another builds them round in a circle the size of the intended house. The first layer completed, the blocks are cut downward diagonally so that the next layer will take a spiral form and continue to cave up until the dome is closed by a keyblock. Women mortice the chinks with soft snow. The door is cut, and inside, opposite, is piled the snow-bed; outside, a wind-shield of blocks protects the door from a drift. It is now the women's task to make the place home within, while the husky braves feed their dogs.

On the bed-pile go mats of closely-woven willow branches, then deer-skins and deer-skin sleeping-bags. The soapstone lamp is lighted and placed on a snow shelf between the door and bed. In it a wick of dry, pulverised moss is fed with deer-fat or seal-blubber; the kettle is slung over it. The sleds outside are denuded and the dogs bedded. The most valuable sleds are ivory-shod; otherwise, they have whalebone runners. During the cold months these are sheeted with muck and frozen, to lessen friction, and for this the ice coating is renewed daily. The Eskimos now set their traps and go in for the night. So the trail goes on day after day, night after night, until in two months or so they come to the lonely traders of the North. Furs are given in and counters on a graded scale received—a white fox counting as one skin and some silver foxes as much as forty. The Eskimos then hand over the counters their tokens for the white man's plug tobacco, his killing powder and shot, and his needles and fish-hooks, and whatever the trader can attract them with.

For a while they hang round the post, always trading in their best clothes. But at the first sign of mild weather they migrate North again, now in large bands, on the cracking ice, where seals are in plenty near fissures. Eskimo life now is a sweet thing. It is the time of plenty; the famine is over; and the seals, basking in herds on the sun-bathed ice, would fain think the same, until the stalking Eskimo ends their dream with the bark of a bullet. It is a merry time and lasts till May. But now the days, cold and cloudy and of drifting snow, are done. Sometimes a river is beginning by June to look black, as though the water was rising through the ice and honey-combing it. By this time those who are bound inland for the summer have gone. With the melting days, igloo life is unbearable; roofs leak and have to be daily patched. The filth begins to smell offensively and germinate. It is the period of trial before the summer. The seal slaughter is a race carried on by the men with the disappearing ice.

Meanwhile, the women are repairing tents, bags, and kyaks with the skins. Skins are being rotted for winter boots; wardrobes are being fitted out and renewed. Above all, the kyak, or narrow Eskimo boat with sharply pointed ends, must be made good for summer use. In the main, this boat is always the same, though there are tribal peculiarities about its bow or stern or width. It is a skin boat with an oval well in it. The frame is made of thin strips of wood, forming the gun-wales and keelson, kept in place by light ribs about a foot apart. The mechanical skill with which it is fitted can be judged from the fact that there is not a single nail in it, wooden pegs and sinew lashings holding it taut. When the frame is finished all the women at the camp join in sewing on the sealskin cover, for the task must be done at a sitting, before the skins dry. The seams are made with a double lap and are quite water-tight. Drying, the skin shrinks, and is as tight as a drum over the frame.

The month of June is as happy a season for Eskimos as it is for brides with us. For once, in the North it is fine. Ducks and geese have flown to Northern latitudes. The Eskimo paddles away in his kyak as happy as the ducks, to harpoon the schools of white porpoise that attempt to steal up the larger rivers. The Arctic salmon teem in the shallows; sea-birds lay their eggs in myriads. Seals are found in open water, walrus drift round on ice-chunks, and deer come down to the coast.

By the end of August the Eskimos have left the coast, going inland with their seal-skins full of seal or porpoise oil. Their goal is the barren grounds where the caribou collect in September for mating, before they go South. Here the Eskimo stays till the first snow falls and the dog-sleds can haul out the meat and skins. But, as the snow is soft, it often takes till well past Christmas before the coast is again reached and the new trip to the trader's post is taken, beginning a new Eskimo year.

Ottawa.

BERNARD MUDDIMAN.

Messrs. Chatto and Windus will publish very shortly a book by Mr. Clive Bell, entitled "Art," a work which deals with the visual art of all ages, but has special reference to Post-Impressionism and the newer art movements of the day, and includes what may prove to be a novel theory of æsthetics. Miss Mabel Ince's new novel, "The Commonplace and Clementine," will be published immediately by the same firm.

Music

THE production of "Parsifal" at Covent Garden should serve to set at rest two questions which have arisen in connection with Wagner's last opera, and the answer to them ought not to be interesting to professedly musical people only. What will be the attitude of the Perfect Wagnerians, those for whom Wagner was a being more than mortal, one whose gravely expressed wish deserved to be regarded almost as a divine command, what will be their action now that Wagner's behest has been set at nought, the sacred privilege of Bayreuth invaded, the unique opera given in an ordinary theatre, in a worldly city such as London? Twenty, nay ten years ago, we should have had from the stricter sect of the Wagnerian devotees a protest of the most impassioned kind. Thus to violate the dying testament of the Master would be as the violation of a grave. It was unthinkable that "Parsifal" should ever be laid hold of by common hands. Would not the right feeling of European nations at any rate protect them from the commission of such a crime? As for America, it was unhappily too probable that some attempt would be made there to infringe the rights of Bayreuth, and perhaps one could not be certain about France, a country where they neither fear God nor regard man. But in Germany, in England, surely "Parsifal" would be safe from the spoiler? One thing, however, might be counted upon. No loyal pilgrim to the shrine of Bayreuth would ever perjure himself by going to see "Parsifal" in an unauthorised theatre. There would be a general movement of indignation among the true Wagnerians; they would boycott all sacrilegious performances of the prohibited opera, and financial loss and disaster would certainly fall upon the wicked managers who had dared to transgress the musician's command.

Such language has been repeated over and over again in our hearing by ardent spirits on their return from the annual journey to Bayreuth. But, of late, since the production of "Parsifal" all over Germany, in France, in Italy and in England became inevitable, their denouncing voices have been silent. We know, indeed, of several persons, formerly of the most fanatic temper, who have been so backsliding as to take seats for the Covent Garden performances, and we suspect that our friends are not in a minority. We will, however, wait and see.

The more interesting of the two problems now in course of solution is this: Will "Parsifal," when divested of the magic veil of sanctity which enwrapped it at Bayreuth, make the same effect upon the minds of the impressionable which it used to among the hills of Bavaria? Will devout Wagnerians who hear it now for the first time come out into Bow Street with swelling hearts and moistened eyes? Will musicians find the opera as marvellous as they thought it before, now that they have experience of it in a new environment? That the power and beauty of a great deal of it can be lost we do not believe. But we are prepared for admissions even by perfect Wagnerians that there is some measure of alloy in the gold of their idol. We hope that whatever people may say of "Parsifal" will be said with sobriety and consideration. If we are not to hear the ecstatic praise to which the majority of Bayreuth pilgrims have accustomed us, at any rate let us be spared any unkind or uncourteous criticism from those modernists who have grown up to years of musical discretion since the days when no one was safe from the infection of "Wagner fever." Fault may be found with everything, even with "Parsifal"; but it is a monument, a memorial of such greatness as the world does not too often see; a work that could have been conceived by none but a master of gigantic mind and force. By all means let it be approached with candour, but not with any desire to deface it.

It was with unfeigned sorrow that we read the announcement that Mr. Henschel, after his next recital, will give no more concerts in London. There have been times when we have not enjoyed his singing, when we have had to disagree with his interpretations. But his influence has always been for good, and he is a great artist. Though his voice is not now in its prime, and is not completely under his control, his singing is still so much better than that of most of his younger rivals (if, indeed, he has any) that he might go on delighting us for many years to come. And though the voice shows the signs of wear, the playing is as incomparable as ever. When Mr. Henschel plays the accompaniments to such songs as Schubert's "Ganymede," "Der Leiermann," "Fischerweise," and Schumann's "Two Grenadiers," as he did the other day, we declare that we would eagerly go again to hear him even though he did not sing the part for the voice. Will not his innumerable friends combine to use a gentle but firm coercion, and get him to withdraw his notice about "Last Recitals"? It would be too hard upon the public to prevent their profiting by an exhibition of art which no one but Mr. Henschel can give in such full measure. If M. Geloso and his brilliant colleagues were to say they would play no more quartets in London, it would be a very grievous but not an irreparable loss, for there are several quartet parties ready to play to us, though, none, perhaps, which in certain respects can equal them. But we know of no man who can sing and accompany himself like Mr. Henschel.

The Geloso Quartet was lucky to have such a pianist as M. Cesare Geloso to play with them in Franck's Quintet. He seemed to play by intuition rather than by study, just as his colleagues did, and the result was the most perfect performance of the Quintet we have ever heard. It must be fifteen years or more ago since Mr. René Ortmans introduced this most beautiful composition to an English audience in the smaller Queen's Hall. He was Franck's apostle and pioneer; yet in spite of his efforts to make the great Frenchman known (though born a Belgian, he was naturalised in France) how slowly has recognition come! Perhaps the weight of Franck's genius will be the more permanently felt by us because of this. Sudden reputation is not always to be desired for a composer. But Franck is not neglected now. Two days after M. Geloso had given the Quintet, it was played again in Bechstein Hall by the "British Chamber Music Players," Messrs. Albert Sammons, Eugene Goossens, Thos. Peatfield, Cedric and Herbert Sharpe. These gentlemen played it very finely; still they gave the impression that they had to learn it, while whatever the Geloso Quartet plays sounds as if it was being played by instinct. Mr. Herbert Sharpe has qualities of touch and style to equip him for such music as the twelve Preludes—the first series—of Debussy, but his imagination does not equal that of some of Debussy's interpreters, and he is something too serious for music of this kind.

At Queen's Hall, last Saturday, Sir Henry Wood produced "The Song of the Earth," a Symphony for Tenor Solo, Contralto Solo, and Orchestra, by Gustav Mahler, the famous chef-d'orchestre who died prematurely a year or two ago. To him we personally owe a debt of gratitude for the most perfect performance of several operas which we have ever had the privilege of listening to. This was at Vienna. As a composer we cannot think he was so eminent as he was when directing an opera. The third, fourth and fifth of the movements of which "The Song of the Earth" consists are very pleasant to hear; and the rest, though not enlivening, are no doubt the work of a master of orchestral writing. But the level of inspiration is not very high. Even in the charming third movement, which was encored, the themes are not of that distinguished kind which come to the born composer. Miss Doris Woodall and Mr. Ger vase Elwes sang the solos like the artists that they are, but Mr. Elwes was not quite sufficiently audible in the long first movement. Mme. Elly Ney played Brahms' first Pianoforte Concerto very well indeed, and Mr. Hamilton Harty's "Comedy Overture" concluded what was certainly an interesting concert.

In the Learned World

ONE of the standing puzzles of physics is gravitation, the most important force in the world, in the study of which we are hardly further forward than we were in the days of Newton. That all bodies attract one another in proportion to their mass is taken as an axiom, since it is the only way that has yet occurred to us of accounting for the revolution of the planets round the sun, or for the fact that a bullet fired from a rifle does not travel on for ever in a straight line. It was also experimentally proved by Cavendish, who showed that a large leaden ball exercised a visible attraction upon a small copper one placed near it. Yet the nature of this force is entirely hidden from us, and about the only guess that offers any real explanation regarding it is that of Le Sage of Geneva, who suggested in 1818 that everything was exposed to a constant bombardment or rain of particles, from which its mass shielded it on one side. Professor Einstein has lately examined the question of gravitation with respect to what is called the principle of relativity, which asserts that, owing to the movement of the earth through space, all our measures of length and the like must be relative, and not absolute. At the late Congress of Natural Sciences at Vienna, Professor Einstein drew attention to this and to the experiments of Eötvös, which go to show that in an isolated system the inertia and the weight are the same, and that the product of the attractive force of the earth and of the centrifugal force set up by its rotation is the same, whatever be the substance employed. The chief practical result of his calculations showed that the mass of a point was increased, and not diminished, by the presence of other masses in its neighbourhood, and that inertia, which he defines as reaction against accelerations, cannot be estimated absolutely, but only by differences of acceleration.

Not entirely unconnected with this are the ideas put forward by M. Fournier d'Albe in a recent number of "Scientia." According to him, the ether, which Lord Salisbury said only furnished a nominative to the verb to undulate, does not really exist, and the atmosphere, as we pass upward from the earth, gets gradually more rarefied until, in the inter-planetary spaces, there is—a void. Yet this "void," to use a convenient bull, is traversed by electrons or tiny particles of negative electricity which are constantly being thrown off by the sun, and which eventually reach our earth. This is not very far from the bombardment theory of Le Sage above mentioned, and derives some colour from the experiments lately made in mines and other places, which seem to indicate the existence of a constant radiation of electrons coming from some hitherto undetected source. At any rate, such speculations are not entirely barren, since they give us a glimpse of a conquest of Nature greater than any yet seriously attempted. We all know what use Mr. H. G. Wells made of the possibility of doing away with gravitation in his "First Men in the Moon"; but it is to be hoped that, if M. Fournier d'Albe's conception of the universe as a huge vacuum tube in which all matter is like particles of gas be well founded, no one will attempt to destroy the vacuum without due consideration.

In more sublunary matters, researches into the evolution of animal forms and the causes which lead to their variation have of late made some advances. M. de Vilmorin has lately described to the Académie des Sciences experiments made by him in the crossing of dogs with marked peculiarities, such as the Schipperkes, or tailless dogs, at one time fashionable. He finds that tailless varieties are never pure-bred, but are what are called, in the new nomenclature, heterozygotes, or the result of the union of parents bearing dissimilar characteristics. Long-tailed dogs, on the other hand, have what he calls fixed recessive characteristics—that is to say, those which, in crosses between individuals each of which bear one of the same Mendelian pair, entirely disappear in the first hybrid generation. From seventeen crossings between long-tailed male dogs with short-tailed or tailless mates, a hundred puppies have resulted, of which fifty-two have had long tails and the rest either very short tails or none at all. This seems to be in strict accord with the so-called Law of Mendel. Four crossings between tailless dogs have, however, given thirteen puppies, of which five only had long tails.

A curious discovery is announced by Mlle. Drzewina, a Roumanian lady domiciled in Paris, who has done much to make biological facts intelligible to the general public. M. Paul Marchal has discovered, according to her, a race of insects who are abolishing the difference between the sexes, or, rather, are realising the dreams of the more fanatical feminists, by doing away with the males. Among the Chermes pini, a race of aphides which frequent pine forests, M. Marchal has lately observed a great predominance of females, having counted, he says, between June and July, several hundreds of thousands of females and not a single male. The curious thing is that this variety has abandoned in France the sexual reproduction which it practises farther East, and has returned to parthenogenesis, or the production of descendants by the female without male assistance. To this it may be said that this may either be a local accident preceding the total extinction of the race, and probably due to unfavourable local conditions, or an error of observation arising from a periodical slaughter of the males by the unsexed females, such as takes place among the bees. This last seems not impossible, since it is said that the wings which generally distinguish the adult females are markedly absent in those specimens of Chermes pini which M. Marchal has been observing. Possibly the winged females have all emigrated and are producing elsewhere properly sexed descendants, while the imperfectly developed females have remained behind after having slaughtered or expelled the males. It does not seem in that case as if the outlook were hopeful for the continuance of these Amazons or suffragettes.

At the first meeting this year of the Académie above referred to, the new president, M. Appell, drew attention in a formal allocution to the constant and audible conversations that went on during the reading of papers, not only between the Academicians present, but between members of the august body and those of the outside public. He proposed that there should be blazoned on the wall, in letters of gold, the words, "Listen one to the other," which looks as if they did not always manage things better in France. F. L.

"Blush Rose," a soldier's romance in the days of Louis XIV, is the title of a novel by Ernest Alfred Vizetelly, the well-known translator of Zola's works, who writes under the pen-name of "Le Petit Homme Rouge" of the Tuileries. The story, which is based on the French of Amédée Achard, has been compared to "The Three Musketeers," and gained for its author in the French the Cross of the Legion of Honour. It is now ready, published by Holden and Hardingham.

The Theatre

"The Music-Cure" at the Little Theatre

IF this be nonsense, as the author says, we hope Mr. Bernard Shaw will utter it again and again. "The Music-Cure" is gay and quite irresponsible and wildly amusing on the surface, but it possesses lower depths of sociological observation, and is instinct with the lively wit which Mr. Shaw sometimes hides from us so perversely.

The opening is perhaps a little laboured. When Lord Reginald Fitzambey, an Under-Secretary, who has bought some famous shares and is being bullied by his chief and others, tells his doctor he shall go out of his mind, it is rather too bad of Dawkins to retort with the ancient statement "that most of us would not have far to go." There are other examples of this forced and antique humour until it is made known to us that the duchess, Reggie's mamma, is sending a famous pianist, Strega Thundridge, to the hotel to play the worried Under-Secretary back to health. When that beautiful lady comes upon us, Reggie is under the influence of a strong narcotic, and some have thought that his charming scene with Strega is a dream. We hope not. For the Lord Reggie of the play to have lived through such an experience would have been quite possible; quaint and laughter-provoking as it is, there is truth in it—would men observingly distil it out.

Miss Madge McIntosh, who has played so many important parts, never appeared to greater advantage than in the curious character of Strega. As she takes off her hat and bows to the crowd who wait outside the hotel, in the hope of hearing her play, we note that her hair seems to be a lovely green and silver. This is symbolic, we presume, of her many qualities. Just what they are and just how she and Reggie find that they can make each other happy you will surely wish to see for yourself. To tell the little story would be to interrupt the pleasure of the audience, but we may hint that the skilful introduction of both classical music and the sort of composition that is furthest away from it is an important part of the "cure," and that all who like the work of Mr. Shaw, in his gayest mood, will be delighted with this, the latest of his long series of stage plays.

"The Queen's Champion" at the Aldwych Theatre

THIS play is constructed on the most popular lines. It is one of those delightful, conventional, regal romances of a Slavonic State such as we were made familiar with some years ago. But Mr. Graham Hill and Mr. Hubert Ericksen, the authors, are not content to give us only the old grandiloquent speeches, the old noble sentiments, the old bravery and narrow escapes, the well-worn chivalrous outbursts of the hero and the modest grandeur of the Queen, but they add to all this the humour and common sense of a brave Canadian gentleman—most fortunately a millionaire. This character appears as Andrew Dalton, and bursts upon the country of Dalitza when it is seething with discontent, starving, and doubtful in its mind as to whether its not too agreeable crown shall be given to its rightful Queen Natalie or her wicked cousin, the young Prince Vaska. You will imagine what a number of plots and counter-plots arise out of the situation, for Dalton is really Prince Andreas, another cousin of the Queen, the son of a splendid father who married for love, was banished from Dalitza, and made a huge fortune—a trifle of which eventually pays the army and saves the people in what was once his native land. Given the delicate and beautiful Queen, the romantic Canadian Prince, who intended to claim the throne, but, seeing and knowing Natalie, is ready to be her champion and nothing more; accept the sadly wicked Prince Vaska, with his evil friends, Baron Holstein and Alena, the lady-in-waiting to the Queen, and you have ready to hand the material for one of those exciting, picturesque, highly coloured, romantic dramas in four acts which should long fill the Aldwych Theatre and echo for many a day throughout the English-speaking world.

Mr. James Carew does much to make the ever-ready hero new and true. He speaks his most romantic lines as though he felt them; he presents a character instead of an example of type, and he forces belief upon his audience even in the most difficult and doubtful situation. Having brought heaps of money to his country, and found that he loved Natalie better than the crown itself, he nobly sets aside his birth and exclaims, "I have no right in Dalitza except the right to live or die for Dalitza's Queen!" After a hundred ingeniously arranged adventures, in which Dalton's comic servant, Hawkins, plays a merry part, and in which the hero proves himself a champion in deed and word, we discover that he is to live for the Queen. For Prince Vaska's extreme wickedness is no good against the combination of virtue, dollars, and love and courage.

Many of the characters are a trifle conventional, but none the less welcome to the audience on that account. Mr. Carew, however, hold high the banner of romance, and Miss Una Venning plays the Queen with quite unusual charm and delicacy. Among all the well-presented parts in the drama, and there are about twenty-five, Mr. Lawrence Leyton, as the bad Baron Holstein, is extremely neat and effective and convincing. In many scenes he gives a touch of reality to the circumstances which does not always appear to be supplied by the authors.

For those who enjoy these boldly-drawn, romantic stories of kingdoms, love, and passionate encounters, "The Queen's Champion" is the ideal play, for, according to its convention, it never has a dull moment and it is strongly acted throughout the cast. Mr. Jack Haddon is an old-fashioned villain of a Prince such as Dalitza would surely produce, and Miss Joy Chatwyn is as handsome and cunning and naughty a plotter as you can ever hope to meet in the world of melodrama. The piece is well mounted and runs its course without the slightest halt or time for analysis or anything bothering of that kind.

Mr. H. B. Irving at the Palace Theatre

THOSE playgoers who find the performances at the theatres too long and those who consider the usual music-halls too full of smoke and noise will always discover a delightful entertainment at the Palace.

Just now Mr. H. B. Irving is making his first appearance upon the same variety stage as several other actor-managers have done. This week he has chosen "The Van Dyck," adapted from the French by Mr. Cosmo Gordon Lennox, the rapid one-act play in which Sir Herbert Tree was so overwhelmingly effective some time ago at His Majesty's. Mr. Irving's method is different, but highly amusing and powerful as the extraordinary thief, Arthur Blair Woldingham, while his self-satisfied and mean victim, John Peters, is excellently represented by Mr. Tom Reynolds. The grace and distinction with which Mr. Irving endows every character he plays is not lacking in his Woldingham, but he is lighter, gayer, more in the mood of a kind of tragic farce, than is usual. The play appeared exactly to suit the Palace audience, who greatly cheered the actors. After "The Van Dyck" of Mr. Lennox we appear to leap backward in point of time, and welcomed Miss Vesta Tilley, in new characters, looking the same and singing in the same way as we remember her twenty years ago. Her song, "The Army of To-day's All Right," recalls and repeats victories of far-off times. Miss Tilley is just as popular, if not more so, than of old, but her method undoubtedly "dates," and her songs are not quite good enough for so gifted and lively a lady.

Another charming part of the programme is that given to the beautiful dances of the beautiful Mlle. Regine Flory. For our part, we should never grow tired of "Le Cygne" of Saint Saëns as she dances it, nor weary of her superb Egyptian poses. There are ever so many other interesting people at the Palace just now, but those we have mentioned would be enough to fill an even larger and less comfortable and beautiful house.

The Little Theatre

MR. KENELM FOSS is making the fullest and wisest use of his comfortable and agreeably decorated little play-house in the Adelphi. At first its patrons showed signs of being rather esoteric and attenuated, but recently, since the seating has been rearranged and the prices made to suit with those of other theatres, the "Little" has become a great favourite with all those interested in the art of the stage.

Apart from the evening programme, in which Mr. Chesterton's "Magic" and Mr. Shaw's "Music-Cure" are sure of success there are frequent interesting experiments of an afternoon. One of the most original of these has been a new production of a familiar Shakespearean play, hauntingly familiar, yet so curiously new in its latest form.

MR. POEL'S NEW STAGE VERSION OF "HAMLET."

We have been bored and entranced by various Hamlets in our time, but we were immensely entertained by Mr. William Poel's cleverly arranged version. To some extent it appeared as though we were looking on at a play which was at once vaguely remembered and more than half forgotten.

In this new version, it is the conscience of the King and, in the earlier acts, the importance of Polonius, which are mainly brought to our notice. Many passages from the tragedy which are usually left out are herein played, many delicate points of view which other producers have overlooked, or thought well to do without, are now fully set forth before the audience.

Mr. Poel arranges his stage or platform with steps leading to the auditorium and doors right and left through which all the characters of the play have their exits and their entrances. If you are near the front you are on intimate terms with them, a feeling which is increased by their frequently addressing you more or less directly.

As a whole we consider Mr. Poel's experiment of great interest and value to the stage. It is true that he gives us a Queen who is old and uninteresting, a Hamlet who is without much dignity, an Ophelia far nearer to life than the usual tragic heroine of the play, but in revenge he presents us with a thousand new views and turns of phrase, and an ensemble which carries our imagination immediately to the period of the original production. He tells us, in effect, that the "stage business" in this version is not supposed to be that in use in Shakespeare's time, but rather as it is presumed Londoners, in the year 1600, would have interpreted the dramatist's intention from the dialogue, as they heard it spoken from the platform of the Globe Playhouse. Such subtlety is now used in the presentation of "Hamlet" that we feel we should see it several times before venturing to point to matters that appear to us an excess of refinement. In the meantime, we can praise the whole effect and congratulate Mr. Esme Percy and Miss Kirsleen Graeme and their company on a remarkable production of a classic drama. As Claudius Mr. Desmond Brannigan was interesting and convincing throughout his scenes, as his Queen, Miss Edith Evans, had the difficult task of creating a new personage. If Mr. Poel is right in his view that Gertrude was elderly and unsympathetic, Miss Evans was successful. Mr. Esme Percy as Hamlet began well, but the difficulties of his pretended madness over-tried his skill. The true effect was lost in what appeared to be mere folly. The new Ophelia was homely and engaging. Miss Judith Wogan not only has charm, but uses her intellect with convincing results. Two ladies played Rozencrantz and Guildenstern with some skill, and Mr. Poel gave us the best and cleverest Polonius we have ever chanced to meet. We trust we may soon see the new version of "Hamlet" again.

The vogue of the one-act play is approaching the height of its fame. It is a delightful form of stage-work, and, now that the variety theatres produce such pieces, there is no reason why it should not prove well worthy, from the worldly point of view, of the attention of the most gifted of our dramatists.

ONE GOOD TURN

On Tuesday, Mr. Foss gave us three pieces which will add immensely to the repute of the short play. That by Mr. Martin Swayne and Mr. Eille Norwood is called a nightmare, but it is more of the nature of one of those vigorous Grand Guignol plays that are quickly growing into deserved popularity.

Mr. Eille Norwood as George Sanderson represents a young man who, having come into a fortune, enjoys a wild night and falls among thieves. These have ready for him an elaborate plot by which he is made to believe that he can be arrested as a murderer. The scene is a bedroom in which Sanderson awakes to find one man seemingly murdered, and a lady in bed, who quickly telephones for what appears to be a sham policeman. Sanderson eventually ransoms himself from the gang without knowing how completely he has been swindled and made a fool of. The little play is brisk in action and clever in surprises, and admirably acted by Mr. Norwood as well as by Mr. James Berry, the pseudo-constable, and Miss Barbara Everest as the charming lady who so effectively assists the gang. "One Good Turn" would prove very welcome at those halls where an exciting and cleverly played short drama is enjoyed.

"THE LADIES' COMEDY,"

by Mr. Maurice Hewlett, transports us to Venice in the year 1700. His play is an arrangement of complications, in which a lady appears as a man and a man as a maid. The intrigue is simple, delicate, candid. The comedy is like a beautiful fan by Conder, a slight, amusing, colourful piece of artificiality in three panels, as it were.

The widow, Donna Camilla, perfectly played in the earliest eighteenth century manner by Miss Gwen John, is beloved by a shrewd boy of Venice, who, notwithstanding his many mannish qualities, manages to take service with the Donna as her maid. But soon a gallant and his servant hurry from Mantua. One is supposed to be a cousin of the Donna, the Count Galeotti-Galeotto, but is really a lady, Isotta. The other is the real Galeotto. The development of the plot is like a seventeenth century Venetian masquerade, gay, inconsequent, decorative, intriguing. As the masculine maid, Mr. Armstrong, who is so excellent in Mr. Shaw's "Music-Cure," acts a very onerous part with the greatest finesse and courage. He is admirable, but all the parts in Mr. Hewlett's comedy are well played, and the result is a most pleasing, lively trifle, full of neat phrases and happy situations.

After two such admirable productions, Mr. Foss surprised with the intense power of his own play, in one short act,

RAHAB

The characters are the Woman, Miss Ruth Mackay; her Maid, Miss Ada Marius; a Visitor, Mr. Baliol Holloway. The story is bold and simple. Miss Mackay's picture of a woman of the oldest profession is true without being cruel or in any way overdone. Her harsh religious maid is made a stern thing of beauty by the manner in which Miss Marius plays it. The Visitor, a Salvationist whose son has killed himself because of the woman, comes to the flat to avenge the death of his boy. The woman tricks him again and again, and, having won her life and promised to reform, she makes love to the strong man who came to murder and believed he had saved a brand from the burning. In his last passion of disgust he crushes the life out of the woman, who prays him to hold her even more strongly in her last agony.

There is observation and skill and character and tragic beauty in this episode, all of which qualities were displayed by the three accomplished actors engaged with almost startling effect. Three such short plays as these, so admirably acted, should make a welcome regular programme. EGAN MEW.

Notes and News

Messrs. George Allen and Co., Ltd., publish this week a book on the Land Question, entitled "Lloyd George and the Land," by G. E. Raine, the author of "The Real Lloyd George." The book, besides containing a trenchant criticism of Mr. Lloyd George's Land Campaign, unfolds alternative proposals which have the support of a number of influential Unionist M.P.'s.

Mr. John Lane will publish this week "With the Russians in Mongolia," by H. G. C. Perry-Ayscough and Captain R. B. Otter-Barry, with an introduction by Sir Claude Macdonald, G.C.M.G., and fifty illustrations, at 16s. net. This volume supplies the public need of a really authoritative work, and describes in attractive style the latest developments in the drama recently enacted in this corner of the world.

The Liberal Berliner Börsen Courier and the non-party Berliner Neueste Nachrichten for January 22, publish a report to the effect that they have it on good authority that the clauses of the British-German Treaty will be made public in Berlin and in London simultaneously at the commencement of March. They principally refer to the settlement of economic questions in Anatolia and Africa.

The annual general meeting of the Peasant Arts Fellowship will be held on Wednesday, February 11, at 3.30 p.m. Lord Henry Bentinck is to take the chair. He will be supported by Mr. L. March Phillipps, Mr. R. Sandeman, Mr. Godfrey Blount, Dr. Greville MacDonald, and others, who will speak specially in reference to the work already done by the Fellowship, as well as of the aims and opportunities before it.

The Baroness Albert d'Anethan, a sister of Sir Rider Haggard and of Lieut.-Col. Andrew C. P. Haggard, has written a novel of Japanese life, "The Twin-Soul of O'Take San," which tells of two Englishwomen and a delightful Japanese girl. The Baroness has lived for fifteen years in Japan in diplomatic circles, and has therefore an intimate knowledge of things and people Japanese. The book is to be published by Stanley Paul and Co.

The present series of lectures at the Victoria and Albert Museum has reference to various sections of the Metalwork Collections. The first, on Ironwork, was given on Thursday last, by Mr. J. Starkie Gardner. It will be followed by lectures on "English Leadwork" by Mr. Lawrence Weaver, F.S.A., on February 12; on "Silversmithing" by Mr. Herbert Maryon, on the 19th; on "English Silversmiths' work of the Mediæval and Tudor periods," by Mr. W. W. Watts, on the 26th; and on "Jewellery" by Mr. R. B. Rathbone, on Thursday, March 5.

Messrs Crosby, Lockwood and Son announce the forthcoming publication of a new study of "The Wars of the Roses," by Mr. R. B. Mowat, M.A., Fellow and Assistant Tutor of Corpus Christi College, Oxford. The period covers a national crisis of the highest significance and leads up to the established Tudor Monarchy and the Reformation. The author's aim is to trace the causes of the crisis and its results, and to decide upon their relative importance with a discriminating view to the wider issues of modern history. The book contains several genealogical tables and a map printed in colours. The author's name appears on the Lists of Examiners of the Universities of London and Edinburgh.

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

BY LANCELOT LAWTON

THE PROBLEM OF EMPIRE

THE drastic action of General Botha in deporting ten Labour agitators from South Africa brings into prominence a problem of Imperial importance. Let us hasten to add that it is not our intention in this column to discuss in a partisan spirit the rights or wrongs of the particular case at issue. Even were we inclined to take sides as to the relations between Capital and Labour in the Union, we would prefer to postpone decision until fuller information is available. The existence of the Imperial problem to which we have alluded has not necessarily been created by the strong action of the South African Government. That, however, in consequence, it has become urgent is certainly manifest. It may be that General Botha, faced with a situation that threatened civil war, was justified in resorting to unusual measures. As to the legal aspect of his policy, it would seem that he is prepared to rely upon the principle that in the presence of supreme danger the State can do no wrong. In other words, while the individual is responsible to the law, the State in turn, responsible to the community of individuals, may take any course that is deemed necessary for public safety.

Much has been made of the fact that martial law had been declared, but we are yet to learn that under martial law the subject may be deprived the right of trial. Assuming that the conditions prevailing approximated those to be found in a country at war, we are still unable to find precedent for General Botha's remarkable act. Even in war the process, formal though swift, of a drumhead court-martial decides the guilt or otherwise of the worst malefactor. But, as already implied, we are not inclined to discuss at length what might be termed the local political aspect of the unfortunate incident. The Imperial problem that once again has been brought to the front is far more serious than any issue between Capital and Labour on the Rand. A critical examination of General Botha's motives within narrow limits can scarcely help us to come to a decision as to whether or not he was justified. For we must remember that, grave as are the obligations of General Botha as Premier of South Africa, they are light compared with the responsibility of his Imperial duty. Whatever view may be taken of his conduct, we must not forget that it received the endorsement of the representative of the Crown on the spot, Lord Gladstone. To this circumstance we attach more importance than to another, urged in many quarters, and that is the right of South Africa, as a self-governing Dominion, to pursue any course which she may consider best in her own interests. In principle this last argument appears to be unassailable; but in certain contingencies too literal an interpretation of principle may be fraught with the utmost danger. One of these contingencies may conceivably arise out of a case where the local convenience of a self-governing Dominion enters violently into conflict with the traditions and aspirations inseparable from the British conception of liberty, which have in a large measure tended to make the British Empire the glorious structure that it is to-day. Bearing this possibility in mind, we are bound to admit that the outlook for Imperial unity is an unpromising one.

As things are, the foundations of the Empire are set in shifting sands, and to steady them will require all the ballast of sane statesmanship the Empire can command. We, in England, are at present in no state of mental calm, such as is necessary for a true realisation of the significance of this South African incident. We have our own sordid domestic troubles. Party feeling runs high; Labour and Capital are at each other's throats; social reform has become somewhat soiled with class warfare; and through all these manifestations of unrest there stands out the striking fact that by means of the franchise the working man is sweeping his way towards power. Thus General Botha's action finds England herself divided into camps. On the one hand he is assailed as an autocrat unworthy of the protection of a freedom-loving race; while on the other hand he is hailed as a strong man who alone is capable of quelling the insidious unrest of the age. Nevertheless, underlying these exhibitions of the partisan spirit we find that serious men of all shades of opinion are in agreement to a certain extent. That is to say, few are to be found who are really satisfied with General Botha's drastic methods, and all alike are nervous as to whether, indeed, the traditional principle of British liberty has not been outraged. On the other side we find frank detestation of anarchy, the fear that Labour might rise to power by employing the method of the dynamitard.

It is evident, then, that sanity has not left us. But it is equally clear that the time has arrived when we must distinguish between the healthy rivalry of the party spirit and the poisonous prejudice of partisanship. In other words, the men of temperate thought have become more than ever indispensable, not only for the management of our domestic affairs, but also for the safeguarding of the very existence of the Empire. To-day it is not enough that we merely think Imperially; we must act Imperially. Students of the British Empire have frequently drawn attention to the incontrovertible truism that our Imperial rule rests upon its elasticity, and have found in this elasticity what they have termed the real strength of our Imperial sway. To be frank with ourselves, we have governed along the lines of least resistance, and the noble proportions of the Empire as it exists to-day form a wonderful monument to the wisdom, in this respect, of British statesmanship. But who, viewing impartially the Imperial problems that confront us now, can deny that there is urgent need for a reconsideration of policy? In later years the whole aspect of our Imperial dominion has been changed, and no longer is self-complacent indulgence in keeping with that swift progress which found its inception in elasticity of rule. So long as problems menacing to the integrity of the Empire as a whole have not arisen, non-interference with the youthful vigour of our Colonies, though a negative, represented an exceedingly valuable asset of statesmanship. In those days there was no danger that the traditional principles that made for the greatness of our race and rule would be undermined. But now, non-interference, carried to extreme lengths, creates the impression that we are merely ignoring ugly and inconvenient problems—in other words, that we are shirking the obligations of rule. For we must not forget that our Colonies have become adult members of the Imperial family.

As far as South Africa is concerned, we have introduced into this family circle an alien people knowing not as yet the principles and traditions which we hold dear to our hearts. Elsewhere the problem that has arisen in South Africa could hardly be repeated. For in Canada, Australia, and New Zealand the British strain, with British ideals, predominates. Nevertheless, viewed apart altogether from the incident which has suggested this article, we see on all sides Imperial problems of acute gravity shaping themselves. There is the question of Asiatic immigration that does not concern the domestic interests of Great Britain, but that, without exception, troubles all our Dominions beyond the Seas. Then, arising out of this question, with which unfortunately we have but little sympathy, there is the natural desire of the Colonies to possess their own navies. We have left unpatrolled the seas that wash their shores, and is it to be wondered at that they should become alarmed for the safety of their homes? Thus, by a too rigid adherence to the policy of convenient elasticity, like a neglectful parent we have ignored the problems of our growing family and are faced with the shadow of Imperial disintegration. South Africa has taken advantage of this elasticity to pursue her own course. As for the future only constructive Imperial statesmanship can find the remedy. Without excessive centralisation surely some system of practical co-operation in the promotion of British ideals might be devised.

MOTORING

TOURING members of the Automobile Association and Motor Union will be interested to know that arrangements have now been completed for the establishment of headquarters on the Riviera. The Nice Automobile Club, whose building on the Promenade des Anglais has, ever since the inauguration of motoring, been the centre of the sport for the South of France, has agreed to act as the Association's branch. All members of the A.A. can thus obtain triptyques, routes, touring information, reception, and return shipment of their cars, and other advantages of membership, as if they were directly in touch with the head office (Fanum House, Whitcomb Street, London). They will also, during their stay in the South of France, be eligible for temporary membership of the Nice Automobile Club at a specially reduced subscription of one guinea for each season, such temporary membership comprising the full privileges of the Club, which has a commodious garage attached to the clubhouse. The acting secretary, who is always available to callers, speaks English fluently, and, in addition to this advantage, one of the senior officials of the A.A. Touring Department will be in constant attendance at the new branch for the remainder of this season. This development marks a further extension of the Association's sphere of activities in France. As members are aware, A.A. offices and a permanent staff have been established for some time at 39, Rue de la Chaussee d'Antin, Paris.

A new International Customs Pass, embodying an important departure from the existing "triptyque" system, will, according to the Autocar, shortly come into operation, largely as a result of the efforts of the touring department of the Royal Automobile Club. Hitherto, before a tour could be taken abroad, the owner of the car had to deposit with the organisation to which he belonged the full amount of the duty relating to the car in each country in which he intended to travel. Under the new scheme, however, only the highest Customs charge prevailing will have to be deposited. The scheme was produced in the autumn of last year, and was to have been in force on January 1 of this year, but, owing to certain countries having failed to notify their Customs authorities, its general adoption has been postponed.

Every motorist or ordinary traveller who has either completed or is contemplating a tour in the Alpine regions should make a point of securing a copy of the "Alpine Souvenir" recently issued by Messrs. D. Napier and Son, Ltd., of New Burlington Street, London, W. It is a beautifully got-up and profusely illustrated booklet of some thirty pages, and is a most interesting and graphically written description of the now historical "Storming of the Alps" by the 30/35 h.p. six-cylinder Noiseless Napier, written by two well-known journalists who participated in the test—Mr. T. W. Murphy, assistant editor of the Motor News, and Mr. A. J. M. Gray, whose name is familiar to every reader of the motoring press. It is needless to say that the reading matter is excellently done, but special mention should be made of the reproductions in sepia of about fifty of the snap-shots taken en route. These are really charming illustrations of some of the most beautiful spots in the Alps and the Dolomites, and they cannot fail to interest alike those who have already revelled in the glories of Alpine scenery and those who live in hopes of doing so. The "Souvenir," it is refreshing to note, does not mention the price of a car, nor contain the "smell" of an advertisement, but nevertheless it cannot fail to impress the reader, and especially the experienced motorist, with a realisation of the fine qualities of the car which so brilliantly carried out the difficult task imposed upon it. In fact, although entirely free from the "puffing" usually associated with such productions, the booklet will, unless we are mistaken, prove an advertisement of the most effective and convincing character. Messrs. Napier will be pleased to post a copy free to any motorist or tourist on application.

The makers of the Atlas tyre pump, the labour-saving device which has been so widely used by owners of large cars for the rapid inflation of their tyres, have just placed upon the market a really efficient and convenient engine-driven tyre pump suitable for small cars, including Fords. It is called the "Baby" Atlas, and it does for light cars all that the standard Atlas pump has been doing successfully for larger cars for several years. It will inflate a tyre in a few seconds with pure, cold air, and thus saves the time and temper expended in the old system of hand-pump inflation. Including a pressure gauge, the price of the "Baby" inflator is 50s., and we understand that the Atlas people are quite willing to send the device to any light-car owner on "approval or return" terms. Their address is 14, Woodstock Street, London, W.

R. B. H.

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

WE have had quite a little boom in the City during the past week. All gilt-edged securities have been eagerly bought by the country investor. Trade is dull, and large numbers of people, finding that the Bank Rate had been reduced to 3 per cent., instantly ordered their brokers to buy Trustee stocks on which the yield was from 4 per cent. to 4½ per cent. The market was completely bare and some of the rises have been surprising. Consols and Port of London, Waterworks, and similar securities have risen more in the account than they have ever done in the history of the City. I do not think that the rise has come to an end. All gilt-edged securities will probably go to a 3½ per cent. basis; they may rise even higher.

Dozens of new issues have been offered, and all gilt-edged offers have been snapped up almost before the lists were opened. For example, West Australia Fours at 98½ and South Australian Fours at par were quickly taken, and the New Zealand ten year debentures with attractive conversion rights went splendidly. Another very successful offer was made by Schroeder and Company on behalf of the State of San Paulo. £4,200,000 5 per Cent. Two Year Treasury notes secured on a tax on coffee, also on coffee itself, were offered at 97. The security was good and the notes were taken in a few hours. The Republic of Uruguay offered £1,000,000 5 per cent. bonds at 91. The credit of this country is good and the bonds were readily taken. Montana Power gold bonds do not appear particularly attractive and the British Reserve Trust Company seems a very poor affair. The City of Medicine Hat asked for a small loan which it obtained. Elder Dempster and Company offered £250,000 6 per cent. preference shares, the interest on which is covered five times over. It is a good Shipping security. The Anglo-Argentine Tramways offer of £1,500,000 5 per cent. debentures at 95 may be disregarded as this company does not depreciate properly and my South American correspondent considers it a somewhat risky speculation. The British North Borneo Company desires to borrow £500,000 4½ per cent. debentures offered at 88. Santa Rosa Milling Company under the auspices of Messrs. Balfour, Williamson and Company, offered £200,000 6 per cent. debentures. The board is sound and the money would be readily found by the group. The Oklahoma-Pacific Railroad offered two million dollars 5 per cent, thirty-year gold bonds at 85 and also give a bonus of 20 per cent. in common stock. The road connects two important cities and feeds a rich agricultural district.

MONEY.—Very few people expected that the Bank Rate would drop so suddenly to 3 per cent. The fall created a veritable sensation. Some people talk about a break up of the Money Trust, but there is no Money Trust; the plain truth was that the Bank found its funds increasing too rapidly and had no choice but to drop the Rate. No doubt the joint stock banks did not see eye to eye with the Bank of England. The Bank of France followed suit and it is clear that we are in for a long period of cheap money. It is not probable, however, that any further reduction will be made, at any rate, until after the close of the Government financial year, and only then if business continues to fall away. Cheap money may stimulate trade, but the public is hardly inclined to lend money abroad; the whole tendency is the other way; therefore, I see little chance of any improvement in business.

FOREIGNERS.—Although the tone in Paris has improved, that is the best that I can say. The French are getting ready for their new loans and the Russian issue has all been arranged. When all these new issues are out of the way French bankers will be in funds again, and we may see some revival in the foreign bourses, but at the moment they wear a drab-coloured garment. Tintos have improved, partly on the news that the strike has been settled and partly because the Copper position is better, the visible stock of copper in Europe being considerably less than it was a month ago. The news from Mexico continues bad.

HOME RAILS.—At last the public are aroused to the fact that the Home railway market offers sounder investments than any other section of the House, and there has been a big rise in all Home railway securities. Great Central B's have risen four points during the account. Great Easterns had a spectacular jump on the dividend declaration; they made up at 49½ and are now 55. Great Western are five points higher on the account. London and North Western are also five points higher, and Midland Deferred have risen four points, whilst North Eastern consols are five and a half points better than they were at the end of January. Even Dover A and Little Chats have jumped, whilst Lancashire and Yorkshire, whose distribution pleased the House, have been marked up from 89 to 94. Those who followed my advice and bought Home railway stocks a few weeks ago had very handsome profits in a few days. I see no reason why holders should hang on. There is certain to be a small reaction after so quick a rise, but we may be quite sure that all the leading heavy lines will stand on a 4 per cent. basis within the next month. To-day they can be bought cum dividend to pay 5 per cent., and are therefore still under-valued.

YANKEES.—The American market hangs fire. It is clear that the new crowd who have obtained control of the Rock Island propose to make an assessment. The Wabash scheme is also being prepared. There are many things that may prevent a rise in the American market. Trade is not good, and although the important railways will be able to finance without any difficulty, it is doubtful whether the small roads will succeed in getting the money for their needs without having to pay an exorbitant price. However, cheap money will do away with the necessity for borrowing on short-dated notes. These notes have been the curse of the American market for the past three years.

RUBBER.—Even the Rubber market has had its friends during the past few days. Perhaps it is hardly the thing to call a "bear" a friend. Certainly most of the rise has been due to the buying back of nervous "bears." The public has not been anxious to add to its stock of Rubber shares. However, raw rubber has risen to 2s. 5½d., and with cheap money, may be held at that price for some months. The Ratanui report is fairly satisfactory. All-in costs are down to 1s. 6d., or a drop of 5d. on the year. The crop was 139,377 lbs., which sold at 2s. 9½d. Consequently the profit was £10,212, and a dividend of 17½ per

The Subscription List opened on Wednesday, 4th February, 1914, and will close on or before Friday, February 6th, 1914, for Town, and Saturday, February 7th, for Country.

THE OKLAHOMA - PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

(Incorporated in the State of Oklahoma, U.S.A.)

AUTHORISED CAPITAL:

Common Stock, fully paid and non-assessable ... $6,000,000
First Mortgage 5 per Cent. 30-Year Gold Bonds ... $6,000,000

ISSUE OF

$2,000,000 5 per cent. 30-year Gold Bonds

In Bonds of $500 each to bearer, being part of the above-mentioned $6,000,000 of Bonds, the balance of which is reserved for future issue.

PRICE OF ISSUE, 85 PER CENT.

or £87 6s. 9d. per Bond of $500 = £102 15s.

Payable as follows—On Application	£10 0 0
On Allotment	£15 0 0
On April 11th, 1914	£30 0 0
On June 13th, 1914	£32 6 9
	£87 6 9

Payment may be made in full on allotment under discount at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum.

The yield to the investor, at the price of issue of the Bonds, is £5 17s. 6d. per annum, without taking into account the Redemption Premium.

The Bonds are secured by Trust Deed, dated the 1st January, 1914, whereby a First Mortgage is created in favour of the First Mortgage, Guarantee and Trust Company, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, U.S.A., as Trustees for the Bondholders, secured upon all the franchises, right of way, land, tracks, equipment, stations, telegraph and telephone lines, or whatsoever property the Company may now own, or in future may acquire.

The Bonds are repayable at par on January 1st, 1944, but the Railroad Company reserves the right to redeem the Bonds at 105 in whole or in part upon any half yearly date for payment of interest after January 1st, 1919. In the event of partial redemption, the Bonds to be redeemed are to be ascertained by drawings.

Interest is payable in gold on the 1st January and the 1st July, free of all taxes, present and future, in the State of Oklahoma (U.S.A.) and the United States of America. A full half-year's interest is payable on July 1st, 1914.

Interest Coupons will be payable in London at the Offices of the Metropolitan Bank (of England and Wales), Limited, 60, Gracechurch Street, E.C., and in the United States by the Trustees for the Bondholders, The First Mortgage, Guarantee and Trust Company, of Philadelphia, Pa., U.S.A.

The payment of the interest on the Bonds will be guaranteed for the first three years, the Trust Deed stating that the first six coupons attached to the Bonds shall have endorsed thereon the following provision:

"To guarantee the payment of this coupon at maturity the face value hereof has been deposited in cash with the Trustees prior to the certification of the Bond to which it is attached.

"Coupons for a full half-year's interest, payable on July 1st, 1914, and subsequent coupons up to and including 1st January, 1934, will be attached to the Bonds. On or after July 1st, 1934, a new sheet of 20 coupons can be obtained from the Trustees or their agents in Europe on presentation of the "Talon." (This talon is attached to the first Coupon sheet.)

Every allottee under this Prospectus will be entitled to receive a bonus in fully-paid non-assessable Common Stock of the Company at the rate of 20 per cent. upon the nominal amount of Bonds allotted.

$150,000 of the present issue will be subscribed by Directors, on the terms of this Prospectus.

Trustees for the Bondholders.

FIRST MORTGAGE, GUARANTEE AND TRUST COMPANY, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, U.S.A.

Directors.

W. T. VAN BRUNT, Railroad Constructor (former Director of the Railroad Securities Company and President of several railroads controlled by the late E. H. Harriman), New York, N.Y.

E. H. COOKE, President of State National Bank of Oklahoma, Oklahoma City, Okla.
R. A. BROWN, Attorney at Supreme Court of State of Missouri, also for St. Joseph and Grand Island Railroad Co., St. Joseph Light, Heat and Power Co., St. Joseph, Mo.

S. L. BROCK, Director of the Farmers' National Bank of Oklahoma City, and Merchant, Oklahoma City, Okla.

F. C. COLCORD, Director of State National Bank of Oklahoma City, Okla.

I. H. KEMPNER, President of Texas Bank and Trust Company, and Railroad Director, Galveston, Tex.

C. D. SIMPSON, Railroad Constructor, New York, N.Y.

H. H. HOOVER, Land Owner, Hobart, Okla.

G. M. HOHL, Railroad Manager, Hobart, Okla.

Bankers in America.

THE GIRARD NATIONAL BANK, PHILADELPHIA, Pa, U.S.A.

Bankers in England.

METROPOLITAN BANK (OF ENGLAND AND WALES), LIMITED, 60, Gracechurch Street, E.C., Birmingham, and all Branches.

Brokers.

HENRY J. GARRATT & CO., 3 & 4, Great Winchester Street, and the Stock Exchange, London, E.C.

Solicitors.

KEKEWICH, SMITH & KAYE, 2, Suffolk Lane, E.C.

Auditors.

JACKSON, PIXLEY, BROWNING, HUSEY & CO., 58, Coleman Street, E.C. (Agencies at New York City, Philadelphia, Chicago, and Pittsburg, U.S.A.)

Registered Office.

HOBART, OKLAHOMA, U.S.A.

Registrars and Transfer Agents.

PRUDENTIAL TRUST CO., LTD., of Montreal and 14, Cornhill, London, E.C.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application may be obtained from the Bankers, Brokers and Auditors, and from the Transfer Agents, The Prudential Trust Co., Ltd., 14, Cornhill, London, E.C.

cent. was declared. The current year should give 200,000 lbs., and perhaps a profit of £7,500 might be earned.

OIL.—The Oil market remains lifeless. The Black Sea report was very disappointing; the production dropped by nearly one-half, and no dividend could be declared on either class of share. The Board very wisely wrote off a large sum for depreciation, and carried forward the balance. But the position of the company is not satisfactory, and the shares are friendless. Royal Dutch and Shell has been bought. The rig in Venezuelan Oil Concessions appears to be weakening.

MINES.—In the Kaffir market the improved tone did not last, Paris having decided to sell. Geduld have bettered on an official statement that the ore reserves have improved, and Modder Deep and Modder B have hardened. One or two rises have occurred in the Rhodesian market, and Mr. Latilla still keeps going with his Kirkland proposition. Russians have been a little off colour, and Nigerians are distinctly spotty. Evidently the public is not inclined to gamble in any Mining security, although we are assured that the Plymouth Consolidated was over-subscribed, and that both the Kirkland issues went well. I state this with all the reserve possible. Great Cobars have actually jumped to 21s. 6d., mainly on a "bear" squeeze. The "bears" in Mount Elliotts have also been pinched.

MISCELLANEOUS.—In the Miscellaneous market, all Egyptians have been much better; indeed, quite a big rise has occurred in some of the shares. The news from Egypt is good, and as all the securities are under-valued, the little boom may be continued for a week or two. The Home and Colonial report showed largely increased profits, and the dividend of 20 per cent. is readily maintained. It will be remembered that last year the shareholders authorised the Board to sell the gilt-edged securities, and a loss of over £33,000 was made. The Directors must now be sorry that they were so precipitate; had they kept the gilt-edged stock they would probably have made a profit instead of a loss. The Bovril figures are not quite so good, but the income from the subsidiaries has largely increased, therefore the dividend on the deferred is only reduced to 2 per cent. Bovril is energetically managed, and the debentures and preference shares are a very reasonable security.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

"IMPERIAL FEDERATION."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—Your correspondent, Mr. Allen, is to be congratulated upon having made a sufficiently lucid exposition of his "Fair Trade" thesis—at last. Still, it appears to me that he did so at some sacrifice; since he carefully eluded all explanation of prior difficulties regarding producers and consumers. I am willing to let that pass, because of his clear and succinct statement of the "Fair Trade" side of the question. But, of course, there was nothing new in his final elucidation; and just as much, of course, we cannot at all agree. What I cannot understand is Mr. Allen's singular persistence in advocacy of an utterly impossible policy. For it is perfectly certain (as even he has admitted) that there is no hope whatever of a protective tariff in direct behalf of English agricultural interests. Why, then, oppose a policy which would at all events indirectly advance such interests? For I still contend that an Imperial Zollverein would benefit the British (i.e., the English and Scotch) farmers: if not directly, or at once, then indirectly and increasingly. Why, when necessity impels, should it be deemed inconsistent and injurious to advocate Free Trade throughout the Empire? Granted that the British electorate never will tax breadstuffs and meats at the risk of increased cost, what is the use of opposing at least alleviating measures? And so I take the strong ground that, since there is nothing grown or produced in the whole world which cannot be produced and grown within the British Empire in rich abundance, in the common interests both of Motherland and of the free Commonwealths, a Federation should be evolved on such a basis as to assure substantial advantages to all around, and thereby to unite in interests and sentiment the entire Empire. As it is, to-day, nothing save fine sentiment holds it together. How long can such a condition last?

Only so long as the free British Commonwealths are continually recruited by new British emigrants, for it cannot be supposed for a moment that the second and third generations of British extraction will have much sympathy to spare for aught but their own native land, unless its and their own direct interests are in common with those of the Motherland and the Empire as a whole. Surely, then, it is of the first importance that British statesmen should grasp the situation, and resolutely inaugurate an entirely new imperial policy. Yet it would seem as though no statesman were broad enough, or bold enough, to attempt anything of the kind. Mr. Joseph Chamberlain has had the courage and discernment to champion the movement, it is true; but as he has retired from public life, there is not at present a single statesman in Parliament, of avowed convictions, to take his place. I fear that Mr. Allen will scarcely appreciate such "imperialism," which he will be likely to translate only as "idealism." I am sorry that he should be so impervious to "ideas," for life must be very dull and monotonous to one who is intolerant of idealism. Yet I could not but feel amused in my turn by Mr. Allen's sudden change of base and attempt to enlarge upon Canadian possibilities. I wonder if your correspondent has ever visited Canada. If not, he should do so. In Canada, the good qualities of manly Englishmen are as cordially appreciated as the faults and follies of mere English snobs are resented. But if Mr. Allen really does imagine that Canada is at all likely to enact the part he so gravely foreshadowed, he must be grievously ignorant of Canada and of her history. In the first place, her population is more than half French; her progress has been up to this time slow, although sure; and it is not probable that for several decades to come there will be any radical changes in either population or policy, save subject to the promptings of Imperial Federation. For Canada has in truth already evinced more interest in Imperial affairs proper than England itself. Indeed, Canada produced perhaps the greatest British statesman of his time, the late Sir John Macdonald, who, while the British House of Commons and British "statesmen" were engaged in the most paltry politics, or in playing to the galleries for their support and mere factional success, laid the foundations of Canadian prosperity, and caused to be constructed, in the face of the gravest obstacles, "a great Imperial Highway," as he himself proudly proclaimed it, viz., the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Though Canada has undoubtedly a great future before her, I can assure your correspondent that public opinion there is extremely sensitive and averse to all American political influences. But the idea of Canada ever "dominating" American politics is highly amusing, seeing that while, at most, Canada's population is less than seven millions (and, at that, less than half of purely British extraction), that of the United States is already one hundred millions. Yet Mr. Allen seems to regard his prognostications quite sincerely! But however we may differ in our views and sentiments, I have still a high regard for Mr. Allen's individuality, which is plainly sturdy. My compliments to him, then.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully, EDWIN RIDLEY.

Buffalo, January, 1914.

A SPANISH PROFESSOR'S TRIBUTE TO ENGLISH.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—Few criticisms of any national institutions are more instructive than those of a really well-informed foreigner, and few men are better qualified to speak about the peculiarities of a language than those who have been actively engaged in teaching it. José Casadesus, who, as professor of English at the Commercial School in Barcelona, possesses both the detached view of the foreigner and the inside knowledge of the expert, has recently contributed an introduction on the Phonetics and Grammar of English to an important new dictionary which is in course of publication in his town. After a few historical remarks he continues:—

"In our days the English language is of paramount importance. One might almost say of it what Cicero said, in his time, of Latin, 'It is of no particular merit to know it, but it is a great disgrace to be ignorant of it.' Its geographic extension—United Kingdom, Canada, United States, India, Australia, Africa—comprises some 400,000,000 souls, while those who study it in all quarters of the globe are difficult to reckon from their very numbers. For commerce and marine no language is superior, whilst in industry and arts, as in science and literature, few languages can be placed on a par with it.

"Its intrinsic qualities give it fresh lustre and fresh glory. The vocabulary—including technical terms of arts and sciences—reaches the enormous total of 400,000 words; the structure is simple and logical; and the idioms, the monosyllables, and the contractions make it extremely flexible and expressive.

"But along with all these sterling qualities it has one most serious defect, for the writing is not phonetic; indeed, one might almost claim that it is hieroglyphic. Though one may know a word by ear, there is no method or rule for knowing how to write it; and, though one may know how to write it, there is no rule for knowing how to pronounce it. Hence the difficulty, not of the pronunciation, as some aver, but of the orthology or art of reading, and of the orthography or art of writing; arts which we may verily declare to be non-existent at present in the English language, and which never can exist so long as the present system endures. The result is that in English dictionaries each word has to be given in two ways; once as it is written, once as it is pronounced; . . . and the art of reading and writing the language is a torment for all children and foreigners who have to learn it, and continues a torment even for those who know it, since they have perpetually to consult the dictionary on matters of no importance."

"On matters of no importance." The sting of his remarks lies in the tail. The idea of consulting a dictionary, except for the purpose of ascertaining the meaning of a word, seems positively grotesque to a Spaniard; but we poor English are so habituated to the drudgery that we need a foreigner to point out its absurdity, and to remind us of the undeniable fact that no Englishman can tell with certainty how to pronounce any word which he has seen written, but not heard spoken, nor how to spell any word which he has heard spoken, but has not seen written. And yet we call ourselves a practical nation!—Yours faithfully,

W. H. THOMPSON.

48, Queen's Gate, London, S.W.

"ROYAL YORK" HOTEL, BRIGHTON

Supreme Comfort in a Warm and Sheltered Position. Excellent Sea Views

SOME PRESS OPINIONS.

"To the Cuisine particular attention has been paid, and no expense spared, whilst the service is absolutely perfect."

"And in the Royal York you have the perfection of an English hotel and English cooking."

AND—

Colonel NEWNHAM DAVIS says:—"The Chef makes soup like a Frenchman, grills like an Englishman, and fries like an Italian."

Telegrams:
"Presto, Brighton."

Telephones: 206 Post Office, Brighton.
293 Brighton.

ROYAL ALBION HOTEL, BRIGHTON.

THE NEWEST HOTEL.

Closer to the Sea than any other Hotel at Brighton.

Magnificent Dining Room and Lounge with beautiful Sea Views.

"The Academy and Literature says:—"We have tried all the hotels in Brighton and none can compare with the Royal Albion for beauty of position, comfort, and personal attention to visitors' wishes."

For Illustrated Brochure and
Tariff, apply to
THE MANAGER.

Telephones:
903 Post Office (2 lines).

Telegrams:
"Brilliancy, Brighton."

JOTTINGS FOR THE WORD-BOOKS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—The following words and quotations are wanting in some of our Dictionaries :

BARQUADIER; a landing-stage for boats in Jamaica, a shortened form of French débarcadère, occurs in The Times of January 27, 1814 and 1914, p. 11.

"A Gentleman Instructed in the Conduct of a Virtuous and Happy Life. Written for the Instruction of a Young Nobleman. The Second Edition. London: 1704," is attributed on p. 1005 of the second volume of Halkett and Lang to William Darrell, the Jesuit. But a contemporary hand wrote on the title-page of the copy belonging to the University of St. Andrews "By Dr. Baker." One notes therein these words :

BUMPKIN, p. 26.; "a Hawking-Bag hung on the left side, and a Bumpkin guarded the right." The word came from the Netherlands; the Oxford Dictionary calls it "a vessel for carrying water."

DOG BOY, p. 25.; methought they had serv'd an Apprenticeship under Grooms or Dog-boys." The Oxford Dictionary quotes no specimens between the years 1859 and 1612.

FAST OUT, p. 104.; "and my Husband fasts out my Bravery in the King's-Bench or the Marshalsea." It means to "atone for," by abstinence.

INTERPAGE. The Oxford Dictionary gives no example of this word before the year 1858. Yet on p. 160 of THE ACADEMY of January 29, 1914, we read: "The First Six Books of Homer's Iliad, with an interpagated translation, line for line, and numerous notes. By the author of "the first six books of Virgil's Æneid" on the same plan. London: 1841." as the title of an anonymous book.

PREMURE, p. 79 (misprinted 83); "Take care, you may slip into a Premure before you are aware." It means præmunire.

TURCISM, p. 71.; "So that in those Mens Theology Turcism, with a 1000 per ann. is more credible, than Christianity with 500." It means the superstition of the Muhammedan Turks.

EDWARD S. DODGSON.

CHESTERTON'S "MAGIC."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—In the interesting article on "Magic" in your paper of the week before last (only just come to my notice) the writer regrets that the only phenomenon supposed to be brought about by supernatural agency—in other words, the only "miracle"—in the play is the work of evil powers. Now, even were the miracle in question the only one, I, at least, should have more faith in G. K. C. as a teacher than to suppose it possible that he could mean to imply thereby that the Powers of Darkness alone are ready and able to help mortals in urgent need. I should have taken it that, given the fact of supernatural aid in answer to prayer being at our disposal at all, he would mean it to go without saying that the less, or bad, presupposed the greater, or good.

But the Satanic miracle is not the only one in "Magic." Perhaps the other is the easier to forget, or even to overlook at the time, in that it is non-material: one of the kind that Faith believes we "have always with us"—worked in the invisible world of thought. The Conjuror, driven desperate by the mortifying taunts and the scoffing challenge thrown at him, in the presence of the girl he worships, by the conceited young bully, her brother from America, has invoked the Powers of Darkness, who have enabled him to stop the mouth and fever the brain of his persecutor by the production of phenomena that the latter can not explain—a supposed trick which he is powerless to expose—with the result that the baffled youth falls dangerously ill. At the passionate entreaty of the sister, the man, in penitent humility, calls on Divine Power, "if it so be that he may be found not unworthy to save the life of a boy." And thus the second miracle—the beneficent one—takes place; there darts into the suppliant's mind a natural means—a trick—by which the illusion of the storm and the green lamp could have been produced, and the telling of which to the raving boy (who would never have believed the supernatural—the true explanation) will remove his fever.

G. K. C. surely meant his little drama not only to be an antidote to the Gargantuan dose of realism administered to us of late years by the majority of plays and novels, but to have a still more uplifting effect—nothing less than the strengthening within us of Christian faith. It would be a pity if, by remembering only the Faust-like proceeding of the Conjuror, we defeated such an aim.—I am, sir, yours faithfully,

Hampstead, N.W.

C. A. F.

MUSICAL CRITICISM.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—My attention has been called to a letter from Mr. J. Holbrooke, which appeared in your columns on December 27. Referring to some remarks made by me on December 20, about pianoforte composition in the present day, he asks me if I know any English works for the piano. My answer is that I know a considerable number. That some of these may be "fit for our serious players" I have no wish to deny. But the point which I appear to have conveyed imperfectly was that the composers of genius now alive, with two or three exceptions, do not write much for the piano; and that many young musicians of ability put their best work into their writing for orchestra. In making this judgment I may, of course, be wrong. But I have for some years taken a special interest in hearing the work of the younger British composers, and my opinion as to the relative value of their compositions for piano and for orchestra is honestly given. Yours faithfully,

London, W. Jan. 30. THE WRITER OF THE ARTICLE.

BOOKS RECEIVED

MISCELLANEOUS.

- The Nature and First Principle of Taxation.* By Robert Jones, B.Sc. With a Preface by Sidney Webb, LL.B. (P. S. King and Son. 7s. 6d. net.)
A Recantation: A Supplement to a Book entitled "Shakespeare Self-Revealed." By "J. M." (Sherratt and Hughes. 1s. net.)

PERIODICALS.

- The Bibelot; Cornhill Magazine; Fortnightly Review; Cambridge University Reporter; Church Quarterly Review; Nineteenth Century; The Bodleian; Stage Year Book, 1914; Bookseller; M. A. B.; Revue Critique; La Revue; Revue Bleue; Mercure de France; Bird Notes and News; The Animals' Friend; Publishers' Circular; Nordisk Tidskrift; Harper's Magazine; The Candid Quarterly Review; La Société Nouvelle; Literary Digest; University Correspondent; Sporting Gossip; Empire Review.*

THE ACADEMY

A JOURNAL OF LITERATURE, ART, FINANCE & POLITICS

No. 2180

[Registered as a
Newspaper.]

FEBRUARY 14, 1914

PRICE THREEPENCE

SHEFFIELD SIMPLEX

PRESS OPINION:—

*"The highest point to which motor design
has yet attained."*

The "TIMES," 8/11/13

The Connoisseur

who demands smart appearance, and the experienced motorist who desires chassis efficiency, have their ideals in the present 30 h.p. six-cylinder Sheffield-Simplex chassis.

Write for Illustrated List of complete cars, with beautiful bodies by Vauden - Plas, or better still, arrange a trial. Both are free.

Sheffield-Simplex Motor
Works, Ltd.
20, CONDUIT STREET,
LONDON, W.

Works : Tinsley, Sheffield

30 H.P. 6-CYLINDER CHASSIS. STANDARD
EQUIPMENT INCLUDES U. S. L. ELECTRIC SELF-STARTER AND LIGHTER, ALL LAMPS, ELECTRIC
HORN, SPEEDOMETER CLOCK, COMPLETE
SCUTTLE DASH, WITH ALL INSTRUMENTS,
£8 8s. TAX.

PRICE £885.

LATEST DESIGN TORPEDO — WITH CONCEALED HOOD

THE ISSUE OF

THE ACADEMY

FOR MARCH 7

will be a

SPECIAL SPRING ANNOUNCEMENTS

NUMBER

and will form a good guide to the principal books of the present season.

ROYAL ALBION HOTEL, BRIGHTON.

THE NEWEST HOTEL.

Closer to the Sea than any other Hotel
at Brighton.

Magnificent Dining Room and Lounge with beautiful Sea Views.

The Academy and Literature says:—"We have tried all the hotels in Brighton and none can compare with the Royal Albion for beauty of position, comfort, and personal attention to visitors' wishes."

For Illustrated Brochure and Tariff, apply to
THE MANAGER.

Telephones :
903 Post Office (2 lines).

Telegrams :
"Brilliancy, Brighton."

BARGAINS IN BOOKS.—

Kipling's Complete Works, 25 vols., half calf, gilt, fine set, £12 12s.; Hamilton's Parodies, 6 vols., £2 10s.; Jesse's Historical Works, 30 vols., Nimmo, 1901, £7 17s. 6d.; Thackeray's Centenary Biographical Edition, 26 vols., £6 6s.; Barrington's Graham of Claverhouse, 30s. net, for 10s. 6d.; Purchas's Voyages, 20 vols., £9 9s., Glasgow, 1905; Slaters' Engravings and their Values, 1912, 18s.; Chaffer's Marks and Monograms on Pottery and Porcelain, 1912, 42s.; Baily's Magazines of Sports and Pastimes, 64 vols., £7 10s.; Grimm's Fairy Tales, large paper, illus. by Rackham, £2 2s.; Proc. Inst. Civil Engineers, 142 vols., cloth, £16 16s.; Pinkerton's Voyages and Travels, 17 vols., 1808, £5 10s.; Porter's Knights of Malta, 1858, 2 vols., £3 3s.; Burton's Arabian Nights, 17 vols., illustrated, £17 17s.; Gould's History Freemasonry, 3 thick vols., morocco binding, £2 2s., cost £6 6s.; James' Painters and Their Works, 3 vols., £3 3s.; Habershon Records of Old London, Vanished and Vanishing, coloured plates, folio, £2 2s.; Yeats' Collected Works, 8 vols., £3 3s.; Walpole's Letters, large paper, 16 vols., £6 10s.; Oscar Wilde, by L. E. Ingleby, 12s. 6d., for 4s. 6d.; Ditchfield Vanishing England, 15s., for 6s. 6d.; Landon's Lhasa, 2 vols., new., 42s., for 14s.; Spenser's Faerie Queene, 2 vols., Cambridge University Press, £3 13s. 6d., for 32s. Will take any good books in exchange for above.—BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

CITY OF MANCHESTER.Appointment of Art Curator.

THE Art Gallery Committee invite applications for the appointment of a Curator of the Corporation Art Galleries at a salary of £800 per annum.

The gentleman to be appointed will be required to devote the whole of his time to the duties of the office; to become a contributor to the Manchester Corporation Officers Thrift Fund; and to sign the Manchester Corporation Deed of Service.

Applicants must in their applications state (inter alia) age, health, present and previous appointments, qualifications, etc., and the date upon which the applicant can take up the duties of the office.

Applications accompanied by copies of not more than three recent testimonials and the names of four references, must be sent or delivered, so as to reach the undersigned, not later than 12 noon on Thursday the 6th March next, endorsed "Art Curator." Canvassing directly or indirectly is not permissible and will be a disqualification.

THOMAS HUDSON, Town Clerk.

TOWN HALL, MANCHESTER,
February 14, 1914.

FOR SALE.

Several Hundred Copies of a Specially Prepared Map of South America

Printed in Colours, showing the Produce and Chief Characteristics for which each District is noted.

For particulars apply

ACADEMY OFFICE,
63 LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

JOURNALISTIC and SECRETARIAL TRAINING FOR LADIES.—

Rapid systematic coaching. Special course in journalism. Excellent introductions given.—Telephone or write, THE TRIANGLE SECRETARIAL OFFICES, 61, South Molton Street, W.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words.

Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Fourteen years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION: Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free.

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Offices of
THE ACADEMY, 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

To

.....

Please send me THE ACADEMY for the next..... months.

I enclose remittance value.....

Name.....

Description.....

Address.....

CONTENTS

	PAGE		PAGE
Notes of the Week	195	The Theatre :
Unforgotten	196	"A Midsummer Night's
Lifeless Accuracy	196	Dream" at the Savoy
The University of London...	197	Theatre	214
Music and Cant	198	"Broadway Jones" at the
The Companionable Fem-		Prince of Wales's
nine	199	Theatre	215
Reviews :		"The Tyranny of Tears"
Various Verses	200	at the Comedy
Richard Cœur de Lion ...	202	Theatre	215
Taxation and Pleasure ...	203	The Drama Society at the
A Corner of West Africa ...	204	Rehearsal Theatre ...	216
A French Décadent	205	Mr. Walker Whiteside at
Shorter Reviews	206	the Queen's Theatre	217
Fiction	207	Portrait Painters at the
Music : "Parsifal" at		Royal Institute	217
Covent Garden	209	At St. Stephen's Shrine...	218
The Old Guard and New		Imperial and Foreign Affairs	219
Views	211	In the Temple of Mammon	221
The Magazines	212	Correspondence	222
		Books Received	224

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazines rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post-free.

The EDITORIAL AND ADVERTISING OFFICE is at 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

Notes of the Week

IT is difficult to reconcile our impressions of the Frenchwoman with a vehement desire to obtain the vote—to obtain it, in fact, by violent means if peaceable methods will not suffice. In other words, it is not easy to imagine the vivacious ladies of France as "militants." Yet there comes news this week from the Paris correspondent of the Times, of the formation of a "Ligue Nationale pour le Vote des Femmes," determined and energetic, members of which pour vituperative scorn on the more moderate "Union Française pour le Suffrage des Femmes," which refuses to resort to extreme measures. Truly English history repeats itself—in other lands! The new League, we understand, is going to "march forward and show what women can do." Our sympathies are with France in this fresh trouble; but probably the Frenchman will regard petty outbreaks of window-smashing and incendiarism as an occasion for epigram and brilliant conversation. At any rate, such an association is a profitless venture at the present time, for the introduction of ill-temper and ridiculous, spiteful acts on the borderland of crime and insanity defeats its own ends. These enterprising ladies should have paid more attention to the pathetic failure of their English sympathisers before casting aside common sense and self-respect.

Mr. H. Wickham Steed, who has been absent from this country for more than twenty-one years, has come back full of reproaches. Addressing the Royal Institution, he complained of the average British diplomat abroad, and announces that nothing impresses him more than the "ignorance, insularity, and sleepy carelessness of the British nation." Disregarding the other two terms for the moment, we may note that in the mysterious evolution of meaning which words undergo, "insular," a harmless enough adjective, has come to signify "narrow" or "prejudiced." If we admit that as a people we are hard to move, even a little obstinate, we are not at all sure that this is a disadvantage; that same obstinacy has proved a very useful attribute in past years, and to misconstrue it into narrowness or prejudice seems to infer a certain amount of obliquity of vision on the part of the critic. We are not necessarily "ignorant" or "sleepy" because we do not grow excited and voluble at the slightest provocation. It is interesting to compare with Mr. Steed's assertions the recent statements of Mr. Taft, the former President of the United States, at Toronto. After prolonged study of our colonial system and our methods of government, he said, he was forced to the conclusion that "but for English enterprise, courage, and sense of responsibility in governing other races human civilisation would have been greatly retarded."

The efforts of the correspondents of provincial newspapers to express themselves gracefully are often very amusing. We noted, a week or two ago, a letter in a West-country daily which concluded thus: "Please permit me to point out that the splendid facilities which have been afforded by the Press in giving publicity to the subject-matter of this and similar communications during the last seven months have been a considerable contribution to, and of the greatest value in, what will very shortly have been a general reduction all round to a minimum of the needless and avoidable dangers indicated." The writer of this remarkable effusion signs himself very aptly, "Rambler," and in a previous portion of the letter alludes to his "pleasant peripatetic peregrinations." The whole gist of his communication could easily be compressed into one-third of the space; but then, of course, the author would miss the plaudits of his friends upon his magnificent command of language.

Some enthusiastic and sleepless person has been advocating in the columns of a well-known scientific paper the painting of buildings with a phosphorescent material. By the simple process of repainting London, for example, we might have "an automatic equalisation of the light-energy of the sun," since each wall would "return the stored sunlight during the night." There is no limit to the soaring schemes of the faddist, but to do away with darkness really seems carrying things off with a high hand. We would doom such a man to live for a week in his ghostly city that shines at midnight with stolen beams; we warrant he would soon be found beneath the earth, in the darkest corner of the deepest tube, craving only the boon of loneliness and sleep.

Unforgotten

A SILENT, desolate and unsearchable sea,
Linking I know not what far isles of grey,
Lies now, beloved, between myself and thee.

Its marge is crested by no slanting sail
Bringing thee home again the silver way;
No pharos reddens on its girdle pale.

And canst thou never come to me again,
Never again towards the harbour steer,
Scarring the brown sands with thine anchor-chain?

Yet it were not all bitter, not all sad,
To con once more the chronicle old and dear
Of unforgotten seasons blossom-glad.

If I might dream that on some other strand,
Though other lips were folded against thine,
Some other Spring blessed thee with its green wand!

Art thou beyond the morning's exquisite arc
That turns the waters of the east to wine?
Can the sun shine, and thou be in dark?

If it be so, and I must bow to this
Annihilation of all dreams divine,
I know that thou art dead, and what death is.

DOROTHY MARGARET STUART.

Lifeless Accuracy

THERE is something both admirable and pathetic in the unflagging perseverance of people who write—as distinct, we may say, from people whose writings are published and paid for. Apart from stories, ordinary articles, and verse, ten or twelve contributions are received every week, at the office of almost any paper, which may be covered by the generic title of "essay." They come frequently from the same persons; they are often excellent in phrasing and grammar; but they are lifeless and depressing.

It is impossible to help picturing the conscientious author, sometimes, sitting at his desk or table, having written, let us say, the word "Winter"—a favourite subject just now, and so topical—in large, clear characters at the top of his clean sheet. Many interesting remarks throng through his brain. He points out that Winter is the period of the year when Nature rests and the earth sleeps; that it has its beauties as well as Summer; that it contains Christmas, which he will certainly term "the festive season." This will carry him on for five hundred words or so; after which he may comment cheerily on the charms of skating, the "ring of the blade on the firm ice," or on the delights of a walk on a frosty morning and the fireside at the end of it—and two of his paragraphs will begin with the fatal "Then there is. . . ." Inevitably he will conclude by showing how Spring, with her snowdrops and daffodils, is near at hand; how the earth "wakes at last from its long slumber"; how the fleecy clouds sail across the blue sky; and how happy we all ought to be. Thus he accomplishes his thousand words with immense self-satisfaction; it is all perfectly correct, quite harmless, and absolutely useless, and would have been just as correct, harmless, and useless had he chosen a different theme.

Such unprofitable contributions, betraying their character in the first three or four sentences, are returned as a matter of course, save by the very few papers—gentle, uninspiring, soporific sheets!—which print them and send six free copies as payment. For these the author is grateful; he feels that evidently his work is appreciated, even if not at its true value; and from this moment nothing can stay his industry, nothing can subdue his elation. "By the way, I had a little thing in last week's number of The Primrose," he says casually; "care to see it? They seem rather to like my stuff; I just send them something now and then. Not much of it, of course; but then there isn't a great demand for that sort of writing. . . . You can take that copy if you like; they always send me two or three when my stuff appears. Awfully glad you like it; yes, of course, it takes a lot of thinking out. I'll let you know when the next is in."

It is not fair, perhaps, to poke fun at the inexperienced writer who thus has to stand on tip-toe to reach the lowest rung of the ladder; certainly it is not right to sneer at him. He is, in his small way, an artist, striving seriously enough for self-expression, feeling the pull of something big and fine outside his mediocre, humdrum existence, something which as yet he can but dimly apprehend. Possibly he will remain for years on these unpromising levels, writing pretty little articles in his spare time, using familiar phrases, quoting hackneyed scraps of poetry, retaining his good opinion of himself; this often happens. There may come a moment, however, when his eyes are opened to magical horizons, when the knowledge that words may be music, that sentences may be harmonies, and that hitherto he has been as a novice fumbling at the manuals of a mighty organ, comes to him; and then he may move quickly. He will become aware that all he has done is the mere unguided, aimless picking out of an old tune with one finger, while there are keyboards and ranks of stops and melodious thunders freely at his disposal when he shall have spent patient, eager days in the learning of them; he will realise that within the instrument so wonderfully revealed lie fugues and fantasias and symphonies unheard, that it may rest with him, even him, to create them and send them ringing forth. Then, if he succeed, our laughter will have been proved premature; and if he does but manage to bring some simple, pleasing music from that complex array, there will be honour in his failure, and dignity in his despair.

W. L. R.

The University of London

SMALL, unconsidered revolutions are everywhere about us. Probably neither the public nor the press has entirely appreciated the significance of certain commotions which have recently agitated that generally serene body, the University of London. The University has been told, by all the authority of a Royal Commission, that it cannot properly be said to exist, and that, if it is said to exist, then it is utterly unsuitable, ineffective for its purpose, and proper for amendment out of recognition.

London University, as it is known by its intimates—the world at large knows it not at all—is the hybrid offspring of a vicious compromise. For years commissioners have sat upon and considered it. For years they have made recommendations in respect of it. And for years there have been at work forces which have nullified all their conclusions and all their advice. The University came into existence eighty years ago as a body competent to examine and confer degrees upon two Colleges in London, King's and University; at first its scope was limited to this function, and as a consequence its graduates were all school-trained men. But because the popular desire for culture outdistanced the facilities available for its acquisition, the University found itself in the middle of the nineteenth century a purely examining body, conferring degrees on students, whose only qualification was their ability to answer questions set at examination. London University degrees, while they stood for high study and dexterity in the examination room, implied naught of that important something which is the essence of University education: that training in life and manners and modes of thought which, as well as academic attainment, it is the business of a University to supply, and of its degree to signify.

In the late 'eighties a reaction against this mutilated conception of the University ideal set in, and it has continued and developed with growing vehemence ever since. The need in London for a teaching University was emphasised with accumulating insistence. It found expression in the report of the Selborne Commission which examined the matter in 1888. It was prominent in the findings of the Gresham Commission's report of 1894. It was reiterated with urgency in the recommendations of Lord Haldane's Commission of 1913. There is little doubt that the scheme of the Gresham Commission would have been given the force of legislative enactment in 1895 but for one important fact. That fact was the existence of a large and important body of graduates, whose degrees rested on the results of study and examinations alone. In deference to the prejudices of this body, out of regard for the interests that had grown up alongside and by reason of it, and not least because this external side (as it came to be called) satisfied a real and reasonable want, the legislature compromised on the scheme of the Commission, and brought into being the University with which London is now provided.

The government of the University is entrusted to-day to the hands of two opposed, irreconcilable, and mutually neutralising forces, the Council for External Students, which represents the interests of the external students and graduates, and the Academic Council, whose business is to endeavour to develop the training or collegiate side of University life. These Councils are dominated by incompatible ideals. Neither of them is able effectively to impress its wishes on the Senate: each is strong enough to thwart the other; and there is a deadlock between them. The external side is numerically the stronger. The internal side is of rapidly increasing importance, and contains the whole promise of the future. And so the matter rests at present, awaiting further parliamentary consideration.

One factor alone calls for further comment. All suddenly a new spirit is manifest in the London University undergraduate. The students have come to corporate life and sense. For the first time in history they have met to discuss University business. The Jehangier Hall at the University Buildings was barely sufficient to accommodate a huge gathering of them last November; and when, at the close of this meeting, it was realised that a heated discussion on the proposals of the Royal Commission had by no means exhausted itself, the authorities found it necessary to allow the adjourned meeting to take place in the Great Hall of the University. At the conclusion of the debate nearly 1,500 students were present, and the occasion was marked by really powerful and able speeches. A resolution endorsing the recommendations of the Haldane Commission was carried by a large majority.

This is not all. For years a Council, representative of the students of the University, has carried on an inglorious and unconsidered existence. Under the guidance of an able chairman and an energetic secretary, it has recently emerged into an active importance, of which the meeting already referred to is the earliest manifestation. Within the last few weeks the first number of its new organ, The Undergraduate, has appeared, and to this venture we tender our hearty congratulations. The corporate life of the London University student is at last an accomplished fact. We trust that life to increase and expand. We believe that for London University there is reserved a dignified and splendid destiny, proportionate to the dignity and splendour of London itself, and comparable with the dignity and splendour of any University in the world.

G. T. L.

The tale of a full and adventurous career is told in "The Life of Admiral Sir Harry Rawson," Governor of New South Wales. He first saw active service at thirteen years of age in the China War of 1858-60, and as an admiral commanded the Benin Expedition of 1897. The book includes a chapter on his brother, Commander Wyatt Rawson, who led the historic night march over the desert to Tel-el-Kebir. Mr. Edward Arnold is the publisher.

Music and Cant

MUSIC is supposed to be a universal passion. The "savage breast," we are told, is not impregnable to its assaults; the man of culture is mostly impelled to offer it some kind of lip-service. The most facile and insensible of poets, Dryden, ascribes to it most of the miracles in earth and heaven. Nearly everyone likes to be thought to possess at least a minimum of that faculty which has been held to constitute, with the higher mathematics, the most eloquent "intimation of immortality" that we have. The man who says that he does not understand or care for music—of some kind—is either a superman or a super-decadent. He exists; the A.D.C. in "General John Regan" was drawn from life, though it would tax our ingenuity to know into which of our just-invented categories to put him; Jowett undoubtedly said to a famous musician, "I don't like music, but I'm glad I've heard you play." A Socialist musician of our acquaintance once went so far as to declare that, in the perfect state, music would be no longer wanted:

No further show or need for that old coat.

But the prophet was evidently searing his own soul with his paradox. He was a musician after all.

Where the obligation exists, or is supposed to exist, to think or talk about certain subjects, there the weed called cant is sure to thrive. This weed has many varieties. Religion, patriotism, love, are each the soil not of one, but of many cants; to every universal passion a score of imitative insincerities; and how should music, sharing this universality, escape the common curse?

One of the worst varieties of cant, because the most incurable, is the cant of having no cant. The French anti-clerical, at his worst, affords a good example of this kind of insincerity. We all have our cant, but we all have the antidote in our sack; it is called humility; this man has thrown it away. The musical representatives of this type are the people who, loving to perform or to hear good music, are afraid of being thought too cultured. To preserve the fair garment of their reputation from any fancied stain of intellectuality they will impose on themselves every kind of torture. They deny themselves access to the more serious concert-halls, where they know they would find delight; or, if they enter, it is in Arimathæan fashion or fortified by some sound social pretext. To their domestic circle they preach the methods of Grand-Guignol; rag-times jostle requiems, and the greatest music is only excused and shyly admitted either for its familiarity or for certain qualities which it appears to share with the smallest. Their tastes and their scruples render possible "Parsifal" in a music-hall and Beethoven's Symphonies in a Copenhagen restaurant.

Next to these in the hierarchy of insincerity we should place their mortal enemies, the intense and never-bending intellectuals. Their attitude is often intelligible and respectable; their fault lies in the persistent denial of their own probable human weakness—the temptation to "desipere in loco." We say "probable," because we believe this temptation to be, with the exceptions that the idea of universality always carries, an inseparable accident of human nature. The cant of intellectuality—the pursuit of intellectual things purely with a view to the self-righteous glow and the feeling of superiority that such things may give—is one of the deadliest vices. But between intellectuality and intellectuality, the two poles of the intelligence, though the distance is great, the distinction is more than hard; we are in danger of confounding sinner and saint.

The attitude of literary men towards music has varied with the centuries and with the countries of the world, but the retort wrung from Gluck by the provocations of the Encyclopædists contains the elements of a general truth: "il y a apparence que ces messieurs sont plus heureux lorsqu'ils écrivent sur d'autres matières." The true homme de lettres takes all knowledge for his province; and quite rightly!—he is our interpreter—how otherwise are we to know anything? But he is irritated and baffled by the discovery that there is one thing that seems to hide itself from the wise and prudent and to reveal itself to babes. He resents the exclusiveness of music. Autocrat or oligarch perhaps in everything else, he is a leveller in this. He will banish all the music that he does not understand, and recognise only that which appeals to a large number of untrained or insensible ears, including his own. We cannot understand this tyranny; it is that which Gluck's opponents wanted to exercise, and we have heard it advocated in our own circle of friends. The literary man finds that music escapes him; let him remember the higher mathematics; here is another exclusiveness, and one that he cannot hope to break down.

Allusions to music are to be found in every poet. It is extraordinary how vague these allusions mostly are. The best are contained in very short, non-committal phrases:

The setting sun and music at the close.

The glory of the sun of things
Will flash along the chords and go.

Music when soft voices die
Vibrates in the memory.

It is the brevity of veneration; it is the "Altar to the Unknown God." Dryden's is the vulgar expansiveness of familiarity. We can think of only two English poets who have shown that they understood music—Milton and Robert Browning. One of the greatest world-poets, Goethe, has expressed, though not in poetry, a curious miscomprehension of the federal laws that govern the republic of the Arts. His tolerance of Schubert's "Erlkönig" and his contempt for other musical versions of his poems are alike instructive.

Of those who have written in prose about music, Shorthouse and Pater have shown knowledge and perception. The professional critics may be divided into those who know the limits of their province and those who do not. The latter have a habit of assuming that what they choose to read into a piece of music must be patent to the world; the choicest blossoms of the weed called cant are of their watering. The distinguished critic of a London daily paper, with a Nonconformist nuance, once expressed his disgust at seeing "clergymen of the Established Church" keep their places, without blush or protest, through the lascivious strains of "L'Après-midi d'un Faune."

Musicians writing on their own art are generally intolerable. If we started our acquaintance with Wagner by reading Wagner's prose and Wagner's theories, we should probably never face the "Ring" and "Tristan." The Futurists are now giving us a burlesque version of Wagner's procedure.

For the more ordinary kind of cant there are three tests: Can the claimant to musical taste whistle, hum or strum a recognisable version of a song or piece he is supposed to admire?—can he recognise at the third bar a piece he has more than once heard performed?—and—does he spend more time listening to music than he does talking about it?

R. F. SMALLEY.

The Companionable Feminine

And swore he long'd at college, only longed,
All else was well, for she-society.

IN the majority of books on fishing, that agreeable injunction cherchez la femme is an unremunerative one. The late W. Earl Hodgson was one of the very few angling writers since Walton to admit the feminine element to his pages, and Mr. Sheringham has endeared to us one Amaryllis, who, though she cannot tell a chub from a salmon, has curling eyelashes as killing in their way as any trout fly.

Why this depressing lack of "she-society" in our sport? Possibly because the few women who fish take so workmanlike a view of it as to be socially neither desirous nor desirable when on the water. They are out to fish, not to flirt, and would rather have for company a weather-beaten gillie in fustian than the smartest dandy in the Guards. Hunting appears to be the only field sport in which the sexes meet on the same footing, for the woman with a fancy for standing behind a man when he is shooting grouse or pheasants thinks more of her own cap than of his birds. In the hunting field, on the other hand, Diana is no less keen than Nimrod. I am not forgetting that there have been Masters of Hounds with ungallant but emphatic views on the subject, but even they would probably concede that the vast majority of these fair followers of the chase are out to gallop and not to philander. There may be moments of soft relenting outside the covert or while riding home, but, with hounds in full cry, the very last thought in their minds is to make themselves either attractive or companionable, and if they accept the lead of a pilot, it is certainly not for the pleasure of his society.

Their sisters on river, lake, or sea are hardly the Companionable Feminine of our empty dreams. They are sufficient unto themselves, keener even than their brothers, and possessed by a spirit of independence that is clearly fatal to companionship. They don unsightly brogues and waders and throw a fly as well as their lords, if not indeed better. They are anything and everything you please; but they are, emphatically, not companions.

Speaking generally, I do not doubt but the fisherman is best alone. Yet there is joy in the right company. In that he who sings the praises of his paragon in petticoats must need seem a shocking egoist, it needs a little courage to catalogue the virtues of the ideal woman to take a-fishing. To begin with, she should like him a great deal and his fishing a very little. This means that she will rejoice at his success and condole with his failure. At lunch time, she becomes the ministering angel, and on the homeward way she will lend a ready ear to the tedious story of his day's sport. The comradeship that breathes from her face is better than music, unless you are more of a poet than a fisherman.

All this, no doubt, argues her companion a selfish fellow, yet woman was ever happier in giving than in receiving, and so long as she has much liking for his company, and little for his sport, her part need not be a hard one. As to the right man for her to go a-fishing with, I dare not, failing her point of view, particularise too closely. He should be considerate for her comfort. If she is nervous of the cows that graze in the water meadows, he should not jeer, but should contrive to take her wide of them. He should show appreciation of the meal that she has been at pains to prepare, and he should, above all, put his rod away in good time, that she may not have a breathless scramble for the train. Above all, however, even though it should involve carrying her dryshod across the stream (not a necessarily uncongenial service), he should not ask her to wet her feet, for there are women who hate wet feet more even than sin. If she helps him with the landing net, he should bring each fish close to the bank, so that she runs no risk of losing her balance.

Quien peces quiere, mojarse tiene, says the Spanish proverb, or, in other words, you cannot catch fish without getting wet. Let the man, if he so please, stand in water up to his neck, but he has no right whatever to inflict the same penalty on his fair companion.

Although the ideal companion is not herself fond of fishing, it is not always impossible to find pleasure in the company of an enthusiast. Anthony was not the only man to fish with Cleopatra, even on the Nile; but the serious business of fishing suffered woefully on such occasions, for there was need of playing gillie, rowing the boat, baiting the hook, bestowing fulsome praise on insignificant achievement, or even, when a cast broke, or a hold gave, stemming the tide of silent grief ἀδάκρυτον ἀδάκρυτα with such comfort as we could muster. No; it was not worth calling fishing, yet we would not lightly forgo the memory of those days in Arcady.

Yet I make bold to say that no man who takes his sport seriously should go fishing with the girl he is in love with. It is spoiling two good things. There is a time for courting and another for fishing, but you cannot do both at once, and the amorous angler should put his rod and fly-book clean out of his thoughts until he has either lost his lady or won her. Once they have parted, or once they are wed, let him fish again with all his old enthusiasm. What I hold to be impossible is for a man to keep one eye on his float and the other on her face, or to cast with any approach to accuracy over a feeding trout when he is wondering all the time, not whether the fish is going to take his fly, but whether the girl is going to let him kiss her. I remember seeing a man at a music-hall play the violin while he was balancing an umbrella on the rim of his hat, but such a feat was child's play compared with the bewildering business of fishing and making love at the same moment.

No; it must be one thing, or the other.

Then leapt a trout. In lazy mood
I watched the little circles die;
They passed into the level flood,
And there a vision caught my eye:
The reflex of a beauteous form,
A glowing arm, a gleaming neck. . . .

All of which is delightful, and I am the last man to depreciate such attractions. But they should be anathema to the fisherman while he is on the water.

It has been said that much of the regard must be on the lady's side, and for this reason I fancy that the most companionable feminine for the keen fisherman is a younger sister who is devoted to him. Happy the man who can count on the company of such a fancy-free maiden, anxious to please him, without any thought of his pleasing her! She is untiring and careless of appearances. She will net his fish, carry his creel, or unravel his tangled line. She is quick to help and to sympathise, and her prompt cry of "Well done!" or "Hard luck!" as occasion may require, is very heartening. Few men are so lucky, but many years ago, when I was not so wicked or so foolish as I am to-day, I knew of a case. As I remember them, they were inseparable. She cared for no one but her big brother, then home from Sandhurst, and we other lads made our sheep's eyes from the safe distance of the other bank in vain. Then I lost sight of them for many years. When I met him again, a little east of Suez, he had lost his taste for fishing, and she, having meanwhile married a brother officer of his, lay buried in the cemetery of an Indian hill station.

Mr. Durrant Swan, who, in addition to being lessee of the Ambassadors Theatre, has, in his time, been interested in various successful musical comedy tours, announces that preparations for the opening performance of "The Joy-Ride Lady"—due in about three weeks at the New Theatre—are very well advanced.

REVIEWS

Various Verse

- The Lonely Dancer, and Other Poems.* By RICHARD LE GALLIENNE. (John Lane. 5s. net.)
Cromwell, and Other Poems. By JOHN DRINKWATER. (David Nutt. 5s. net.)
Lyrical Poems. By THOMAS MACDONAGH. (Dublin: The Irish Review. 6s. net.)
Echoes. By A. L. H. ANDERSON. (Elkin Mathews. 2s. 6d. net.)
A Sea Anthology. Selected and Illustrated by ALFRED RAWLINGS. (Gay and Hancock. 3s. 6d. net.)
Colombine, a Fantasy; and Other Verses. By REGINALD ARKELL; with some Drawings by FREDERICK CARTER. (Sidgwick and Jackson. 1s. net.)
Nature's Interviews, and Other Poems. By MURIEL E. GEORGE. (Eastbourne: Alex. Clayton. 1s. 6d. net.)

WHAT shall we say of Mr. Le Gallienne? Sweet singer as ever, full of his pretty conceits, he yet fails to take his place among the poets who move us. "Ah, bosom made of April flowers!" he exclaims; and in "Flos Ævorum" sings:

All time hath travelled to this rose;
To the strange making of this face
Came agonies of fires and snows.

A hundred lines could be quoted on the same model; "Alma Venus" gives us the same sort of thing:

O land made out of distance and desire!
With ports of mystic pearl and crests of fire.

There are a few stronger poems in this book; the picture of the "East-bound flyer for New York, Soft as a magic-lantern slide," speeding through the orchard where—

The apples and the moonlight fell Together on the railroad track—this is one memorable little lyric; but the verses which treat of love and death awaken no overwhelming response; they are too much in the sweet-melancholy vein. Page after page inclines us to say, "How pretty—how charming!" but not one passage can bring the sigh, the thrill, the tear. The poem to Emerson we can only regret:

Seeds of the silver flower of Emerson:
One, on the winds to Scotland brought, did sink
In Carlyle's heart; and one was lately blown
To Belgium, and flowered in—Maeterlinck.

Solemnity is the note of Mr. Drinkwater's poems. He is the serious artist, bent on fine, right expression; down far below the surface-pretty of things he seeks a meaning and finds thoughts that glow, if they do not often burn. There is no trace of hurry, no sign of carelessness in the whole of this delightful little book, nor is there any futile attempt to deal in showy words, the jewels of language that become paste in the hands of the incompetent. At the same time, the resonant, excellent verse is here in plenty—such lines as these, for instance:

One with the reverend presence who had been
Steward of kingly charges unbetrayed.

The gods are just; eternity
May gird me for its lordlier clime;
But here, where time encircles me,
I am a lord of time.

The title-poem, "Cromwell," is a series of pictures under separate headings—"The Call," "The Coming," "Edgehill," "Marston Moor," and so on; some of these are in rhymed couplets, others in blank verse. They leave us very slightly stirred, though the conception is good and the whole effect impressive; the "interludes" are a feature of the poem which pleases us much. One lyric in this section appears to be directly modelled on the curious measure used by Tennyson in "The Daisy." If we give one stanza of Tennyson and one from this "Entry into London" we shall see:

At Florence, too, what golden hours
In those long galleries were ours;
What drives about the fresh Casciné,
Or walks in Boboli's ducal bowers.

Along the streets of London town
Full twenty thousand men go down
In fighting gear and with faces beaten
To little of laughter in battle's frown.

Many memorable poems Mr. Drinkwater gives us, and we should like to confirm our assertion by several quotations. "The Inviolable Hour" is a grave, musical lyric, strong with subdued passion; "In Lady Street" deals with a theme which might easily have betrayed him into the snare of lilting prettiness; and "Dominion," of which we give the last two verses, is a little cheery song to be read many times:

But gladder than them all was I,
Who, being man, might gather up
The joy of all beneath the sky,
And add their treasure to my cup.

And travel every shining way,
And laugh with God in God's delight,
Create a world for every day,
And store a dream for every night.

Mr. Thomas MacDonagh announces himself with a little flourish of trumpets on his first page; he "tells the things" that he has seen and "shows the man" that he has been:—

As simply as a poet can
Who knows himself poet and man,
Who knows that unto him are shown
Rare visions of a Life unknown,
Who knows that unto him are taught
Rare words of wisdom all unsought. . .

Mr. MacDonagh is quite sure that he is a poet; we are not so sure. Pages of rhyme and pretty thoughts and smooth words do not constitute poetry. Let us cull a few lines from the long effort called "O Star of Death":—

Wisdom's voice is the voice
Of a child who sings to a star
With a cry of, Hail and rejoice!
And farewell to the things that are,
And hail to eternal peace,
And rejoice that the day is done,
For the night brings but release
And threatens no waking sun. . . .

There is no reason why this sort of thing should ever stop; there is no finality, no restraint, no inspiration; it is dull metal, and does not ring clearly. And how could a poet begin a poem thus:—

I once spent an evening in a village
Where the people were all taken up with tillage. . . .

On the credit side of the account we must place a really powerful thing entitled "A Dream of Hell," which has quite a mesmeric effect, and a couple of translations from the Irish. Self-criticism is the greatest need of this writer, who can, we feel sure, do good work, but who at present is far too fluent and copious.

Modestly Miss Anderson—it seems that the author must be a lady—puts forth her little book of "Echoes." The lyrics are decidedly pretty, and run trippingly; the author knows the value of varied rhythm, and manages her verses well. We like the "Gipsy Song" and the song of "An Exile" better than most of the other rhymes; the contrast in the latter piece is skilfully given:—

The hot, sweet day is over,
The flashing stars are white,
White are the orange blossoms—
The fireflies alight
Sparkle beneath the olives
In the purple velvet night.
O, the hateful, scented darkness,
I long and long in vain!—
I sicken for the moorland
And the soft small rain.

Too many of the stanzas are written on hackneyed themes; "Spring," "Dead Leaves," "The Song of the Birds," "A Dull Day"—not many poets can make these subjects interesting, unless something beyond mere description with an occasional moral is achieved.

Most of us could compile a "Sea Anthology" to please ourselves, but we should probably not be so comprehensive in research as Mr. Rawlings, who has ranged from Sophocles and Cædmon, Dante and Hakluyt, to modern times. We are surprised not to find certain of Mr. John Masefield's delightful salt-water songs and lyrics included; but we are glad to see two of Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton's exquisite sonnets. Such a volume might be extended until the writer dropped from fatigue, but in this case a wise and pleasing selection has been made, and the book, with its reproduced seascapes by the author, is one to be treasured.

To "Colombine," with its charming "Other Verses," we devoted a whole column of this paper in April, 1912; we need only say that there seems no reason to alter the high praise which we then gave it. We do wish very strongly, however—and have wished many times—that publishers would intimate on new issues that the book has appeared before. There is absolutely no indication that this volume is two years old, although we are again informed that "Colombine" was produced at the Clavier Hall in December, 1911.

The English spring appeals to Mrs. George very strongly, and her sense of it finds expression in many of the poems in "Nature's Interviews." Some of them are excellent; we prefer those which seem to have been written in India—they have a wistfulness which adds a reason for their writing:—

That tree, whose old leaves dropped but yester-morn,
Will stand new clothed to-morrow, shaking out
Her shimmering veils of beauty, sudden-born
Of Spring's sweet magic; here no glorious rout
Of buttercups and daisies gem the sod,
Only the jungle grass looks up to God.

The series of twelve poems to the months has a pleasant variation of melody and of rhythm, and the whole book, if not of any high poetic value, gives an impression of sincerity and clear thought. We wish that the same could be said of all who strive to cast their ideas into the form of verse.

Richard Cœur de Lion

Der Mittelenglische Versroman über Richard Löwenherz. Kritische Ausgabe nach allen Handschriften mit Einleitung, Anmerkungen und deutscher Übersetzung. KARL BRUNNER, Dr. Phil. (Braumüller, Wien und Leipzig. 15 marks.)

DR. BRUNNER has done well in re-editing the Middle-English ballad of Richard Cœur-de-Lion. The poem had not been edited since 1810, and then very imperfectly. The seven existing manuscripts have been industriously compared, and questions of versification, time, place and history carefully examined. It is unfortunate that the French ballad that inspired the original version of the English one has been lost, but enough material exists for a sound evaluation of the origins of the poem. The German prose translation appended by Dr. Brunner is of great service, though the text of the poem itself should be by no means difficult, even for those unskilled in Middle-English. The oldest manuscript appears to date from the end of the fourteenth century, the author was almost certainly an ecclesiastic, and he may or may not have lived in Lincolnshire.

The historical groundwork of the poem is for the most part sound and accurate, though much of the famous story of the hero's imprisonment in Austria gets embodied in an earlier and apocryphal episode. The repeated battles are rather irksome, as in most early poetry. The issue is never in doubt, the slaughter is always incredible, and the place-names are so carelessly sown about the poem that the reader must cultivate rigorous estrangement both from the atlas and any previous knowledge he may have.

But by skipping the majority of the battles and composing an ideal topography for the story, the reader of this ballad may attain to much enjoyment. Does he "fear God and hate the French"?—he will learn that

"Ffrensche men arn arwe and ffeynte," that

"Ffyghte they cunne with wurdcs lowde," but

"Whene they comen to ye mystere"

(of real fighting),

"Anon they gynne to turne here hele."

The writer is a very intense patriot, and Philip Augustus and the Duke of Austria come in for some rough treatment. As against the Saracens Heaven speaks with no uncertain voice—

"There they herden an aungele off heuene

That seyde: 'Seynyours, tuez, tuese,

Spares hem nought, behedith these!'"

Whereat

"They were behedyd hastelyke,

And caste into a ffoul dyke."

The narrative abounds in graphic touches, which mix oddly with the conventional repetitions. Here is the hero in a passion:

"In anger Rycharde toke a lofe,

The croste in his hondcs all torafe."

Humour is abundant; the device of capturing a town by throwing bee-hives over the wall is lovingly described. But the gem of the poem is the description of Richard's illness and its successful treatment: when the King lay deathly sick, and

"Aftyf pork he was alongyd," a knight said to the steward,

"Take a Sarezyn yonge and ffat;

In haste that the theff be slayn,

Openyd, and hys hyde off flayn,

And soden fful hastyly."

The dish was served:

"Beffore Kyng Rychard karf a knyghte,

He eete ffastere than he karue myghte."

Much revived, the King calls for the head, and is considerably diverted when he sees it.

The poem is a spirited and by no means inartistic composition. Where the fighting was, and why—it certainly was not to test

"Whether is off more power,

Jhesu, or ells Jubyter"— is not always plain, but, bating the bare catalogue of knocks, it was good and pleasant fighting. The edition is a good contribution to Middle English literature.

His Majesty the German Emperor has been pleased to accept a copy of "A Day with the Corps-Students in Germany," by Sir Lees Knowles, Bart., C.V.D., recently published by Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.

Taxation and Pleasure

The Nature and First Principle of Taxation. By ROBERT JONES. With a preface by SIDNEY WEBB, LL.B. (P. S. King and Son. 7s. 6d. net.)

IN R. L. Stevenson's delightful rambling story of "The Wrecker" Loudon Dodd, the sensitive young sculptor, was horrified to find an interview on himself and his art in the St. Jo Sunday Herald, by the irrepressible Jim Pinkerton, "wedged in between an account of a prize-fight and a skittish article on chiropody." "Think," he exclaims, "of chiropody treated with a leer!" Although comparatively short, this is a scientific book on a difficult and complicated subject; but to lighten it and to lure the ordinary reader on, there is a jaunty preface by Mr. Sidney Webb.

Mr. Webb is the high priest of modern Radical progressive (in more senses than one) taxation; to use an inaccurate but useful simile, he has more capacity to the square inch in his little finger than many greater politicians have in their whole bodies. He is far more dangerous because he is an accurate thinker—practical and logical—who knows what he wants and how to achieve his ends. He first educated the Fabians; then when the Progressive Party had captured the L.C.C. under the specious cry of "No politics," he proceeded to exploit its vast resources in order to propagate his theories, and a splendid time he had until the Municipal Reform Party, thanks to Captain Jessel, drove them from power. It is not unfair to say that much of the taxation of the present Government is more his work and the result of his teaching than is generally supposed. We remember his saying that he had no objection to people being taxed 20s. in the £, and defending that proposition.

Mr. Jones, who is one of his disciples in that forcing house of Socialistic theories, the London School of Economics, has written an able and plausible book from his point of view, to which Mr. Webb has put his imprimatur in the shape of the jaunty preface aforesaid. To treat such a horrid subject as taxation jocularly is almost as bad as treating chiropody with a leer.

If "bold bad Chancellors" have to pick our pockets, how, asks Mr. Webb, can it best be done? Along this line Mr. Jones conducts us skilfully enough to a practical ideal of a steeply graduated income tax which shall discreetly stop short of being "Procrustean." He shows how it might be bad to abolish some taxes even if a thousand millionaires agreed to pay all the rates and taxes in the country. There might be drawbacks, he points out, for instance, to untaxed gin, dogs and guns. Moreover, why, because the nation had collectively become richer, should it bestow largess on an arbitrarily selected minority of individual property-owners by letting them off tithe and land tax? It is time, he says, that someone made a stand for the positive advantages of taxation. In sober truth, he declares there are in the United Kingdom of to-day not a few taxes that we could not afford to lose, even if we did not need the revenue. In fact, he asserts that the nation is a sleeping partner in every firm, and spends the money far more wisely than we can spend it ourselves!

The economists told us, years ago, that of the then aggregate of private incomes at least £500,000,000 a year is spent in ways that we can in no sense justify—in riotous living that impairs our health, in foolish extravagances that actually lessen our aggregate enjoyments, in a consumption of so-called luxuries that so far from increasing our capacity, makes us at once less wealthy, less healthy, and less wise.

It is only fair to admit he is good enough to say that Government expenditure is inefficient and wasteful, but it is far more wisely done, he alleges, than the average private expenditure. This, of course, is nothing but pure Socialism, naked and unashamed, and shows the hopeless want of knowledge of human nature which can suppose that as a first step to doing away with all profits, people will toil so that its Government may spend all their earnings in the way a number of bureaucrats think will be to the general and even individual advantage.

The nature of a tax is very clearly defined in Chapter I, and there is much for reflection in the painstaking definitions. For instance, all the revenue of the British Government or the L.C.C. does not represent taxation, although at first glance it may be thought to do so. Income tax is a pure tax, but the profits from municipal tramways contain no element of taxation. (Some tax-payers, we may here say in parenthesis, feel that municipal trading very often inflicts a good deal of unnecessary taxation, and as we believe that there will not be a tramway in London twenty years hence, a great deal of waste.)

Rates are defined as a payment for something offered in return—such as water—but another subdivision shows exceptions, such as the wealthy bachelor who pays an education rate for which individually he gets nothing. The essential elements of a tax appear to be (a) That it

NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Funds Exceed £23,000,000.

"An old and first class office. Low rates a distinctive feature."—The Times.

Chief Offices :—LONDON : 61 Threadneedle Street. EDINBURGH : 64, Princes Street.

is compulsory; (b) That it is not the purchase price of something bought. The compulsion makes the tax.

If we consider how Passive Resisters are forced to contribute to Church Schools [note that our author puts this first], Quakers to the Navy, Anarchists to the Police, Churchmen to "Godless Schools," Republicans to the Monarchy, and Unionists to the salaries of Irish Nationalist Members, we find that taxes are constantly demanded and paid for, not for "nothing in return," but what is worse, for something that the payers conceive to be more mischievous than if the money had been cast into the sea.

He inquires if there is a tax element present in the Post Office, for instance. It has been said that letters could be carried in the area of London for a halfpenny, and would at that price yield a large return to a private company; if so, are Londoners taxed fifty per cent. on their penny postage? No, because you cannot isolate London—the scheme has to include the carriage of a letter from a small inland village in Scotland to a small postal area in central India, which is necessarily done at a loss. The net profit of the Post Office would, however, appear to be a tax. We have given these interesting examples to show Mr. Jones's line of argument.

The second chapter is a clear and able history of the development of ideas on taxation from the earliest times. The main principles are Equity, Economy, Certainty, Productivity, Uniformity and Generality. There is an excellent chapter on definitions, a note on family budgets and taxes, and a carefully prepared Bibliographia and Index.

The book, apart from its political hints here and there, is an excellent handbook for the statesman, the political economist, and the student. It sets out clearly much of which we are hazily aware; a dry subject is illuminated with some quaint wit, and after reading it the tax-payer will pay his rates and taxes more readily, or, at least, more resignedly, than he did before. Our thanks are therefore due to its painstaking author.

W. B.

A Corner of West Africa

Among the Primitive Bakongo. By JOHN H. WEEKS. Illustrated. (Seeley, Service and Co. 16s. net.)

MR. WEEKS spent some thirty years with the Bakongo—mainly in and about San Salvador—and gives us what in many respects is a striking book on the habits, customs, religious beliefs, and characteristics of the tribes of the Lower Congo. He worked as a missionary in that particular corner of Portuguese West Africa, but this is not a record of missionary experience. It is a serious study of "native life in all its complex stages from before birth to after death"—as Mr. Weeks rather quaintly but expressively puts it—"the native's work, fights, hunts, dances, games, stories, and loves; the diseases to which he is subject, the spirits he must cajole, and the struggles he encounters through life." His long sojourn among the Bakongo, the closeness of his relations with the King of Kongo, as he is called, and the nature of his work necessarily brought him opportunities which the mere Continent-trotter would never get. If the volume is lacking in any respect, it is in regard to the associations and influence of Portugal. The Portuguese were here centuries since; relics and remainders of their past are frequently forthcoming; San Salvador is well within the Portuguese border line on the maps; the very name is Portuguese.

Yet we are told a letter appeared in the Belgian paper Le Mouvement Géographique, in 1884, in which the King of Kongo acknowledged the King of Portugal as his liege lord. It bore the King of Kongo's mark, and was witnessed by all the white men in San Salvador at the time, except Mr. Weeks. The King was astonished and angry when he heard of it. "My brother, the King of Portugal," he said, "sent me this chair as a present, and a short time after the head padre brought me a letter to sign, saying it was a letter of thanks to the King of Portugal for this chair, and that is the only letter I ever signed my mark to or ordered to be sent." "Poor old man!" comments Mr. Weeks, "in saying 'Thank you' for a chair he had signed away the independence of his country, for the Portuguese used that letter as one of the arguments upon which they founded their claim to the ancient kingdom of Kongo." Mr. Weeks wonders how many treaties with African kings have been gained by a similar ruse. As he speaks early in his book of San Salvador as in Portuguese Congo, we are a little puzzled to know whether this document did not merely proclaim what everyone else regarded as a fact, with probably the exception of the King of Kongo himself.

The Bakongo are among the most primitive, though far from the most savage, of the peoples of Equatorial Africa. Folklorists and anthropologists will find much that is interesting in Mr. Weeks' descriptions of them, their institutions, their polygamy, their laws, their rites, their sayings, and their fetishes—local variants on the lives of other tribes and peoples in Africa. One chapter dealing with language, idioms and proverbs, is peculiarly good, and shows, as Mr. Weeks says, that these uncultured, backward folk of the Congo possess a certain keenness of intellect, a power of observation, and a felicity of expression which augurs well for their progress in civilisation. Primitive as they are, many signs are forthcoming that they are moving towards a higher and humaner plane—to wit, their attitude towards the secret societies which in the past have been an inestimable power for evil. These secret societies in the beginning probably aimed at checking the tyranny of chiefs through a sort of brotherhood. They survived to become the terror of the people themselves. We might not have to go far at home to find an analogy!

One rather curious feature of this corner of West Africa seems to be the almost total absence of big game. Mr. Weeks in his travels round and about saw only one antelope and the footmarks of an occasional elephant. It is a great event, and the hunter himself becomes a local hero, when a leopard is killed. The chief hunting enjoyed by the Bakongo is from September to November. In September the long rank grass which covers the country is fired. Antelopes, wild pigs, buffaloes, palm rats, snakes, and other creatures who hide within the depths of the growth seek to escape from the flames, and whilst the men go for the larger game, women, girls, and boys scamper over the charred vegetation in search of rat holes, the rat being a much prized delicacy. It must be a fine spectacle, it is certainly often a practice full of danger to local habitations, this firing of the grass. "At night it is a grand sight to see the hills in the distance outlined in living flames; and when the thick grasses are burning, they generate such an amount of steam in their stalks that causes them to explode with loud, gun-like reports, and the force of the explosions sends the burning grass hurrying through the night air like blazing rockets." These children of Nature, with their absurd and barbarous fetishes and charms, are not altogether lacking on the practical side. And there is at least one thing among them that they have not to learn from us in more civilised lands. They have discovered the efficacy of the strike, even in the royal residence. When the King's attitude to his wives became unreasonable, they held aloof, refused to cook for him or minister to his comforts in any way, and the King's ultimate surrender was assured. We are not told whether he ever returned the compliment by subjecting his wives to the Lock Out!

A French Décadent

Paul Verlaine. By WILFRID THORLEY. (Constable and Co. 1s. net.)

IF you do not know Paul Verlaine, it is because a sufficient number of books have not been written about him. Of all the modern French décadents, he is certainly even now the most discussed. He was a familiar figure in Bohemian Paris; he was not unknown in London. And yet the element of mystery which surrounded this man with the domelike forehead during his lifetime has never been entirely dissipated. It might indeed be said of him, as of the man out of whom seven devils were cast, that his name was legion. He combined the aspirations of a saint with the performances of a satyr. He could pour out his soul in passionate pleadings to an offended God. He could—and did—write verses the obscenity of which must have brought a blush even into the faces of the trolls and sluts who inspired them.

Mr. Thorley's little book certainly helps us to a clearer understanding of the man. It is a sane and just appreciation. Verlaine's unquestionable genius is fully recognised, and no attempt is made to palliate his faults—if so mild a word as faults can properly be used to describe the vices of a man whose life, at the best, was a moral wreck. Above all, Mr. Thorley is too sincere a writer to urge the hackneyed and hypocritical plea that a genius is exempt from those obligations of morality which are incumbent upon a mere ordinary member of society. He seeks not to defend Verlaine, but to explain him.

And Verlaine wants a good deal of explaining. His life teems with inconsistencies. He came very near to being a murderer, but there was that about him which, in happier times and in happier circumstances, might have produced a martyr. We see him the reckless debauchee of the Paris gutters. We see him, too, the blameless instructor of an English county family. He was sent to prison for the assassination of a man who shadowed him throughout his earlier life as his evil genius; and it was in prison that he wrote such lines as these:—

Mon Dieu m'a dit : Mon fils, il faut m'aimer. Tu vois
Mon flanc percé, mon cœur qui rayonne et qui saigne,
Et mes pieds offensés que Madeleine baigne
De larmes, et mes bras douloureux sous le poids

De tes péchés, et mes mains ! . . .

Such a fervour of devotion would not have seemed strange in the writer of the "Imitatio Christi." But it would be more than strange to imagine Thomas à Kempis as having written the "Chansons des Ingénues," to name one of the more reputable of Verlaine's lighter poems.

That he was capable of deep emotion is undeniable. The man, at his worst, was the victim of a remorse that must have been terrible. That he was capable of any abiding emotion, however, may well be disputed. Conversion came to him in jail. "His life thereafter," writes Mr. Thorley, "was a continued see-saw between whole-hearted wantonness and the rigours of repentance, and he seems to have found each of an equal savour."

The conflicting emotions and experiences which made up his life are mirrored in his verse. And, after all, it is with this that the critic is mainly concerned. In Paul Verlaine there flamed the soul of a poet. It is no business of ours to pass judgment upon his crimes, which will be brought before the bar of a higher tribunal. The mournful music of the "Chanson d'Automne" will make glad and sad the hearts of men long after the memory of those crimes has faded like that dead leaf of which the poet sings. Coppée—poet and Catholic—knew Verlaine as well as any man. And this is what Coppée said about him: "Let us salute respectfully the grave of a true poet, let us bow down before the coffin of a child."

Mr. de Morgan's long-promised novel, "When Ghost Meets Ghost," is ready this week, published—as have been all Mr. de Morgan's other works—by Mr. William Heinemann. The book in many ways, we understand, reminds the reader of "Joseph Vance," while humour, for which the author has so rightly won a reputation, is a pronounced feature of the novel. A particularly delightful character is a retired prize-fighter who lives off the Tottenham Court Road.

Shorter Reviews

Considérations sur l'Art Dramatique à propos de la Comédie de Bernard Shaw. By AUGUSTIN et HENRIETTE HAMON. (Eugène Figuière and Co., Paris. 1 fr.)

WE have already had occasion to notice M. Hamon's enthusiasm for Mr. Bernard Shaw, as developed in "Le Molière du XXe siècle." The author has spared us the trouble of referring back to that work by inserting an exhaustive little précis of it in the present essay. We believe we hinted at "rivers in Macedon," when we discussed M. Hamon before; the phrase is still difficult to avoid. And it is impossible to forget that M. Hamon's appreciation of Mr. Shaw's humour was painfully acquired—"fit, non nascitur."

M. and Mme. Hamon have a cold-blooded way with them in analysing humour. The novice of the dissecting room may be forgiven if he experiences qualms in watching the process. This or that phenomenon of humour—"on l'a constaté chez Molière, Ben Jonson, Holberg" . . . "on peut le constater chez Ben Jonson, Molière, Holberg." Humour under the knife, humour docketed and dessicated, is difficult to recognise as humour. And yet the work has to be done, we suppose, from time to time, and, if the best anatomist is a good, callous dissector, M. and Mme. Hamon are certainly well qualified. "Callous" is perhaps an odd word to apply to them; we use it because it suits our metaphor. In other respects our critics are sensitive, not to say sentimental. They end with a fine lyrical outburst on the familiar theme that Wagner was once hissed, and we may be sorry some day if we hiss somebody else.

The essay is quite short, and full of suggestive things, suggested mainly to the authors by a fine passage of Bergson that is quoted, with characteristic sincerity, at length.

Roswitha. By OTTO ERNST. Parts I and II. Second Edition. (A. C. Caton. 2s. net each.)

It is quite possible to write about children and childish matters in a way that is simple and at the same time exceedingly dull and uninteresting; but in these short sketches of Roswitha—the first when she is three and the second when she is four years old—and her father there are no dreary passages, no boring details. All is as bright as the little maiden herself, a charming mite who turns her father from the study of "Critique of Pure Reason" to play with her tireless self for a whole day. Both books are quite short, but they leave one with the impression that the little that has been said was well worth recording, and thanks are also due to the translator for the good rendering into English.

History of the Nations. Part I. (Hutchinson and Co. 7d. net.)

By starting the above series another attempt is made to bring some knowledge of ancient races and the development of modern ones within reach of the general public. The compilers promise that the work shall not exceed fifty fortnightly parts, therefore it cannot be expected that very great detail concerning each can be given; but if, as was suggested last week in the review of "Harmsworth Popular Science," this and succeeding numbers stimulate a reader's thirst for greater knowledge and cause him to pursue further for wider information, a good result will have been achieved. Egypt is the country dealt with in the first number, after a lengthy and illustrated introduction has pre-faced the work. No pains have been spared in making the illustrations as good and varied as possible in both the introduction and the actual text. Some have been specially painted for the History; others are reproductions; but all are good and greatly add to the value of the publication. We await with pleasure the forthcoming numbers.

The Old Wood-Carver. By SIR HUBERT VON HERKOMER, R.A., and SIEGFRIED HERKOMER. Illustrated. (Stanley Paul and Co. 1s. net.)

THIS tale of fourteenth century life is now written by Mr. Saxon Mills. We presume his work is, in effect, to report the happenings on the cinematograph film which Sir Hubert von Herkomer and Mr. Siegfried have invented, and in which the well-known artist enacted the leading character. We have been so often bored by being obliged to watch the productions of the cinema theatres that we own we approached this present volume with what the Chinese call a strong feeling of "no enthusiasm." But Sir Hubert is himself a brilliant artist and craftsman, versatile and widely experienced, and he and his assistants have been enabled to effect an appreciable improvement in this, to us, incomplete and generally uninteresting form of dramatic expression.

It is well known that the Herkomers come of a race of wood-carvers, and that the present head of the house in England is a devoted labourer in that craft. Thus he may be supposed to be able to throw himself heart and soul into his representation of a fourteenth century type he both knows and admires. He appears in most of the illustrations to this book as a venerable and dignified master who bears such trials as come his way with nobility and high courage.

The story of "The Old Wood-Carver" is as old and far more simple than the art itself. He has great victories and happiness in his work and home, but his beautiful daughter leaves his house with a gifted apprentice and is married to him, although the father had made totally different plans for her. We see his suffering and regret and rage. We see, also, the life of the young couple, who are eventually restored to the love of the old wood-carver by means of their child. The plot of a cinema film must, we presume, be clear and on well-worn lines; if that be so, the present undertaking fulfils its purpose admirably.

The photographs which form the long sequence of the film were all taken near Bushey, where Sir Hubert has his home, and his direction and personality can be felt throughout the undertaking. No doubt the craft—or is it art?—of the cinematograph is now in its youngest salad days, but in the hands of such an accomplished family as that of the Herkomers it should soon blossom into a flower of beauty and develop into a refreshing entertainment.

The Land and the People. (John Murray. 1s. net.)

THIS small volume of ninety pages consists of a reprint of the special articles on the land problem which appeared in the Times last year. It would be difficult to put too high an estimate on the value of the book to those who, not having extensive first-hand knowledge at command, are nevertheless anxious to form a sound practical judgment on the most important political questions of what one may, perhaps, describe as the panto-post future. The volume is in the nature of a text-book and a summary, and is chiefly designed to lay before the reader the main facts present to the mind of a well-informed person considering the exigencies and possibilities of reform of the English land system. "The root of the whole matter," says the author of the book, "is that agriculture is, and has long been, a sick industry, and the problem is how to cure it, as an industry, not by treating parts of it, and still less by setting one part against another, but by infusing life into it as a whole." The statistical details given in the volume are well selected and very useful; and the writer offers several timely warnings against impulsive and partisan treatment of the nation's agricultural difficulties, and enforces his warnings by temperate and strongly supported argument. His most important conclusion in relation to legislation now in prospect is expressed in the following passage on "Owners or Tenants?":

A violent and unnecessary controversy has arisen on the respective merits of the two systems. . . . One suits some men and some conditions best, the other suits others. But so far as keeping the population on the land is concerned, there is no question that for the most energetic and enterprising men the prospect of ownership is the most powerful of attractions and its realisation the strongest tie. . . .

There are other men of different temperament or differently situated who do not wish to be owners and prefer to be tenants. . . .

. . . No class should be left out of view; but perhaps the most promising line now opening out for the regeneration of village life is that of colonisation by groups of cultivators in co-operation; and experience goes to show that owners, who have to depend on themselves, are more ready to co-operate than tenants.

Fiction

The Three Trees. By GUY RAWLENCE. (T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

PHILIP GIFFORD, in addition to inheriting a reasonable competence, found on reaching maturity that he was also the possessor of a family curse, one that had operated with great success for a matter of three hundred years or so. The acquisition of the knowledge made him a fatalist—though not sufficiently to prevent him from marrying—and when the curse became due to act he sat down to await its falling. The book is the life history of this selfish, illogical mortal up to the age of thirty; its first part is taken up with his childish days at Salisbury, where he lived with two maiden aunts and made the acquaintance of Antonia, a little Italian girl whom he subsequently met again and married. A third of the way through the story Philip, now arrived at maturity, learns of the family curse—a healthy, full-blooded curse it is, too—and thenceforth he flings up his occupation and goes wandering, to meet again with Antonia, grown to womanhood in the interval of fifteen years. From the moment of their meeting on the Appian Way we know the end of their story, and the author very wisely refrains from holding us in suspense, marrying them without hesitation. Then come the best chapters, in which Antonia, ignorant of the nature of her husband's obsession, sets to work to fight it, while he, poor coward, waits for the fulfilment of the curse. The author makes us rather contemptuous of his hero before the last page is turned, but it is, for all that, an interesting story, racily and well told. The fact that two characters sustain it for nearly half the length of the book proves that Mr. Rawlence is capable of—what is to be desired—a longer work than this, if he will introduce two or three more characters to his stage as relief for the principals.

Everyone wants the BEST
in Everything, so
why not have the
BEST LIFE POLICY
by effecting one with
The Legal and General Life Assurance
Society,
10 FLEET ST., LONDON, E.C.

Bonus for over 20 years - 38/- per cent. compound.

The Horoscope. By JOHN LAW. (Thacker, London and Calcutta.)

THE scene of this novel is entirely laid in Ceylon. Ceylon stories, with which it might be compared, are few, if any exist. There is plenty of local colouring: the writer shows a knowledge of at least some portion of the colony's history, of its chief products, of the manner of life, and, above all, of the dominant Buddhism and its practical operation. So far we might have been describing a Gazetteer. But the book is a story full of human developments. A Sinhalese gentleman, descended from the deposed Kandyan dynasty, proprietor of an encumbered estate, loses his wife, is left with two little boys, and devotes himself to their welfare. The story turns on the evolution of the horoscope of the elder son: a superstitious regard attaches to horoscopes in Eastern countries. This elder boy is, contrary to an English planter's advice, sent to a Christian College, and eventually, after his father's death, becomes a Christian. The younger becomes a Buddhist monk. Their mutual devotion is touching. Their characters and careers are well drawn. The life of the elder is hardly a success: the moral is that he would have done better by adhering to Sinhalese ways. His Sinhalese wife is amusing in her ambitions. The younger brother is the stronger character. His trust in his faith is unshaken: his attachment to his stricken brother is most pathetic. The interest is well sustained to the end. The Buddhism is prominent, but not overdone. How many understand what Nirvāna means? It is "taught that Desire leads men to be born again and again, and that by killing Desire a man can escape from re-births and enter Nirvāna," the deathless state.

The Cockney at Home. By EDWIN PUGH. (Chapman and Hall. 6s.)

IN his preface Mr. Pugh tells us that he has written the sketches and stories in this book with the idea of making his readers laugh. We have read them all, some one day and some another, in order that our judgment of them might be fair and not formed hastily because we were bored by one class of story and therefore wrote them all down as foolish. But in spite of all this precaution it must be said that there is very little in the whole book that is strikingly funny, or any story that presents the Cockney in as interesting an aspect as it is possible to place him. For instance, "The Quack" and "The Cheap Jack," two types well known in London—or, for that matter, in the provinces also—could have been better drawn, and might have been presented in a much more mirth-provoking manner. From the two sketches, "Humble Pie" and "The White Serge Dress," it would appear that Mr. Pugh is happier when dealing with characters of a class a little removed from the very poor and illiterate slum-dwellers. In the first of these is developed a capital little plot concerning a young man, Bertie, and his exploits along a Monkey Parade; and in the second the pride of poor Milly of the white serge dress has its proverbial fall, very sympathetically related by the author. "The Penny Walker," otherwise the man who learned his way about London by tossing a penny at each cross-road, "Heads—to the right! Tails—to the left!" will possibly find some imitators, but it is to be hoped that for the sake of the "Chair" no one will endeavour to run a debating society on the lines indicated by Mr. Pugh in "The Debating Society."

Katya. By FRANZ DE JESSEN. (Wm. Heinemann. 6s.)

BY reason of his position among Continental writers on Russian subjects, and especially on southern Russia, M. de Jessen deserves attention for this, his first book to receive English translation. The work of the translator is, it may be remarked, of a high order throughout; the life and spirit of the story have been preserved, and the English is as vivid as it is faithful to the original.

Katya's story is laid principally in southern Russia; she is of the Ukraine, and in a few sentences Niki, her husband, describes her. "You are clever—yes, clever as few women are, and you can do great things, as long as they are dramatic and splendid. But your heart is little—little and poor, Katya."

It seems otherwise as we read, but in the end the ruthless description is amply justified. For Niki is shot, and Petya Orloff is executed—the best men pass out from Katya's life, and at the end, finding no alternative, she marries Shipagin, though we know all the time she despises him. It is as fine a study of a woman as modern fiction can show; not a normal woman, perhaps, since she is of the type in which the head dominates the heart, but a woman at once admirable and despicable, one who compels and repels. And, after all, is there in all creation such a thing as a normal woman—is not each, rather, a law unto herself and a type by herself?

So much for the personal element of the story, which is but a part. The author is among the foremost students of Russia and its problems, and here he gives us glimpses at the character of a nation as well as of its individual men and women. In the grim chapters which tell of the struggle between established order and revolutionary forces there is clear, keen insight into Russia of to-day, its sacrifices and enthusiasm, its iron suppressions, and the multitudinous aims of its reformers, would-be and in being. Petya Orloff, on the ship that bore his father's name, is but a sorry hero, yet he wins all our sympathies; Pravdin, of and for the people against the powers that be, strikes the true note of Russian upheaval—fanatic, extremist, dreamer, he has the merit of sincerity and little more. These chapters, in which he and Petya are as gods moving men, make in themselves a story of great dramatic power.

The book is complex as Russian character, and it breathes the life and spirit of the Russian people. It is a merciless analysis of a woman and some men, a masterly study of men and women, and it is so far instinct with the problems and essentials of the nation that it deserves a place among text-books on southern Russia and the countries with which its frontiers march.

The Lost Road. By RICHARD HARDING DAVIS. Illustrated. (Constable and Co. 6s.)

THE stories in this book are of the kind to make the reviewer enthusiastic. To take the first, it is compounded of quite ordinary material, tells a part of the life of its rather ordinary hero, and ends in a perfectly conventional fashion; but the manner of the telling is so fresh and engaging that the reading gave us real pleasure—and it is rarely that one ventures to say as much as that of any of the multitude of books read in a publishing season. There is no reason for selecting the first story in the book for such a criticism, for most of the others are equally good, and some of them are better; the miracle of Las Palmas, for instance, grips from its first page. In "The Lost Road" there is a little gem of a poem which we trust, for its own sake, was written by the author of the story, for it is verse of the kind which one cuts out and keeps.

Of the illustrations, one is an adequate representation of the text (that facing page 222), but the rest are, apparently, designed to give us an idea of the skill of the artist. In such a thoroughly entertaining book as this, however, it is folly to cavil at such a small point—we have enjoyed the work, and trust others may read it with similar result.

Lieut.-Col. C. J. Bruce, of the 6th Gurkha Rifles, has already recorded some of his travels in his work, "Twenty Years in the Himalaya." His new book, which Mr. Edward Arnold has in the press, describes his exploration of the mountains of Kulu and Lahoul, a country due north of Simla, hitherto neglected by the climbing fraternity. In addition to mountaineering, the folk-lore and history of the districts receive considerable attention.

THE Libraries, Museums and Art Galleries Year Book 1914 is the Manual of Professional Practice. But it is more than this. It tells every Bookman; every educationist; every student where special collections of Books on his particular subject are to be found throughout the country, and how to borrow from them. It also tells him where Special Museum collections are to be found, although these cannot be borrowed.

It is a key to unlock the collected knowledge of the country.

Get the Book: get it somehow. You want it. Buy or borrow the Book: but do not beg for it, nor steal it.

470 p. crn. 8vo. 8/6 net.

Stanley Paul & Co., 31, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

Music

"Parsifal" at Covent Garden

CONVERSATION as an art is said to be so nearly lost that only a very few persons, Lord Rosebery and one or two others, know where to find and enjoy it. But if Conversation exists no longer among the general circles of society, there is, at any rate, plenty of Discussion. Discussion is to Conversation what Lawn Tennis is to Tennis. It is within everyone's reach, and the game, as a rule, is soon over. Subjects seem never to be wanting, and we turn from the last to the next with perfect contentment. Providence acts for us as did that host in the "New Republic" who propounded a certain number of subjects for conversation at his dinner-party and caused a bell to be rung when each one had had its turn. Last week two subjects struggled with each other for the first place at every table, luncheon, tea, dinner, or supper; they were "Parsifal" at Covent Garden and the murder of the little boy on the North London Railway. The latter interest, to be sure, engaged the majority of tongues, and it may be that "Parsifal" was only permitted because it was felt that developments might be expected in the murder case and that it would keep for a future time. So "Parsifal" was discussed until the coming of Mr. Barker's "Midsummer Night's Dream" caused it to be forgotten, and the problem of gold or not-gold fairies superseded that of the delinquencies or otherwise of Covent Garden. But as we are not invited to contribute our views on murder or fairies in this column, we must drag "Parsifal" out of its seclusion, and, threadbare topic as some may consider it to be, set down the few comments which the performance at Covent Garden have suggested to us.

First, as to the question of environment. Has the spirit of glamour stayed behind, declaring that she will never leave the hills of Bavaria, that she can only breathe and inspire others in an air remote from that of cities? Did the journey through London's noise and dirt so indispose us that we were unable to enter with the right proportion of awe and excitement into the so cunningly presented drama of sex and spirituality? For ourselves, "Parsifal" was every whit as impressive here as at Bayreuth; the astuteness of Wagner the manager in confining "Parsifal" to Bayreuth for so many years was abundantly rewarded, no doubt. But the work was great enough, being so original and so large in its conception, to have done without the réclame which the circumstances of its performances gave it. We are not at all sure, either, whether "Parsifal" is not more impressive in London, where it can be seen stripped of the nonsense and make-believe which were so tiresome to many plain folk, than at Bayreuth. If there was something of the pilgrimage about the visit to that little town, there was also a good deal of the picnic and the holiday jaunt. The country was pleasant, and on a fine summer's afternoon there was not always lacking a subdued feeling of self-sacrifice before the altar of Art, when one had to prefer the theatre to a ramble among the fields. Here one goes to see "Parsifal" direct from the ordinary routine of London life, and, to our thinking, it is wholesomer that this should be. Bow Street is forgotten as soon as the Prelude begins, just as the fields used to be; but one has the consciousness that, when all is over, we shall still be our usual selves, willing to say to each other what we really think, instead of the half-intoxicated people we used to be at Bayreuth, unable to discuss the opera except in hushed tones and the broken accents of stupefied admiration.

As to the performance which the untiring labours of the Covent Garden management have given us, we are bold enough to say that we found it very good indeed. We have been told that the performances given a few years ago in New York were the best ever witnessed, but we are not bound to believe it. One who confessed to having been present at nearly forty Bayreuth performances said, safely enough, "I have heard better performances there, but also much worse." The novelty of the costumes here has disturbed the pious feelings of some who maintain that Bayreuth can do no wrong, but we found nothing in that respect to quarrel with, and the Knights, who are, after all, the most important people from the scenic point of view, were quite satisfying in look and in dignity of bearing.

Indeed, the scenes in the church were made as profoundly impressive as they ought to be. The moving scenery failed; but, as that was never to us a very satisfactory business at Bayreuth, we were not upset by the failure. The country scenes disturbed us more, especially so the spring landscape in the third act, which was even painfully garish and left nothing to the imagination. We were in the country of Mr. Vicat Cole rather than in that of Titian or Turner, and could not believe in Mr. Harker's blossoming thorns and emerald downs and azure rivulets. We should have preferred Mr. Granville Barker to arrange the scene as he has done for Oberon in Fairyland. The Garden of Klingsor, too, was terribly overblown, and not unlike the nightmare gardens that have troubled our sleep after a tour among modern "herbaceous borders." Klingsor's Garden should be horribly desirable, subtly sinister, poisonously alluring, full of suggestion. Too many flowers spoil the pleasure of a garden when they are packed together, and Klingsor's gardener, we are sure, cultivated Baudelaire's "fleurs pervers" to perfection, else he would have been sent away without a character. Except for some monstrous tubes (allied to Bignonia?), we discerned nothing that Messrs. Ware or Cutbush or Kelway would not like to grow if they could, and expose in fatiguing ranks at a "mammoth" flower show. We have yet to see the perfect magic garden. Mr. Harker's reminded us of what the Swiss Family Robinson might have come across and described in their travels. Kundry is really the most sympathetic character in the opera. A lovely woman who never seems to get what she wants, how should she be otherwise than sympathetic to a masculine heart? We are sorry for her; she never bores us as Parsifal and Gurnemanz too often do. She deserves a garden of delight, even if it is really a garden from which the prudent would shrink from entering.

But how could any lady who called herself such like to live among those merely huge yellow and turnip-coloured blossoms? We liked Mme. Von der Osten; her voice is one of the most beautiful now to be heard, and her singing of Kundry's music was very fine. Had she had a garden of the right sort to help her, we think Parsifal would have been an even greater fool than he was, if he had not allowed her wiles to seduce him. As an actress she has not the compelling power of a Ternina or a Von Mildenburg, but her voice alone ought to carry any ordinary man off his feet. Parsifal himself, played by Garrick endowed with a voice of melody like Mario's, or played by Jean de Reszke in his prime, might have attracted one's love, or, at any rate, one's absorbed interest; but as played by an artist of the "meritorious" class among German singers, he is too likely to be rather tiresome. Amfortas has the better chance, and Herr Paul Bender, who appeared at the opening performance, was admirably in the picture. So, too, was the Gurnemanz, an old and valued friend at Covent Garden, Herr Knupfer. But not even if an archangel came to sing that part could Gurnemanz enchain our sympathies for long, especially in the first act. He is a blameless being, except that he is often dull, and does not know when to stop. We think of Wordsworth and how wisely Matthew Arnold edited him. When shall we have a musical Arnold who will present us with a sifted Gurnemanz whom we shall be able to admire thoroughly?

But if there are frailties on the stage in "Parsifal" which our candour requires us to recognise, it is true that Wagner has given us a veil so beautiful to soften their imperfections, that we can, without distress, put up with them. In none of Wagner's operas is the orchestra more distinctly the saving health than in "Parsifal." We may have to admit that the score shows itself to be the work of an older man than that of "Tristan," that the surface is thinner, that some of it reminds us of what had been said before and more magisterially. But, also, in none of the operas is the work of the orchestra more precisely the right interpreter of the doings on the stage; in none is Wagner's Mozart-like gift of writing in the special style needed more evident. What the singers sing does not so much matter, when the orchestra does its duty; and the body of players under Herr Bodansky is, we venture to say, superb, better than the type of orchestra at Bayreuth. Herr Bodansky does not share our impatience with Gurnemanz; he lets him have his say and linger over it as much as he likes. Perhaps he is too slow and deliberate. But he directs the tone of his players quite excellently, and we would not wish to have the beauties of the score brought out more clearly or more tactfully. Richter was weightier, no doubt, but he did not make the mingling of sounds more lucid.

Covent Garden, then, is to be congratulated and given a hearty vote of thanks. It is pleasant to know that appreciation of its work is general and ungrudging.

The Old Guard and New Views

IF he valued anything or believed in anything that is thought or written to-day, Mr. Grundy might be disgusted to know that, after reading his pamphlet, an admirer—in their day—of some twenty of the playwright's works, considered his latest diatribe an utterly unfair piece of rhetorical nonsense.

Possibly such a one may take a totally wrong view of the matter. This little book may be an example of the pamphleteer's fun. But really Mr. Grundy appears to be greatly out of temper. The ostensible causes are to be found in the kind of plays in which we are interested to-day and in Mr. John Palmer's volume, "The Future of the Theatre," in which we were not greatly interested.

All that so clever and successful a dramatist may have to say on the subject of the theatre deserves the fullest consideration, but unfortunately his style is not impressive, nor his bitterly didactical and bullying method conducive to agreeable or sane argument.

Being very cross with the author of "The Future of the Theatre" for mentioning several authors several times, he begins his present essay thus: "Oh, that mine enemy would write a book!" Well, Mr. John Palmer has written one, and the theatre ought to be very much obliged to him. For, like the majority of its contemporary critics, Mr. Palmer is its enemy." This is the first stage of a rhetorical outburst against many authors of our time who have done much to rid the stage of theatricality—not of the necessary artificiality and the art of the theatre, as Mr. Grundy appears to suppose. This outburst develops, as he goes forward, into a whirling tempest of vexatious words and stark abuse. His attacks become more and more gross until he expends his venom and ill-considered irascibility and—contradicts himself. Thus he parts with Mr. Palmer: "Our dreams are not identical, but they converge; and in his heart he feels, as I in mine, that for the drama, as for all things else, we are sufficient: Naught shall make us rue

If England to herself do rest but true."

This trite and somewhat doubtful quotation forms the feeble and contradictory end to a tirade against the dramatists of to-day that is as unworthy as it is unnecessary and untrue. With an egotism and prejudice which are surprising in a man of such varied gifts, Mr. Grundy praises the people of his day and damns those who follow him. He accounts it a virtue to himself and his friends that they were interested in the theatre before us. We, too, regret the matter, but Nature is like that. She insists on one generation following the other to the quiet grave. She also makes us hold views developed, doubtless, from those our fathers held. The intellectual communion between the generations which Mr. Wells seems to think a possibility of the future was not yet in the beginning of the twentieth century. Why should Mr. Grundy not recognise this obvious fact? Why not accept the simple truisms of evolution and grant once and for all that young brains and old brains do not mate—save in cases of exceptional wisdom? He will not, however, accept such an idea. There are very many unjust and inconsistent statements in Mr. Grundy's forty pages. For example, the following wretched parable is printed in the forefront of his book:—

A Man of the Theatre, with half-a-crown in his pocket, once met a Man of Letters, with naught therein.

Said the Man of the Theatre, "The public will never have your new plays." "So be it," chortled the Man of Letters, "but we'll stop it having your old ones!"

Presently, they parted, and went their several ways; the Man of the Theatre, with naught in his pocket; the Man of Letters, with half-a-crown therein.

This implies an unworthy insult. A marked inconsistency is to be found in his heavy abuse of those foreign dramatists whose works have been enjoyed in London, authors who have immensely influenced our playwrights, even those who are admired by Mr. Grundy. This seems to us to come with a peculiarly ill grace from a man who has enjoyed such successes as "A Pair of Spectacles," founded on works that were not of native growth. There are inconsistencies in abundance, too, in his fable of "A Little City and a Few Men within It"—namely, the stageland of Mr. Grundy's youth. He says that "there is an ancient ordinance that none shall trade in that city who was not born there, or has not served a long and arduous apprenticeship which few survive." We do not believe in that disreputable ancient ordinance. It is seemingly intended to bar such welcome workers as Sir James Barrie or Mr. Henry James—was it upheld when Bulwer Lytton wrote for the stage or Browning's plays were produced? The fable of these noble dwellers in the city of the stage, eaten out of house and home by the ravening wolves of letters, is absurd. The playgoer is an independent person; he goes to see many things, and goes oftenest to the things he likes. He does not care whether the writer of the play he admires was brought up in the atmosphere of the stage or on the lawns of paradise. For any playwright, old or new, to pretend that a few men in a small city are to govern the supplies of the stage, that there is a certain caste or breed of people for this purpose, is to refuse freedom to humanity and stultify the rights of man. All interested in the art of the stage and the soul of man should read Mr. Grundy's book, for, unless they do so, they can have but a slight idea of his limited outlook. The clumsiness and unfairness of his statements astound, hurt, and repel us. He claims for his school of art every virtue of brain and heart; every mean vice he attributes to the workers of to-day, who toil in the field in which he laboured.

Mr. Grundy is not very old, neither are the men he names, frequently and bitterly, very young. We have lived a little in both periods, and we cannot pretend that the devotion to the things that greeted and enlivened our youth destroys our joy in the later or latest developments of the stage. Nor do we find that the old guard of the theatre is not still greatly honoured. Mr. Grundy writes as though we had befouled the gods of the past. We do not think that those who are, or were recently, his contemporaries would join in his lamentations. He gives the names of personages whom he considers have built up the glory of the English stage, which our generation is supposed to have dragged in the dust and made horrid. We take a few of these, and will show that although, according to Mr. Grundy, they made the playgoer of his period, they are none the less in the van of progress at the present time.

The Play of the Future. By SYDNEY GRUNDY, a Playwright of the Past. (Samuel French. 6d.)

Only the other day we had the pleasure of seeing Miss Ellen Terry playing on the apron stage of the Savoy Theatre, perfectly adjusted to her environment, delightfully at home amid surroundings very different from those in vogue in the young days of herself and Mr. Grundy.

A few nights ago we heard the applause which greeted the revival of Mr. Haddon Chambers' "The Tyranny of Tears."

Do Sir Herbert and Lady Tree complain of the modern spirit? We think, rather, that they have inspired much of the movement Mr. Grundy regrets.

Mr. Henry Arthur Jones has recently been immensely welcome for the extremely modern play he wrote for Miss Tempest.

Gilbert's last play, we think, was "The Hooligan," written for a very modern actor, and instinct with the bold spirit of our day.

All these names are in Mr. Grundy's list of the great ones who "built, four square, with beams of cedar and with planks of fir, and overlaid with gold the house of stone," we hypocrites are quaintly said to be yelping to devour.

The fact is the world of art is wide and free. Freedom is an essential quality, whether in the drama or any other form of art. In this pamphlet Mr. Grundy shows a narrowness of view, an egotism, and a conviction that he and the people of his period have chosen the good part which shall not be taken away from them, which would be disconcerting were it not that he so frequently knocks his arguments to pieces by misstatements and curious admissions.

After a page devoted to vituperative phrases about an imaginary race of undesirable young men who are supposed to govern the stage and the press, and incidentally, we presume, shut out Mr. Grundy, he decides to let such people hang in their own garters, and states in the well-worn line that he "had rather be a kitten and cry, Mew." This is not, of course, a compliment to that agreeable family of the friends of man, the cat. Often and often as we have seen the line quoted, we have not observed it before with a comma after the word cry and a capital letter for the last word. But then, perhaps, Mr. Grundy is being funny in his gracious Victorian way, and we have taken his spleenish outburst a trifle seriously.

EGAN MEW.

The Magazines

MR. T. GIBSON BOWLES is a man of courage. None knows better than he the risks, in these days, of starting a new periodical enterprise. He faces them confident that he has something to give which others provide in inadequate measure. He is also a man of public spirit, and that to some extent determines his courage. Does the public like the Candid Critic? We think it does. We shall better be able to judge when we know the reception it gives to Mr. Gibson Bowles' new Candid Quarterly. Candid papers so called have generally been failures, because they have been more "candid" than sincere, more outspoken than honest, concerned to be sensational, not truthful. Mr. Gibson Bowles will not make that mistake. His aim is "to deal with public affairs faithfully and frankly, and to treat them with candour having sole regard to the public welfare." Can this end be attained without lapse into party bias? In our humble opinion so much that is not for the public welfare is supported by one party that candour will induce a preponderance of opinion in favour of the other side, and it will be said that "Candid" is a synonym for Unionist. Quality and spirit will account for something, and Mr. Gibson Bowles is warmly to be congratulated on such articles as "The Kingship," "The New Corruption," "The Salaried Parliament," and "The National Insurance Act." They should all give a sober public "furiously to think." The Candid's reflections and argument on these four subjects, hackneyed as the subjects themselves are, would alone make the new quarterly notable: they show that there are fresh points of view to be taken and that fresh material is to be found. That great element in the public which is never strongly or consistently partisan, which claims to support one side or the other according as it detects merit in its policy and programme, will find in the pages of the Candid all it wants to assist decision on certain vital issues. Truth is writ large across this initial number. Magna est veritas et prævalebit—and with it Mr. Gibson Bowles and his quarterly.

In the February number of the English Review, Mr. George Moore continues his article on "Yeats, Synge, and Lady Gregory." It is fitting that Mr. Moore should write on Synge, for he is himself a playboy, though that is not a thing for which one expects recognition in England. It would be ridiculous, for instance, to expect an attempt at accuracy from him. But the point is, that whereas Yeats will alter facts in order to heighten the "artistic" relation of his story, Mr. Moore will alter them in order to submit it to the cross-fire of his raillery. In the result Mr. Moore is, in spite of all, a salutary influence. It is good to read, for instance, what he has to say upon Yeats' introductions to Lady Gregory's books, even though we may not happen to agree with it. "An English Notebook of Voltaire" occupies the first place, chiefly because it has recently been found in St. Petersburg. It is strange to discover the Voltaire idiom coming through his faulty use of a foreign tongue. That idiom, by the way, is compounded largely of salacity and irreverence; and in English these things wear neither lightness nor grace. Moreover, the cynic is, as cynics too often are, of a most credulous nature. The story of Cromwell and Milton will not pass muster. Mr. Scott-James in "The Real Decadent," examines the spirit of compromise in England to-day: and Mr. H. G. Wells continues his serial, "The World Set Free."

What we at once turned to in the Fortnightly was "Wordsworth at Rydal Mount," by John Eglinton. Confined by the relation of facts and the sequence of events he has not much opportunity for that taut excellence of style that we have come to associate with his name. The interest, that is to say, is with the subject rather than with the telling of it; but it is an article to be read. Mr. J. A. T. Lloyd writes on "Feodor Dostoevsky," and is well qualified to do so. It seems very desirable that writers on Russian subjects should come to some agreement on the transliteration of Russian names. Not that there is any fundamental difference; but the readers of the collected edition now being published will find the distinctions of spelling a little irritating. For a short account of Dostoevsky's life and doings Mr. Lloyd's article would be hard to beat. Mr. E. A. Baughan writes on "A Practical Repertory Theatre." There is not much that is new for him to say; and we may add he does not say it. But it is a good resumé of the possibilities.

In the Nineteenth Century there is a striking article entitled "The Parting of the Ways," by Mr. A. P. Nicholson, in which he gives his reason for relinquishing his connection with the Tory Press for the other side. He sees what he wishes to see, but writes carefully none the less. A most interesting sidelight on the journalism of the war-scare over the Armada is thrown by Mr. Wood in "The True History of the Fabrication of the 'Armada Mercuries.'" Quotation is necessarily a great part of its interest; and Mr. Wood quotes fully. Our chief complaint is that it is not so exhaustive as it might have been; but we shall keep it by us nevertheless. The present number is rather bare of literary matters.

In the British Review Mr. Clement Antrobus Harris writes on "The Music of the Novelists." Much might profitably have been said in criticism of the subject; but Mr. Harris relies chiefly on a mere resumé of the novelists and books that either deal with or mention music—surely rather a scanty basis for an article. The two best contributions in the number, however, are "The Unimportance of Politics," by Professor T. M. Kettle, and "The Unworldliness of Journalists," by G. K. Chesterton. Politics and journalism are subjects nearly allied; and both Professor Kettle and Mr. Chesterton are men who swear no excessive fealty to either matter. The consequence is that both articles make refreshing reading. Mr. Chesterton, especially, can be trusted to be entertaining while he is pungent; though in the present instance he curiously misses saying in clear terms what he has engaged himself to say. In the Cornhill the series of Browning's unpublished poems is continued. We doubt if a real service is being done to Browning by these publications. If a poet decides to omit certain things from his published works, it seems to us that his wish should be respected. In the present "Sonnet addressed to the Memory of his Parents" there is no great merit, and we cannot help feeling that Robert Browning would have been better pleased had it been kept to the obscurity to which he had destined it. The best article is "Rory of the Glen," by the Hon. Gilbert Coleridge. Character studies like these, and studies of such characters, are always worth preserving; and a just enthusiasm is brought to the telling.

In the Quarterly Review Mr. R. H. Murray writes upon "The Evolution of the Ulsterman." History is not only just in the facts it states, but not less in the perspectives it employs; and by this standard Mr. Murray writes most unjustly. One need not object to his eulogy of the successful commercialism of the Ulsterman to feel acutely that his account of the state of affairs prior to the planting of Ulster is historically unsound and untrustworthy—not only in what he says, but mainly in what he implies. And when he says that "the forests resounded with the ceaseless axe . . . and new tenements and streets grew up under the magic power of industry," we wonder, having had a sight of the ghastly squalor of those same tenements and streets, whether the writer be in an ironical vein or not. Professor Case writes upon "The Plays of Beaumont and Fletcher" with learning and an excellent memory of the dramatic history of the time. Two essays of great literary interest are on "The Contemporary German Drama," by Mr. Garnet Smith, and "Modern Mysticism: Some Prophets and Poets," by Mr. Leslie Johnstone. They stand out in marked contrast to one another. Mr. Johnstone seems to understand as little of the drift of modern mystical thinking as Mr. Garnet Smith is able to take an over-sight of the tendency of German drama. Indeed, Mr. Smith's article is most useful and complete. Mr. Desmond McCarthy writes upon Samuel Butler, "The Author of 'Erewhon.'"

The Dominion of Canada, an illustrated monthly review, which made its appearance in December last and met with a cordial reception from Canadians in this country, has this month introduced important alterations and improvements. It has changed its cover, substituting an artistic for a stereotyped design. The magazine has not only enlarged its size and introduced new features, but has also reduced its price from 6d. to 3d. The new editor is Mr. J. V. Morton, late editor-in-chief of the Birmingham Gazette, and allied papers. The journal has a two-fold policy—to promote the consolidation of the Empire and to present to the British public the opportunities offered by Canada for sound investment of capital, for increasing trade, for building up new homes under brighter conditions and prospects than those prevailing in this country, and for travel and sport.

The winter number of Bird Notes and News prints some striking opinions received from Continental countries with regard to Mr. Hobhouse's Plumage Bill; and a coloured picture of "Some Victims of the Plume-Trade" further helps to bring this question to the fore. It also contains title and index to Vol 5, reports on the Public School Essays Competition and the Bird and Tree Competitions, and interesting notes on the new Bird Protection Bill in Italy and the protection of swallows in France.

The Theatre

"A Midsummer Night's Dream" at the Savoy Theatre

THERE was no lack of collaboration at the Savoy. Mr. Cecil Sharp took in hand the music and the dances that play so inevitable a part in the Dream; Mr. Norman Wilkinson devised the decoration of the play—and, though decoration may seem an incidental matter, yet as it happened that was an essential part; Mr. Granville Barker undertook the general production. And it may be worth mentioning that one William Shakespeare was the author. Not that the presentation was not faithful to the inspiration of the author. Better in this than in any of his productions, Mr. Barker has felt, and realised, that the function of the producer is not to articulate himself apart from the author, but to let the author be perfectly articulate through him. The natural desire for a personal triumph obscures this; but in the present instance the play is of the sort that invites incidental business for its better interpretation. For this reason, in its fundamental idea, it departed less from the customary staging—such as the last production that London was given, at His Majesty's, some years ago, extensively mentioned in these columns at the time. Apart from the extended proscenium, or fore-stage—which, to be sure, is a distinction fundamental enough—and the substitution of nightmare-devils for fairies, the distinction was not challenging; and it was in the direction of wisdom.

It was an excellent idea, for instance, to call in the aid of Mr. Cecil Sharp for the dances. The result was, not that we had any more dances than usual—in point of fact, we actually had fewer—but that each of the dances, while perfectly adapted to the purpose of the play, had an authentic ring. This was no merely antiquarian matter. For ourselves, it matters little whether the dance be old or young so long as it is a convincing expression of a mood of pure joy. But there are two things we must remember: the first is that the present commercial age is not one that is given to the outbreaking of pure joy; the second is that Shakespeare, when he wrote the play, wrote it in the idiom of certain folk-dances that then prevailed. The joint result is the dances that Mr. Sharp has devised rang authentically, in both senses of the word. It was noticeable that he did not slavishly reproduce the old dances, or the old music for them. Sometimes he made a most delicate mosaic out of them, that were again subject to Mr. Barker's happy groupings; with the result that they shook free from a mere antiquarianism. And in one case we are sure that the audience thought a dance was an invention, quaint and hearty, of the moment. The dance of three of the yokels, after their play before Theseus and Hippolyta, was a gem of appropriate humour. But it was also an actual old folk-dance.

The "decoration" by Mr. Norman Wilkinson has the great virtue of being less "decorative" than in the other Shakespearean productions by Mr. Granville Barker. That is to say, it is less a matter of external ornament, and more central to the purpose of the play, and that is all to the good. There was only one thing that, from our point of view, offended: and that was the second "drop," on which a cottage and its environments were painted in flat decoration. It created no illusion, on the one hand, and distracted, on the other. A simple curtain—with free-hand drawing, as with the first "drop"—would have satisfied the dialogue entirely, without distracting the eye. The forest scene, however, was a beautiful conception. It had the very great merit of being perfectly simple, while at the same time arrestingly beautiful—not a usual combination on the stage. There was the suggestion of a forest clearly conveyed to the mind without the intrusion of mock tree-trunks: and the conical bank that occupied the centre of the rear-stage was an excellent and purposeful idea that helped the illusion of the tree-drapery. Mr. Wilkinson has never done better than this; and, as against it, it was possible to see the occasion of the bronzed and bewiskered imps that served as fairies, without agreeing to them. Mr. Barker utilised them well in the very happy groupings he devised for them, and so their oddity was lost in a sense of proportion; but nevertheless they reminded one irresistibly of diminutive and fantastic examples of Harry Richmond's father playing the statue of Prince Albrecht. There was nothing aerial or essential about them. The nursery variety of the "fairy" bears no relation, of course, to the authentic presences of the earth; but they are at least less an artist's mere invention than these bronze-green imps from an outrageous nightmare. Their chief use was that they helped Mr. Barker to get some very beautiful effects in grouping.

The acting throughout was admirable. It is time that Mr. Baliol Holloway overcame the twisting to and fro of his body while speaking verse; but his elocution was good, and he made a fine Theseus, with Miss Evelyn Hope as a worthy partner in Hippolyta. Miss Laura Cowie as Hermia was exquisite. To see her action while speaking the lines—

How low am I? I am not yet so low
But that my nails can reach unto your eyes, or, again, "Lower! hark again," was to know enjoyment undefiled. Miss Lillah McCarthy as Helena had a graceless task by comparison, and she did not seem to rescue its difficulty sufficiently by dignity. Mr. Denis Neilson-Terry and Miss Christine Silver took the parts of Oberon and Titania. We did not envy Miss Silver in a "coat-of-mail" that did not spare her face, but she spoke her lines well; and Mr. Neilson-Terry found a part that suited him in Oberon. His slightly affected pronunciation and intonation became a "fairy" attribute instead of being lack of robustness in a mortal part.

Yet, apart from Miss Cowie, the chief of the praise must be reserved for the yokels with their play. They were yokels, not the traditional stage-clowns; and thus their humour was human and refreshing instead of being merely tedious. Bottom, the one man among them who can mobilise his thoughts quickly, and so take the leadership of his fellows, was played by Mr. Nigel Playfair; and in spite of some hesitation and uncertainty in opening he played it with convincing heartiness. Mr. Arthur Whitby was admirable as Peter Quince throughout. The only feature that quite departed from the spirit of the original was the counterfeited wall with which Snout was encased. It detracted from the humour, was cumbersome, and altogether without excuse. It marred the humanity of the yokels: an excellent example of which was given in the speaking of the words: "All that I have to say is, to tell you that the lanthorn is the Moon; I, the Man in the Moon; this thorn-bush, my thorn-bush; and this dog, my dog," by Mr. H. O. Nicholson as Starveling. The pathos of it, simple and querulous, was one of the memorable things of an excellent production.

D. F.

"Broadway Jones" at the Prince of Wales's Theatre

THIS is one more specimen of the class of play which has long been thoroughly successful in America, and having been seen there by an actor-manager is now, doubtless at vast expense, spread before us for our delight.

We regret to say that Mr. George M. Cohan's four-act piece does not contain an idea, a word of dialogue, or a single character which is either amusing or interesting to the accustomed playgoer. It is called a new farcical play. What is there new in the statement that a stupid young man, Broadway Jones, has spent a fortune, has become engaged to an elderly lady on account of her money, has succeeded to the family chewing-gum factory, and become enamoured of the pretty young lady who runs the business? What is there farcical in the long drawn situations in regard to a temperance drink having a little whisky in it or the lugubrious statements of a heavy-looking boy, in short and would-be comic trousers, that he may some day be a great man? In one scene Jones' friend, Wallace, is elaborately sent to a barber's shop. When he returns he presents us with the splendid piece of information that the hairdresser once shaved the Mayor. "What did he do to the horse?" is the brilliant reply by Jones. Certainly the audience near us did not laugh much at that, but they did at strong expressions about hell, the devil, and by God. We scanned quite closely the persons who were amused by such phrases, but their faces were not unusual, their manners sane, their conduct told us nothing of their hidden source of joy.

Perhaps we have reiterated too often our desire to welcome American plays and then proved ourselves faint in praise when we have been allowed to see them. Unfortunately, we are fully justified; both in our desire to see the successes of the States reproduced in London and in our blank disappointment when they appear. That such an arrangement of nonsense as "Broadway Jones" should be presented to the public seems to us to be a bitter insult, but, for the sake of those interested in the fortunes of this chewing-gum romance, we trust that we may be proved in the wrong, and that the courage which enables the management to put such a play on the stage will be rewarded as it deserves. The acting is perfectly adjusted to the quality of the play. Mr. Seymour Hicks revels in the impossible person of Jones. He rushes, dashes and rattles. He uses his hands and arms in the most curious ways; he never spares himself or us for a moment. He listens to the balderdash the other characters speak as though it were a matter of life and death; he is alert, lynx-eyed, and tremendously interested in nothing.

The whole performance is emptiness and vanity. Had Miss Ellaline Terriss anything to do or anything to say that was worthy of consideration she would, we feel sure, be most engaging. As it is, her beauty and charm, the sweet note in her voice, all pass for nothing, for the author has given her no chance of showing her vital qualities. She is not human, although—apart from the play—we are quite prepared to consider her divine. Then there is Mr. William Lugg as the Vice-President of the Consolidated Chewing-Gum Co. He has a good deal to say about the squalid matter of which he is vice-president. It appears to interest him, and we are glad about that, for no one else, we fear, will value his speeches. As for the rest of the cast, many of its members are accomplished people who represent empty and inhuman stage types. They all work heroically in the useless task of trying to make "Broadway Jones" an intelligent and possible piece of work.

"The Tyranny of Tears" at the Comedy Theatre

THE revival of plays of ten or fifteen years ago is not usually a very lively business. Time is not kind to our comedies; nine hundred and ninety-nine die out of a collection of a thousand. But Mr. Haddon Chambers has given us something vital—and easily refreshed by a few clever touches of the author—in his play of the manners of the married. Each character lives its little hour before our eyes; we have no difficulty about believing them to be real, the author sees to it that the whole affair runs smoothly and that we are not excited, but interested, not wildly hilarious, but comfortably amused; not greatly informed or preached at, but gently instructed how to avoid our follies, how to show more consideration for others, how to live our tiny day without irritating the nerves of those who are about us and those we love.

It is so long since we saw Sir Charles Wyndham and Miss Mary Moore play the parts of Mr. and Mrs. Parbury that we are not inclined to compare them with Mr. Loraine and Miss Ethel Irving. We know they are totally different people, the Parburys of to-day, and that they are equally in the picture and equally vivid. And we know that the woman who rules her husband by some form of peevishness, tears, and the whole arcanum of the unwise and unamiable, will always be with us.

But Mr. Chambers sets before us the comedy of such things with so light a touch, such a gay, neat, engaging manner, that the result is entertainment and delight. Miss Ethel Irving handles the difficult character of Mrs. Parbury, who bullies her husband with pseudo kindness, with infinite skill. She does not make the wife an agreeable person, but she makes her beautiful, and in a way attractive and real. The sincerity of the change of heart at the end of the play, although sudden, is cleverly treated by the actress, so that we believe in it—at the moment when the curtain comes down. What we feel in the homeward taxi, Mr. Chambers may say has nothing to do with the play or the actress. Although Mrs. Parbury holds our attention closely, she is not alone in that characteristic. Every part in the play is a good part. As Parbury, Mr. Loraine is at his very best. He has, we are thankful to say, laid aside the Wyndham timbre in his voice and released himself from the restlessness which he acquired, we fancy, in America. We have never seen him so convincingly and truly the man he played. You remember the delightful secretary, Hyacinth Woodward, who kissed her employer's photograph, in a maternal mood, and was discovered by Mrs. Parbury in the act—she is made more agreeable than ever by the accomplished and reticent acting of the beautiful Miss Evelyn D'Alroy. Mr. Fred Kerr, too, is at his very best as the soft-hearted cynic, George Gunning; while Mr. Alfred Bishop contents himself, and us, by being Colonel Armitage, the worried father of Mrs. Parbury, and not obviously acting the character.

On the whole we can imagine no more perfect cast for an amusing, light, and yet distinguished comedy than that chosen for "The Tyranny of Tears." If you have seen the play many times before you will enjoy it again. If you do not know this, perhaps, the cleverest of Mr. Haddon Chambers' comedies, you may well hasten to Panton Street to enjoy his wit, his philosophy, his pretty sentiment—and above all the admirable acting.

The Drama Society at the Rehearsal Theatre

WE have not had the opportunity of knowing much of the work of this society hitherto, but now we gather that it is the nursery of ardent spirits. Here are made visible the hints of things to come; talent is seen in its most immature forms, hopes half realised, ideals not quite understood. The first one-act play given is by Mr. Aldon Roen. It is a piece difficult to act, but it has potentialities. Margot, a beautiful girl of the town, who loves and is loved by an honest man, is a stage-character with possibilities. Miss Eve Balfour, who plays the part, has charm and tenderness and a sense of the theatre, but a much more careful production than that given last Sunday is required to enable the author to get his ideas across the footlights. Margot is tempted to marry Arthur, a straightforward young artist. But the nobility of her character obliges her to send him away, and she falls back into her old and hopeless life. That is all, but under better conditions it would be enough.

"POUDRE D'AMOUR,"

Naturally, one makes every allowance for a first performance that is arranged on a tiny stage for only one evening; still, the actors of the Drama Society would do themselves more justice if they took the trouble to remember their words and rehearsed the action and stage business more thoroughly.

"DAMAGES,"

by Mr. A. von Herder, suffers as does Mr. Roen's little play. There is a cynical boldness and directness in the idea of an Indian army doctor, poor, and tired of his wife, who accepts all her lover is prepared to give as "damages," and is prepared to let the affair go at that. Here, again, the acting did not convince, but showed plentiful signs of intention rather than of accomplishment.

"BARN Y BRODYR."

Plays in a language only partly understood always have an attraction for us, and certainly Mr. T. R. Evans' "The Voice of the Brethren" gives one's imagination full scope. It is a Carnarvon play in Welsh which tells of a local strike and the change of mind of a hitherto devout Chapel worker to agnosticism. This man, Dai Williams, hurts his mother and loses his lover by his social and non-religious attitude; the play ends by the girl of his heart praying for his return to the fold. The excellent production was assisted by Mr. J. O. Francis, the author of "Change," which we praised some time ago, and the whole presentation was far more careful than the plays that went before it.

During an interval Miss Edyth Olive recited several poems by Richard Middleton with admirable vocal effect. But this accomplished lady had to do her work with the light so arranged that it fell in floods of colour near her feet and left her face masked by grotesque shadows, thus robbing her of some of her power over a highly sympathetic audience.

Mr. Walker Whiteside at the Queen's Theatre

THERE is more art in Mr. Israel Zangwill's American-Russian-Jewish play, "The Melting Pot," than we at first supposed. For this often tiresome drama now provides an American actor whom we have not hitherto been privileged to see with an opportunity of displaying his undoubted gifts. Although the thesis of the play itself, which postulates that "America is God's crucible" in which all the nations of the earth and all the religions shall be sublimated and made beautiful, does not interest or convince us, there is certainly a chance to show idealism and passion and terror on the part of the young Hebraic violinist, David Quixano. Without undervaluing the excellent stage work of Mr. Harold Chapin, who played Quixano when we last wrote of Mr. Zangwill's play, it must be freely owned that he made the part absurd. Mr. Walker Whiteside, on the contrary, has moments, even minutes, when he makes us believe in the affairs of the play and in the curious personality of Quixano. As we have not seen Mr. Whiteside act any other character, we cannot judge how generally accomplished he may be, and we therefore accept his present performance as typical work, and we can compliment him and ourselves on the fact that he is often an extraordinary artist. In seeing the drama as it was presented by the Play-Actors at the Court Theatre and in reading it in book form* we were not convinced of the strange mystery, perhaps madness, which lies within David's character. But Mr. Whiteside shows all that, and charm and grace and distinction as well.

He makes the play a possibility. There are few other changes in the cast. Miss Bensusan still gives her remarkable sketch of an old Jewish woman deeply immersed in the convention of her people, weary with suffering, yet still believing in her family and the glories of a Zion she sees clearly enough beyond the mists of common life. That admirable actor, Mr. Edward Sass, now plays the difficult part of Baron Revendal, and sometimes almost persuades us to believe in him. Miss Phyllis Relph is still the Russian-American Christian girl, Vera Revendal, who loves and is loved by David. Miss Gillian Scaife still plays Vera's stepmother, the Baroness Revendal, with grace and character, and Mr. Alderson gives the conventional musician, Herr Pappelmeister, with the same thoroughness and force as heretofore.

But it is the new David that will interest all lovers of the ever-varying art of acting. Mr. Walker Whiteside is original and exotic and, fortunately, quite outside and beyond the average American actor who graces our stage in semi-sentimental plays. Mr. Whiteside possesses a quaint but distinguished style; his shy, sly way of taking a call would alone place him among the masters of stage finesse and enable him to teach our own comedians the wisdom of the serpent and the tenderness of the dove.

EGAN MEW.

* The Melting Pot. By ISRAEL ZANGWILL. A Drama in Four Acts. (William Heinemann. 2s. 6d. net.)

Portrait Painters at the Royal Institute

THE supreme art of the portrait painter is, of course, to penetrate the characteristic self of his subject, which he will express as he understands it. No doubt, such a characterisation will not always be perfectly just, for the man of generous temperament will recognise and lay stress upon what is best in the mind and person of his sitter; another, cynically sensitive to the "thousand peering littlenesses," will seize and express these with a pitiless skill not far removed from cruelty. In this exhibition we note with pleasure the prevalence of the kindlier and more sympathetic spirit.

The first five pictures are the work of Mr. Alan Beeton, striking and sincere achievements. The portrait of "Letitia Dale" shows a worn face full of character and goodness. Nos. 2 and 4—apparently portraits of the same individual—give a powerful suggestion of a political fanatic, with drawn face and sunken eyes, full of that fire and conviction which may just as well lead a nation to ruin as to anything else, for want of steady reasoning power behind. The seated figure of a girl in purple, with dark furs, against a dim, receding background, is very striking in its sincerity: we like, too, "La petite blonde aux yeux mauves," which depends for its effect on the very clever scheme of colouring, rather than the face half-covered by the hand on which it leans. Mr. Louis Ginnett exhibits a "Head of a Girl," unobtrusively and harmoniously coloured, and full of grace and charm.

But beyond doubt the most successful artist in the exhibition is Mr. Gerald Festus Kelly, whose small study of a girl's head, which he calls "Reyes," is exceedingly beautiful, in the subtlety of its technique, the quiet richness of its colouring, and the simple pathos of its subject—the work, in short, of a genuine artist who may achieve great things. Hard by is another picture by the same artist in totally different style, "Alma de mi Alma," though the appeal is not so poignant, nor does it express the same tenderness of feeling. A Spanish girl in a costume of dazzling white stands finely posed against a dark background, with one hand on her hip and a pink fan open in the other. The flesh tints are beautifully painted, and the radiance of self-conscious and even arrogant loveliness is wonderfully expressed. Another striking portrait from the same hand is "A Man of Letters," a noble literary face well caught. We are not greatly enamoured of Mr. Oswald Birley's contributions; by far the best is the clever but distinctly unpleasing portrait of Mr. Ellis Griffith, in which the artist is at no pains to soften the cynical temperament of his sitter. Far more pleasing is the picture of Colonel Spottiswoode, in which the characteristics of a kindly English gentleman are well caught. Considerable cleverness in harmonisation of colour marks the portrait of a lady in a blue dress seated at a piano in a large room, in which some daring contrasts are cleverly managed. There is some Raeburnesque handling in Mr. Waldo Murray's portrait of "Brownell Cornwallis, Esq.," though both he and others who have essayed to follow in the footsteps of this master in respect of broad brush-work are apt in so doing to endow their sitters with exceedingly ill-fitting clothes. Mr. Martine Ronaldson produces something of a tour-de-force in his picture, "The Attorney's Daughter," in which a pleasant-looking girl is seated at a luncheon-table, with her back to a window, through which a strong light pours into the room. The shadowed face against the window, modified by the reflected light from the white tablecloth, is very skillfully expressed. But whether an equally charming effect could not have been reached by less complicated methods is to us uncertain.

Mr. R. G. Eves contributes an excellent portrait of Mr. H. B. Irving, straightforward and honest, in which the art is so cleverly concealed that many will think that it is not there; but the picture is, in fact, one of the best in the exhibition, and owes nothing to eccentricity or trickery. Two delightful pictures by Mr. Sholto Douglas are his "Portrait Group" of two girls en plein air, in which the prevailing white is handled with considerable skill, and the figures are posed naturally and gracefully; and the charming half-length of Miss Cerasoli, a very happily conceived and broadly painted work in singularly clear and beautiful colour. Mr. W. B. E. Ranken exhibits in another room a number of bold and clever studies for the large picture which he calls "Lifeguards," a stiff and unpleasing work, and a most disappointing outcome of the studies referred to. Mr. George Bell's "Nancy" deserves mention as a live piece of work; and another of Mr. Kelly's Spanish subjects, "La Gananciosa," strikes one again by its purity and brilliance of colour and the easy grace of the model. Mr. Glyn Philpot sends a successful but rather self-conscious head of "The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres," in which the really fine qualities of the sitter are rather obscured by the too obviously literary get-up. A rather daring picture is that of "Mme. Karsavina as Thamar," a riot of flaming colour and vigorous pose, in which the tragedy is obvious, though, perhaps, slightly overdone.

In the second gallery one is struck at once by Mr. Binney Gibbs' picture of "A Young Violinist," a young girl in a blue dress, with earnest face, standing, with her violin, against a dark background—a work of real art, which steadily improves upon acquaintance. Mr. R. E. F. Maitland's portrait of Mrs. Price is a wonderfully clever study, practically in black and white—a portrait with considerable humour. But certainly among the first two or three pictures in the exhibition is Mr. William Ablett's astonishingly clever portrait of "Mlle. G. C.," a large-scale study of a girl of thirteen or so, sitting with hands crossed on a white Empire chair in a blue dress against a light green background. The head is slightly turned towards the beholder, and the whole thing, in spite of its flat decorative treatment, is marvellously natural, and full of subtle understanding of dawning womanhood. Mr. Ablett contributes another fine "Portrait Sketch" of a lady in summer draperies on a verandah bathed in brilliant sunshine, in which the prismatic blend of clear colours is superbly handled. There is no little appreciation of character in Mr. Colyn Thomson's small studies, "Miss Dorothy Baines" and "The Black Toque"; the former is perhaps the more subtle. A delightfully natural and unaffected study of boyhood is Mr. F. C. Mulock's "Jack Boord," though the interest of the great dog rather overshadows that of the boy himself. Mr. Mark Milbanke's portrait of Sir William Ramsay is almost pre-Raphaelite in its wealth of minuteness of detail; but the central figure stands out broadly, nevertheless; the pose is excellent, and the face full of nobility and force. We like, also, his delightful full-length seated portrait of "Mlle. Nicole d'Alsace," which, though slightly inclined to hardness, is expressive of a very distinct personality. Much the same praise may be awarded to Mr. Hayward's portrait of his wife, which is marked by an originality which compels attention. Mr. Ivan Lindhé contributes some strangely brilliant portraits, somewhat hard in handling, but full of life and character—those of Mrs. Lester Reid and M. Paul Cambon are both of them remarkable and compelling works.

As usual, the third room is given up to drawings and paintings, mostly of the nature of studies, some of them for pictures exhibited in the other rooms. The best work is shown by Mr. G. W. Lambert, whose studies are full of character and even of humour. Mr. F. W. Carter's two sketch portraits, "Yvonne" and "Suzanne," are hard to forget, and Mr. Waldo Murray's "Miss Graham" is a perfectly delightful sketch portrait. The illustrated catalogue is a little tantalising, inasmuch as few of the best works in the exhibition are selected for illustration.

At St. Stephen's Shrine

BY A REGULAR DEVOTEE

"IN a matter in which the hopes and the fears of so many of my subjects are keenly concerned, and which, unless handled now with foresight, judgment, and in the spirit of mutual concession, threatens grave future difficulties, it is my most earnest wish that the good-will and co-operation of men of all parties and creeds may heal dissension and lay the foundations of a lasting settlement." Thus spoke the King, and it was the keynote of Tuesday's debate. The sun was shining brightly at 2 p.m. when the Life Guards swung round Westminster Hall, followed by the procession of carriages and the King and Queen in the old-fashioned crystal coach. It was difficult to imagine that this was the opening of a session bound to be fraught with so much to the Empire and all the Empire means. Members and their wives and children stood on the pavement and chatted easily with their neighbours, regardless of their politics.

I saw the King and Queen alight, and then I made my way into the House of Lords. Here the scene seemed especially bright and magnificent. The peeresses had never seemed fairer or more beautifully dressed, set off as they were by the brilliant uniforms of the men. The splendid Cullinan diamond glittered in the corsage of the Queen, whilst a long wave of light ran down the fair foreheads of the peeresses as the electric gleams flashed on the diamonds in their coronets.

The Proposer and Secunder of the Address in the Commons made sensible speeches, with a note of conciliation here and there.

Walter Long then rose to move an amendment to the Address, to the effect that the Government ought to appeal to the country before passing the Home Rule Bill. Mr. Long made several good points, but he is essentially one who speaks better when he has no notes. This time he had too many notes, and too often referred to them. He quoted the magnificent simile which Bright made use of during the Crimean War, "when the beating of the wings of the Angel of Death could almost be heard in our midst." He said it was only due to the magnificent leadership of Sir Edward Carson that the Angel of Death had not already appeared in Ulster. He it was who had kept the peace owing to the confidence the men of the North had in his leadership. There was a silly laugh from the Government back bench at this which was hushed at once by an angry snarl from the Unionists. The former had evidently received instructions not to be provocative. Ramsay MacDonald had risen on a point of order to complain that the action of the Opposition was unprecedented; for over thirty years the House had always had at least one day's general debate on the Address before amendments were moved. Was it in order to move an amendment at once? The Speaker ruled that it was, and Long curtly said that "the situation was unprecedented." He got in one or two heavy punishing blows which made Asquith wince and McKenna nod his head doubtfully like a Chinese mandarin. "You talk of safeguards and supremacy, yet you dare not interfere in South Africa," was one.

After speaking for forty minutes, Long sat down, and Asquith rose amid loud cheers from his own side at 5.35.

He spoke lightly and flippantly at first. The belief that Home Rule would not follow the Parliament Act if they were successful at the 1910 Election was a myth. I do not think, he said, that "in the whole history of anthropology there has ever been a case in which a myth was so quickly crystallised into a creed." This was very elaborate, and the House looked puzzled. He quoted Lord Lansdowne, but it only served to prove that statesman's foresight. "I think you are trifling with the subject," said Carson sourly.

He then changed his note. He admitted the gravity of the situation, and asked for time to consider the whole matter. He frankly admitted that initiative lay with the Government, but said the finances of the country must be carried on, and practically intimated that before March he would lay further proposals before the House.

It was a capital speech from his point of view. It took the wind clean out of the sails of the younger members of the Opposition who were bent upon a row. They had made up their minds to make business impossible if a reasonable spirit was not shown; but Asquith with his quick eye for the situation followed the earnest words of the King's Speech and was all sweet reasonableness.

Clavell Salter, a sound lawyer and capital speech-maker, was put up to reply whilst Bonar Law considered the position.

The House emptied into the Lobby and also considered the position. Some men thought Asquith's speech was a climb-down; others wondered what Redmond would have to say about it; whilst the majority agreed that the speech was a masterly piece of dexterity. He had removed the cap from the bombshell. He had snatched the torch from the hands of the Opposition backbenchers, and time would be given to the House to quiet down. After all, in face of the terrible danger of civil war, no one could complain of a delay to enable the Government "to consider itself."

At dinner the House practically emptied, but those who stayed were rewarded by hearing a fine speech from Austen Chamberlain.

He hit the nail on the head when he said: "Why was not this done before? The Prime Minister had put off the evil day, and even now, on the brink of the precipice, he pleaded for further delay. I cannot believe that he has not made up his mind, or [with a glance at Redmond] is he waiting for someone else?"

The younger Tories cheered. The debate had not quite turned out as they had expected, but the Prime Minister seemed at last to be alive to and admit the seriousness of the situation.

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

BY LANCELOT LAWTON

NAVAL ARMAMENTS—THE DAWN OF REASON

ALL doubts as to whether the Government would surrender to the agitation within the Liberal Party in favour of armament reduction were set at rest by the lucid and statesmanlike pronouncement of Sir Edward Grey, the chosen spokesman on this occasion for the Cabinet. The Foreign Minister, in that simple though forcible language of which he is the master, set forth a policy of which England may well be proud. We are not afraid of war. We are, as ever, jealous of our national honour, and prepared at the instant to rebuke insolence and repel aggression. But, at the same time, we approach this question of armaments with a sane and open mind. In the first place, as a commercial nation we realise the utter imbecility of the ship and gun competition now being waged throughout the world. In the second place, situated as we are in the vanguard of civilisation, we deplore the wicked and sinister intent that lies behind such competition and its grim emblems. Nor is our policy restricted to pious aspiration. We are ready, whenever the world will go with us, to attempt to devise practical schemes with which to give expression to our hope.

Cynics with the purview of a pedlar may continue to declare their adhesion to the doctrine that the strength of a nation rests in the abundance and quality of its powder. For a long time they had the experience of the past to guide and support them. Recent history, however, has shown that the heavy burden of armaments is grinding the very spirit out of the nations, and that, so soon as these armaments are employed in the deadly and destructive work for which they are raised, the victorious suffer in no less degree than the defeated. When statesmen of the calibre of Sir Edward Grey publicly subscribe to the theories advanced by Norman Angell, men with less pretensions to seriousness may well drop their ridicule and begin to have faith in force other than that emanating from cordite. Unfortunately we have too long been governed by general fallacies such as appeal to the very lowest attributes in human nature. For example, living soldiers, and many others who are anything but soldiers, still subscribe to the idea that war occasionally is necessary for the vitality of a race. This theory, though entirely disproved by competent authorities who have made special investigations on the subject, is frequently to be heard in places where the atmosphere is convivial, as, for instance, after dinner, in the smoke-room and occasionally at afternoon tea in the suburban drawing-room. Clever individuals fond of paradox derive endless satisfaction out of the fanciful belief that for perpetuation there is nothing quite so stimulating as extermination. Happily for the sake of universal progress, civilisation and prosperity are not in the keeping of tattlers of this description.

We discern as one of the most remarkable tendencies of our times a growing and healthy movement in the direction of real international goodwill. It is inevitable, where the ideal is grand, that progress should be slow. That such progress is perceptible, however, is a matter for rejoicing. Likewise it is inevitable that with a movement of the kind indicated there should be associated extremists and cranks, all well-meaning enough, but so enthusiastic to reach the ultimate goal as to oppose with eccentric gesture the steady march of the men of sane effort. It is true, as we have just said, that progress can be only very slow. For the revolution which it is sought to encompass must involve fundamental changes in the fixed ideas held by a large section of humanity to-day. The remedy for the evil will be found in widespread education extending from the highest to the lowest throughout the earth. Statesmen themselves stand in need of enlightenment, and on that account we welcome strong though pacific pronouncements like that of Sir Edward Grey. Many wars have been brought about solely because of the vanity of men occupying illustrious positions in the State, and for this reason it is well that Kings and their Ministers constantly reiterate the policy of peace with honour, thus teaching their circle to condemn ambitious ventures and to applaud only that statecraft which is inspired by a generous love of humanity. Instructed from above, the squalid bickerings of political parties must in turn be silenced. And finally we look forward to the day when the masses, too, will be taught the proper proportions of patriotism.

In a former article in THE ACADEMY we alluded at length to the contemporary manifestations inclining towards international comprehension. Here we went so far as to assert that there are practical evidences in sight of true progress in the direction of the peace ideal. It is to-day well understood that any writer employing this last theme refers particularly to the relations existing between England and Germany. Sir Edward Grey, though speaking in the reserved language of diplomacy, clearly intended that his words should be thoroughly understood by the Wilhelmstrasse. Reading through the lines of the response from Berlin, and taking into consideration other equally significant circumstances, we are fully convinced that the moment has arrived when some definite arrangement on the question of armaments may be arrived at between the two great Powers whose furious rivalry has for many years past thrown the shadow of war over Europe. Let us be emphatic on one point. Before an arrangement between Governments can be arrived at, political parties in Great Britain must sink their differences on the subject of armaments. Germany at last appears to have made up her mind. Responsible statesmen, speaking on her behalf, have declared a willingness to be content with a sixty per cent. margin of British naval superiority. The obstacle to be overcome lies in the difficulty to convince them that such margin can be rigid—that is to say, incapable of expansion, by reason of Colonial additions and the sudden acquisition of ships building in England for Foreign Powers. Nevertheless, there is surely here disclosed room for round-table negotiation, and with the exercise of consideration on both sides we see no reason why an arrangement, binding to both sides, should not be drawn up. But to revert to the original standpoint—is it not apparent to all impartial minds that, so long as political parties are unable to agree as to what degree of naval strength is required for the safety of Great Britain, Germany cannot be expected to repose implicit trust upon the mere verbal assurances of a Government temporarily in office?

Mr. Alan Glen, who has studied singing and dancing with Miss Marie Brema, and who recently took part in the "Joan of Arc" performances at Covent Garden during the Raymond Roze season, has been specially summoned to Brussels, where, at the end of this week, he fills an engagement as solo dancer. Mr. Glen takes with him the Cecil Sharpe morris-dancers, who will make their first appearance across the Channel.

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

EVERY day makes it the more apparent that the Baby Boom has become very tired. Brokers tell me that they get no more orders to buy shares, and even the investment brokers who supply banks, insurance companies and Trusts admit that the appetite of their clients has been satisfied. This is very sad. We all hoped that 1914 would be a glorious boom year in which the City would make a fortune. There seems little likelihood that our hopes will be fulfilled. The future, so far as I can foresee it, would appear favourable for holders of gilt-edged stocks, but unhappy for every other class of share. For example, the whole of Central and South America has entered upon a reaction. In Brazil the South is determined no longer to finance the North. Already a separation of the two areas is openly discussed. The North is Royalist, the South Republican; the North almost bankrupt, the South short of money, but quite capable of holding its own. Brazil is in a bad way. In the Argentine the boom has come to an end. Nothing can stop this great country, but a reaction was inevitable, and it has come. We must count upon declining traffics and dull trade. We shall be lucky if we escape more serious trouble. Paraguay and Colombia would appear less affected. They may continue to make progress. But Peru is in a troubled condition, and the revolution which deposed Billinghurst may be but the beginning of further émeutes. In Chili the good days have passed, and the peso is still depreciated. Chili has missed her chance. Rich as she is, business-like as her people are, the depreciated coinage must weigh heavily upon the commerce of the land. Uruguay would appear in happier mood. Here we get better news, and the loan just floated will give the country its required impetus. But on the whole the South of America seems to have a clouded future to face.

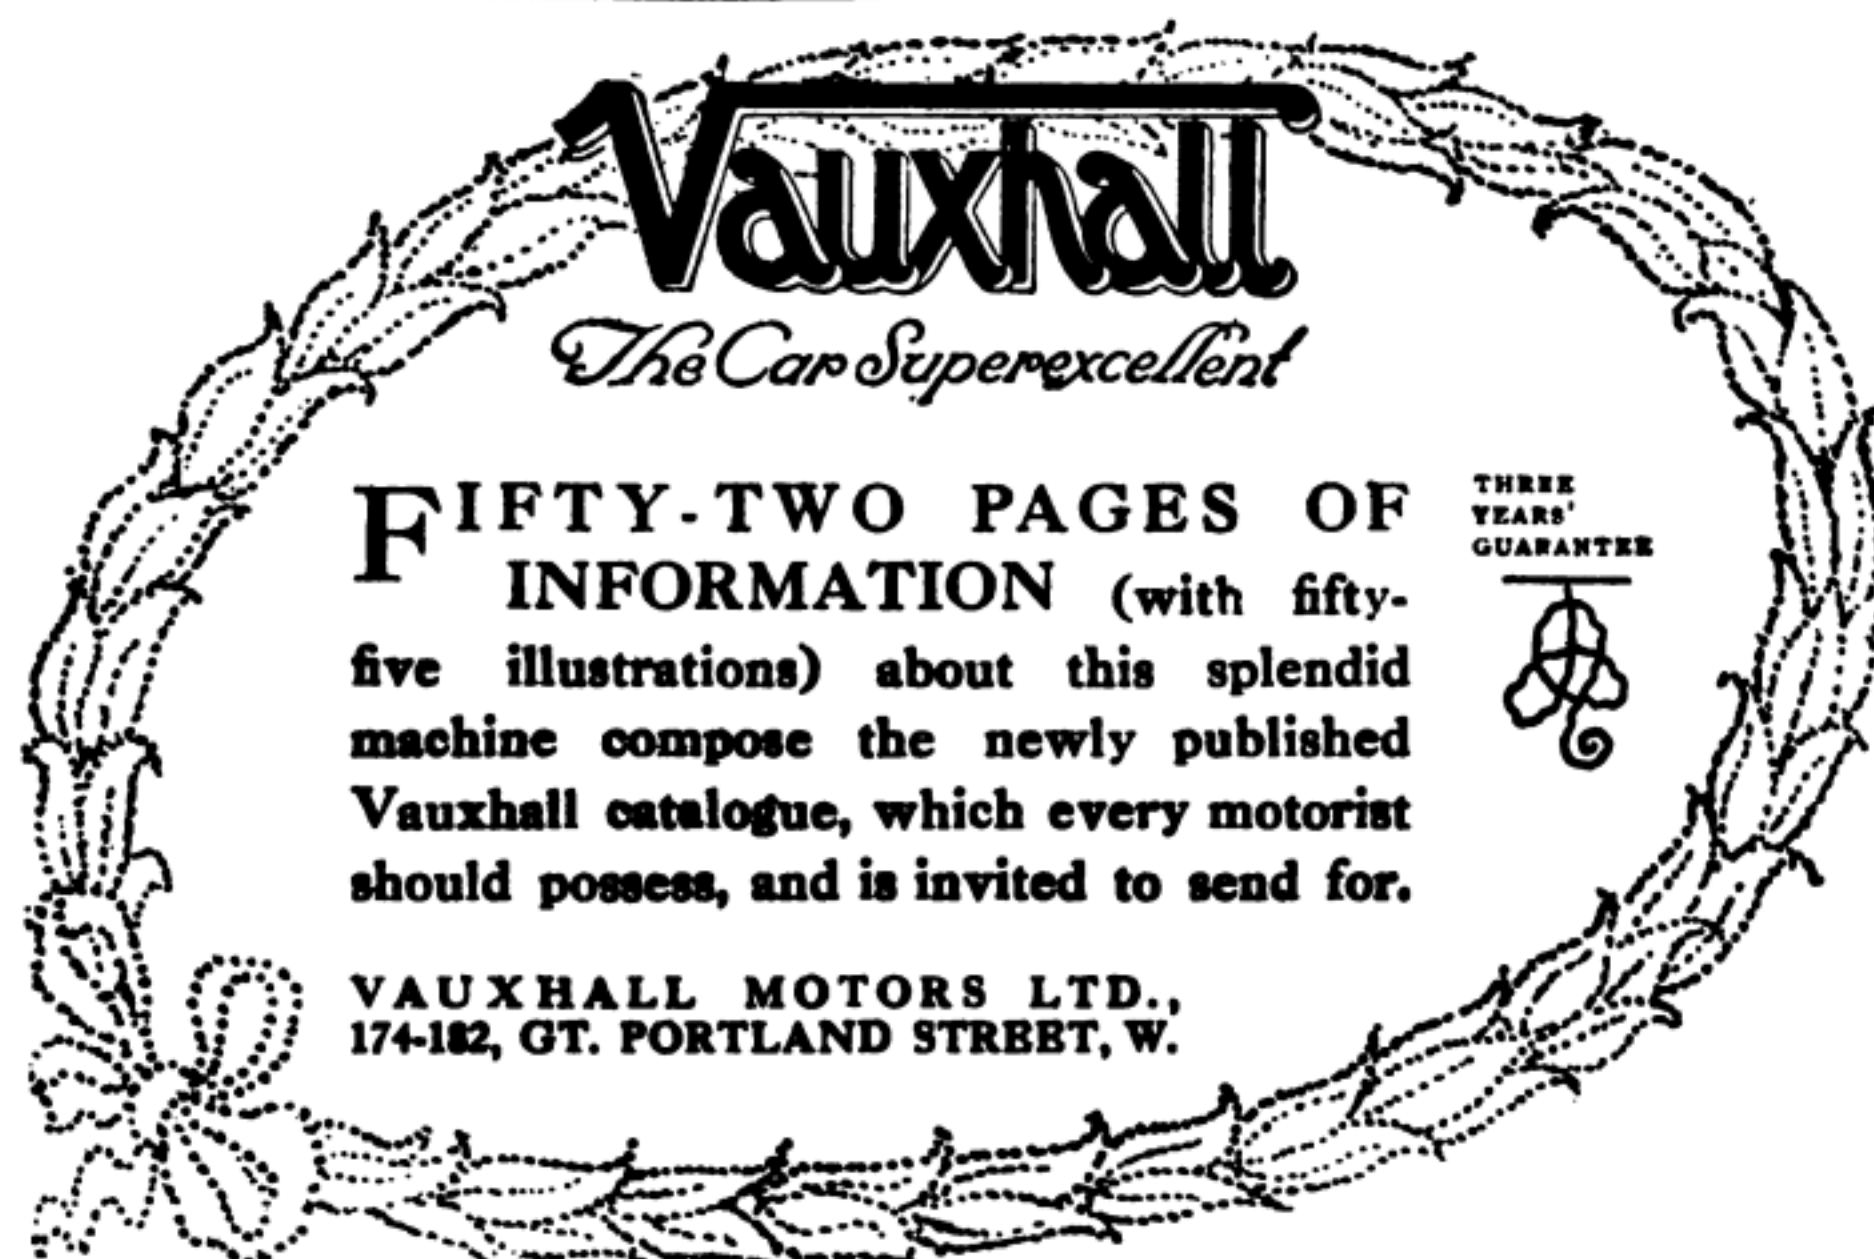

Every day brings forth half a dozen new issues. The Belgian Loan was greedily sought for and now commands a high premium. The Canada Steamship Debentures are well received, but can only be considered as a risk. The Regal Fire may succeed, but those who apply should understand that the venture is speculative. The Allsopp Prior Lien Debenture appears fairly well received, but unless the brewery can improve its management, I should not care to hold the security. The Pekin Syndicate took advantage of the low Bank Rate to sell its Chinese Railway Bonds, and they went well. They were cheap. I do not care for the Canadian Northern Debentures, in spite of the fact that Lazards backed the issue. The Trinidad Fours are Trustee, and good. Maisonneuve Fives were taken well. The Selfridge Preference are a good industrial. The business is admirably managed. But I could not advise anyone to invest in Hudson's Consolidated Prefs. The promotion schemes of this concern are not to my taste. Chenderiang Tin is in honest hands, and may succeed. The Guardian Realty of Canada may be left to those closely in touch with the local conditions.

The MONEY MARKET seems to me harder. But there was ample money for the Stock Exchange settlement; indeed, brokers declare that they have seldom been offered so much or at such low rates. Nevertheless, as I say, I suspect that we may get harder rates. I do not look for any rise in the Bank Rate, but I cannot believe in the reduction to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. which is talked of in some quarters. Gold is gradually dribbling away, and India, Paris, and Berlin may continue to absorb small lots. But if trade remains dull we need fear no rise. The feature of the week has been the Russian demand. It is one I do not understand, for there are few nations so well supplied with gold. However, Russia wants gold, and she gets it.

FOREIGNERS are not happy. There is a growing feeling that Brazil may default, and this uneasiness, joined to further trouble in Paris, where stock is on sale all the time, affects London. The Peru market is held up, but I think Peru Prefs. may be safely sold. Tintos are firm on the American figures, which, taken by themselves, are promising, but taken in conjunction with the European statistics are simply impossible to understand. In my opinion they are faked. Russians are kept steady, but Paris selling is a factor against any big rise. Hungarians are still too cheap. I also think cheap money must put up German Threes, and Italians are undervalued.

HOME RAILS are spotty. The Caledonian dividend was a bad shock. Not even the most cynical of us suspected

Vauxhall
The Car Superexcellent

FIFTY-TWO PAGES OF INFORMATION (with fifty-five illustrations) about this splendid machine compose the newly published Vauxhall catalogue, which every motorist should possess, and is invited to send for.

THREE YEARS' GUARANTEE

VAUXHALL MOTORS LTD.,
174-182, GT. PORTLAND STREET, W.

so bad a result. The House took the Ayrshire distribution well. I confess that I expected better news. Evidently the Scottish lines have had heavy expenses throughout the year. The North Stafford dividend was excellent. We must now wait for the Heavies. The Great Central managed to pay 2 per cent. on the 1894 Prefs. I expected a full dividend here, but many looked for something on the Preferred ordinary. This was being sanguine to madness. The results to date are on the whole disappointing. Presumably the companies are not making the best show possible. They will never get another year like 1913, and they should have paid record dividends. But the average hardly shows any improvement upon 1911.

YANKEES are quite disorganised. The decision to reconstruct Rock Island can have surprised no one. It has long been inevitable. But those behind the scenes have ample funds, and they will by means of a twenty dollar assessment place the road in a sound position. Also they will probably wipe out the present complicated system of holding companies. Then we shall know where we are in Rocks. To-day we don't. New York Centrals remain weak. The road is not doing well, and the persecution—I can call it nothing else—still threatens. The peculiar thing in the Yankee market is the continued strength of Steels—due possibly to the “bear” position. The Trust is not doing well—everyone knows it, and everyone has sold short. Denvers will possibly follow Rocks, reconstruct, and assess; no one should hold either.

RUBBER keeps very hard. The financial position in Brazil is so bad that no one dare hold any stock, and the price of fine hard-cured Para dwindles. Here the exact opposite applies. Cheap money allows the “bull” brigade to buy Plantation and hold it up. This puts up the price of the shares, and gives the Trusts a chance of unloading. The Culloden Trust paid a small dividend, but calmly ignores the huge depreciation of its securities—a curious method. Surely an asset (which is the only asset) that has fallen £90,000, and is not worth the price at which it stands in the balance sheet, must be written down before any dividend can be paid.

OIL shares are hardly mentioned. In St. Petersburg the oil market is dull. Paris sympathises and London does not like the position in Mexico. We are all wondering when the Premier Oil will call another meeting of its shareholders. Burmahs have been steady, and Shells hard, but no business of any moment has been done.

MINES.—In the mining market there has been some good buying of all the Barrier mines on the proposed amalgamation. Another rise is prophesied in Zincs, and the newspapers are flooded with favourable notices. The Associated Northern Blocks report was sad indeed when one remembers that over 22s. was paid by many for the shares. Professor Liveing reports in a gloomy fashion, and holders are tumbling over one another in their eagerness to get out. I do not blame them. There is no business doing in Kaffirs, and less in Rhodesians. The rig in Kirkland holds its own, but only the arrant gambler is concerned. He will probably lose his money.

MISCELLANEOUS.—Even the Miscellaneous market shows signs of drooping; but all Electric Light shares keep hard. The St. James's and Pall Mall profits rose sufficiently to enable the dividend to be raised from 10 to 12 per cent., and the other announcements are also satisfactory. The Cairn Line and King Line figures are good, and Houlders, now that it is under the ægis of the Furness group, maintains its dividend. Nevertheless, I think all shipping shares should be sold. Cuban Ports have been marked up, and holders should take advantage of the rise to get out. It also seems wise to sell Mexican Trams and Brazil Tractions.

Before I close this article I should like to congratulate my old friend Walter R. Skinner upon the 28th issue of his “Mining Manual.” It contains nearly 1,250 pages of information, and is a unique volume, complete in detail, accurate and clearly compiled. It is cheap at 15s.

RAYMOND RADCLIFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

LA LANGUE ÉTRUSQUE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—A perusal of “La Langue Étrusque: Affinités Ougro-Finnoises, Précis Grammatical, Textes Traduits et Commentés, Dictionnaire Étymologique, par Jules Martha, Professeur à la Faculté des Lettres de l'Université de Paris” (Paris: Ernest Leroux, Éditeur. 1913.) convinces any one that the author has devoted much laudable patience and scholarly research to a very interesting and difficult problem. I am not prepared to criticise his conclusions; but I got the following note from him: “Paris, 28 janvier, 1914; 16 rue de Bagnaux, VIe. Monsieur, Il est très possible qu'il y ait quelque relation entre la langue étrusque et les dialectes heuscariens. Vous seriez bien aimable de m'indiquer les principales ressemblances que vous avez relevées. Vous me parlez d'un ouvrage de Monseigneur Liverani. Je ne le connais pas. Il est probable qu'il n'a jamais été publié. Veuillez agréer, Monsieur, l'assurance de mes sentiments les plus distingués.—Jules Martha.” This emboldens me to add my mite to the discussion which his book of 496 pages has raised among linguists, and to connect it with an other branch of philology which formerly won the hospitality of THE ACADEMY, in the days of Prince L. L. Buonaparte. I mean the origin of Heuscar, or Baskish, of which M. Martha makes no mention. His book would be the better, if it contained a list of corrigenda. The similarities which I pick from it are these:

A=a, the demonstrative pronoun=that, and also the definite article=the, in Baskish.

AN=ici; Baskish han, an, there, in that place; or voici, recalling B. huná=see there!

CANA=voici, B. han, an huná.

CES=apprivoisé; B. hez, as in St. James iii, 8, in the Baskish New Testament of Ioannes Leizarraga, published by the Trinitarian Bible Society, of 7, Bury Street, London, W.C., in 1908.

CESP=sept; B. zazpi, probably akin to Latin septem.

ETER=excellent; B. eder, beautiful, in all senses.

Ez=père; B. aita, (Gothic atta).

FELI=dire, parler; B. elhe=parole, propos.

THE Sunday Times

THE LEADING SUNDAY PAPER SINCE 1822.

ROUND THE GALLERIES

By FRANK RUTTER.

ART GOSSIP

By W. T. WHITLEY.

Acknowledged to be the most interesting, instructive and accurate articles on current art matters.

Of all Newsagents.

Price One Penny

IM=femme, mère; B. ama=mother; ema=femelle. This ema may, however, be old French feme. (Whence did the Gaels get im=butter?)

MI=je, me; B. ni=I, me.

SEC, SECH=fille. In the Vocabulaire de Mots Basques Bas-Navarraïts traduits en Langue Française par M. Salaberry (Bayonne, 1856) you will read: "Sehi, s., domestique. Ce mot s'applique aux domestiques mâles et femelles sans distinction." One sees it in the Catechism of 1733, and in the Labourdin version of the Fables of Lafontaine by Goyhette, 1852; both printed in Bayonne.

SU=feu; in B. the very self-same word, generally connected with zure (pronounced sure), tree, wood, the primitive material for fires.

X IS=urine; B. chis, chish.

At Cortona, in 1891, I inspected the antiquities in the Museum, and noted the resemblance between the characters of the Etruscan Alphabet and those of the Iberian Inscriptions of Portugal and Spain, collected by my friend, Dr. Emil Huebner, of 4, Ahornstrasse, Berlin. I was advised to call upon an aged Prete, of Cortona, Monsignore Liverani, who showed me his two heavy manuscript volumes in which he claimed to have interpreted all the Etruscan inscriptions which were then known to exist in Italy. He hoped to obtain from Pope Leo XIII the means of publishing his work. I advised him to cause a transcription of it to be made and deposited in a safe place. Has this monument of patient study and devotion to linguistic science been lost? Just outside Cortona one sees the wonderful building known as the House of Pythagoras. It occurred to me that it might have been meant as a solution in stone of the problem of squaring the circle.

February 5, 1914.

EDWARD S. DODGSON.

FREE TRADE OR FAIR TRADE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—I thank Mr. Ridley for his kindly references to myself, and I am very glad to know that I have succeeded in making clear the Fair Trade position, though I am equally sorry that the practicability of Mr. Ridley's ideal of Imperial Federation appears to me to be as doubtful as ever.

Let me speak quite plainly. The maintenance of agricultural prosperity is absolutely essential to the existence and independence of a nation. No State which has depended entirely on commerce, however rich and powerful it may have grown, has ever lasted. In fact, its very wealth has been its downfall, and this because it necessarily leads to interior degeneration as much as to foreign aggression. We English are now almost entirely a commercial nation: we have grown fabulously rich by artificially protecting our foreign trade at the expense of our own country life: political power is in the hands of the manufacturers and their dependents, the industrial workers; and consequently there is little hope that the system of Commercial Protection known as "Free Trade," with its apparent corollary of "cheap food," will ever be altered.

What will be the result? Well, there is only one possible result. England will collapse, as every commercial State—Tyre, Venice, Holland—has collapsed, and will cease to figure as a first-class Power. Remember, there is even now nothing but the Fleet between us and political extinction. It is so by our own choice; and all our wealth will avail us nothing if one important naval action were to go against us: we could be starved into submission in a fortnight.

I put it to Mr. Ridley—Would it be wise of Canada to stake everything on the continued inviolability of the British Empire? She does not, I venture to think, as a

"ROYAL YORK" HOTEL, BRIGHTON

Supreme Comfort in a Warm and Sheltered Position. Excellent Sea Views

SOME PRESS OPINIONS.

"To the Cuisine particular attention has been paid, and no expense spared, whilst the service is absolutely perfect."

"And in the Royal York you have the perfection of an English hotel and English cooking."

AND—

Colonel NEWNHAM DAVIS says:—"The Chef makes soup like a Frenchman, grills like an Englishman, and fries like an Italian."

Telegrams:
"Presto, Brighton."

Telephones: 206 Post Office, Brighton.
293 Brighton.

THE KARSINO and NEW ISLAND HOTEL HAMPTON COURT.

Propri.: Mr. FRED KARNO.

Tel.: MOLESEY 1.

The only Residential River Hotel open
all the Year round.

THE RIVIERA OF LONDON
THE FAVOURITE RESORT OF LONDON SOCIETY:
LUXURIOUS PALM COURT.
DANCES & ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

For Illustrated Brochure & Tariff, apply Manager.

matter of fact do so. And I am bound to say that I sympathise with her reluctance to provide ships for an Imperial Navy whose main function must necessarily be to guard the coasts of England rather than to strengthen the position of Canada herself. Is it not, then, wiser on Canada's part to have a second string to her bow, an alternative ideal to which to look forward? If the British Empire should dissolve, a North American Republic remains as an equal, perhaps as a greater, possibility; and I am sure that every thoughtful Canadian must inwardly feel this, however loyal to the Old Country he may declare himself to be.

Mr. Ridley is amused at my idea that, in the event of the amalgamation of Canada with the United States, the former would exercise a dominating influence. I was speaking racially, of course. Even in the States the Anglo-Saxon race is the ruling element in spite of the great admixture of nationalities which has been going on for the past hundred years. The inclusion of Canada would have the effect of strengthening this ruling element enormously, and of placing its continued predominance beyond all question, to the unquestionable benefit of the New World as a whole. I repeat what I said before, that Canada and the northern States would control the destiny of the Americas, should such a fusion as I have suggested take place.

But after all, what is the use of speculating? These big world-movements are for the most part entirely outside our control; and it is quite useless to fight against them, however exalted may be our motives. The wise course is to recognise them and to be prepared for eventualities. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

London Institution.

IMMO S. ALLEN.

BEOWULF AND VIRGIL.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—The commentators on that most interesting English poem, "Beowulf," do not seem to have noticed that "swigedon ealle:" in line 1699 of Dr. Sedgefields admirable edition, is a translation, and possibly an intentional reminiscence, of "Conticuere omnes," the first line of the second book of the Æneid.

EDWARD S. DODGSON.

The Oxford Union Society, February 2, 1914.

BOOKS RECEIVED

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Le Ciel: Lectures et Leçons pour Tous.* By J. H. Fabre. Illustrated. (Ch. Delagrave, Paris. 3 fr. 50.)
- The Effect of Taxes on Food Stuffs: When and Why a Tax on Food Stuffs does not Increase the Cost to the Consumer.* By Bernard Dale. (Effingham Wilson. 2s. net.)
- Capitals of the Northlands: Tales of Ten Cities.* By Ian C. Hannah, M.A. Illustrated by Edith Brand Hannah. (Heath, Cranton and Ouseley. 6s. net.)
- Chats on Old Coins.* By F. W. Burgess. Illustrated. (T. Fisher Unwin. 5s. net.)
- "God's Own Country." An Appreciation of Australia. By C. E. Jacomb. (Max Goschen. 5s. net.)
- The Land Problem: Notes suggested by the Report of the Land Inquiry Committee.* (Wyman and Sons. 6d.)

- The Dignity of Business: Thoughts and Theories on Business and Training for Business.* By H. E. Morgan. (Ewart Seymour and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)
- L'Esprit Classique et la Préciosité au XVIIe Siècle.* By J. E. Fideo-Justiniani. (Auguste Picard, Paris. 3 fr. 50.)
- In the Fall of the Leaf.* By Stanhope Bayley. (Elkin Mathews. 1s. net.)
- The Unfolding of Personality as the Chief Aim in Education.* By Thiselton Mark, D.Lit., B.Sc. (T. Fisher Unwin. 1s. net.)
- The Melting Pot. A Drama in Four Acts* by Israel Zangwill. (Wm. Heinemann. 2s. 6d. net.)
- The Comic Kingdom: Napoleon, the Last Phase but Two.* By Rudolph Pickthall. Illustrated. (John Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)
- The Freedom of the Press in Egypt: An Appeal to the Friends of Liberty.* By Kyriakos Mikhail. (Smith, Elder and Co. 1s. net.)
- The Story of Beowulf.* Translated from Anglo-Saxon into Modern English Prose by Ernest J. B. Kirtlan. With Frontispiece in Colour. (Charles H. Kelly. 3s. 6d. net.)
- The Romance of Names.* By Ernest Weekley M.A. (John Murray. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Abu'l Ala, the Syrian.* By Henry Baerlein. (John Murray. 2s. net.)
- Principles of Property.* By John Boyd Kinnear. (Smith, Elder and Co. 1s. net.)
- Among the Primitive Bakongo.* By John H. Weeks. Illustrated. (Seeley, Service and Co. 16s. net.)
- At the Back of the World: Wanderings over Many Lands and Seas.* By George and Jennie Pugh. Illustrated. (Lynwood and Co. 6s.)
- The Old Wood Carver.* By Sir Hubert Von Herkomer, R.A., and Siegfried Herkomer. Illustrated. (Stanley Paul and Co. 1s. net.)
- Stories from the Operas.* By Gladys Davidson. Illustrated. (T. Werner Laurie. 6s. net.)
- The Schools and Social Reform.* By S. J. G. Hoare, M.P. (John Murray. 6d. net.)
- The Philosophy of Bergson.* By the Hon. Bertrand Russell. (Bowes and Bowes, Cambridge. 1s. net.)
- Our Task in India: Shall We Proselytise Hindus or Evangelise India?* By Bernard Lucas. (Macmillan and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)
- San Miniato.* By E. J. Watson. (Partridge and Love, Bristol. 6s. net.)
- Noblesse Oblige and National Service.* (S. Williamson. 3d.)
- The Conscience of a King, and Other Pieces.* By Paul Hookham. (Cottrell Horser, Oxford. 2s. 6d. net.)
- Surnames of the United Kingdom: A Concise Etymological Dictionary.* By Henry Harrison. Vol. II, Part 8. (Eaton Press. 1s. net.)
- Everybody's Guide to Book-keeping.* By T. E. Copeland, F.S.A.A. (Brindley and Howe. 6d. net.)

PERIODICALS.

English Review; Atlantic Monthly; Publishers' Circular; Educational Times; School World; Antiquary; Book-Prices Current; The Bibelot; The Author; Cambridge University Reporter; Journal of English Studies; London Matriculation Directory, Jan., 1914; The Homeland; Cambridge Magazine; Revue Critique; Revue Bleue; Irish Review; Book Monthly; Book-seller.

THE ACADEMY

A JOURNAL OF LITERATURE, ART, FINANCE & POLITICS

No. 2181

[Registered as a
Newspaper.]

FEBRUARY 21, 1914

PRICE THREEPENCE

SHEFFIELD SIMPLEX

PRESS OPINION:—

*"The highest point to which motor design
has yet attained."*

The "TIMES," 8/11/13

The Connoisseur

who demands smart appearance, and the experienced motorist who desires chassis efficiency, have their ideals in the present 30 h.p. six-cylinder Sheffield-Simplex chassis.

Write for Illustrated List of complete cars, with beautiful bodies by Vauden-Plas, or better still, arrange a trial. Both are free.

Sheffield-Simplex Motor
Works, Ltd.
20, CONDUIT STREET,
LONDON, W.

Works: Tinsley, Sheffield

30 H.P. 6-CYLINDER CHASSIS. STANDARD EQUIPMENT INCLUDES U. S. L. ELECTRIC SELF-STARTER AND LIGHTER, ALL LAMPS, ELECTRIC HORN, SPEEDOMETER CLOCK, COMPLETE SCUTTLE DASH, WITH ALL INSTRUMENTS, £8 8s. TAX.

PRICE £885.

LATEST DESIGN TORPEDO—WITH CONCEALED HOOD

ALLIANCE ASSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED.

Head Office:

BARTHOLOMEW LANE, LONDON, E.C.

ASSETS EXCEED £23,500,000.

Chairman:

The Right Hon. LORD ROTHSCHILD, G.C.V.O.

Business transacted by the Company:—

- (1) LIFE INSURANCE, with and without Profits, with special provisions for the payment of Estate Duties.
- (2) FIRE INSURANCE of every description.
- (3) INSURANCES TO COVER LOSS OF RENT, Interest and Profit consequent upon Fire damage to property.
- (4) MARINE INSURANCE.
- (5) BURGLARY, THEFT and PLATE GLASS INSURANCE.
- (6) ACCIDENT, including PERSONAL ACCIDENT, Motor Car and Employers' Liability Insurance.

Fidelity Guarantee and Sinking Fund Policies are also granted.

Applications for Agencies are entertained, and Prospectuses with other papers may be had on written or personal application.

ROBERT LEWIS, General Manager.

THE ISSUE OF

THE ACADEMY

FOR MARCH 7

will be a

SPECIAL SPRING ANNOUNCEMENTS NUMBER

and will form a good guide to the principal books of the present season.

BARGAINS IN BOOKS.—

Kipling's Complete Works, 25 vols., half calf, gilt, fine set, £12 12s.; Hamilton's Parodies, 6 vols., £2 10s.; Jesse's Historical Works, 30 vols., Nimmo, 1901, £7 17s. 6d.; Thackeray's Centenary Biographical Edition, 26 vols., £6 6s.; Barrington's Graham of Claverhouse, 30s. net, for 10s. 6d.; Purchas's Voyages, 20 vols., £9 9s., Glasgow, 1905; Slaters' Engravings and their Values, 1912, 18s.; Chaffer's Marks and Monograms on Pottery and Porcelain, 1912, 42s.; Baily's Magazines of Sports and Pastimes, 64 vols., £7 10s.; Grimm's Fairy Tales, large paper, illus. by Rackham, £2 2s.; Proc. Inst. Civil Engineers, 142 vols., cloth, £16 16s.; Pinkerton's Voyages and Travels, 17 vols., 1808, £5 10s.; Porter's Knights of Malta, 1858, 2 vols., £3 3s.; Burton's Arabian Nights, 17 vols., illustrated, £17 17s.; Gould's History Freemasonry, 3 thick vols., morocco binding, £2 2s., cost £6 6s.; James' Painters and Their Works, 3 vols., £3 3s.; Habershon Records of Old London, Vanished and Vanishing, coloured plates, folio, £2 2s.; Yeats' Collected Works, 8 vols., £3 3s.; Walpole's Letters, large paper, 16 vols., £7 10s.; Oscar Wilde, by L. E. Ingelby, 12s. 6d., for 4s. 6d.; Ditchfield Vanishing England, 15s., for 6s. 6d.; Landon's Lhasa, 2 vols., new., 42s., for 14s.; Spenser's Faerie Queene, 2 vols., Cambridge University Press, £3 13s. 6d., for 32s. Will take any good books in exchange for above.—BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

CITY OF MANCHESTER.Appointment of Art Curator.

THE Art Gallery Committee invite applications for the appointment of a Curator of the Corporation Art Galleries at a salary of £600 per annum.

The gentleman to be appointed will be required to devote the whole of his time to the duties of the office; to become a contributor to the Manchester Corporation Officers Thrift Fund; and to sign the Manchester Corporation Deed of Service.

Applicants must in their applications state (inter alia) age, health, present and previous appointments, qualifications, etc., and the date upon which the applicant can take up the duties of the office.

Applications accompanied by copies of not more than three recent testimonials and the names of four references, must be sent or delivered, so as to reach the undersigned, not later than 12 noon on Thursday the 5th March next, endorsed "Art Curator." Canvassing directly or indirectly is not permissible and will be a disqualification.

THOMAS HUDSON, Town Clerk.

TOWN HALL, MANCHESTER,
February 14, 1914

JOURNALISTIC and SECRETARIAL TRAINING FOR LADIES.—

Rapid systematic coaching. Special course in journalism. Excellent introductions given.—Telephone or write, THE TRIANGLE SECRETARIAL OFFICES, 61, South Molton Street, W.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address MISS MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

BRITISH MUSEUM.

THE READING ROOMS will be closed from MONDAY, 2nd MARCH to THURSDAY, 5th MARCH inclusive.

F. G. KENYON,

Director and Principal Librarian.

BRITISH MUSEUM.

February, 1914.

Bettws-y-Coed, North Wales.

An Ideal Artist's Home, standing amidst some of the most picturesque valley and river scenery in the Principality. The house is well furnished and stands on side of a well-timbered hill with delightful sunny aspect. about 10 minutes walk from the station. 3 reception rooms, 6 bedrooms, bathroom and separate w.c. Kitchen and offices. Excellent studio, Charming wooded grounds. Easy rent to an approved tenant for one year. Recommended. Apply, BROWN & Co. (Chester) Ltd., House Agents and Auctioneers, Eastgate Street, Chester (6080).

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Fourteen years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE AND ART
PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION: Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free.

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Offices of
THE ACADEMY, 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

To

.....

Please send me THE ACADEMY for the next..... months.

I enclose remittance value.....

Name.....

Description.....

Address.....

CONTENTS

	PAGE		PAGE
Notes of the Week	227	Music	241
Worship	228	The Theatre :
Futurism and the Music-		"Follow the Girl" at the
Hall	228	Gaiety Theatre	242
In the Learned World	229	"Thank Your Ladyship"
A Memory of Aden	230	at the Playhouse ...	243
Reviews :		"Helen with the High
A Frontier Medical Mis-		Hand" at the Vaudesionary	231	ville Theatre	244
Sir Thomas Wiat: Stalk		The Incorporated Stage
and Flower	232	Society at the Hay-
Oriental Opinions	232	market Theatre ...	244
An Elizabethan English-		Some Magazines	245
man	233	Notes for Collectors	245
When the Assyrian Came		Two Exhibitions	246
Down	234	At St. Stephen's Shrine ...	247
Popular Opposition to the		Notes and News	249
Reformation	235	Imperial and Foreign
Shorter Reviews	236	Affairs	250
Fiction	237	Motoring	251
Unbeaten Tracks	239	In the Temple of Mammon	252
The Plague of Pictures ...	240	Correspondence ...	253
		Books Received	256

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post-free.

The EDITORIAL AND ADVERTISING OFFICE is at 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

Notes of the Week

THE meeting of Parliament makes one think, and there is only one really serious topic to think about. That topic is the almost inextricable mess into which the Government have floundered in connection with the Irish question. We were all on perfectly safe ground until Mr. Gladstone, in the days of his decadence, chose to meddle with a national matter which only needed to be severely let alone. Autonomy, or Home Rule, or whatever you like to call it, is quite good and quite reasonable, where you have to deal with a homogeneous population. Directly you come into contact with a nation which in reality is no nation at all, but two uncongenial and incongruous peoples welded together for the sake of convenience, any person who is entitled to the appellation of a statesman would know at once that there must be some outside controlling influence to prevent the opposing elements from flying at each other's throats.

The harm, unfortunately, has now been done, and in these columns we have consistently maintained that one, and only one, solution is now possible; that solution, of course, is a separate assembly for Ulster, and it is by no means a hopeless one. The Ulster Parliament would be able to safeguard the interests of the Protestants scattered through the South and West of Ireland, because Ulster would be the solvent member of the association. In putting forward this proposition we are not suggesting anything with the intention of making autonomy for Ireland unworkable. We believe that in the course of time the two assemblies would draw together. Each of them would be a participant in the future of their country; the rough edges would be smoothed down, and through the medium of joint sessions and joint conferences the divergences which are now acute would, we think, possibly disappear. The danger at the present moment appears to be that Mr. Asquith and Mr. Redmond, to both of whom we would like to ascribe the best possible motives, have neither of them quite the courage to come out into the open and face the situation in the only way in which it can be dealt with.

If our travel, as Mr. Kipling suggested in his delightful address at the Queen's Hall on Tuesday, is soon to become a matter of aeroplanes and swift air-traffic, our ideas on the subject of scenery will have to be thoroughly revised. We shall approach cities, not through their exhalations of smoke and vapours and grimy outskirts, but dive down upon them from the skies and have our first impressions of them as though we looked upon a detailed, large scale plan, while the countryside will simply be perceived as a plan of a different colour. For some reasons we are not in love with this aspect of the coming change. The charm of a winding lane consists in the flowers along the banks, in the fresh views revealed at each turn, in the loitering at gates and straying down by-paths—idle hours, in fact, which most people would be sorry to lose. "Progress" is an ambiguous term, and often seems to be accepted as meaning increased speed; if we succeed in taking an hour off the journey from London to Scotland, say some, it is a sign of "progress." When it is possible to fly that distance in half the time that an express train now requires, shall we have "progressed" to any remarkable extent? The truest advances lie in the human mind, not in the ease with which our bodies can be transported from place to place.

Too many pessimists spoil the world. That, at any rate, is the burden of Sir James Crichton-Browne in a recent interview. He has small sympathy with those who pull long faces and echo the groans of the ill-equipped worker who laments that a man is "too old at forty"; in fact, he points out that "a preponderance of the work involving calm and powerful reason is done by men from fifty-five to seventy years of age." He sets the goal of the centenarian as the normal duration of man's life. This is very comforting indeed; if only we can bear it in mind when we reach the period of three-score years and ten, instead of settling down to a mumbling and discontented "old age" we shall look forward to thirty years of really enjoyable and profitable employment. The average intelligent man has a hatred of being considered "on the shelf," and this feeling, we presume, is merely the protest of nature at being coddled and treated as though everything was finished and done with when "old age," after all, should be the real, rosy time of our lives.

Worship

FOR many ill-earned days
Sped joyously I raise
My song of fearful praise;

For Beauty, earth's own bride,
Whose breath is as a tide
Of holy mirth and pride,

Sweet wonder and strange pain
For all things maimed or slain
Whose life comes not again;

For trees with leaves a-sway,
Day-long, and day by day,
To catch what the winds say,

For birds that sing and sing
As though all life were spring
And death not anything:

I praise though none may hear
All beauty far or near
In earth or sea or air.

WILFRID THORLEY.

Futurism and the Music-Hall

PPOINTING the antithesis between the customs and characteristics of various nations is a harmless and entrancing game. Everyone knows a story or two about an Englishman, an Irishman, and a Scotchman, at the expense (morally and figuratively only) of the last-named. The game can also be played with schools—Eton, Harrow, and Winchester, for choice; or with religions—Roman Catholic, Anglican, and Nonconformist or Jewish. The number of types recommended is three.

The best Anglo-Franco-German comparison we have heard is that of Heine, with patriotism for the connecting link. The Teutono-Franco-Jewish poet said, in effect—we wish we had his very words beside us, but we have not—"The Frenchman loves his country as his mistress, the Englishman as his lawful wedded wife, and the German as his great-grandmother."

From Heine to ourselves is certainly a step, but we cannot refrain from putting on record a piece of antithetical wisdom we once served to a friend. Perhaps it was more antithetical than wise, but, at any rate, it brings us closer to the subject in hand. Our advice was—"Go to the Theatre in France, the Opera in Germany, and the Music-hall in England." Wise or not, the idea does not seem to be our monopoly. At any rate, Signor Marinetti has hold of it. He knows England is the home of the Music-hall. Else why does he address his pontifical communication on the subject to the Daily Mail? Or—to put the matter rather differently—why did he choose this subject for his first appeal on a large scale to the great heart of the British Public?

The latest Futurist manifesto bears the date September 29, and professes to have been "publié par le Daily Mail, 21 Novembre, 1913." That is not quite exact. We read Signor Marinetti's article, and we are in a position to state that the two documents differ both in form and in detail. The Daily Mail article was—an article; "Le Music-hall: Manifeste Futuriste" is a debauch, starting with a riot of classification, worthy of Austin's "Jurisprudence," and ending in an orgy of Futurist prose, "beyond the good and ill" of punctuation. And some of the words and expressions that figure in the manifesto, had they done duty in the article, would infallibly have enriched our daily press with a pink morning paper.

Why does Signor Marinetti exalt the Music-hall? For nineteen separate reasons (most of them the same), "separated" (some of them) "quite reasonably and precisely" into four. The Music-hall has no traditions; it symbolises the rapidity of modern life; it tears the veil from amorous sentimentality; it gives object-lessons in courage; and it flouts Art—"avec un grand A."

Now, a good many of these virtues do undoubtedly belong to the Music-hall, but one of them we can by no means allow. "Le Music-hall," says Signor Marinetti, "n'a heureusement pas de traditions." For the English music-hall—which is the type Signor Marinetti has in his mind, since he disdains "le genre des revues parisiennes aussi ennuyuses et stupides que la tragédie grecque"—nothing could be less true. Tradition is the essence of our variety stage; the mother-in-law, the lodger, and the umbrella are types that have a long life behind, and probably before, them. The innuendo even is perfectly conventional. The really solid Music-hall of to-day and the Music-hall of fifty years ago are as like in their essence as two circuses. The Music-hall performer who suddenly found himself in the hands of a Futurist stage-manager would probably be seized with an attack of sheer fright.

No, Signor Marinetti is too much of an idealist. If he had been the round of the London theatres, he would have seen revolution at work. If he had been to some of the typical Music-halls, he would have sat through a performance dating from the Great Exhibition of 1851. In a few of the twice-daily houses he might occasionally trace a more adventurous spirit, but even there the ensemble is frankly reactionary, in the Futurist sense. The client of the Music-hall is the product of a long and slow formative experience; a simple child of nature he is certainly not. Signor Marinetti would be better employed preaching to the new theatre. Some of its patrons are quite capable of understanding his jokes.

R. S.

A lecture on "British Wit and Humour of To-day" will be given by Mr. Walter Emanuel on Friday next, at 8 o'clock, at Stationers' Hall, Ludgate Hill. The chairman will be Mr. Arthur Waugh. Admission will be 6d., and the lecture is held in connection with the National Book Trade Provident Society.

In the Learned World

A COMMUNICATION to the Académie des Inscriptions made last month by M. Maurice Pezard well illustrates the undying nature of personal names in the East. The French excavators at Bender-Bouchir, in the province known in ancient times as Susiana and in ours as Khuzistan, have found an inscription of a king of Susa or Elam about 2000 years before Christ, called Humbanmana. This appears to be a variant of the name of Khumbaba or Humbaba—the k being merely a strongly aspirated h—the tyrant whose home was among the cedar-trees of Elam, and who was slain by Gilgamesh, the national hero of Babylonia, in whom Professor Sayce and others see the prototype of the Greek Heracles. In Greek times, however, we find this Khumbaba mixed up in a most extraordinary story in which one Nannaros, who, as was pointed out long ago, is plainly the Babylonian Moon-god Nannar, appears as his antagonist. Nor is this all. In Mahomedan times, when En-Nadim, in the book known as the "Fihrist," set to work to give an account of what he considered the cosmogony current among the Manichæans then clustered on the eastern borders of Turkestan, he found that they called Satan or Ahriman, the Chief of the Evil Creation, by the name of Hummâma. Thus we find a personal name persisting for nearly 3000 years in recognisable form, and always associated with an enemy or opponent of the good powers. An exactly similar instance of this tendency exists with regard to the queen of hell, while, on the other hand, the name of Iskander or Alexander the Great still lingers in Central Asia as that of the king of the believing genii. Whether the East is really as "unchanging" as was once thought may be doubted, but it certainly preserves tradition as the Desert does the material relics of culture.

In the Proceedings of the Society of Biblical Archaeology, the Hon. Emmeline Plunket, who has devoted a lifetime to the investigation of the astronomical myths of the ancients, again tackles the story of the Descent of Ishtar, the Babylonian Aphrodite who was fabled to have descended into hell to reclaim her dead lover Thammuz or Adonis. She would connect this legend, with which that of Gilgamesh above mentioned is interlaced, with the bright star known as Spica virginis, which, according to her, must at one particular time in Babylonia have set with the Sun, to reappear with him a month later on the horizon at dawn. This is possible enough; and, although what is called the "Astral Theory" of Oriental mythology has been pushed much too far by certain German scholars, it is by no means improbable that the Babylonians, as a nation of astronomers, strove to explain the different months of their calendar by myths which were perhaps in existence before they began to record their observations. Miss Plunket declares that this is one of the proofs that the Zodiacal calendar of the Babylonians must have been formed at a date not later than 6000 B.C., as evidenced by the fact that the month in which the reappearance of Spica was hailed with rejoicing after a month of mourning nearly coincided with the summer solstice. That this was in Babylonia also the month of harvest coincides, of course, with the elaborate theory of the Dying God worked out by Dr. Frazer in his "Golden Bough," and is supported by the fact that the Virgin of the constellation still bears on our celestial globes an ear of wheat in her hand.

In the same Proceedings, Professor Newberry shows, it would seem conclusively, that a much-damaged stela from Abydos, now in the Cairo Museum, is that of King Djer—or, as he prefers to spell it, Zer—of the First Egyptian Dynasty. This king, whose name Dr. Budge of the British Museum and others would read Khent, was one of the earliest kings whose relics were found by M. Amelineau at Omm'-el-Gaab, and the art of his reign, as shown by his inscriptions on stone vases and the like, is so different from that of the objects found in the other tombs there as to give some colour to the theory that he was of a different race from the rest of the so-called dynasty. Professor Newberry's reconstruction of the stela, which is broken in such a way that only the tip of the distinctive sign, which he assumes to be three pots or water-jars tied together, appears, is a piece of circumstantial evidence worthy of Sherlock Holmes.

Two new English journals devoted to Egyptology have appeared this month, thereby taking away the reproach that England, the Protector of Egypt, has hitherto refused to follow in this respect the example set by, among others, France, Germany, and Sweden. One of these is called the Journal of Egyptian Archaeology, and is published by the Egypt Exploration Fund, which has done such good work in excavating and preserving some of the greatest monuments in Egypt, among them being, as every visitor to Luxor must remember, the magnificent temples of Deir el-Bahari. Its first number contains, among other things, an article by Captain Lyons, giving the new law with regard to antiquities in Egypt now in operation, which must materially interest all scarab-buying tourists—their name is legion—as well as more serious investigators. In stringency it leaves nothing to be desired, but whether it will have any other effect than raising the already high price of "antikas" remains to be seen. The other contents give the lectures delivered, under the auspices of the Fund, by Professor Naville, its senior excavator, to whom we are indebted for the clearing of Deir el-Bahari; Mr. Hogarth, curator of the Ashmolean Museum; Professor Sayce, who discourses on the Egyptian beads found at Stonehenge; and others. There is also a very careful summary of finds and publications relating to Christian Egypt—a subject too often neglected by archaeologists—by Mr. Gaselee, and full reports of all the work done by the Fund during the past year. The whole tone of the journal is scholarly and impartial, and we wish it every success.

The other Egyptological periodical is called Ancient Egypt, and is said in its prefatory note to be the "regular organ of the various branches of the Egyptian Research Students' Association." It is edited by Professor Flinders Petrie, and seems to be a good deal more of a "one man show" than the other. It contains, however, two papers by Egyptologists of note in the persons of Professor Newberry and Baron von Bissing. An article by the editor on Egyptian beliefs in a Future Life — it purports to be a reprint of the Drew lecture, a foundation unknown to us—is well illustrated and interesting, and will please those who like to combine Egyptology with mysticism. One would like to learn, however, what ground the lecturer can have for the date which he assigns to the Hermetic writings, which he tells us "are dated by the political allusions in them, and were composed from 500 to 200 B.C." Subject to anything he may have to say on the subject, one must doubt whether any of the fragments he quotes are anterior to the Christian era, while most of them seem clearly to belong to the age which saw the death of paganism.

F. L.

A Memory of Aden

ALTHOUGH Aden could not, perhaps, be written Eden, it has been called harder names than, to the casual eye, it deserves. One writer styles it a coal-hole; another, the Clapham Junction of shipping east of Suez. The Arabs go to the other extreme and hail it as the "haven of rest," a tribute paid, it must be confessed, less to any scenic attractions of the place than to the beneficent rule of a born race of administrators that has never adopted the Oderint dum metuant policy of some among its rivals in the sun. No; Aden is not even remotely suggestive of Paradise, yet only a blind man or a Bonze could fail to see beauty in those clear-cut hills lit by the setting sun, their silhouette so sharp against the violet sky over which the darkness stalks swiftly as to suggest stage scenery for the Brocken act of "Faust." In the searching light of day, it is not to be denied, the lack of verdure is forbidding, and it is clear that those scalped pinnacles, arid and inaccessible, provide neither sanatorium for the convalescent nor game for the sportsman.

Those who, stationed at this westernmost frontier of our Indian Empire, have opportunities of watching its development, recognise changes, some of them for the better, during the past decade; but to the not too discerning eye of one who last set foot on Steamer Point eighteen years ago—eighteen years of unfulfilled promise gone to the greedy locusts that devour so many reputations dreamed of, but never, alas, made—the place might, but for its motor-cars, be the same to-day as it was in Queen Victoria's reign. The long-tailed kites perch and whistle as of yore in the ship's rigging, and the great grey gulls still harry them in the air.

Amphibious Somalis, hopeful of baksheesh and heedless of sharks, still dive off the top deck, for there has long been an end to the unpopular interlude during which this hazardous practice was interdicted, the Governor having revoked the decree in view of the number of aged folk supported by the earnings of the diving boys.

To the passenger in transit, a little weary of life between decks, Aden is merely a brief but welcome interlude in the long voyage to India or the Cape, with a few idle hours ashore in which to buy cigarettes and, if he be foolish enough, ostrich tips packed in long tin cases. For these, unless worthless or stolen, he has to pay as much as he would if purchasing them from a reliable dealer in Bond Street, and, even so, he runs the risk of a heigh, presto! change of tins under his very eye, discovering too late that he has been the victim of a fraud so ingenious as in some measure to condone the vendor's villainy. Here, if anywhere, the buyer needs a hundred eyes, for these unsophisticated Arabs can give as good an exhibition of legerdemain as any cheap-Jack fleecing yokels at a country fair at home.

The drive to the Tanks, formerly available only in decrepit gharries painfully drawn by knock-kneed refugees from the crowning mercy of the knacker, may now be done on petrol, though the discriminating sight-seer will, with a couple of hours to spare, still give the preference to the antique shandrydan of other days rather than be whirled along at a pace prohibitive of due appreciation of the route. If the whole truth must be told, the tanks themselves, which have, among other alleged sources, been ascribed to the Public Works Department of the Queen of Sheba, are less worth the travelling to than the picturesque native quarter passed on the way, a seething hive of black humanity, infinitely attractive to the photographer. Those who have seen the tanks on former occasions will find more to attract them in the hospitality of the Union Club, where they are sure of a welcome and good cheer.

At length, out of that baffling cul de sac forges the sturdy old Golgonda on her way to the East Coast, and, as she dips majestically to the blue seas that meet her keel, Aden goes down over the sky-line. It is a spot that, like others better and worse, is many things to many men. To the bird of passage it is a pleasant perch on which to alight, a little space while yawning hatches are fed by creaking cranes. To Arabs and Somalis it is a glad refuge from the petty tyranny of native misrule, not without opportunities of imposing on the ingenuous tourist. To white men stationed there it is a waste of sand and rock on which they must work towards the official Nirvana of home and pension. Tired eyes strain ever towards Suez and the little grey home in the West. Weary exiles sympathise with those patriotic Athenians of old who vowed that the moon which shone over Athens was finer than the moon of Corinth.

F. G. AFLALO.

REVIEWS

A Frontier Medical Missionary

Pennell of the Afghan Frontier: The Life of Theodore Leighton Pennell, M.D., B.Sc., F.R.C.S. By ALICE M. PENNELL, M.B. With an Introduction by F.M. EARL ROBERTS, V.C., K.G. Illustrated. (Seeley, Service, and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

THE brief introduction to this book has been appropriately written by Lord Roberts, who has personal knowledge of the scene and value of Dr. Pennell's labours; and the latter's father was the Field-Marshal's first cousin. The hope expressed by Lord Roberts that this volume will have a wide circulation may be cordially echoed. It is a record of great service, nobly and fearlessly rendered, to country, to humanity, to God. Dr. Pennell was cast by nature in a heroic mould, and in his Medical Mission at Bannu had ample scope for showing his sterling qualities and great ability. Bannu—as many may not know—is one of the districts of the North-Western Frontier Province of British India, situated between the River Indus and the Independent Tribes who separate British India from Afghanistan. "The Bannuchi is not a lovable or attractive type of Pathan. He has all his vices and few of his virtues." Here the Medical Mission had been established, to which Dr. Pennell was appointed by the Church Missionary Society. Besides the Hospital at Bannu, and the innumerable out-patients attending it, there was a Mission School for native children; there were, too, outlying dispensaries to be supervised, and fraud to be detected. He was often summoned to serious cases at great distances; he had regular preaching in the Bannu bazar, touring and preaching in the villages; all these multifarious duties kept him fully employed—every minute of his time was occupied. He was accessible to all-comers, and indefatigable; he took very little rest and hardly ever any holiday. Perhaps he would have been wiser to have spared himself a little, but it was in his nature to be always strenuously engaged: change of occupation was his relaxation; he was too busy to be ill, he said.

The Bannu district is subject to raids by the tribesmen who are experts at pillage and kidnapping; they live in an atmosphere of trivial quarrels, leading up to retaliation, border feuds, and bloodshed, while, as fanatical Mahomedans, they "count it righteousness and the way to heaven to kill an unbeliever." The dangers of the frontier, "bristling with tragedy," are notorious; this book recounts many instances of gallant officers suddenly attacked and struck down individually, while organised raids have to be punished, and kidnapped persons and stolen property have to be recovered by superior force or skill. In such a situation Dr. Pennell showed his fearlessness by never carrying a weapon of offence. Though he was constantly assaulted, and not unfrequently stoned, he maintained his belief in his policy, and could not be induced to change it. It was wonderful that, during his long residence at Bannu from 1893 to 1912, he escaped a violent death. Though he gained, in his medical capacity, the confidence and love of his patients and all who knew him—and Indians are shrewd judges of character—he was exposed in his long and lonely journeys to collisions with strangers, robbers, and cut-throats; he lived unarmed in their villages, trusting to the protection of his hosts. His name and reputation travelled far; the blind, the halt, and the maimed were brought to him from remote places, though many of the cases were beyond all human skill. He was most famous for his operations for cataract, but his success was often marred by the folly of the patients and their attendants.

Apart from his professional prowess, which was guaranteed by the honours and distinctions he had gained as a medical student, the secrets of his success lay in his courage, in his sympathy for the natives, in the confidence he inspired by his personal sacrifice, his personal magnetism, his many acts of forgiveness, for he never condemned a transgressor. He was convinced that his adoption of native dress, which he varied in travelling to suit local fashions, gave him a speedy entry into the affections of the people. But he was careful to distinguish that he regarded Indian garb not as an end in itself but as only one missionary implement out of many to be used when necessity arose. His main difficulties in religious matters lay with the mullahs, the priests and preachers of Islam, and with the ingrained faiths of the population hostile to Christianity. By the former he was violently opposed, but one at least of his chief antagonists succumbed to his personal influence. His sense of humour was a great help. Once he baffled a native pleader by saying, of a mental picture, that "it is compared by a process of unconscious cerebration with previous mental pictures founded on experience." By his schoolboys he was adored: himself an athlete, he encouraged their games, football and cricket, bathed with them in pools and rivers, took them expeditions, conducted a football team through India, "in every way he could he set himself to train them to be good citizens and upright men."

A medical missionary, of his stamp and physique, may gain, as he did, enormous influence: his work was "an important political factor on the Bannu frontier"; so competent authority stated. Some natives, at the same time, said of him, "your medicine is good, but your religion is wicked." His converts generally remained faithful, and some rose to positions of trust; others yielded to family pressure and relapsed. He employed his pen by writing on the "Wild Frontier Tribes," and on his Travels in Northern India; for he travelled constantly, and preached and taught wherever he went. His death from septic poisoning, after operating on his colleague, cut short a noble and useful career. "The countryside was plunged in grief." His work and name will abide on the frontier when Viceroys and Politicals have long been forgotten. This book, a simple record, will do much to inform the British public of life—and death—on the Indian frontier, and shows what an enthusiast can do to win turbulent tribesmen to civilisation and to Christianity.

Sir Thomas Wiat: Stalk and Flower

The Poems of Sir Thomas Wiat. Edited by A. K. FOXWELL, M.A. 2 Vols. Illustrated. (Hodder and Stoughton. 21s. net.)

THOMAS WIAT, knight, courtier, diplomatist, statesman, ambassador, loved making little verses to be accompanied by the lute. And now, lo and behold, his services as a great man of the world are forgotten, while his little songs, shining like bright gems in the crown of English poesy, give him immortality; which thing is a parable. For it shows the economy of Time: how like a flail Time winnows perishable from imperishable, and it also points the moral that our devouring lust for specialisation does not really accord with true harmony of life. Does Mr. Churchill play the lute, and has Mr. Lloyd George rondeaus to his credit? We have no hesitation in saying that they would be better statesmen if to the proud boast, "I am the servant of the Lord God of Hosts," they could add, "and I understand the lovely art of the Muses."

To-day, the politician who wrote poetry and was an accomplished musician would probably find that his talents cost him votes, being regarded by the vulgar as wasteful trifling, and the fact is one of those depressing signs which show how deeply Materialism has stamped its hoof. On the other hand, for at least a century it has remained equally true that the poet who was also a statesman or man of affairs has been looked upon as an incompetent Jack-of-all-trades. The result is that we have many feeble poets lifting up their insignificant mirrors to catch the fleeting glances of the Muses, while bigger men who might blossom into poetry, as they had the proud humility, are content to make money and collect old masters, or waste their substance in a riot of political self-seeking. They are all stalk. But if we think of the lives of Dante, of Spenser, of Milton, or Sir Thomas Wiat, we see how under noble and natural conditions of life a man's whole activity comes to flower in art, and we may be quite sure that the time is not far distant when the labours of men like Blake and Nietzsche, and all who insisted that without imagination man sinks towards the beasts, will bear fruit, and whole men will supplant a generation of mechanical specialisers.

Sir Thomas Wiat's poetry was the flower of his life. He translated Petrarch and borrowed freely from earlier writers, as every sincere artist borrows from his fore-runners, happily assured that originality is never a matter of mere superficial unlikeness. He was the originator of the sonnet form in English, and by his honest endeavours to wrestle with English prosody paved the way for the great Elizabethans. For all these things he is renowned in our text books and guides to English literature; but those who read for more than what is miscalled "culture" will look for the man in his verse, and they will not be disappointed. Wiat was an honest lover of life who quested for understanding and wrote with a zeal for truth. He had style because, in Matthew Arnold's phrase, he had something to say and he said it. His lightest lyrics were no mere spinning of words, no amiable contortionist's exercise in interesting emotions; but he spoke with authority, like Sydney and Donne and Herbert, of the things which he knew.

Miss Foxwell has done well to insist upon these virtues rather than upon Wiat's historical importance. It is a healthy sign of the times. Her books are a magnificent example of the care and pains which have lately been expended upon our classic authors for the purpose of making complete and definite editions. No decent library can afford to be without the Clarendon books, and here is the edition of Wiat. No pains have been spared to make the work a triumph of sound editing. The commentary is very full, but Miss Foxwell is too anxious to hand herself over to her readers in her sincere enjoyment of her author. Thus on a couple of lines in the Satire beginning, "My mothers maydes," she writes:

"This combination of work allied with a great human sympathy is the great force which is drawing men and women nearer together to-day. The idea of work undertaken in love, meeting the problems and difficulties of life on an equal footing, with mutual help and mutual joy in life, is one of the ideals of the age, and must be partially realised, because of the purity and integrity of the purpose that it involves."

However true that may be, it is an expression of personal opinion. We do not go to an authoritative edition for general opinions, and Miss Foxwell gives us too many of them, while she falls into the error of over-praise in her too great anxiety to establish Wiat's high position. She also makes use of that most detestable of all terms, "the sex." But these are human and forgivable flaws in a piece of work which merits the gratitude of every real student of English literature.

Oriental Opinions

Epochs of Civilisation. By PRAMATHA NATH BOSE, B.Sc. (W. Newman and Co., Calcutta.)

MR. BOSE has undertaken an immense task. In the words of his own candid admission: "In fact, the immensity of the task I have undertaken makes me exclaim with the Indian poet, 'A dwarf deluded do I stretch out my arms for a fruit attainable only by a giant.'"

The Indian poet's estimate of the disproportion between the relative statures errs on the side of moderation. For the difference between the infinitely small and the infinitely great is infinity. A consideration of the title of Mr. Bose's book will demonstrate the accuracy of our proposition. The word civilisation is of so wide a connotation as to be meaningless to all save the Socialist orator; and in that process which is vaguely indicated by the term there are no epochs. The natural swing of the pendulum from the doctrine of Nature doing nothing per saltum resulted in the equally erroneous doctrine that Nature does everything by epochs. It will be the glory of the twentieth century to have exposed the fallacy of this as of all generalisations. The nineteenth century saw the apotheosis of the "ologies." The twentieth century shall haply witness the restoration to favour of that knowledge, the only truly exact knowledge, which was dispossessed of her estate in favour of the upstart harlequin which has too long masqueraded in the guise of "Science." Mr. Bose complains that every science has been marching apace, except sociology. If misguided students of human affairs will insist upon forcing their pet study into the Procrustean bed of an "ology," they must not be surprised if its tender organism becomes irreparably stunted in the process.

We have read Mr. Bose's thesis with care and interest. If we have misunderstood his teaching, the fault is not in the reader but in the writer. If we read him aright, he would have us believe that there is a fundamental difference of temperament between the Oriental and the Occidental; that the passivity of the former is opposed to the activity of the latter; that material development is destructive of ethical and spiritual development. The spirit of Mr. Bose's writing is reactionary. In our opinion his faculty of generalisation has led him astray. When he attacks Huxley's exhortation to Europeans of the present age, as "grown men," to "play the man"—

Strong in will

To strive to seek to find and not to yield, he fails to see that Huxley's gospel is true, whether or not there be an answer to the question which Mr. Bose asks: "To find what?" It is a true gospel, though a man should strive after the unattainable, should seek that which he may never find, should find that which should profit him nothing.

The keynote of such a gospel is contained in the words "not to yield." The ethical and spiritual development of which the author approves, not necessarily but in fact does connote a yielding, a turning away of the face from that which is ugly and painful. The development which he holds up to scorn as "material" does, however unsuccessfully, aim at a complete understanding and solution of the problems of existence. It refuses to take things for granted. It says: "If the purpose of Providence be a beneficent purpose, we will assist in its realisation; if it be not beneficent, then we will frustrate it." Far different is the mental attitude of the homunculus of Mr. Bose. "Why strive when ye shall not attain? Why seek when ye shall not find? Why find when it shall not profit you? Yield to the inevitable."

The author has a somewhat aggressive habit of reminding us that all discoveries of any value whatsoever were made some thousands of years ago by Hindu philosophers. He is not the first critic to preach that all is vanity. Nor is he the first preacher to forget that his prototype who said, "Vanity of vanities; all is vanity," did not end there: "and further because the Preacher was wise he still taught the people knowledge." If all be vanity, our Western minds demand the reason why. And since the answer involves a complete comprehension of the "all," we are not at present in danger of that mental hebetude which comes of finality.

It would be an unprofitable task to criticise Mr. Bose's conclusions in detail. We totally disagree with him upon his general principle that the Occidental has "conquered the forces of Nature, only to be a slave of the forces which that conquest has created. His marvellous and manifold inventions, instead of lightening the struggle for existence, have tended rather to make it more acute, more prolonged, more widespread, and more debasing; instead of facilitating the liberation of the soul, have tended rather to tighten its fetters; instead of diminishing the sum of human misery, have tended rather to increase it."

So sweeping a condemnation of Western civilisation carries its own refutation upon the face of it. But it is useful as a typical expression of that peculiarly "Oriental" mode of thought which to us stands for decadence. That we disagree with Mr. Bose does not in any way preclude us from acknowledging that his work is of great value, if only because he draws attention to some of the many defects in European life and manners. His failure is due to the same causes as contributed to the disaster which befell Phæthon.

An Elizabethan Englishman

Gabriel Harvey's Marginalia. Collected and edited by G. C. MOORE SMITH. (Stratford-upon-Avon, Shakespeare Head Press.)

AT the present day, Gabriel Harvey is chiefly remembered for his literary friendship with Edmund Spenser, his literary conflict with Thomas Nashe, and his attempt to impose classical metres upon English poetry—an attempt which has caused him to be dubbed "pedant" from his own day to this. But recent research has shown that Harvey, far from being a mere pedant, was a man of wide interests and sympathies and of keen ambitions, and one whose friendship was valued by some of the most gifted men of his day.

The present volume contains, besides the Marginalia, which are its essential part, a study of the life and character of Harvey. For this, Professor Moore Smith tells us, the material "is so abundant that it would not be strange if Harvey stood out as the best known of all Elizabethan Englishmen"; and he has certainly been able to set forth a very complete and vivid account of Harvey's career, "with its bright morning, its noonday storms, and its long, dull evening." A tragical career it was in many ways. His brilliant promise never came to fulfilment. If he had the gift of attaching friends to himself, he seems to have possessed in no less degree the power of exciting enmity, and in his efforts to better his position he found his way constantly blocked by those personally hostile to himself.

Of the Marginalia which Professor Moore Smith here publishes, the great bulk is now printed for the first time. Harvey's Commonplace Book, preserved in the British Museum, is included. The books whose margins he has enriched with notes bear witness to his wide reading in many languages besides his own, and to the great variety of subjects in which he was interested. Works on law, politics, history, and natural philosophy all came within his range. Poetry and the drama are less conspicuous. The only contemporary English poet whose work he annotates is George Gascoigne; but in a copy of Speght's edition of Chaucer we have some valuable notes on the writers of his day. This last-named volume which, though known to have been in existence in the eighteenth century, was supposed to have perished in a fire, was brought to Professor Moore Smith's notice when his book was already in type, but fortunately not too late for him to include the Marginalia in an appendix, and to discuss the points raised therein in a preface. We are also given a photographic facsimile of the most famous passage in these notes—that containing the earliest known mention of the play of "Hamlet":

"The younger sort takes much delight in Shakespeare's Venus and Adonis; but his Lucrece, and his tragedie of Hamlet, Prince of Denmarke, have it in them, to please the wiser sort."

Professor Moore Smith discusses in his preface the bearing of this note on the usually accepted date (1602) of "Hamlet," his conclusion being that in all probability the drama is dated almost certainly two, and possibly four, years too late.

Literary students will be grateful to Professor Moore Smith for having made accessible to them in so readable a form these intimate notes and comments, which throw so much fresh light on Gabriel Harvey's complex and outstanding personality.

When the Assyrian Came Down

Excavations at Ain Shems (Beth-Shemesh). By DUNCAN MACKENZIE, Ph.D. Illustrated. (Palestine Exploration Fund Offices. Double Vol. 31s. 6d.)

THE new annual of the Palestine Exploration Fund, which is a double volume, is devoted entirely to the excavations during 1912 at Ain Shems, the Biblical Beth-Shemesh. The text, written by Dr. Duncan Mackenzie, extends to one hundred large quarto pages, and these are followed by sixty-one pages of splendidly reproduced plates, comprising photographs, plans and drawings, together with a few illustrations in the text. These features have combined to form a volume, which, apart from its value to the expert, must prove a pleasing addition to the libraries of all archaeologists, both professional and amateur. Beth-Shemesh, which has lain desolate since its destruction by Sennacherib, years before the beginning of the Christian era, was the site of three distinct cities, each of which was in turn destroyed by an alien invader. After the first two destructions the city was rebuilt, but so thoroughly had it been destroyed that, in both instances, the new city was erected upon the ruins of the old one. The first of these, destroyed about 1400 B.C., was that of the Canaanites. This was succeeded by that of the Philistines, which was in turn captured and destroyed by the Israelites, who in their turn succumbed to Sennacherib and the Assyrian host. The city was never again rebuilt, although the Arab village of Ain Shems now occupies the site.

The authorities of the Fund in the course of the excavations brought to light innumerable objects; after these have been thoroughly examined, they cannot fail to extend the field of knowledge of early Palestinian history and of Biblical science. The plates, forming a not inconsiderable portion of the present volume, contain reproductions of many of the smaller objects which are part of the harvest of the excavators, and as the periods to which many of these objects relate are identical with those of a good portion of the Old Testament narrative, one can easily understand how much light they throw on the Bible story and on the social customs of the ancient Hebrews. For instance, a large number of finds consisted of water pitchers, belonging to a period contemporary with that of the Patriarchs. Dr. Mackenzie is therefore not unjustified in suggesting that these pitchers are probably, if not identical with, very similar to that borne by Rachel when Jacob met her at the well. Then, again, many small figures of gods and goddesses came to light, and these Dr. Mackenzie suggests were household gods similar to and contemporary with those stolen by Rachel when she left her father's house. All these small discoveries must add appreciably to the sum of Philistine and Israelite lore. The most valuable of the discoveries recorded in this volume is, however, that of the great South Gate, considered by Dr. Mackenzie one of the finest monuments in Palestine. Another discovery of supreme interest is the great Canaanite High Place, including its pillars, which survived through all vicissitudes until its overthrow by Sennacherib, when the city was finally destroyed.

The Fund does well by means of these volumes to bring before all of us the invaluable work it is performing. It is to be hoped that the public for its part will recognise these researches by more adequately supporting the Fund.

Messrs. Sidgwick and Jackson publish this week Miss Ethel Sidgwick's new novel, "A Lady of Leisure." For once in a way, Miss Sidgwick deals wholly with English characters, and the greater portion of the story takes place in London. The same firm issue the Welsh play, "Change," by J. O. Francis, recently performed in London by the Stage Society. This is the play that won Lord Howard de Walden's prize.

Popular Opposition to the Reformation

The Western Rebellion of 1549. By FRANCES ROSE-TROUP, F.R.Hist.S. (Smith, Elder and Co. 14s. net.)

IN no department of English history has such biased partiality been shown as in the chapter of the Reformation period. The reasons are sufficiently obvious. Until the new philosophical school of history arose under the leadership of men like Bishop Stubbs and Lord Acton, historians, in the interests of policy, expediency, or religious predilections, had no scruples about slurring over or omitting inconvenient facts in a manner which often amounted to a suppression of the truth. Stubbs once traversed the ritual judgments of the Privy Council as a "most barefaced falsification of history and of documents." If such an indictment were possible in the case of English judges, what might be expected of prejudiced historians, who, as Acton said, were exactly like jurors, who vote according to their personal likes and dislikes. In the Moral Sciences, Prejudice is Dishonesty. In much religious history moral science is of no account.

Bright dismissed in a few lines the Western Rebellion as mainly a result of social discontent at the rise in prices and enclosure of common-lands. Though we now know well enough that the Reformation was forced on the people from above by Tudor absolutism, former historians generally gave the impression that the country welcomed the suppression of the monasteries and joyfully accepted without protest the most violent changes in religious worship.

But the Calendars of State Papers reveal a very different story. These grim documents are as a well of truth, unfouled by the mire of controversy, and the talented author of this work has examined them to some purpose. Many other MSS. have been consulted, as for example, at Hatfield House, at Oxford, at the Diocesan Registry, Exeter, and particularly the Petyt MS. in the library of the Middle Temple. Miss Rose-Troup tells us of the disturbances which arose in Cornwall as early as 1536. In that land of many saints, with their local festivals, resentment began with the suppression of the village feast-days. Later, the abolition of customary church ceremonies, but, above all, the despoiling of churches of their beautiful treasures, crosses, plate, banners, reliquaries, vestments, aroused the greatest indignation, particularly "when the commissioners had been reported as riding along the highways decked in vestments associated with the most sacred and solemn services. Gross insult was added to the injury of stealing things mostly bought with the people's own contributions."

The churches' furniture was regarded naturally as the property of the parish. This feeling is evidenced by the number of beautiful pre-Reformation screens still extant in Devon churches, which no pressure of the terrible arm of the law could induce the parishioners to destroy. In how cruel and summary a manner the law was enforced we learn from these pages. It is true that the people were, strictly speaking, rebels. But it is equally true, though hitherto often forgotten or designedly neglected, that in a large part of England the Reformation Settlement was carried by force of arms and ruthless executions, amounting sometimes to massacre. The Lincolnshire rising was followed by thirty executions. In the North we find that "seventy-four victims were suspended from the walls of Carlisle alone, while a list of those executed by Norfolk's lieutenants bears witness to a terrible vengeance." All this Froude ignores. Further, he exonerates Lord Russell for the horrible massacre of prisoners of war when the Royal forces were marching on Exeter. He hints that it was the work of mercenaries, but does not produce a grain of evidence. At Clyst Heath the insurgents fought with great valour and bravery, but were defeated with fearful carnage on both sides, to which the plough three centuries later bore witness in the vast number of bones disclosed. Later, the battle of Sampford Courtenay left five or six hundred dead on the field, while of the fugitives some seven hundred men were slain. The last stand was made at King's Weston, in Somerset, where there was "great slaughter." The suppression of the rising was followed by numerous executions in the West, "a trail of death and terror, a veritable shambles on an enormous scale." Those who wish to know by what a reign of terror in many parts of the country the sweeping changes of the Reformation were compelled, against the will of the people, will find in these pages some remarkable evidence drawn from MSS. and other contemporary sources by the zealous research of the talented author, who has written a most interesting account of the insurrections in Devonshire and Cornwall against religious innovations in the reign of Edward VI.

NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE

INSURANCE COMPANY.

Funds Exceed £23,000,000.

"An old and first class office. Low rates a distinctive feature."—The Times.

Chief Offices :—LONDON : 61 Threadneedle Street. EDINBURGH : 64, Princes Street.

Shorter Reviews

Edmund Burke und die Französische Revolution. By FRIEDRICH MEUSEL. (Weidmannsche Buchhandlung, Berlin. 5 mks.)

BURKE is a writer who will always be read. It has been granted to him to say almost all there is to say on one side of the greatest historical debate of modern times, and to say it before anyone else had begun to grasp the meaning of the phenomena under discussion. It is curious that two foreign works dealing with the "Reflections on the French Revolution" should have appeared almost at the same moment—M. d'Anglejan's French translation and Herr Meusel's critique. Herr Meusel's work, we gather from the preface, is only an instalment. It consists really in a series of suggestions, some of them most informing. The central fact about Burke—that he stood for historical against abstract politics—is well developed. Comparisons with Hume and Herder help to define his position. Herr Meusel ingeniously notes that, when Hume wants to describe a great man, he uses substantives, giving his subject a ready-made, doctrinaire appearance, while Burke prefers adjectives and verbs, "die Eigenschaften und Tätigkeiten schildern." Burke is elsewhere assigned to the growing company of the fathers of Romanticism. We note a reference to the "hübschen Artikel des ACADEMY, Bd. LIV, S64." In another note on the same page we find an example of a certain pedantic truculence that occasionally spoils our pleasure—"Hillebrand irrt, wenn er meint . . ." etc., and "Doch überschätzt ihn Held, wenn er . . ." und so weiter!

Ovid and the Renaissance in Spain. By RUDOLPH SCHEVILL. (University of California Press, Berkeley, Cal., U.S.A. $2.50.)

THE University of California has done much good work of an unobtrusive kind in relation to the lesser phases of classical thought. In the present volume the author, as the result, no doubt, of a very extended series of researches, places before us the effects of the "Ovidian Tale" upon renaissance writings in Spain; he also traces the influence of the "Metamorphoses" upon Spanish mythological writers. The learned author shows in a very convincing manner the enormous influence wielded by the amatory writings of Ovid until as late as the middle of the seventeenth century, when "A more genuine psychology of our human relations and of the motives of our actions guided poets and novelists; love and its manifestations became, in a sense, more reasonable because they were truer to real life, and more original in so far as the art of writing broke with practically every inherited classical tradition. In the change Ovid and his prestige were bound to vanish for ever."

Sonnets from the Trophies of José-Maria de Hérédia. Rendered into English by E. R. TAYLOR. (The Author, San Francisco.)

FROM San Francisco comes the fifth edition of Mr. Taylor's very capable and painstaking version of Hérédia's famous sonnet-sequence. We can have nothing but praise for the zeal and industry which have gone to its making, but Mr. Taylor would be happier if he gave more heed to Dryden's counsel and dwelt less upon the actual words of his original, throwing them ruthlessly into the furnace of his own imagination and giving them back to us completely fused and recast. If we compare his "Church Window" or "Samurai" with Mr. Eugene Mason's superb renderings of the same sonnets, the advantages of freedom in vocabulary are at once seen to be overwhelming. It is true that Hérédia makes great play with words of remote suggestion such as Togukawa, Cipango, for which some equivalent must be found; but we do not see the advantage of reproducing nacre, saker, châtelaines, poulaines, all in a single sonnet as rhymes simply because they so appear in the original, even if, which is exceedingly doubtful, they can be considered as English words at all, for they cannot have the force of suggestion which they carry to a French ear. And what is a "nielloed pax" and a "ring's chaton"? Hérédia tells us, of course, but Mr. Taylor does not.

To have done with our cavilling, a large number of these sonnets are rendered perhaps as perfectly as is possible, and fully reproduce the sonority and exalted paganism of their originals. "Artemis," "The Ravishment of Andromeda," "The Rapier," "The Beautiful Viole," are beautifully turned, while "The Trebia" is completely triumphant. In "Nessus" and the "Centauress" Mr. Taylor has managed to give a noble air to musings so very pagan that they might very easily convey simply an aroma of foulness, were they less deftly handled. In short, the volume is one which no lover of Hérédia can afford to neglect, however much he may regret the translator's occasional lapses into strange jargon, and his equally foreign slighting of both definite and indefinite articles.

"Interpretations and Forecasts: A Study of Survivals and Tendencies in Contemporary Sociology," by Victor Branford, M.A., will be issued by Messrs. Duckworth this month. Its review of social and economic movements, and its attempt to give a sociological interpretation of them detached from partisan points of view and political interests, are in continuation of the author's work for the advancement of sociological science, as one of the founders of the Sociological Society and its first honorary secretary. The author has made arrangements with his publisher by which the profits of the English edition will be for the benefit of the Cities Committee of the Sociological Society.

Fiction

Limelight. By HORACE WYNDHAM. (John Richmond. 6s.)

MR. HORACE WYNDHAM is the well-known author of many successful novels dealing with the stage, the army, matrimony and many other interesting matters. His latest story of the theatrical world is a most entertaining one, and one which describes life in the haunts of mummers as many of us have known it. The characters that appear in his pages are those that anyone may meet there—the aspiring youth and girl, the broken-down actor, the jealous actress, and others of “the profession,” together with the variety-agent and the actor-manager who reserves for himself the best part and the best lines in every play he produces. A couple of years ago THE ACADEMY noticed a work, “The Position of Peggy Harper,” by Leonard Merrick, which treated of the same subject, and it is a curious coincidence that these two authors should have produced novels—irrespective of each other—which run very much on similar lines. The hero and heroine, young aspirants for histrionic honours, first meet at an agent’s office, which, after all, is only natural, but the hero in each story writes a melodrama and has trouble concerning the production of it. Such things no doubt have happened before, as recent law-suits can testify, and in the words of the Preacher, “there is no new thing under the sun.” There are other resemblances, but probably they are due to the class of people described and the world they move in. Mr. Wyndham appears to have got tired of his story before he reached the end of it, for it runs to but three hundred pages, and finishes rather abruptly; the impecunious hero quite unexpectedly coming into wealth, and he and the heroine quitting the limelight, which had not shone too kindly upon them. Perhaps Mr. Wyndham will tell us in a future volume the fate of Eliot Bingham’s comedy and melodrama which were on the point of being produced at the end of the story.

Blush-Rose. By E. A. VIZETELLY. (Holden and Hardingham. 6s.)

IN issuing “Blush-Rose,” a book based on the French story of Amédée Achard, we are indebted to Mr. Vizetelly for one more romance of war, bloodshed, and stirring events. The original “Belle-Rose,” as M. Achard called his book, we have not read; but Mr. Vizetelly has given us a translation interesting and good in its many details. The troublous and adventurous times of Louis XIV form the period during which Jacques, the son of Guillaume Grinedal, a falconer, leaves his father’s house to seek fame and fortune on the wider field of battle. Courageous, fearless, and honest, the lad wins lasting friends, and, as must happen to anyone with Jacques’ resolute nature, relentless enemies as well. Many encounters does he pass through, many skirmishes is he concerned with, many duels are fought, and, although on several occasions it seems possible that he will be outwitted or defeated by his enemies, yet does he not give his name to the book, and therefore must he not survive, victorious and triumphant? The passages describing these many exciting incidents are particularly well done, and place Mr. Vizetelly’s story on a much higher level than books of a similar—or as Mr. Vizetelly would say “somewhat similar” (the author makes the word quite irritating, the number of times he uses it)—character. The reader hurries on breathless to know what will happen to the daring fugitives; for it is more often than not as fugitives that “Blush-Rose” and his companions are dashing through France, having incurred the anger or malice of someone in high power.

Love as well as war enters into our hero’s affairs, the two ladies who give their affection into his keeping being women of good social standing and able to aid him in some of his hours of need. One is merely an incident in his career; the other his life-long friend and eventually his wife. Evidently the popular way of embracing at this period is to take the face of the loved one between the hands and then implant the seal of devotion—at least that is the way the demonstration is described many times in the story.

Thanks are due to Mr. Vizetelly for placing within reach of all English readers a good rendering of an interesting French romance, the dramatic rights of which, we understand, have already been applied for.

A Lady of Leisure. By ETHEL SIDGWICK. (Sidgwick and Jackson. 6s.)

THERE is about this simple English story of people living in a country rectory, others in Harley Street, and two more belonging to a dressmaking establishment at Battersea, so much that is elusive, so much that is reticent, that the wonderful spell of the whole is not realised until the last page is reached. Miss Sidgwick’s style is excellent; a short phrase, one or two words of description, and the person is before us. The reader knows immediately Violet, the lady of leisure; Margery and Maud, the rector’s daughters; Violet’s mother; Alice, the clever young dressmaker; Dr. Ashwin, Violet’s father; and, in fact, all who in any way figure in the romance. The love between Violet and her father draws them very close to one another, and is all the more intensified by the unloyal behaviour of Mrs. Ashwin, a lovely, regal, and attractive woman. As Violet once said to her friend, “It is of no use talking to me about mother. Mother is divine. I saw father thinking so at the same time as I did. We are all perfect pigmies—grimacing pigmies—compared with her.”

Like some beautiful gentle flower slowly unfolding its petals and as quietly closing them after spreading its perfume around, so the story opens out, gradually releases its charm, and concludes, leaving the reader the happier for having been a witness of the delicate tracery of events and the characters who helped to form them.

Time's Hour Glass. By ALFRED E. CAREY. (Greening and Co. 6s.)

THE Kernel, the Old 'Un, and the "Co" went on a walking tour; they encountered Miranda and some others; the "Co," who tells the story, met with adventures of sorts in the course of the book, and the end, apart from John Saumarez's letter—which is as mere epilogue—is as we would have had it. To tell the plot, or a part thereof, were idle, for it is in the characters that we are interested, far more than in their doings.

The Old 'Un's yarns would delight the heart of a Puritan or a Boccaccio, so diverse are his humours; the Kernel is a man of many memories, of the clean, pungent kind that we feel in reading of them. Borrowians will come with pleasure to a book which, without sense of strain or unreality, renders the gipsy dialect correctly and in a way that gives a sight of the true gipsy spirit, and pictures gipsies of to-day with fidelity and insight. It is a book of fresh air and openness; we owe its author a grudge for a few dull pages among its total of nearly four hundred, but we bear witness to the fact that there is sufficient of good in the remainder to outweigh by far the fault of the few. It is an interesting yarn, bearing the marks of clear and wide observation on its author's part.

The Possessed. By FYODOR DOSTOIEFFSKY. From the Russian by CONSTANCE GARNETT. (William Heinemann. 3s. 6d. net.)

OF all Russian novelists, Dostoevsky is perhaps the most characteristic of his country. Tolstoy was always—despite his fantastic repudiation of the fact—an aristocrat. Turgenieff was a cosmopolitan. Gorky represents that spirit of revolt which, at the present time, is common to all countries. But Dostoevsky was pre-eminently the novelist of the Russian people. Unlike his two great rivals, he was Russian alike in the width of his sympathies and in a certain stoical resignation which prevented him from throwing himself whole-heartedly into the movement for the emancipation of the Russian moujik. It was not that he had an insufficiency of imagination. It may easily have been that he saw too clearly. He himself had suffered for his liberal opinions. But he knew how hopelessly futile was the political anarchy which "advanced" thinkers were trying to foist upon an unwilling populace.

"We did nothing but indulge in the most harmless, agreeable, typically Russian, light-hearted liberal chatter." So he writes in the introductory chapter to "The Possessed," and these words supply the keynote of this great and gloomy book. With infinite, with almost wearisome detail Dostoevsky traces the development of a Nihilist conspiracy in a Russian provincial town. One is impelled to a certain sympathy with the leading protagonist, Nikolay Stavrogin, who commences his career by tweaking the nose of a highly respectable official, and who concludes it by hanging himself; but, for the most part, the reader will find it difficult to avoid sharing the contempt which the novelist obviously feels for these fussy and futile busybodies. The book is written with undeniable power, and there are glimpses here and there of a humour which one seems to miss in such a story as "Crime and Punishment." The attack on Turgenieff—who appears in the second chapter as Karmazinov—is hard to justify, but easy to explain. Dostoevsky had suffered too severely to feel any real sympathy with a writer who launched his polished invective against a system under which thousands were groaning from the secure seclusion of Paris. A word of acknowledgment is due to the excellent translation of Mrs. Garnett, who has laid all English students of Russian fiction under a deep debt of obligation.

The second two of a course of three Cantor Lectures on "Artistic Lithography" will be delivered by Mr. Joseph Pennell at the Royal Society of Arts on Mondays, February 23 and March 2, at 8 p.m. In connection with these lectures a very interesting collection of lithographic prints (including an exhibition by members of the Senefelder Club) will be on free view at the Society's house, John Street, Adelphi, W.C., until Monday, March 2, open from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. (Saturdays from 10 a.m. to 1 p.m.). At the last lecture a demonstration of transferring and printing lithographs will be given.

THE Libraries, Museums and Art Galleries Year Book 1914 is the Manual of Professional Practice. But it is more than this. It tells every Bookman; every educationist; every student where special collections of Books on his particular subject are to be found throughout the country, and how to borrow from them. It also tells him where Special Museum collections are to be found, although these cannot be borrowed.

It is a key to unlock the collected knowledge of the country.

Get the Book: get it somehow. You want it. Buy or borrow the Book: but do not beg for it, nor steal it.

470 p. crn. 8vo. 8s. 6 net.

Stanley Paul & Co., 31, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

Unbeaten Tracks

LA BREA.

MANY descriptions have been attempted of the famous Pitch Lake of La Brea. Kingsley's word-picture in "At Last" is too prolix and sententious. If Tom Hood could have spun one of his cobweb "songs" about this ghostly inferno, weaving Indian legend into the fabric of its magic shroud, such song would have conveyed a truer impression than statistics and catalogues of trees. Raleigh ran his little craft ashore there to caulk. According to his masterful creed, tactics signified the art of seizing the nearest weapon and beating your enemy therewith. His mind flew straight to its quarry. Not far away from La Brea a body of Spaniards held a little fort. They appear to have been forgotten by the home authorities and were staling in exile. Raleigh had determined on a dash for the mainland, tempted by the mirage of that El Dorado which ultimately lured him to his doom. It would "have savoured very much of the asse," he naïvely remarks, to leave enemies on his flank. So he promptly smoked out the hornets' nest and wiped the Spaniards out of existence.

Our party went ashore from the little coasting steamer in boats. A dark pall of mephitic vapour lay across the elevated plateau, black and treeless, before us. The asphalt deposit eternally slides seawards, glacier fashion. It bulges up in the bed of the sea, it bubbles and frets inwardly. Could Shakespeare have heard of this weird spot when he penned the famous dialogue between Hotspur and Glendower?

Diseased nature oftentimes breaks forth
In strange eruptions.

Skirting the active area (about 100 acres) of the great fermenting vat, there springs up a marvellous vegetation, due to the underground heat, the tropic sun and the heavy rainfall, produced by constantly changing atmospheric tension. Here is "stove heat" in excelsis. The succession of crops must be incessant, but under conditions leading to rankness, not perfection. The wild pineapple grows to an unusual size, but, in general, the fruits of the district are flavourless and poor in quality. We trudged a mile or so in steamy heat, like that of the Nepenthes House at Kew Gardens, and then reached a ragged village. The folk were all infected with the apathetic, listless air, so characteristic of the "poor Indian." They squatted in squalor and dirt on their patches of land. Tickle the surface of the ground and it will give you mañoc and other lightly-won vegetable foods.

A young Indian came toward us and offered to guide us round the Lake. The man was typical of his race—of the high-cheeked Mongol breed, with a shock of wiry horsehair, a muddy complexion, mouth and nose well cut—almost aristocratic. His most arresting feature was, however, his eyes. These were dark, melting, dreamy. They possessed that peculiar quality to be noted in the eyes of the deer, who watch all comers with a glance appealing and shy. Our guide's English was good, but occasionally a phrase was used which sounded as if it had been copied out of a book. He spoke slowly, sadly, with excellent articulation. He had evidently received his training in the village school. There seemed no trace of humour in his composition. We tried him with a few jokes, but the business of life for him was apparently a preternaturally solemn affair.

He knew the lake in its every corner. On its fringe grows the roucou, from the seed-pods of which is extracted the dye familiar to us in the colour of Dutch cheeses. On the "inky cloak" of the area of so-called "pitch" vegetation comes to an end. We wandered over hummocks and ridges of sticky paste, fizzing with sulphuretted hydrogen. Jets of gas are perpetually squirting out of the surface. Apply a match to one of these and a tiny tongue of flame shoots up for a few seconds; stand still for a moment, you feel yourself sinking, and the impress of your boots will be left on the plastic surface. Handle the stuff and it does not soil your fingers. The Government geologists a few years ago estimated that this black cataract contains four and a half million tons of crude asphalt. The heat of the sun and the stench of the exhalations of gas soon grow oppressive. Runlets of water flow between the ridges of asphalt. We spent a couple of hours on this strange bogland and then told our Indian to guide us back to the village.

There is a legend of this place, a tale of retributive justice, which was recounted a few years back by an aged Indian to Joseph, the historian of Trinidad. It runs as follows: The Chayma tribe once inhabited here. Everything came ready-made to their hands—the fish in the waters, the fruits on the trees, the years in their seasons. Humming birds fluttered over every bush. But the Chaymas, in sheer wantonness, scoffed at the idea that the souls of their ancestors inhabited the jewel-bearers whizzing from flower to flower. They slaughtered the humming-birds wholesale. Then the wrath of the Good Spirit was kindled, and the community of bird-murderers disappeared, swallowed up in the black gulf of pitch, where lie their bones until this day.

We made a circuit back to the Indian village and offered our guide a few coins for his trouble. He was highly indignant at the suggestion. We proffered him the money repeatedly, but he would not listen to anything we had to say, and finally retreated to his cabin, from which he returned with some birds in a home-made wicker cage. Would the present writer accept them? The risks of the voyage impelled us to decline. We told him the birds would surely never reach England. So he retreated again, baffled, and came back with a few Indian trinkets, which we gladly accepted. Then he said: "Would you take me for your servant, sare? I would be very faithful." Visions rose of Pocahontas and the unfortunate exiles brought to Europe by Englishmen and Spaniards. So we told him it was impossible, that our sunless England would kill him off quickly. At this rebuff he was quite shocked. "Have you no wife and children?" we asked. Oh! yes, he told us, in his quaint, gentle vein, he had a wife and five children, but he would leave them with the neighbours. There would be no difficulty on that score. We had not the heart to speak chaffingly; it was too pathetic; the man was apparently so deeply grieved and disappointed. Then we urged him again to take something from us for all his trouble. Eventually we handed him some little personal trifle, as it was useless to induce him to take money, and so we left him. He had awakened our interest, and we could not shake off the glamour and pathos of those sad, reproachful eyes. What must be the fate of his race? It is a hard saying that it is destined to be hustled out of existence. We have found these folk faithful as dogs, but capable of fierce acts of retribution when treated with European savagery. They have none of the light-heartedness and animal energy of the negro.

One of the great problems of Central and Southern America is the blending of aboriginal races. In the West Indies is a large contingent of East Indian coolies. Physically, these people have a thoroughbred appearance—they are sculptors' models. Their impassivity is amazing. Men squat on the ground and, save for the movement of their eyes, might be taken for clay images. Their ebullitions of fury are, however, volcanic, and wife-murder is common. A few Chinamen are to be noted. With the odd cynicism of their race, they seem to be for ever regarding life as a practical joke. But the Indian is a strain of humanity which must surely have sprung from an untainted source of supreme antiquity. Half the qualities of "civilised" races appear to be left out of his composition. It is for that reason that outrages, such as those of Putumayo, loom up in such revolting colours. A mild, harmless race, appealing for protection and pity, has there, as for the thousandth time, been treated with ruthless savagery. No punishment could expiate so vile an offence.

A. E. CAREY.

The Plague of Pictures

BY ALFRED BERLYN

OUR conventional moral censors are led hopelessly astray by that queer British sex-obsession which causes them to be eternally scenting degeneracy in the latest vagaries of the fashion-plate, the ballroom, and the variety theatre. As a matter of fact, the dominant vice of the present generation of English people has nothing whatever to do with the Seventh Commandment or the special affairs of Mrs. Grundy. It is, in plain words, the vice of intense and incorrigible mental laziness. Their demand is for freedom from intellectual exertion at all costs, and to induce them to take a sustained interest in anything that really matters becomes more and more difficult. Politicians bewail the public apathy in relation to questions of the gravest national and imperial moment; theologians are baffled by the sheer inertia which evades the trouble of accepting or rejecting a creed with the vague postulate that one form of faith is probably, on the whole, as good as another; leaders of movements, and pioneers of new departures in art, in literature, and in the theatre, find only a select few with sufficient energy of mind either to support or controvert their views. To form definite opinions on any subject under the sun involves the exercise of thought; and to be spared the trouble of thinking has apparently become the supreme desire of the average twentieth century Briton.

Nothing, not even the breathless rush of modern life, can have done much more to encourage this mental atrophy than the rise and progress of the popular illustrated newspaper; not the paper that merely includes illustrations among its contents—they all do that nowadays—but the daily journal, professedly of current news, which is before all things a picture-paper. A few years ago, such a thing was unknown; to-day, papers of this kind circulate by hundreds of thousands, and by a vast number of readers are regarded not as adjuncts to, but as welcome substitutes for, the ordinary newspaper—which means that they have become, for very many people, the sole channels of daily information about public affairs and current events. To look at the pictures seems to involve almost as much mental effort as their patrons are willing to expend in gathering the news of the day; so the pictures are all-pervading, and the letterpress is reduced to a minimum. But even that is not the worst; for it invariably happens that, in the presentation of this illustrated news, the degree of prominence is regulated by the pictorial value or sensational effectiveness of its several items, rather than by their intrinsic importance. Thus, a bazaar or a boxing-match, the latest jewel robbery, or the last new thing in negroid dance-measures, is likely to receive far more attention than many an event affecting the welfare of an empire or the peace of a continent. Small wonder that those who depend entirely upon the picture-paper for their intelligence—in either meaning of the word—are apt to lose their sense of proportion, and with it the faculty of interesting themselves duly in the things that matter.

This prevailing laziness of mind, of which the latter-day craze for perpetually looking on at other people's games and sports is another of many symptoms, has also, no doubt, been pandered to by the snippety journals of "bits" and "cuts," so profusely provided for the modern multitude. But it has gained its crowning satisfaction in the now ubiquitous picture-palaces in which those who crave entertainment wholly divorced from mental effort find their earthly paradise. Even the crudest type of popular fiction demands from its readers a certain measure of concentration; the spectators of "the pictures," assisted by the terse running commentaries flashed at intervals upon the screen, are absolved from the trouble of exercising their minds at all. And so it comes about that these places are little gold-mines, and that they continue to multiply at an amazing rate in every city and town in the kingdom.

A great deal of cant has been talked, in this connection, about the value of the cinematograph as an educational instrument. No one would be so stupid as to deny that its possibilities as a popular educator are, in theory, very considerable. But the most casual study of the programme of the average picture-theatre—apart from a few ambitious West End houses which draw their patronage from a more select and cultivated class—will suffice to show to what extent the appeal to intelligence enters into the scheme of those who exploit the film as a vehicle of public amusement. There may be an occasional pictorial version of some famous novel, or even—to the undisguised boredom of the majority of spectators—an attempt to illustrate some story from the ancient classics, by way of giving an air of comprehensiveness and a suggestion of “tone” to the programme. But the items which provide the bulk of the entertainment, and upon which its unlimited powers of attraction depend, are furnished in fairly equal proportions by sensational stories of crime, mawkishly sentimental domestic drama, Far Western “cowboy” romance, with revolver practice ad libitum, rough-and-tumble buffoonery, and illustrations of topical events—these last being, to all intents and purposes, the “picture-paper” over again in an animated and consequently far more seductive form. It would, of course, be absurd to find fault with the people who run these places on the score of the class of entertainment that they provide. As commercial dealers in amusement, it is their business to discover what their customers want and to supply it. But that the majority of their “shows” give much suggestion of their value as an educational medium, it would need a rare degree of moral hardihood to pretend.

There is no need to over-emphasise what has been said of late about the influence upon young and impressionable minds of the criminal and sensation-stories which these picture-theatres illustrate so freely, though the possibilities of harm from this source cannot wholly be ignored. But it is far from reassuring to learn that not only the public libraries but even the technical evening schools are being adversely affected, as regards attendance, by the lure of “the pictures.” If the disastrous inertness of mind that is betrayed by this readiness to grasp at shadows and lose the substance is not checked in time, the present picture-epidemic may prove, in the long run, a deadlier scourge to its victims than any of the plagues of ancient Egypt.

Mr. John Lane publishes this week “Napoleon at Bay,” by F. Loraine Petre, author of “Napoleon’s Last Campaign in Germany,” with maps and plans, at 10s. 6d. net. This volume, the fifth of the author’s studies of Napoleonic campaigns, shows Napoleon after the disastrous campaign in Germany, left to stand at bay in defence of a sovereignty reduced by the natural limits of the Rhine, the Alps, and the Pyrenees.

Music

PEOPLE have been asking, “Who was Méhul, and what in the world do we want with an opera about Joseph, especially as it appears that Mme. Potiphar is never brought in at all?” It is easy to answer one question, by saying that there are two songs in the opera which every young lady used to learn in the days before Schumann’s songs became the “right thing”; that the Overture to “Joseph” not infrequently appeared in old-fashioned programmes, and that a few years ago the opera was revived in Paris, when it won a very fair succès de curiosité. But it is not so easy to say what the directors of Covent Garden think that the British public wants with “Joseph.” They must know by this time that we take little or no interest in Opera, and do not care a brass farthing to go and see a particular opera merely because it has a definite place in the history of Music Drama. In France and Italy and Germany the people delight in Opera, and welcome opportunities of making acquaintance with it in all its manifestations. They would not need to be told about Méhul’s masterpiece; they would not inquire if it were likely to please them; but they would go to find out for themselves. Had we such a public in London, the production of “Joseph” would require no explanation. It would have seemed perfectly natural, and a wise policy, to present something in strong relief to “Parsifal,” “Tristan,” etc. To a musical epicure there would have been something delightfully piquant in the delicately archaic flavour of Méhul after and before the rich seasonings of Wagner. But musical epicures are rare in London, and “Joseph” has been given to small and but languidly interested audiences. We have heard it once, and are quite ready to hear it again. It is not necessary to be excited every time one goes to the Opera, and the tranquil flow of Méhul’s music, which now carries your mind back to Gluck, now forward to Mendelssohn, which sometimes makes you think of Mozart and sometimes of Grétry, though it is not exciting, is never dull. Gracious melody is here in plenty, and there is a definite charm about the prim formality of the designs. The performance under Mr. Percy Pitt was very fair indeed, and Herr Paul Bender’s study of old Jacob deserved to be seen and admired by a much wider circle than it was.

But even “Tristan,” at any rate on the evening when we were there, had not brought together the overflowing audience which once it would have ensured. Yet was it in some respects the finest performance enjoyed by us since the days of Ternina and Van Dyck at his best. Mme. Van der Osten sings the music of Isolde superbly with that glorious voice of hers. Not even in the most trying moments of the second act did she stop singing and begin shouting, as is the custom of most Isolde. Every note was round and sweet, and the pianissimo with which this splendid artist began the Death Song was startling in its excellence. Christine Nilsson could whisper like that, and hold the audience breathless. Mme. Van der Osten is not a great actress in the sense that Nilsson and Ternina were, but she rose to an impressive height in that last scene, and we left the theatre ranking her with the greatest Isolde we have seen. Then, too, we had Mr. Coates directing the fine orchestra splendidly, though adopting, in certain passages, a slower tempo than that which we prefer: we had Herr Knüpfer to make King Mark hearable, Herr Platschke as a very fine-voiced Kurvenal, and a Tristan who was new to us, Herr Urlus. We preserve unforgettable memories of this artist as a singer of Bach in Holland and Germany, but had never heard him in Opera. His voice is small for Covent Garden and for the part of Tristan, but this fact interfered hardly at all with our enjoyment of his extremely refined and beautiful singing. It is a very rare experience to listen to a Tristan who sings in so musician-like a style. It might be urged that he was lyric rather than dramatic. But the surprise of hearing those oft-shouted passages vocalised properly was a delightful one, and we are impatient to hear Mme. Van der Osten and Herr Urlus together again.

There has been some good, and in one case some surprising, piano-playing. One has never listened to Mr. Leonard Borwick without knowing that a gentleman and a musician was at the instrument. But the delight he has given us has been as that of a scholar reading Conington's Virgil rather than as that of a lover hearing his mistress's voice after a separation. We had not suspected Mr. Borwick of being what we now know him to be, one of the two or three best players of Ravel's "Gaspard de la Nuit," especially in "Le Gibet." His playing was astonishing in its combination of vividness and mystery. If one can imagine etchings by Whistler after Monticelli, there would be something of a parallel there. But when, the following week, Mr. Borwick undertook the "Valse Nobles et Sentimentales" of Ravel, he was less successful, for, although he defined his phrases well enough to stamp them clearly on the hearer's mind, he did not bring out the rhythm of each piece so as to make clear the perfection of its form. It may be that Ravel's orchestration of these pieces has spoilt one's ear for them in their original form, but whether that be the case or not, they are not so "impressionistic" as Mr. Borwick made them appear. His arrangement of the "Harmonious Blacksmith" so that it sounded as if played on a fine harpsichord was deliciously clever, and the command of an equal tone which it enabled him to display was, we must say, phenomenal.

M. Lhevinne is a player to be enjoyed for his beautiful tone and his freedom from exaggerations and mannerisms, while M. Cortot, who played at the Queen's Hall Symphony Concert, though not by any means a Pugno, as has been rashly suggested, is distinctly among the finer pianists of to-day. In the last movement of Schumann's Concerto his playing of the passage work was admirable, and made amends for an undue sentimentalism and trickiness which had been disturbing elements in the first and second. Stravinsky's "Fireworks" proved to be as brilliant as it was short, and in the representation of such noises, and we will also say such silences, as accompany a display of fireworks, it was gramophonic. Debussy's "Feux d'artifices" is just as clever, but the orchestra can whizz and explode better than a piano, and can convey the effect on the mind of white lights in a curiously illustrative way.

An enormous audience came to the Symphony Orchestra's concert to hear the last of Herr Steinbach's Brahms. A politician, who sat near us, objected that the eminent conductor's appearance reminded him forcibly of that of Mr. Lloyd George, and said that, had not Mr. Hubermann put him into a good temper by certain exquisite things which he did in the Violin Concerto, he would not have been able to sit through the 2nd Symphony. Such a sensitive being is an amateur musician! He should have voted warm thanks to the violinist, not only for some beautiful playing, but for the soothing effect which enabled him to hear Steinbach in the Symphony. Here were no irritating methods, at any rate, though in Beethoven's "Pastoral" the conductor had dealt with some of the themes in the dictatorial way which the Chancellor applies principally to dukes, and he had attempted more than once to be very firm with Mr. Hubermann.

The Theatre

"Follow the Girl" at the Gaiety Theatre

THERE is something of a new departure in this latest production under the management of Mr. George Edwardes. If to rename the entertainment that had come to be called musical comedy "revusical comedy" was not a very brilliant touch, to give six scenes instead of two was a reversion to type and certainly an improvement; to import new comedians and ladies to the Gaiety a stroke of that kind of genius which has been effected more than once before.

The action and songs of the first two scenes, the Bois, in Paris, and the Customs House, on the Belgian Frontier, were rather dull and indistinct. One noticed that the main differences between the thing that is called revusical and the revue as it is in London was the lack of an explanatory programme for the former, which would have helped one to know just what was happening and by whom the happening was caused. But by the time we arrived at the second act, and the fine scene of Buda-Pesth, the audience appeared to have entered into the spirit of the affair, and the old Gaiety atmosphere was established and every trifle of wit or attempted humour was snatched at with avidity and applauded with hearty determination.

There can be no doubt that "Follow the Girl," absolutely unconvincing and far-fetched as it is, will be an immense success. Mr. Paul Rubens has not spared himself in the effort to make his music and lyrics amusing and attractive; the result is a riot of colour, sound, girls, comedians, and gaiety. Each night will see an improvement in the entertainment, for at present the producer, Mr. Malone, is a little too generous, and while some of the thirty-six characters in the cast have nothing to do, others are rather over-worked.

Miss Isobel Elsom is a lively, young and beautiful heroine, Doris, daughter of a rich American, Mr. Pitt, who is represented after a fashion with which we are all gladly familiar, by the engaging Mr. Lew Hearn. Although Miss Elsom's voice does not appear to be of the quality suited to a large theatre, she is so bright and pretty and high-spirited as Doris that she is very welcome. Returning from school, she has spoken to the gay hero on a railway platform, loses the train, and then returns and gets into trouble with her stepmother. After that she flies across Europe as the girl after whom all the other characters career in vain. There is something about her being confused with a racehorse of the same name, but you would rather we did not go into that, as the joke, if it is one, has been used up before and does not matter in the least.

The main point is that Doris has school friends in Paris, Belgium, Amsterdam, Buda Pesth—here, especially—at Berlin, and probably at the Carlton Hotel, London, where the last scene takes place, and where the girl who was so elaborately followed is reunited to her lover and her family amid the liveliest music and most brilliant scenery, amongst the most beautiful people in the sweetest dresses ever seen, even on the Gaiety Stage. Add to this the fun of Mr. Clifton Crawford, as Freddy Charlston, who caused all the trouble by the awful sin of speaking to Doris at a railway station; the delicious humour of Mr. Lew Hearn as an American husband who has married, secondly, his French cook, Mlle. Caumont—a perfect comedian—and add still further the delicate fun of Miss Mabel Sealby, the ripe, gay manner of Mr. Volpé, in a not obviously well-written character, and the general beauty and jollity of the chorus, the swing of the amusing dances, and, over all, the glamour of the popular, bright music—the best that Mr. Rubens has given us so far. Then you can reconstruct the latest Gaiety success, an entertainment which will delight people from the ends of the earth for many months to come.

“Thank Your Ladyship” at the Playhouse

THIS is an amusing essay in the graceful art of making a new and original comedy rather than an accomplished piece of work. But even the tentative qualities are highly interesting; the failures now and then to make good early promises do not disturb us very much; above all, Mr. Norreys Connell's attempt provides some curious artificial characters for Miss Marie Tempest, Mr. O. B. Clarence, and Mr. Graham Browne.

The Earl of Havant is the broadest possible caricature of an example of our old nobility who is driven frantic by the mere mention of the name of Lloyd George—a gentleman who, as a source of humour, has already been exploited to the ultimate point of boredom. Nevertheless, he has to serve in the present comedy, and thus a sort of villain of the piece is called Lord George Lackland. Lord George's mother is spoken of as Lady Lackland, and it is one of the many quaint points about this bearer of a courtesy title that his family name appears to be the same as that of the family peerage. Of course, this is not impossible, but it is unusual. There are other curious points. He is a fortune-hunter who does not trouble himself to find out the will of the late husband of the widow he proposes to marry for her money. What is that department of Somerset House for? He is so completely stupid a cad that he is ready to make love to the widow's friend, Sophia, under her eyes at a moment's notice. Of course, these little things in the affairs of Lord George, which is supposed to sound like Lloyd George, would not matter if the whole amused. The worst of it is that his name constantly being mistaken by Lord Havant for that of the critic of dukes soon becomes a deadly dull piece of business.

But at the Playhouse Miss Marie Tempest is the great attraction, and she is by no means badly fitted as Lady Sophia Flete, the middle-aged, only child of the Earl of Havant, who has been loved many times for her fortune and, we should imagine, for her gaiety, and now loves a young footman, Sempill, who is made a very agreeable person with a neat way of saying “Thank your ladyship,” by Mr. Graham Browne. Some people have thought of Fielding and his Lady Booby in this connection, but nothing could be further from Mr. Connell's scheme of comedy. It is true such names as Lackland for a penniless Guardsman and Flete for a lady who is a little rapid have a certain eighteenth century smack about them, but to confound the genius of Fielding with the original, if rather vague, quality of Mr. Connell's work is to insult both. Lady Sophia loves Sempill, and Lackland, played by Mr. Ben Webster, tries to get rid of him, and Lord Havant is eventually delighted to give his consent to her marriage with a very agreeable servant because he thinks Sempill has knocked down Lloyd George. That is all, except that there are a thousand whimsical fancies interwoven in the development of the story, many of which are slightly irrelevant, but none the less freakish and stimulating even when they do not help the characterisation of the play. Finally, Miss Tempest looks as spirited and alive as ever; she extracts every ounce of humour out of Lady Sophia, and she dresses her, or rather Hayward and Lucile do, with exquisite effect. Mr. Clarence has an absurd and inhuman part, but he does wonders with it. The unfortunate widowed lady, who is jilted by Lord George because she loses so much of her income on re-marrying, is made the best of by Miss Kate Sergeantson, and Mr. Webster has a struggle with the part of Lackland—but the actor does not win. Mr. Graham Browne plays with infinite tact the character of Sempill. His is a rather unreal piece of work, occasionally clever and amusing; we fear the same may be said of the comedy as a whole.

A FABLE BY MR. HAROLD CHAPIN.

It is refreshing to find this admirable producer and writer in some other character than that of actor. In his one-act play, "Dropping the Baby," which forms the prelude to "Thank Your Ladyship," Mr. Chapin is at his best. The two scenes are on the plains of Scythia on a pleasant evening and a sunny morning ten thousand years ago. Thus we are dealing with elemental things, but they are stated with a gay touch of modernity. In the family circle of Zee Ol, Mr. Horton Cooper, his daughter Nali, Miss Cavanagh, has a cup given to her, in which sand is mixed with the water. This is because the young man Cheekoo, Mr. Norman Loring, has found a treasure, and, holding it tightly, can only use one hand to get water. Nali cannot bear the situation. She transgresses all tradition, lays down her baby for a time, works for herself and her family, and transforms life as it was lived on the plains of Scythia ten thousand years ago. Those who run to the Playhouse may read the fable as they will; anyhow, they will be interested, and see the short play acted with considerable skill and charm.

"Helen with the High Hand" at the Vaudeville Theatre

TO the devout student of Mr. Arnold Bennett's more engaging novels there is a particular pleasure in seeing them translated into stage plays. There will generally be something more than we could wish for, something we could wish away. But Mr. Richard Pryce has done his adaptation with so much skill and taste that one has nothing to do but praise the result.

You know the story, of course. Miss Nancy Price gives us an effective and all-conquering Helen, but it is a Helen of a sly hand rather than of a high one. The reduction of her rich, old, miserly great-step-uncle, James Ollerenshaw, played to perfection by Mr. Norman McKinnel, her lesser victories over his servant, over the lady who had thoughts of marrying him, and her great triumph over the man she loves, who is here called Andrew Wilbram—the family is famous in the Five Towns—these conquests are carried out with more subtlety than the title suggests. The fact of the matter is that the various actions of Helen Rathbone, which seem so natural and convincing in Mr. Bennett's book, are not so simple a matter when the forms of the drama have to be used. And thus Miss Nancy Price appears just a wee bit of a schemer and sly-boots, a perfectly honest Becky taken far from Vanity Fair and brought up to date at Bursley.

The comedy of the first scene is slow, but one is shown something of the quality of Helen and a good deal of the character of Ollerenshaw. The battle of these two wits begins in leisurely fashion, but advances with admirable effect.

The second act develops the story very amusingly, and we know that however much Wilbram may engage himself to Helen's little friend, Lilian, and whatever quarrels the uncle and niece may indulge in, all will come right and Helen will have her way—which is, possibly the best way. Clash as the three principal personages of the play may, they really all want the same thing if their pride will permit them to find a way to adjust matters. Love does that for Helen and her Andrew; fear—of an all too gracious widow lady—does it for the great-step-uncle.

But as with many of Mr. Bennett's works, the plot is not the thing that matters; it is, rather, the dry, subtle humour, not exactly of the usual stage brand, but excellently fitted to the uses of the theatre by Mr. Pryce's adaptation. Of the acting, nothing but good can be said. As is usual under this management, all the minor parts are splendidly played. Such a character as Mrs. Butt, the servant Helen gets rid of and Ollerenshaw wished to go, although she only appears for a few minutes, is made life-like by Miss Agnes Hill. Of course, the character of the widow, Mrs. Prockter, is easily within the skill of Miss Rosina Filippi, who endows her impersonation with the personal quality of her exquisite art. Emanuel Prockter, everyone's victim, is well given by Mr. Henry Hargreaves; and Lilian Swetnam, who means to console him, is made a very lively and true personage by Miss Mièle Maund.

Mr. Norman Trevor, as the rude Andrew Wilbram, has not much chance in the earlier stages of the play, but his proposal to Helen, when he shakes her consent out of her, as it were, is very convincing. Mr. McKinnel has put aside his slowness of style, and makes the old uncle the very man that we believe Mr. Bennett knew or imagined. He has seldom been seen to greater advantage. The Helen of Miss Price is a cunning piece of art which every lover of the stage will like to see more than once.

The Vaudeville Theatre has not of late been too fortunate, but we think that with so agreeable a comedy, so finely acted, it should prosper for many a day to come.

The Incorporated Stage Society at the Haymarket Theatre

AMONG the many performances which this association has given us, that of last Monday was the most lively and charmingly presented which we have seen. Primarily we are indebted for this to M. Anatole France; secondly, to Mr. Ashley Dukes, who has translated the delicate and inspired French into telling English phrases; and then we owe no end of thanks to the clever and charming players and to the accomplished producer, and no doubt to some dozen other people who helped forward the merry entertainment.

"AU PETIT BONHEUR" is a comedy in one act, which you probably know in French and believe too delicate to be transplanted to our rough-hewn British stage and English methods. But Mr. Dukes has succeeded where many might have failed.

With Miss Miriam Lewes as Germaine, the widow of society who makes experiments—from 5 to 7 o'clock—in the soul of man, and Miss Madge McIntosh as Cécile, the normal wife—who is wise and quick-witted—and with the excellent aid of Mr. Claude King as Nalége and Mr. Malcolm Cherry as Paul Chambry, with all these and his own skill the translator gives us a delightful, if utterly unconventional, play, which should soon be seen in an evening bill. When it is thus produced it will be difficult to get the same cast together, no doubt; but we trust we may see Miss Lewes again, for we feel that much of the charm of "Au Petit Bonheur," in its English dress, arises from her characterisation of the alluring Germaine.

But that view is perhaps hardly fair to Mr. Dukes, who shows his infinite skill again in the second play,

"THE COMEDY OF THE MAN WHO MARRIED A DUMB WIFE."

Owing to a trifling difficulty about the Society's rule that one must not be allowed to enter the theatre a moment after the curtain has gone up, we were unable to see the second act of this clever work, in which Mr. Rudge Harding gave so convincing a performance. But now that Mr. Dukes has made these two plays so agreeable to English audiences we have no doubt that we shall soon have an opportunity of seeing the comedy, as well as "Au Petit Bonheur," in an evening bill.

EGAN MEW.

Some Magazines

THE most entertaining item in Harper's Magazine for this month is "The Too Adaptable American," by Sydney Brooks; it is suggestive, too, and points out admirably the methods adopted by the American abroad to fall in with the customs of the country. The contrast between the English and the American in the French hotel is exceedingly well drawn. A fine travel article opens this number, "Through the Heart of the Surinam Jungle," by C. W. Furlong, and a good "home-travel" contribution is "A Philosopher in Central Park," by Edward Martin.

The Windsor begins well with an amusing "Comedy of Styles," by E. F. Benson—a skating story—and has another long instalment of Sir Rider Haggard's novel, "The Holy Flower." A short story by Eden Phillpotts and an article on "The Art of Phil R. Morris, A.R.A.," are other good features of a full number. In both these magazines the illustrations are on a very high level.

In United Empire the "Master-Builder" this month is Lord Charles Somerset (1767-1831), Governor of Cape Colony. A capital account of a farm school in Western Australia is given by Kingsley Fairbridge under the title of "Child Emigration: An Experiment," and there are many other articles of great interest.

The Review of Reviews for Australasia (January) shows a steady improvement; its pictures are better, and its letterpress is more satisfactorily arranged. It forms, now that it has overcome preliminary difficulties, an attractive summary of events and literature which must soon become invaluable to our friends "down under."

We have received the opening numbers of The Champion, a new magazine for boys. If it does not quite win a place corresponding to that of the "B.O.P.," it is still a capital venture, with stories and many special features that are bound to make a wide appeal.

The Poetry Review has a very good February issue. The editor leads off with a note on "The Decay of English Verse Satire"; Mr. John Helston discusses "Poetry and the Man in the Street"; there is a short and rather weak article on Mr. A. C. Benson's poetry, a lecture on Eurhythmics by Dr. Hulbert, and a selection of reviews and verse. Mr. Acton Bond contributes a capital article on "The Amateur and Shakespeare," dealing particularly with the British Empire Shakespeare Society, of which he is so indispensable a member.

Notes for Collectors

DRESSES OF THE LAST TWO CENTURIES

ALTHOUGH the catalogues on our desk fore-shadow some twenty sales, at which many charming examples of old-fashioned arts—furniture, silver, paintings, and books—are to change hands, one very rarely sees any examples of antique costumes offered for sale. It seems that these historic and often beautiful examples of a kind of workmanship long passed have to be gathered together, piece by piece, and sought with infinite care and watched and tended. For they are often very delicate and liable to discoloration. But the quest is worthy of the labour, and many who have begun to collect in a casual way for costume dances and that sort of thing have eventually become very devout in the matter.

The fashions of our ancestors form an index to a thousand branches of the hobby of collecting.* The study of costume, which has widened so greatly of late years, is invaluable to all who would recreate the decorative setting in any period of the past. Although we believe no fashion in dress ever returns to us exactly as it originally appeared, the whirligig of Time brings round, at least every hundred years, something very like the far-off modes of three or four generations before.

* "Old English Costumes," a Sequence of Fashions through the 18th and 19th Centuries. (Harrods. 2s. 6d. net.)

Among the collectors of dresses of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the well-known artist, Mr. Talbot Hughes, has been particularly fortunate; fortunate, also, is the Victoria and Albert Museum, which has recently received this sequence of examples of past fashions from Messrs. Harrod, who have bought the collection from the artist and presented it to the beautiful galleries at South Kensington.

If we may quote Mr. Austin Dobson and say—

Assume that we are friends. Assume

A common taste for old costume,—

Old pictures,—books. Then dream us sitting—

Us two—in some soft-lighted room.

we can also say that the portfolio of pictures, which Messrs. Harrod send us, representing people of suitable type dressed in the old costumes, will fill a quiet hour with pleasure and information.

To these pictures is added an admirable preface by Sir Cecil Harcourt Smith, the Director at South Kensington, and a full and gaily written account of the dresses, the sort of people who wore them, and the times in which they were fashionable, by that excellent authority on the subject, Mr. Philip Gibbs, reprinted from the Connoisseur.

Although the present volume begins with specimens of the eighteenth century, the collection itself deals historically from the time of the first of the Stuart kings in England. One may see at a glance the character of costume at the Court of James I, and the styles that were in vogue at Whitehall when Charles II was king. The beauties that Sir Peter Lely flattered have had many of their fine, and fashionably free, gowns preserved for our entertainment, so on through the generations until the mid-Victorian period, when the present delightful book ends with a plain dress of graceful character in bright blue silk (1860-1870), such as Sir John Millais might have painted. To us, whatever happens to be the fashion of the moment is always agreeable, but we own there are many specimens in the Talbot Hughes collection that make us think with pleasure of "days that are over, dreams that are done."

E. M.

Two Exhibitions

THE LEICESTER GALLERIES

NOT a little interest attaches to the Memorial Exhibition of the work of the late Sir Alfred East, now on view at the Leicester Galleries. Once again it brings us face to face with the difficult question—what was the secret of the attraction of the popular artists of the last two generations? How was it that this man of seemingly few ideas and obvious limitations of technique could win the reputation which he did, and the ungrudging praise of not a few critics whose praise was best worth having?

The finest work exhibited is, to our mind, the collection of etchings. Here Sir Alfred's gifts of simplicity and directness find full play; and, though he seldom rises to extraordinary heights, he displays more sense of atmosphere and variety than appears in his pictures. Yet even among these there is little to arouse enthusiasm. They are the work of a master-craftsman, perhaps, who loved his craft, but in them is no touch of inspiration. Coming to the water-colours, we find an all but unbroken monotony of grey-green trees and still waters. Nature, it would seem, presented itself to him in but few aspects. When he was not in the grey-green vein, he revelled in rather crude autumn effects expressed by a particular orange tint which became characteristic; and sometimes he would bathe in the same golden hue Spanish hillsides and cathedral towers suffused with the tints of sunset. In a third phase he would portray gaily coloured crowds in the dazzling sunlight of Spanish midday. This contains some of his cleverest and most original efforts, and here at times he shows a magical touch which almost brings him into the ranks of the artists. In oil-colours he displays much the same ideals and characteristics, except that in this medium his touch is a good deal harder, and his colours more inclined to crudity. There are not a few living men who are doing equally good work, and some who are doing better work, without recognition. The recognition that Sir Alfred East won was fairly earned, so far as hard labour and a lovable personality could earn it; but these qualities are not sufficient to carry a man into the ranks of the immortals.

Mr. Gosse's prefatory notice sketches an indomitable toiler, and one whose success was the reward of labour. Born at Kettering in 1849, the youngest of the eleven children of a man engaged in the local boot industry, he showed a precocious bent for drawing and painting. Except that he was forbidden to draw on Sunday his tendencies were encouraged, although it was considered ridiculous to suppose that he could earn a living by art. So he followed his brothers into the shoe-factory, keeping his drawing for leisure hours. Next he drifted to Glasgow, where he attended a school of art, and married the lady who survives him. He went to Paris and Barbizon, and thenceforward made art his profession. In 1883 he attained his first success in the Royal Academy, and in the following year settled in Hampstead. Thenceforward his triumph was unbroken. He wandered about the world, and sketched in Egypt, Ceylon, Japan, and Southern Europe. Friends sprang up on every hand, not a few of them in America, and his last years were as happy as any mortal could wish. He was saturated with love for his craft, and the marvel is that he never touched higher levels. He leaves behind him a pleasant memory of a good man and conscientious worker, and the tragedy of what seems to us a failure that he was fortunate enough never to realise.

THE BAILLIE GALLERIES

The exhibition of Mr. Wynford Dewhurst's pictures at the Baillie Galleries is exceedingly striking. Mr. Dewhurst challenges attention at once as a "child of the open air." His pictures have been almost all painted in the open, and they palpitate with atmosphere and that sense of endless variety which marks a close acquaintance with nature. He has been described as an Impressionist, an imitator of Manet and Monet and Degas et hoc genus omne, and it is true that he reproduces not a few of their characteristics and principles. But we have his word for it that he attained his methods independently, before he had seen their work, and his pictures bear testimony to the fact. The "illusion" with which some critics reproach him seems to us merely the "illusion" of truth. His colours are built up of myriad separated portions of the spectrum, which at close quarters look hopeless, but, seen from the right distance, suddenly blend into the absolute truth of nature.

Coming to particular pictures, we find some difficulty in making a selection. Our catalogue is covered with notes of which but a very small fraction can be expressed in the space at our command. La Creuse supplies the majority of the larger subjects. He paints it under all manner of effects. We have a magnificent Sunset over the ruins (7); Sunrise, over the same scene (18); Haytime, in the same valley (6); Heather-time in the Valley (17), and many others. Every effect is rendered with astonishing subtlety, combined with the brilliance which would be crude, did it not stop short of the danger exactly at the right moment. Atmosphere is everywhere, and there is no escaping from it. The rocks that tower above the torrent skirting the church-crowned hill on which the village stands, and the ruins that top the neighbouring heights, are wonderfully rendered under the changing aspects of time and season; in the Sunrise picture the first rays touch with gold and magic the foreground slope; in the Heather-time royal purple clothes the hills, and peeps among the rocks, with shadows of velvet depth; and the glory of apple-blossom was never more winningly expressed than in the painting of that name (4).

A fine series of pictures displaying powers of a somewhat different order is that which illustrates the great formal gardens of the Grand Trianon and Versailles generally. Some of these are earlier works, and give wide vistas of rectangular lawns, and bedding flowers banked up against stiff yew hedges, always with a fine sense of distance and atmosphere which modifies the stiffness of the arrangement. But far better are the later studies of dark trees touched with the gold of autumn, hanging over ghostly pools and fountains, and statues showing dim against deep, purple water and dark, rich shadows. The effect of stateliness and mystery combined could hardly have been better produced, and testify to the strong imagination as well as to the technical skill which gives it thus forceful expression. Besides these are many clever pastel and other sketches, rendering brilliant effects of light and landscape at all seasons and in many lands; but we cannot stay to consider them in detail. The gallery will repay more than one visit. Mr. Dewhurst is an artist with a definite individuality, who is not afraid to give his independence full play. He puts you off with no tricks and mannerisms which may impose on the crowd, and might even lead to a popular success, but which would certainly obscure the message which is his to deliver.

At St. Stephen's Shrine

BY A REGULAR DEVOTEE

WEDNESDAY, the 11th, was the second day of battle. The back-bench Opposition men had vowed that they would make Parliamentary Government impossible unless Asquith plainly stated what he was prepared to do. In a speech of wonderful dexterity he used the King's Speech as a plea for time and conciliation. In effect he said, "Let the finance of the country be carried, and in six weeks' time I will put my proposals before you. I admit the initiative is with the Government, and I will then make an offer." In obedience to their leaders, the Unionist back-benchers kept quiet, but they have been sorely tried.

If there is one thing the Radical Party did not care tuppence about last year, or the year before, it was finance. They brought in their Budgets after they had spent half the money, and as late as they could with any decency—or rather without any decency at all. And now they ask us to sit quiet and vote supplies, and, when they get them, they will put forward a proposal which we may not be willing or able to accept. They will have got all they wanted, and can then snap their fingers at us. Carson in a splendid speech smote them hip and thigh. He struck the right note when he said, "The Government is just manœuvring for position"; but he did not follow it up, as we all expected, by saying, "We need not decide at once, but you must know, after all this delay, what you intend to do. Tell us what your plans are at the conclusion of the debate on the Address, so that we may know where we are; or, if not, we will not allow the Government to go on." For some good reason this was never said, but he went on: "You put to us whether we will be bound by a general election. Why do you never put the same question to the Nationalists?" The Government were silent.

John Redmond got up next and tried to prove how small the minority in Ireland was. He spoke smoothly, and ended up by declaring "that he would cut his tongue out rather than say one single word in support of Home Rule if he thought it would mean the slightest injury to the lives, persons, property, or religious convictions of any section of his people." James Craig, we thought, was coming nearer the point when he said: "The people of Ulster are being tricked and humbugged by the swindlers who sit on the Government bench"; but he was cut short by the Speaker, and, to the surprise of some of us, meekly apologised.

Augustine Birrell made an amusing speech, but not worthy of a great occasion. He had never said anything in the House or out of it which he had not had to explain. "If I have said anything to wound the feelings of any Ulsterman, I heartily apologise for it," he observed, and added handsomely, "I am aware I am not qualified to occupy the position I do," and the Unionists unhandsomely assented with cheers which seemed to surprise him. He had been abused in all directions—only that morning he had received an anonymous postcard from Ulster, accusing him of having two daughters in a convent in Ireland. "I have no daughters, I am sorry to say," he announced quaintly, and added, as a sop to Protestantism, "If I had, I would sooner see them happily married than in any convent."

Lloyd George for once was dull, but he declared that "Anyway, we are not going to quail before threats of violence." Bonar Law wound up the debate, but again the expected threat did not come. Without a note he made a telling speech which enhanced his position as leader, and solemnly warned the Government, "If you go on, there must be bloodshed. If that happens, your party will not be defeated, it will be annihilated." We expected to be beaten by 95, but to our surprise the majority was only 78. Every man in our party was accounted for, so the defections must have been on the side of the Coalition.

On Thursday the second amendment to the Address was taken. The Labour men wanted the Government to instruct Lord Gladstone not to sign the Indemnity Bill until there had been a judicial inquiry into the whole affair of the deportation of the strike leaders from South Africa. Their position was peculiarly awkward. They supported self-government in Ireland; they had voted for self-government in South Africa; and now they wanted to interfere at the first opportunity. Ramsay MacDonald is a fierce leader in the country, but he is very small potatoes in the House of Commons, and Lulu Harcourt made mincemeat of him. People in England little realise the position in South Africa. There are mineowners culled from every quarter of the globe, with no feelings of patriotism, bent on making as much as they can out of the gold and diamonds. There are the Trade Unionists, earning £7 a week, led by Syndicalists. There are the poor whites without organisation, who earn £1 a week with difficulty, and are for ever liable to be undersold by the coolies from India, who passively resist; and below all is the dark mass of the real natives, who outnumber the white population, all told, by hundreds to one, and who are with difficulty held in check.

"You could easily smash the Empire by a day's debate in this House," said Harcourt. "Let South Africa fight its own battles," was his text. "The Empire is held together by a silken cord; but if you twist it into a whip-lash, the first crack of it will be the knell of the Empire." He spoke very smoothly from elaborate notes, but he carried conviction to the majority of his hearers.

Bob Cecil rubbed home the obvious parallel to Ireland. "Assume," he said, "that an Irish Government attempted to crush its political opponents in Ulster; would it not be as in the case of South Africa? Would the House of Commons have any power to enforce any of the paper safeguards in the Home Rule Bill?" The Government were silent. Many Liberals thought the action of General Botha very high-handed and indefensible, but they dared not vote against their party, and, seeing the Unionists would not vote, the Labour men courageously pressed the matter to a division. They numbered 50, and were beaten by 164. Gallant fellows to risk so much!

The Labour Party in the House have been steadily losing touch with their followers outside, and it is not to be wondered at when we consider their action. On Friday they moved an amendment, mourning that the King in His Gracious Speech had not mentioned the subject of the number of accidents in mines and railways; all the afternoon they got up, one after another, and belaboured the Government. The Government were, as usual, very sympathetic, and promised to see what could be done; whereupon the Labour men wanted to withdraw their amendment. They were not certain how the Unionists would vote, and, moreover, they were not certain (what was more important) how many men they had hidden away. They were not so gallant as on the day before! Two or three, it is true, had the courage to vote for their own amendment, but the rest actually voted against it at the crack of the Liberal whip. We stood in the doorway and jeered at them as they came through.

"Your £400 a year is in danger," said one Unionist. "I should not like to be at your next Congress," said another; but all to no good. The fidelity of the Labour leaders (?) to the Radical Party is touching in its canine devotion.

There was only half an hour left for Leif Jones to discourse on temperance. Asquith was as sympathetic as Robertson had been to the previous amendment. He would bring in the 1908 Licensing Bill if and when he had time, etc., etc., etc. Meanwhile I hear a rumour that they mean to put another tax on beer, which will doubtless please Leif, even if it displeases the new Radical candidate for Fulham—a wealthy baronet who is a brewer and a temperance reformer.

On Monday there was an unedifying spectacle at each end of the sitting. At the commencement Gulland, one of the Radical Whips, apologised for a speech in which he was accused of hinting in unmistakable language that, if the electors of Wick voted for Munro, they were more likely to get a much-desired harbour than if they voted for his opponent. Asquith admitted that he had committed an error of judgment, and Bonar Law let it rest at that.

At the conclusion of the sitting Joynson-Hicks accused Masterman of doing the same thing at Bethnal Green, where he is standing at the present moment. It is alleged that he promised good things for the dockers if they will return him again. The Unionists feel that this is grossly unfair. Supporters of a Government in power, if they habitually resort to this practice, can always outbid the other side. Lloyd George tried to prove that the scheme had all been arranged long ago, but he did not make much of a case for the defence.

In the afternoon the Church in Wales held the floor, and Ormsby-Gore. He described the "meanest Bill" as one which is being pushed forward by Welsh politicians as a means of securing for themselves jobs, offices, honours, and rewards. Balfour spoke, and the majority went down to 62, and, as all the Irish voted, it was a virtual defeat.

In the evening we had a debate on Tariff Reform. "Amphy" Tryon made a brilliant speech, which was answered by Chiozza Money; but, as he spoke in the dinner-hour and there were one or two big dinners going on, he spoke to an almost empty house. Bonar Law wound up the debate, and the majority was only 74.

The Radical whips are getting uneasy at these low divisions so early in the session, and are straining every nerve to improve their organisation. Inside the Whips' passage they have a board similar to that employed in some factories, where little knobs are pulled out when a workman enters the works, and pushed in when he leaves. By counting "knobs" you can see at a glance how many men are in the House in support of the Government.

Questions put by Lord Robert Cecil and James Hope showed that the Opposition rank and file are getting restive at Asquith's delay. They think he is playing for time, and, when he has got his Supply through, will snap his fingers at us. The feeling is growing that he ought to be made to give a definite date when he will put his proposals on the table, and if he does not—or they are unsatisfactory—there will inevitably be a row.

Tuesday was a day of further humiliation for the Government. In the House of Lords, Elibank had to make a maiden speech such as I suppose has never been heard before in that august assembly; he apologised for his share in the Marconi scandal. Lansdowne gravely said that not only Lord Murray's own reputation and that of his colleagues had been endangered, but also the honour of the House. He suggested delay, but Lord Amptill declined to drop his motion for an inquiry, so it will come on again on Thursday. By the way the Peers cheered it could be seen that they mean business.

In the Commons, Lloyd George had to defend himself against a host of enemies and answer attacks on his recent statements on the housing and land questions. It seems to me that he loses his temper more often than he used to do. Runciman, also, was rather peevish. White to his thin lips, he accused Walter Long of want of courtesy. Red and choleric, the member for the Strand indignantly denied it, and laughed to scorn the suggestion that the Unionists had kept back charges until after Lloyd George had spoken, in order that he could not reply.

Altogether, it was a lively evening, and the Unionists felt they had begun well.

The painter members of the Friday Club will hold their annual exhibition at the hall of the Alpine Club, Mill Street, Conduit Street, W. It will consist of oil and water colour paintings, drawings, etchings, executed by the members during the past year. The exhibition will continue till March 7.

Notes and News

The next lectures at the Victoria and Albert Museum will be given on Thursday, February 26, by Mr. W. W. Watts, F.S.A., on "English Silversmiths' Work of the Mediæval and Tudor Periods"; and on Thursday, March 5, by Mr. R. L. B. Rathbone, on "Jewellery."

Dr. W. T. Grenfell, C.M.G., who has done such splendid work in Labrador, is now in England, hoping to raise some money for his work by lectures. His first public lecture in London, entitled "My Life in Labrador," takes place at the Queen's Hall on the evening of Monday next, and will be illustrated with lantern slides and films. His Excellency the American Ambassador has very kindly consented to preside.

The success of Miss Hoskyn's "Pictures of British History" has induced Messrs. Black to issue a further volume, "More Pictures of British History," in which the series of stories has been arranged so as to follow and enlarge the survey of history given in the earlier book. The illustrations, of which 32 are in colour, will be found to maintain the high standard of all Messrs. Black's picture lesson-books for children. Colour illustrations will also form an important feature of Miss Hoskyn's "Stories of London," to be issued shortly.

By a generous act of private beneficence, the Victoria and Albert Museum has just come into possession of one of the most beautiful existing examples of a mediæval English craftsman's work, the silver-gilt covered bowl formerly at Studley Royal Church, near Ripon. Mr. Harvey Haddon, the donor, has for some time past shown his interest in the building up of a worthy representation of English silversmiths' work in the Museum, and has endowed the collection with an example of which the importance can hardly be overestimated. The form, proportions, and decoration of the Studley bowl are admirable, and illustrate to the full that instinct for beauty possessed by English craftsmen of the Gothic period.

The Sterling Mackinlay Operatic Society announce three productions for their second season. Two will be stage productions: in the spring, Lacombe's romantic opera, "Ma mie Rosette," which was given over twenty years ago at the old Globe Theatre, with Eugene Oudin as Henri IV; and in the autumn, Lecocq's famous opera-bouffe, "Girofle-Girofla." The repertoire will later on include "La Bearnaise" (Messager), "La Belle Helene" (Offenbach), "Le Petit Duc" (Lecocq), "Le Calife de Bagdad" (Boieldieu), "Olivette" (Audran), and other works. The third production will be a concert version of Liza Lehmann's romantic opera, "The Vicar of Wakefield," to be given in June. In future Mr. Mackinlay will be prepared to give each season a concert performance of a new English opera. Composers who submit operas must do so on the understanding that only a small orchestra will be used. Subscription tickets for the season (stalls, £1 1s.; balcony, 10s. 6d.) may be obtained from the secretary, 32, Baker Street, W.

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

POLITICAL DEVELOPMENTS IN RUSSIA

THE circumstances under which Ministerial changes have just taken place in Russia are of exceptional interest, and, if we mistake not, will exert a far-reaching influence upon the destinies of the Empire. The retiring Premier, M. Kokofftseff, was in many respects one of the most remarkable men of our times. Besides presiding over the Council of Ministers, the high office to which he succeeded after the assassination of M. Stolypin, he had filled for many years the portfolio of Finance. From every point of view, his tenure of power marked him out as a statesman of front European rank. He proved himself to be a diplomatist of no mean attainments, and it was largely due to his belief in the spirit of compromise that Europe survived the critical period of tension throughout the Balkan conflagration. As a financial authority, the retiring Premier enjoyed world-wide reputation. In the domain of home affairs it is not surprising that opinion should be sharply divided as to his success. M. Kokofftseff was an orator without rival in his own country, or, for the matter of that, in any other country of Europe, and there is no doubt that again and again dexterous employment of this great gift alone maintained for him the leadership of State.

In all cases it is a difficult task for one nationality to appraise justly the internal affairs of another, and this rule applies particularly to the example of the vast Russian Empire. Our interest in the Ministerial changes alluded to will be largely confined to speculation as to their effect upon international relations. It cannot, however, be emphasised too much that the crisis is internal, and that Russian foreign policy, which always rests in the keeping of the Tsar, will undergo no change. In this connection it is only necessary to refer to a proposal which is supposed to have come from St. Petersburg during the past few days, and clearly inspired by satisfaction felt with the working of the Ambassadors' Conference that was called into being in London specially to deal with issues arising out of the Balkan War.

The suggestion is that a permanent body representative of the Triple Entente should be located here; Sir Edward Grey to preside, and France and Russia to be represented by their Ambassadors. At first glance the idea appears to be a sound one, but deeper consideration reveals certain objections. For instance, it may be urged that the creation of such permanent machinery might conceivably deprive the Triple Entente of some of that elasticity which has been looked upon as its principal virtue; or, again, the friends of European unity might complain that realisation of the project would tend to emphasise more than is necessary the dividing line between the two groups of Great Powers. It is not our intention to discuss the points thus raised. We merely mention the proposal emanating from St. Petersburg as an indication of Russian appreciation of British diplomacy. Knowing full well as we do the fixed nature of Russia's foreign policy, we are convinced that, as in the case of this country, no ministerial change can bring about any drastic alteration.

When we return to the domestic aspects of the crisis, one which it should be strictly noted is essentially domestic in character, we discover some features that have an extremely important bearing upon the welfare of Russia. In spite of all newspaper announcements to the contrary, the fall of M. Kokofftseff was not altogether unexpected. There had long been considerable opposition to the policy which he had pursued in regard to railway development, and powerful financial interests, ignored by him, had strived to undermine his position. The cause which ultimately sent him from office was the attitude he adopted in regard to the drink question. The actual force which swept him away found its origin in the bitter and sustained opposition of Count Witte. Ever since his retirement this great statesman has been longing to return to power. The Tsar, however, while anxious to make use of his advice occasionally, is apprehensive of a man so determined and original in character and method. That Witte's day will come is the conviction of many competent authorities, but before the time arrives startling developments must take place in Russia. Meanwhile he has been the instrument that produced the downfall of M. Kokofftseff, but, as we have already said, the cause in which he sought issue was merely contributory. On the surface, all the moral force was on his side. To anyone who has travelled extensively in Russia the statement that the peasants are becoming degenerate by the spread of the drink habit is no exaggeration. This unfortunate tendency mainly exhibits itself in those industrial centres which are quickly springing up throughout the Empire.

The educated Russian is undeniably more abstemious than his corresponding class in England. Vodka, the spirit mostly consumed, is a Government monopoly from which the State derives one hundred millions sterling annually, or one-third of its total revenue. This monopoly was instituted by Count Witte himself, but it is only fair to say that his case against it to-day rests upon charges of abuse and maladministration. He asserts, and quite rightly, that no nation should be dependent for its existence upon the spread of alcoholism.

It is not easy to find a reply to a denunciation of this kind. M. Kokofftseff took refuge in stating the increase in population as explaining the growing consumption of vodka, and he also referred to the spread of education as a sign of cultural progress. In short, he made the most of a bad case, but all the moral suasion was on the side of his pious political opponent. In future the monopoly is to be rigidly controlled, other sources of revenue are to be discovered, and the State must depreciate the value of its own liquor business by waging a campaign of temperance. For these things have been duly decreed by the Emperor of all the Russias.

It is not a little interesting to reflect that the desire to reform owes its origin to a Temperance Bill introduced to the Duma by a man described as half-peasant, and that the measure received the assent of the Duma, an assembly which includes peasant representatives. In spite of all criticism it would seem then that the Duma is no small factor in national advancement. That the Tsar came to a wise decision will be the verdict of the friends of Russia. The future of the Empire depends solely upon the steady progress of her peasants, who constitute nearly ninety per cent. of the whole population. As for the aristocrats and officials, they are immersed in bureaucratic stagnation, while the Intellectuals are so freakish and individual in method as to be useless for the furtherance of the national ideal. Peasant happiness alone can encompass the welfare of Russia.

MOTORING

THE important paper recently read before the Royal Society of Arts on the great motor fuel problem has aroused considerable interest in scientific as well as in purely motoring circles, and many eminent experts have taken part in the subsequent discussions. Dr. Ormanby's conclusions, arrived at after a careful and comprehensive survey of the position, all point to alcohol as the only solution at present in sight—an opinion which is endorsed by such authorities as Sir Boverton Redwood, Professor Vivian Lewes, Dr. Hele Shaw, and Mr. Thomas Tyrer, and many others of scarcely less distinction in the scientific world. A great deal has been heard of benzole in this connection, and, in view of the fact that many motorists are obtaining this coal-extracted spirit at a lower price than that of petrol, and are using it with every satisfaction, many people wonder why its competition has not brought down the price of petrol to a lower level. The answer is simply that the supply of benzole is limited, the total quantity producible under existing conditions representing a mere fraction of the demand for motor spirit. The petrol monopolists are aware of this, and they are not likely to reduce their prices until an unlimited supply of the competitive fuel is available. If some means of treating coal as to render the process remunerative for the sake of the spirit alone could be devised, the position would be entirely altered; but at present it appears to be the demand for coke which controls the situation. The motorist's only hope, therefore, of obtaining an adequate supply of fuel at a reasonable price seems to lie either in the discovery of a much superior method of coal distillation, or in the development of alcohol on a world-wide scale.

The award in the competition promoted by Messrs. Napier to encourage careful and skilful driving by chauffeurs in charge of privately owned six-cylinder Napiers has been made by the specially appointed committee of the Automobile Association and Motor Union, and the first prize—a gold watch and chain of the value of £35—has been won by Mr. J. Swinton, chauffeur to H. Percy Densham, Esq., of Cuerden Hall, Thelwell, Warrington. These competitions are excellent in every way, as they offer a strong inducement to the driver to run his car at the lowest possible cost to the owner, and they are valuable to the makers of the car because they serve to show at what a low cost even a powerful six-cylinder can be run when handled by a careful and competent driver. It is interesting to note that the tyres used on the winning car were all Victors, and that each of them did over 5000 miles. This is a very good performance on a car weighing nearly two tons, without passengers, and it will doubtless be noted by those motorists who realise how important a factor the tyre is when considering economy.

The potentialities of Australia as a market for motor-cars is seen in the official trade statistics for 1912, which have just been issued. The actual number of cars imported is not given, but the rapidity with which the trade is developing is indicated by a comparison of the values of the chassis and bodies imported in 1910, 1911, and 1912 respectively. In 1910 the total value was £790,249, in 1911 £1,178,562, and in 1912 it rose to £1,671,583. These figures will come as a surprise, not merely to the general public, but to many of the British motor firms whose concern it is to find and cultivate fresh markets for their productions. Great Britain still has the lion's share of the Australian business, but whereas its increase since 1910 has only been about 50 per cent., that of America has been about 300 per cent., and Canada is not much behind. There is plenty of food for reflection here for the British maker, especially in view of the fact that there is an undoubted demand in Australia for the high-class British-made car.

Messrs. Belsize Motors, Ltd., of Clayton, Manchester, have issued a little booklet, consisting solely of letters of appreciation from users of Belsize cars, and those prospective motorists whose ambitions and means are of the limited order will be well advised to procure a copy and read it before making their purchases. Many of the letters, the originals of which can be inspected at any time, if desired, constitute really remarkable records of efficiency, economical running, and freedom from mechanical troubles of any description. The "10/12" especially seems to have given unbounded satisfaction to users, and there is little doubt that this model represents the biggest success the Belsize people have ever achieved.

THE Sunday Times

THE LEADING SUNDAY PAPER SINCE 1822.

"City Chatter" by "Magpie"

is acknowledged by all experts to be the most interesting, instructive and accurate article on current financial matters.

Of all Newsagents.

Price One Penny

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

ALMOST could I write that a cloud of depression has settled on the City. At any rate, the little boom which startled us when the Bank Rate dropped to 3 per cent. has quite died out, and brokers now complain that they are just as badly off as they were at the end of 1913. Trade remains bad all over the Continent and throughout the United States, whilst, as I pointed out last week, everybody in Brazil and the Argentine is suffering from a severe reaction. I do not think that we shall get any serious failures in the Argentine, but it is quite possible that Brazil may find herself unable to meet the interest on her debt. The rumour that she had arranged a loan in Paris has now been denied.

The New Issues are not going as well as they did a few weeks ago. The Union of South Africa loan was a complete failure and gave the underwriters a very bad shock. Eagle Transport asked for another million in preference shares, and the money was found by the followers of Lord Cowdray. Venezuela Central Railway asked for money, but I see no reason why anyone should apply for the bonds, for there is no Central American State that has a worse record. Also, the offer is not good enough, for one can buy the present bonds on better terms. The City of Pretoria has borrowed £750,000, but the public is chary of all South African finance. Trinidad Grand River Oil may be an excellent venture for the promoters, but is likely to turn out as unlucky for the investor as all the other Trinidad oil companies in which the foolish public have wasted their money. The St. Louis Breweries offer us £450,000 6 per cent. debentures at 97, repayable in 12 years at 102. Thus the yield is very high and the Law Debenture may probably obtain the necessary funds; but American breweries, like the oil-fields of Trinidad, have a bad record in the City. The Electric and General Investment offered us £100,000 4½ per cent. debentures in the Tramways (M.E.T) Omnibus Company, guaranteed by the Metropolitan Electric Tramways. The Tramways Company owns 350 motor-buses, and works with the London General Omnibus. There is not much in applying for these debentures, for the yield is not high enough. The Mogyana Railways and Navigation Company offer £1,500,000 5 per cent. bonds at 96. The road has a revenue of £741,061 per annum, and depends mainly upon the coffee crop. In the present state of Brazilian affairs, there is nothing very attractive in the issue. The General Scottish Trust asks for £250,000 with the idea of running a Trust on true Scottish lines. It must be admitted that most Scotch trusts are successful and probably the Scotch will support their own enterprise. Personally, I have nothing to say either for or against the offer. The directors are respectable and the business is certain to be carefully managed.

MONEY.—The Money market seems to be hardening up. There is a steady drain of gold, and Egypt has actually taken £100,000, and it is said that South America is also in the market. If the continued call upon our gold is not stopped, then the Bank of England will have to protect the preserves and raise rates. At the moment, trade bills are readily taken at 3 per cent.

FOREIGNERS.—Some excitement has been caused amongst the German colony in London by an article in the Frankfurter Zeitung on the situation in Japan. None of the English newspapers has translated this article, which boldly declares that all the news from Japan is faked. The Japanese placed £2,500,000 Treasury bills, and this money will tide them over for a few months, but the country is in a desperate condition, and as I have again and again said, default is only a question of time. There appears to be some argument as to whether the so-called military bonds placed in Brussels are authorised by the Chinese Government. It is said that the Banque Industrielle de Chine has secured a loan, and will shortly make an issue both here and in Paris. China is in dire need of money. It looks very much as though the power of the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank were broken. Brazilian bonds have been very flat. Indeed, the whole Foreign market has become weak.

HOME RAILS.—Lord Claud Hamilton made a very sensible speech at the Great Eastern meeting, but he has annoyed railway men by declaring that the best managers can only be found in the United States. Everyone who has travelled through the States must admit that he is speaking the truth. Great Easterns, under an enlightened manager, should be worth buying to-day. The North Eastern dividend was magnificent. I have been urging a purchase of this stock for the past twelve months, and those who got in at the bottom have a 12-point profit, in addition to a 7 per cent. dividend, so that they have 19 per cent. profit on their purchase. London and North Western dividend was not quite so good as some people expected. We all expected not only ½ per cent. increase, which we obtained, but also that the reserves would get at least as much as they did last year, whereas they are docked with £100,000. The Midland announcement was good, and the Midland deferred held their own in the market. On the whole the heavies have done just what people thought they would. No railway can do more. I think, however, that the rise will probably slacken off for some weeks, and that we may see lower prices, in which case wise people will buy, for English railway common stocks will all get to a 4 per cent. basis before the end of 1914.

YANKEES.—The American market is not good. Apparently the bankers are not inclined to encourage speculation at the moment. Some say that the Wall Street magnates are out to get cheap stock; others that the trade position in the United States is bad. The Woolworth Company and the Sears, Roebuck Company made records during 1913, but it must be admitted that general trade has been steadily declining for some time past. The rise in Steels seems nothing but a "bear" squeeze, for the news in regard to the Steel trade is that most of the plants are only working 50 per cent. of their capacity, and that the January and February figures of the Steel Trust will show large deficits. There is a little rig in Copper. The Americans are exporting enormous quantities to Europe, and apparently hiding away the whole of these shipments, for they certainly do not appear in the English statistics.

RUBBER.—Rubber kept very hard until Tuesday, when it tumbled to 2s. 5½d., and Rubber shares tumbled with it. The position according to the dealers in the market is purely professional. They all declare that the public are not buying, and that it is only the Trusts and the professional "bulls" in Mincing Lane that are responsible for the rise. No doubt cheap money has something to do with it. The Glendon report showed enough profit to pay 10 per cent., but it seems impossible that this little company can continue the distribution through 1914. The shares at 25s. seem to me over-valued.

OIL.—Practically no business is doing in the Oil market. Insiders are buying North Caucasians, but as everyinsider has a different excuse for his purchase, it is not easy to see why the price has risen. Dealers consequently think it a safe thing to go short. Nevertheless, there is a fairly large "bear" account open already in this share. Premier Pipes are never mentioned. Indeed, the only free market in Oil shares is in Shell and Royal Dutch. The Venezuelan Oil rig hangs fire now that the riggers have gone to Venezuela.

MINES.—The Wolhuter report was frankly bad. Profits are down, and the dividend has been cut to 10 per cent. Ore reserves are not only smaller, but their value has decreased. The Arizona report was as good as anyone could have expected, but the careful Scotch board placed large sums to reserve and reduced the dividend. This is one of the best managed Copper companies in the world. There is practically no business doing in either Kaffirs or Rhodesians, but there has been considerable excitement in the Russian Mining market, and Russian mining has had a big jump. None of the Kirkland issues is mentioned. The steam has gone out of this market.

MISCELLANEOUS.—The Electric Lighting reports are all good, and once again I desire to point out to my readers what admirable investments may be found in this market. Charing Cross increase their dividend, and the shares jumped to 5, at which price they yield 6 per cent. Notting Hill report is good. City of London figures are also quite noticeable, although the shares seem fully valued. Maple's report shows reduced profits. The Bradford Dyers come out with a record result, on which I congratulate Mr. Milton Sharpe. Selfridge figures are also excellent, and a dividend on the ordinary is paid for the first time. I hear that Mr. Selfridge is going into the provision business. Holders of Forestal Lands should get out of their ordinary shares.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

ULSTER: A SOLDIER'S VIEW.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—The King's Speech makes no alteration in a situation which Radical papers, at first inclined to ridicule, now treat as the gravity of the case merits. One of the leading organs of the party, referring to the Ulster preparations as "Sir Edward Carson's Circus," and "comic opera army," not long since, was forced before the opening of Parliament to such a change of front as involved the statement, "We do not agree with those who would ridicule the preparations in Ulster," or words to that effect.

It is generally admitted that, if the Home Rule Bill is forced through without the consent of the people, given at and by a General Election, Ulstermen will make trouble in some way. A body of nearly a hundred thousand volunteers has been formed to resist being thrust out of the Union, as Ulster sees it, whatever the justice of that view may be from a Radical standpoint. A well authenticated rumour has it that, in case of serious disturbance, a portion or the whole of the Aldershot striking force will be hurried to Ulster, to assist the troops already there in dealing with the situation. The fortunes of the Aldershot men on their errand, and those of the Ulster volunteers, in such a contingency, present a very interesting study.

To take the Ulster volunteers first. It must be granted against them that they are, to a certain extent, untrained, that their armament is not the most effective that can be procured, and that, even in Ulster, there is a section of the community which would uphold any law, once it had

ROYAL ALBION HOTEL, BRIGHTON.

THE NEWEST HOTEL.

Closer to the Sea than any other Hotel
at Brighton.

Magnificent Dining Room and Lounge with beautiful Sea Views.

The Academy and Literature says:—"We have tried all the hotels in Brighton and none can compare with the Royal Albion for beauty of position, comfort, and personal attention to visitors' wishes."

For Illustrated Brochure and
Tariff, apply to
THE MANAGER.

Telephones :
903 Post Office (2 lines).

Telegrams :
"Brilliancy, Brighton."

"ROYAL YORK" HOTEL, BRIGHTON

Supreme Comfort in a Warm and
Sheltered Position. Excellent Sea Views

SOME PRESS OPINIONS.

"To the Cuisine particular attention has been paid, and no expense spared, whilst the service is absolutely perfect."

"And in the Royal York you have the perfection of an English hotel and English cooking."

AND—

Colonel NEWNHAM DAVIS says:—"The Chef makes soup like a Frenchman, grills like an Englishman, and fries like an Italian."

Telegrams :
"Presto, Brighton."

Telephones : 206 Post Office, Brighton.
293 Brighton.

been passed. On the other hand, the Ulstermen have in their ranks a number of trained and seasoned men, especially among those who would correspond to the holders of commissioned rank in a regular military force, while among the rank and file may be counted many who have been under fire on active service. These trained men would have a steadying effect on the whole, and would brace up the Ulster volunteer force—not, perhaps, to equality with disciplined Regular troops, but to a steadiness which would make the army of Ulster, as a whole, a very tough nut to crack in the guerilla tactics which that army would, almost certainly, employ.

With regard to their armament, it may be reasonably assumed that this would be incomplete, and we may take it that, out of the hundred thousand volunteers, Ulster is capable of providing sufficient arms and equipment for only about forty thousand men. That, however, is quite a sufficient force for the opening and carrying on of a disastrous civil war; it will be—assuming that actual hostilities arise out of the situation—an effective and even a dangerous striking force, with its men, animated by what is, to them, a thoroughly patriotic spirit, able and willing to work and fight to the uttermost for that Union which the rest of Ireland is eager, at the bidding of a few interested leaders and the temptation of a plentitude of Yankee dollars, to forgo.

The invading force will be in a precisely opposite situation to that of the Ulstermen. Theoretically, the Regular Army is non-party; practically, it is Conservative to the last man and almost to the last officer—the economising spirit of Radical legislation, reducing and starving the Regular Force in every possible way, has fostered a Conservative spirit. Already officers have resigned their commissions on account of the possibilities of Ulster, and the nature of the case provides that the path to resignation shall remain open up to the very last minute. Those who force Home Rule through dare not, for their own sakes, use the words “civil war” in connection with Ulster trouble until such words are absolutely unavoidable. “Regrettable disturbances,” “violent scenes,” and “riots,” are phrases that will fit the case and serve for ordering troops out without making too full a confession of ghastly blundering in the semblance of legislation. But, until a state of war, civil or otherwise, is admittedly existing, an officer is at liberty to resign his commission. Consequently, on a low estimate, any British regiment ordered to Ulster to preserve peace, before war is admitted to exist, will embark with a third—or, at most, a half—of its officers. For, whatever fine phrases may be used with regard to troops and officers yielding blind obedience to official mandates, quite half the officers will resign, rather than order their men to fire on the force that has been formed to maintain the Act of Union between Great Britain and Ireland.

Robbed thus of half its officers, and to a certain extent in sympathy with the men whom it is ordered to oppose, a British coercive force will take the field half-heartedly—for no soldier will retain even a semblance of enthusiasm over a cause which his officers refuse to support. Its men will be thoroughly disciplined, and that fact may be set off against the patriotic—or ill-judged as a different standpoint may cause it to be phrased—eagerness of the Ulster volunteers.

It must be admitted that quite forty thousand of these volunteers will be in a position to take the field—and this is placing the total very low indeed. They will be able, like the Boers in the last war that gave British troops practical experience, to disperse and reassemble, they will be among relatives and friends who will house, feed, and nurse them, while Regular troops in Ulster, fighting against Ulstermen, will be among a host of spies and ill-wishers. Those who set out to coerce Ulster by force of arms must overcome, not only the hostility of the actual volunteer force, but the scheming and plotting of their friends, who will disclose plans, render assistance to their friends, and mislead their enemies, to the utmost of their power.

To turn into Ulster regiments recruited from the rest of Ireland—the only regiments that would prove dependable in every way for the work—is a step that not even a Radical Government dare contemplate, for the bitter hatred between volunteer Orangemen and troops animated by a Nationalist spirit would lead to bloodier scenes, even, than Cromwell enacted on Irish soil. Again, to destroy civilian Ulster, apart from the volunteer force, to deport families and lay waste the province, is an unthinkable step; the whole population must be fought by half-hearted, half-officered regiments, who will, so far as actual fighting is concerned, have opposed to them a body of armed enthusiasts forty thousand or more strong—a very respectable little army, in fact, about equal in numbers to thirty-two infantry battalions plus eight cavalry regiments.

The anomaly of “traitors” who fight to keep within the Union, and “loyalists” who would support disruption at the instance of an interested Government, has no bearing on this aspect of the Ulster problem. The point at issue is that Ulster possesses a defensive and offensive force capable of maintaining armed opposition, under the ordinary probabilities of a campaign, for a considerable period, and able to take the field with every advantage against an extremely problematic and not nearly so fortunate opponent. There is an infinite field for speculation over the probable results of such a situation as this.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

E. C. V.

London, February 17, 1914.

MADAME D'ARBLAY, EDWARD, AND THE RING.

A BIBLIOGRAPHICAL QUESTION.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—In THE ACADEMY of April 5, 1913, I mentioned “Edward. A Novel. In Two Volumes. Dedicated (by Permission) to Her Majesty. London: Printed for T. Davies, Russell-Street, Covent-Garden; Bookseller to the Royal Academy. M.DCC.LXXIV.” Copies of it exist in the Bodleian Library and in the British Museum. After comparing it with “The Ring: A Novel: In a Series of Letters. By A Young Lady. In Three Volumes. London: Printed for J. Stockdale, opposite Burlington-House, Piccadilly. MDCCCLXXXIV.” (which exists in the Bodleian Library, but not in the British Museum), and both of these works with “Evelina or The History of A Young Lady’s Entrance into The World”; and with “Camilla: or, A Picture of Youth. By the author of Evelina and Cecilia. In Five Volumes. London: Printed for T. Payne, at the Mews-Gate; and T. Cadell Jun. and W. Davies (Successors to Mr. Cadell) in the Strand. 1796”: I am “inclined,” (to use a word which they contain) to attribute them to Frances Burney, Madame d’Arblay, who flourished (D.N.B.) in the years 1752-1840. The following are a few of the details on which I found the suggestion. The Bodleian copy of The Ring bears the name “Penelope Sneyd. 1788.” Among the subscribers to Camilla one reads “Mrs. Sneyd, Brickley Lodge.” In the same list one finds “Mrs. Holroyd, Bath. Mr. Holroyd.” The Bodleian copy of Edward contains the book-plate of “I. Baker Holroyd Esq. Sheffield Place Sussex.” This gentleman lived (D.N.B.) 1735-1821, became Earl of Sheffield in the Peerage of Eireland, and M.P. for Bristol, a place

mentioned in Edward and in The Ring. Both these novels contain evidence of their authors interest in Eireland, in Spain, and in Bath, where Madame d'Arblay and her father Charles Burney, musician and author, 1726-1814 (D.N.B.) spent much time. In them Bristol meant Bath. Henry Temple, 2nd Viscount Palmerston, visited Spa, a place in Edward, (as visited by Lord Henry), and was married, in 1783, at Bath, and was the grandson of a speaker in the Irish House of Commons. On p. 213 of Vol. 2 of The Ring we read, "and Lord Palmerston, whom I have before mentioned to you under the title of Sir Edward, but who has been lately created a peer. He is a very agreeable man, and a great favourite of mine." On p. 189 of Vol. 3, "Lord Palmerston is married to Lady Horatia, Lord Merton's sister, and was presented at court on the birth-day." Lord Merton occurs also in Evelina. Belville is a leading character in The Ring as in Edward. In the latter he is bad: in the former good. The Ring is less insipid than Edward. The Dedication of Camilla, in 3 pages, begins "To the Queen. Madam," and ends "With the deepest gratitude, and most heart-felt respect, I am, Madam, Your Majesty's Most obedient, most obliged, And most dutiful servant, F. d'Arblay. Bookham, June 28, 1796." Edward has a Dedication of 3 pages beginning "To the Queen. Madam," and ending "with the most profound respect, Madam, Your Majesty's Most devoted and obedient Humble Servant, The Author." Both dedications contain the word "patronage." That of Edward speaks of "this little production": that of Camilla calls it "this little Work." Frances was thus following the example of her father, who became a Bachelor of Music, in Oxford, in 1769. His father was educated at Westminster School. So was Edward in the Novel of 1774. He was introduced to Fulke Greville by a harpsichord-maker. A "Greville" appears in The Ring, and the harpsichord and the guitar are instruments therein. In Edward music is represented by "rural reeds," "flagelet," and "fiddle." Oxford is mentioned in Edward: Oxford and Cambridge in The Ring, as places of study. Both these novels have a large number of titled people among their actors, as Frances Burney had among her friends. The 3rd Lord Palmerston 1784-1865, is described (D.N.B.) as "a light of Almack's." Almack's, The Pantheon, and The Thatched House, are places of entertainment which occur in Edward and The Ring. The final letter both in The Ring and in Evelina announces the marriage of the heroine, and is followed by the Latin FINIS. Evelina was published in 1779; Cecilia in 1782. I have collected much more evidence to shew that Edward and The Ring came from the pen of Madame d'Arblay. Probably some reader of THE ACADEMY has found in the literature of her period external, collateral support of this conjecture. The expression "soss, soss!" in Edward seems to represent Gaelic suas=up! In Vol. I. p. 12 one notes "gauzey," a word for which the earliest authority in "The Oxford Dictionary" is Charlotte Smith in 1796. It occurs thus: "The light was seen through the thin gauzey black."

EDWARD S. DODGSON.

February, 11, 1914.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION.

- The Heart of the Moor.* By Beatrice Chase. (Herbert Jenkins. 6s.)
The Sheep Track: An Aspect of London Society. By Nesta H. Webster. (John Murray. 6s.)

THE KARSINO and NEW ISLAND HOTEL HAMPTON COURT.

Proprietor: Mr. FRED KARNO.

Tel.: MOLESEY 1.

*The only Residential River Hotel open
all the Year round.*

THE RIVIERA OF LONDON
THE FAVOURITE RESORT OF LONDON SOCIETY.
LUXURIOUS PALM COURT.
DANCES & ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

For Illustrated Brochure & Tariff, apply Manager.

- Derfel the Strong: A Romance of the Days of King Henry VIII.* By Mary Agatha Gray. (R. and T. Washbourne. 6s.)
Limelight. By Horace Wyndham. (John Richmond. 6s.)
Shepherdless Sheep. By Essex Smith. (T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.)
Max Logan. By Paul Trent. (Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.)
Ten Minute Stories. By A. Blackwood. (John Murray. 6s.)
The Day of Days. An Extravaganza by Louis Joseph Vance. (Grant Richards. 6s.)
The Custody of the Child. By Philip Gibbs. (Hutchinson and Co. 6s.)
The Happy Hunting Ground. By Alice Perrin. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)
The Eight of Diamonds: The Story of a Week-End. (Hutchinson and Co. 6s.)
The Garden of Dreams. By H. Grahame Richards. (Hutchinson and Co. 6s.)
The Making of an Englishman. By W. L. George. (Constable and Co. 6s.)
A Great Coup. By Nat Gould. (John Long. 6d.)
The Purple Mists. By F. E. Mills Young. With Coloured Frontispiece. (John Lane. 6s.)
Time's Hour Glass. By Alfred E. Carey. (Greening and Co. 6s.)
When Satan Ruled. By C. Ranger-Gull. (Greening and Co. 6s.)
Behind the Veil: True Stories of London Life. By G. R. Sims. (Greening and Co. 2s. net.)
A Madonna of the Poor, and Other Stories. By Clive Holland. (Lynwood and Co. 6s.)
Crying for the Moon. By Nancy Pain and Winifred Rose. (T. Werner Laurie. 2s. net.)

- Disturbers.* By W. H. Williamson, and "Canadienne." (T. Werner Laurie. 6s.)
- There was a Door.* By the Author of "Anne Carstairs." (Chapman and Hall. 6s.)
- Down in Devon.* By Uncle Tom Cobleigh. (Heath, Cranton and Ouseley. 3s. 6d. net.)
- The Pathway.* By Gertrude Page. (Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.)
- The Business of a Gentleman.* By H. N. Dickinson. (Wm. Heinemann. 6s.)
- Her Stewardship.* By E. M. Payn. (Digby, Long and Co. 6s.)
- The Great Attempt.* By Frederick Arthur. (John Murray. 6s.)
- Small Souls.* By Louis Couperus. Translated from the Dutch by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos. (Wm. Heinemann. 6s.)
- The Ransom for London.* By J. S. Fletcher. (John Long. 6s.)
- Salad Days: A Comedy of Youth.* (John Long. 6s.)
- A Lady of Leisure.* By Ethel Sidgwick. (Sidgwick and Jackson. 6s.)
- In the Cockpit of Europe.* By Lieut.-Col. Alsager Pollock. With a Map. (Smith, Elder and Co. 6s.)
- The Split Peas.* By Headon Hill. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)
- The Twin Soul of O'Také San.* By Baroness Albert d'Anethan. With Frontispiece. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)
- The Devil in London.* By George R. Sims. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6d.)

VERSE.

- More Rhodesian Rhymes.* By Cullen Gouldsbury. (Philpott and Collins, Buluwayo. 5s. net.)
- Region of Lutany.* By Winifred Ellerman. (Chapman and Hall. 1s. 6d. net.)
- Poems, with Ballads of Old Birmingham.* By E. M. Rudland. (David Nutt. 1s. 6d. net.)
- Songs in Sail and Other Chantys.* By C. Fox-Smith. (Elkin Mathews. 1s. net.)
- Little Poems.* Selected and Arranged by E. Crosby Heath. With a Critical Essay. (Erskine Macdonald. 1s. net.)
- A Modern Magdalene.* By E. J. R. Atkinson. (McEwan, Stephens and Stillwell, Melbourne. 2s.)
- Wayside Poems.* By E. J. R. Atkinson. (McEwan, Stephens and Stillwell, Melbourne. 2s.)
- Time and the Timeless.* Songs of Shadow and of Hope by a Physician. (Henry J. Glaisher. 2s. 6d. net.)
- Brunelleschi.* A Poem by John Galen Howard. (John Howell, San Francisco. $6.)
- The Saviour of the World: Vol. VI. The Training of the Disciples.* By Charlotte M. Mason. Illustrated. (Kegan Paul and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)
- Moods of the Inner Voice.* By J. H. Twells, jun. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Odd Numbers.* By Robert Calignoc. (G. Bell and Sons.)
- The White Gate, and Other Poems.* By Lorma Leigh. (James Hewetson and Son, Hampstead. 1s. 6d. net.)
- "As the Heart Speaks," and Other Poems.* By May Belben. (Morland, Amersham, Bucks. 2s. 6d. net.)
- The Acharnians of Aristophanes.* With a Translation into English Verse by Robert Yelverton Tyrrell, M.A. (Humphrey Milford. 1s. net.)
- Parsifal, and Tristan und Isolde.* The Stories of Richard Wagner's Dramas told in English by Randle Fynes and Louis N. Parker. (Smith, Elder and Co. 1s. 6d. net.)

- Sophocles in English Verse. Part II.* By Arthur S. Way, D.Lit. (Macmillan and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Green Ears.* By G. R. Harvey. (Milne and Stephen, Aberdeen.)
- The New Circe.* By F. Gerald Miller. (Elkin Mathews. 1s. net.)
- Echoes from the Gospels.* By Marcus S. C. Rickards. (J. Baker and Son, Clifton. 2s. 6d. net.)

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Everywoman's Guide to Home-Dressmaking.* By Emilie. Illustrated. (Brindley and Howe. 7d. net.)
- Trial of John Jasper.* Verbatim Report by J. W. T. Ley. (Chapman and Hall. 2s. 6d. net.)
- Pot-Pourri Parisien.* By E. Bryham Parsons. Illustrated. (Argus Printing Co. 6s. net.)
- Lloyd George and the Land: An Exposure and an Appeal.* By G. E. Raine. (George Allen and Co. 1s. net.)
- Idle Women: A Study in Futility.* By Magdalen Ponsonby. (Arthur L. Humphreys. 1s. net.)
- Do Miracles Happen?* By G. K. Chesterton and Others. (Christian Commonwealth Co. 6d.)
- What Federalism is Not.* By Frederick S. Oliver. (John Murray. 6d. net.)
- The Sonnets of Shakespeare: New Light and Old Evidence.* By the Countess de Chambrun. Illustrated. (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Secrets of the Tango.* By S. Beach Chester. Illustrated. (T. Werner Laurie. 6d.)
- Some Plain Words to the English People.* By Arthur Bennett. (Sunrise Publishing Co., Warrington. 2s. 6d. net.)

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS.

- With the Russians in Mongolia.* By H. G. C. Perry-Ayscough, M.A., and Captain R. B. Otter-Barry. Illustrated. (John Lane. 16s. net.)
- Pennell of the Afghan Frontier: The Life of Theodore Leighton Pennell, M.D., F.R.C.S.* By Alice M. Pennell. With an Introduction by Field-Marshal Earl Roberts, V.C., K.G. Illustrated. (Seeley, Service and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Governance of England.* By Sidney Low. (T. Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Gipsy Coppersmiths in Liverpool and Birkenhead.* By "Andreas." Illustrated. (H. Young and Sons, Liverpool. 1s. net.)
- Old Magdalen Days, 1847-1877.* By a former Chorister. (B. H. Blackwell, Oxford. 1s.)
- Everybody's Book of the Navy.* By Charles E. Eldred, R.N. Illustrated. (Brindley and Howe. 6d. net.)
- Napoleon at Bay, 1814.* By F. Loraine Petre. With Maps and Plans. (John Lane. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Les Prêtres Danseurs de Rome: Etude sur la Corporation sacerdotale des Saliens.* By René Cirilli. (Paul Geuthner, Paris. 7 fr. 50.)
- C. F. Meyer, sa Vie, son Œuvre (1825-1898).* By R. d'Harcourt. (Félix Alcan, Paris. 10 fr.)

PERIODICALS.

- St. George's Magazine; International Journal of Ethics; American Historical Review; Revista Gráfica; Cambridge University Reporter; Wednesday Review; Collegian; Literary Digest; The Circulation Manager; The Periodical; United Empire; London University Gazette; Bookseller; Le Carillon; The Book Lover; Publishers' Circular; Ulula; Revue Critique; Revue Bleue; Mercure de France; La Vie des Lettres; Review of Reviews for Australasia; Cambridge Magazine; Hindustan Review.*

THE ACADEMY

A JOURNAL OF LITERATURE, ART, FINANCE & POLITICS

No. 2182

[Registered as a
Newspaper.]

FEBRUARY 28, 1914

PRICE THREEPENCE

SHEFFIELD SIMPLEX

PRESS OPINION:—

*"The highest point to which motor design
has yet attained."*

The "TIMES," 8/11/13

The Connoisseur

who demands smart appearance, and the experienced motorist who desires chassis efficiency, have their ideals in the present 30 h.p. six-cylinder Sheffield-Simplex chassis.

Write for Illustrated List of complete cars, with beautiful bodies by Vauden - Plas, or better still, arrange a trial. Both are free.

Sheffield-Simplex Motor Works, Ltd.

20, CONDUIT STREET,
LONDON, W.

Works: Tinsley, Sheffield

30 H.P. 6-CYLINDER CHASSIS. STANDARD EQUIPMENT INCLUDES U. S. L. ELECTRIC SELF-STARTER AND LIGHTER, ALL LAMPS, ELECTRIC HORN, SPEEDOMETER CLOCK, COMPLETE SCUTTLE DASH, WITH ALL INSTRUMENTS, £8 8s. TAX.

PRICE £885.

LATEST DESIGN TORPEDO — WITH CONCEALED HOOD

ROYAL ALBION HOTEL, BRIGHTON.

THE NEWEST HOTEL.

Closer to the Sea than any other Hotel
at Brighton.

Magnificent Dining Room and Lounge with beautiful Sea Views.

The Academy and Literature says:—"We have tried all the hotels in Brighton and none can compare with the Royal Albion for beauty of position, comfort, and personal attention to visitors' wishes."

For Illustrated Brochure and
Tariff, apply to
THE MANAGER.

Telephones :
903 Post Office (2 lines).

Telegrams :
"Brilliancy, Brighton."

THE ISSUE OF

THE ACADEMY

FOR MARCH 7

will be a

SPECIAL SPRING ANNOUNCEMENTS NUMBER

and will form a good guide to the principal books of the present season.

BARGAINS IN BOOKS.—

Kipling's Complete Works, 25 vols., half calf, gilt, fine set, £12 12s.; Hamilton's Parodies, 6 vols., £2 10s.; Jesse's Historical Works, 30 vols., Nimmo, 1901, £7 17s. 6d.; Thackeray's Centenary Biographical Edition, 26 vols., £6 6s.; Barrington's Graham of Claverhouse, 30s. net, for 10s. 6d.; Purchas's Voyages, 20 vols., £9 9s., Glasgow, 1905; Slaters' Engravings and their Values, 1912, 18s.; Chaffer's Marks and Monograms on Pottery and Porcelain, 1912, 42s.; Baily's Magazines of Sports and Pastimes, 64 vols., £7 10s.; Grimm's Fairy Tales, large paper, illus. by Rackham, £2 2s.; Proc. Inst. Civil Engineers, 142 vols., cloth, £16 16s.; Pinkerton's Voyages and Travels, 17 vols., 1808, £5 10s.; Porter's Knights of Malta, 1858, 2 vols., £3 3s.; Burton's Arabian Nights, 17 vols., illustrated, £17 17s.; Gould's History Freemasonry, 3 thick vols., morocco binding, £2 2s., cost £6 6s.; James' Painters and Their Works, 3 vols., £3 3s.; Habershon Records of Old London, Vanished and Vanishing, coloured plates, folio, £2 2s.; Yeats' Collected Works, 8 vols., £3 3s.; Walpole's Letters, large paper, 16 vols., £7 10s.; Oscar Wilde, by L. E. Ingleby, 12s. 6d., for 4s. 6d.; Ditchfield Vanishing England, 15s., for 6s. 6d.; Landor's Lhasa, 2 vols., new, 42s., for 14s.; Spenser's Faerie Queene, 2 vols., Cambridge University Press, £3 13s. 6d., for 32s. Will take any good books in exchange for above.—BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

Just Published.A CRITICAL ESSAY ON EUROPEAN LITERATURE

By JAMES LINDSAY, D.D., M.A.

Author of "Studies in European Philosophy," etc.

2s. net.

"As in previous books, Dr. Lindsay shows an almost uncanny sweep of knowledge."
—Glasgow Herald.

WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS,
Edinburgh and London.

JOURNALISTIC and SECRETARIAL TRAINING FOR LADIES.—

Rapid systematic coaching. Special course in Journalism. Excellent introductions given.—Telephone or write, THE TRIANGLE SECRETARIAL OFFICES, 61, South Molton Street, W.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

EPSOM COLLEGE.

The Head Mastership will become vacant in July next by the resignation of the Rev. T. N. H. Smith-Pearse, and the Council are prepared to receive applications for the office from candidates not over forty years of age.

The Head Master must be a graduate of Oxford or Cambridge University, not necessarily in Holy Orders.

The emoluments amount to at least £1,100 a year, together with a house in the College grounds, free of rent, rates, and taxes. Applications, with not more than six testimonials, which must be recent, are to be sent, on or before the 16th day of March, addressed to the Secretary, at the Office of Epsom College, 37, Soho Square, London, W., who will furnish any information that is required.

By Order of the Council,

J. BERNARD LAMB, Secretary.

17th February, 1914.

LITERARY MSS. should be typewritten. We do it under expert literary supervision. Neatly, quickly, accurately, cheaply. Work returned same day as received. A. B. BRIDGES, 20, East Parade, LEEDS.

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Fourteen years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION: Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free.

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Offices of
THE ACADEMY, 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

To

Please send me THE ACADEMY for the next months.

I enclose remittance value

Name

Description

Address

CONTENTS

	PAGE		PAGE
Notes of the Week	259	The Theatre :
The Hint Within	260	"The Joy-ride Lady" at
Via Dolorosa	260	the New Theatre ...	275
No Exclusion—No Supplies	260	"A Pair of Silk Stock-
Loches	261	ings" at the Criterion
Reviews :		Theatre	276
Northern Cities and Cus-		M. Eugène Brieux's "Les toms	263	Avariés" in English	276
West Country Names ...	264	Mr. Arnold Bennett's
The Russian Advance in		Little Play at the
Mongolia	265	Palace	277
Tragedy, Tittle-tattle,		The National Portrait
and a Throne	266	Society	277
Shorter Reviews	267	Indian Reviews	279
Fiction	269	At St. Stephen's Shrine ...	280
Music	271	Notes and News	281
Poetry and the Daily Press	272	Imperial and Foreign Affairs	282
Foreign Reviews	273	Motoring	283
A Great Refusal	274	In the Temple of Mammon	284
		Correspondence	286
		Books Received	288

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post-free.

The EDITORIAL AND ADVERTISING OFFICE is at 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

Notes of the Week

A DISCUSSION has lately arisen as to whether death—the parting of the soul from its human habitation—is painless. The subject is fascinating, and it is entirely lovable to think that the moment of dissolution is not attended with physical suffering. We think this is the truth because the exhaustion is so great, that analgesia is probable almost to the point of certainty. Who has not witnessed the almost instant change which occurs when consciousness departs:—

So fair, so calm, so softly sealed,

The first, last look by death revealed.

We believe the medical profession incline to the opinion that the moments preceding death are painless, and anyone who has observed the curious, beautiful and inscrutable smile which passes momentarily over the features is reminded painfully but not without consolation of the words which he will shortly hear at the graveside:—

O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?

The question is one on which it would be extremely interesting to have the opinion of men like Dr. Hollander as to actual physical fact—so far as it can be ascertained—whilst on the spiritual side the conclusions of learned divines would be very welcome. It has been said that death is as natural as life, and obviously the saying is a true one. It may be that as there is very little immediate pain to the newly-born infant, so there is reason to infer that there is absence of absolute final suffering to the creature of larger growth, when the moment arrives for dissolution. All of us would like to think that such is the truth as regards those who are taken from us. The inquiry will in all probability remain one of the unsolved problems of clogged humanity, but at least it involves a mystery which cannot but interest animated creation.

The size of a newspaper is an attribute which never occurs to us as susceptible of change, and when, therefore, we find the Standard suddenly diminished in area, we suffer almost as severe a shock as though it had been detected in a lurid Socialist editorial. In some ways the alteration is an advantage; the man who always tries to open his paper in half a gale of wind and succeeds only in making himself a good subject for a fancy-dress ball will approve of the forethought which has lessened his trouble; the ladies who, with compressed lips and uncontrolled gestures, endeavour to unfold their morning sheet in public and reduce it to a limp, misshapen, disreputable mass, only fit for fire-lighting, will be pleased; and those domineering persons who in trains and other public conveyances extend their newspaper—they invariably buy the biggest—to the full, and thereby obscure quite harmless passengers on either side, besides distributing gratuitously unnecessary nudges and knocks, will be frustrated. Thus a certain amount of benefit arises; further than these purely physical aspects, we do not see much to comment upon. But that the weekly issue of the Westminster Gazette should change in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, from green to a distressing drab, with the added provocation of assuming the figure and proportions of a review—this, we protest, is too much. Let the literary roysterers of the "Problem Page" meet in a body at Trafalgar Square and demand, in the name of the Rhyming Dictionary and everything else they hold dear, that the nice green tint and the pleasant form be replaced. They would certainly have more reason at their back than some who orate on that classic ground!

Some purely delightful possibilities are suggested by the report that the town of Tarnopol, Austria, has sued the city of Vienna for "damages caused by loss of dignity." It seems that a rash councillor of the capital spoke harshly during a debate; upon which the representative of uncivilisation, very much upset, returned to his native haunts and told about it, and was comforted. But if the procedure becomes a habit, Austria is likely to see some lively times. Mayors and corporations, accompanied by every responsible adult townsman as witnesses to integrity, will be resenting the least aspersion on their domains; it will become risky to make any remark reflecting on the scenery of their district or the condition of their telephone system. We can only trust that the irascible inhabitants of Tarnopol will be duly mollified, and that in future they will not take themselves too seriously.

The Hint Within

AT moments, when night relaxes, and stars go seaward,
 Soft hath come o'er me a thought;
 That perchance we dream away, if we dream the Creator
 Aloof, apart from ourselves;
 That a Power outside us forbids, chastises and drives us,
 Wherefore we know not, nor guess.
 O brother, hath never a splendid hint surprised thee,
 That to rule we have but to claim?
 That ours are Orion, Arcturus, the Pleiades,
 The gorgeous fall of the sun?
 That ours are Death and Bliss and Renunciation,
 And the keys of all Heavens and Hells?
 What if the thief, the murderer even, found guilty,
 Be but glimmering low in his light,
 And the murder or theft delay but a final kingdom,
 Delay it, alas, how long?
 What if, apart from ourselves, never God existed,
 But that we, we ourselves, are God?

STEPHEN PHILLIPS.

Via Dolorosa

WOMAN, to you, before the Worlds were born,
 The Power that seeks, in dreadful love, decreed
 A wistful, blind, imperishable need
 To yield your body to be kiss'd and torn:
 Beneath your tender feet it set the thorn:
 It gave your brows for evermore to bleed
 With pitiless roses, and it made your meed
 An hour of worship and an age of scorn.
 O everlasting Sorrow, from your cross
 Let your sad hair touch me in healing wise!
 Wash me with those rich tears which God denies
 To us who grasp the gold and give the dross:
 Teach me the splendour of defeat and loss,
 And bless me with your meek, redeeming eyes.

FREDERICK LANGBRIDGE.

No Exclusion—No Supplies

WE hope and we think that the attitude of electors, and certainly of Conservative electors, is distinctly hardening. Mr. Asquith's consistent evasion of a plain statement of the intentions of the Government in regard to the position of Ulster, whilst it is not very respectful in connection with the very significant paragraph in the speech from the Throne at the opening of Parliament, is causing a widespread doubtfulness amongst thinking people in the United Kingdom as to his honesty. The castigation which he has received from Mr. Frederic Harrison is even more significant than the scourging administered by Mr. Bonar Law. We think we know the trick, and the author of it. The author we suspect of the present situation never deserts the Cambrian boroughs, with a Parliamentary electorate of 6,073, and is content to remain their champion by a majority of 1,208. Other men, such as Mr. Winston Churchill in the past, and Sir John Simon in the future, are willing to go to large constituencies and get a really important vote. Sir John Simon is relinquishing his safe seat in the Walthamstow division of Essex, with its electorate of 39,000 to contest the extremely hazardous constituency of North-West Lancashire. You never have found, nor will you ever find, the champion of the Carnarvon district going out into the open and fighting in a constituency which from its numbers and its influence in the country may not be likely to approve his methods. We now make Mr. Lloyd George an offer. No Liberal candidate has at present come into the field to oppose Mr. George Cave in the Kingston division of Surrey. It is open to Mr. Lloyd George to offer himself as a candidate, and we think we know Mr. Cave well enough to be able to assure the Chancellor of the Exchequer that his candidature will be welcomed by the sitting member.

We have indulged in this digression because we think there is an influence which, to put it mildly, is not entirely wholesome, urging the Prime Minister to persevere in obstinacy which in existing circumstances is wholly reprehensible. The manœuvre is not difficult to unravel. If supplies are voted before the question of Home Rule has been placed upon a sound and reasonable basis, obviously they can be used for the coercion of the loyal minority in Ireland. It is true that the Duke of Bedford has shown quite plainly that the Government would have at its disposal no adequate military force to oppose in arms the rebellion of Protestant Ireland. This is a fact which doubtless has escaped the notice of a politician who is advised by auctioneers on financial matters, and who is no doubt an authority on signing judgment under Order XIV, but who is eminently parochial in his outlook. Our object is to expose the petifogging intrigue which is intended to pervert correct judgment. Mr. Asquith cannot be acquitted of complicity on the ground that he is very little vigilant—in the acts of a versatile and nimble colleague. We say here and now that the Conservative Party in the House of Commons ought to be no parties to voting a single item in supply until they are well assured that votes for the public service will not be used in its disservice, and to the grave jeopardy of National and Imperial policy.

One last recommendation to Mr. Asquith: and it is this:

"But Esau's hands suit ill with Jacob's voice."

The Prime Minister's honour and reputation are at stake. Let him honestly state his views, and in language similar—but not identical—with that used by Lord Milner on a well-remembered occasion, endure the consequences.

CECIL COWPER.

"Loches"

IT was a day of mid-September when I came to Loches, but autumn was masquerading as summer and there were few signs to remind one that the time was not full July: only the faint browning of leaves and the sight of September flowers in the gardens.

The little town was quiet and almost deserted, wearing a contented look: a cluster of houses rising from the back of the Indre and dominated by the great rough donjon of the château. To a newcomer this vast building shows grim and aggressive, but apparently those who live in its shadow consider the thing of small account, and are perfectly unconscious of its history: of the fact that half the royal celebrities of France sojourned here, that it was the cradle of the Plantagenet kings, that countless stories, grim and enthralling, cling around its stones. Indeed, it struck me that the inhabitants of Loches only remark the romance of the past and the tranquil beauty of the present when they see eager tourists in the streets; and so the town had a somewhat superficial air, in spite of its charm. It is frightfully old, yet one does not feel its age—a feminine town! . . .

Being a stranger, the château was the chief object of my pilgrimage; so, lunch done with, I set out to climb the steep approach to a gateway in the still solid walls of the castle. Within are several little streets of closely-huddled houses, for the town, quite untimorous, has approached the donjon and spread itself within the old enceinte.

Presently I turned to the left, passed through another gate—very narrow and for the moment blocked by a cavalry officer writing picture-postcards and using the wall as an escritoire—bought a ticket, and found myself in the terraced garden of the Château Royal—that is to say, the newer portion of the castle. The garden's principal lion is a splendid horse-chestnut tree, planted, tradition says, by Francis I; but I found other attractions: above all, a great bed of salvias—the intensest scarlet rising from pale leaves. A few steps, and I was on the edge of the terrace, looking on a jumble of old roofs slanting down the hillside to the slow-flowing river. Beside me stood a nun with a stout friend. The nun wore a coif of starched linen, folded fantastically as occasionally serviettes are folded on a dinner-table. The wind made the stiff linen crackle like thumbed parchment.

Then the gardien appeared, and we were led to a little circular room at the base of a tower and shown the tomb of Agnes Sorrel—brought here a hundred years ago from the Church of Saint Ours. At the head of the recumbent statue, on either side of the lady's neatly folded hands, kneels a diminutive angel; at the foot are two lambs, their fleeces curled as if they had just come from the barber's—exquisitely curled. Set close together, these elegant animals—really no other adjective fits them—face you with tilted heads, smirking absurdly. The writer of Agnes Sorrel's epitaph certainly was not sparing in praise, and I wondered what the placid nun thought of it, and hoped that she did not contrast these adulatory words with those which will be written over her grave. I also hoped that she did not question which merited praise the more, she or the woman whose effigy lay between the midget angels. Perhaps, however, I questioned needlessly. No doubt she believed in the divine right of kings, and, at that moment, particularly in the divine right of Charles VII.

The Château Royal is now a sous-préfecture, a fact which made me realise that the life of a sous-préfet has compensations hitherto undreamt of. I cannot, however, say in what manner the gentleman lives—probably none too luxuriously, in spite of his residence—for one is only shown the tomb, with its alluring lambs, and the oratory of Anne of Brittany—undoubtedly an oratory of the most delightful description. It is quite small, a mere cell, in fact, but the walls are decorated very charmingly with the devices of the ermine and the festooned rope; there is also a little altar set in a recess, finely arched and carved. I suppose that in the days of Anne (the lady who was twice a queen) there was colour here, colour of lamps and altar-cloths, gleams of gold and silver, colour, again, in the window. Now all is whitewashed, and the effect is one of an attractive, but quite unregal, simplicity.

At the door of the Château Royal the gardien took our tickets, tore them slightly, and handed them back with the suggestion that they should be kept as souvenirs. The nun and her friend appeared to welcome the idea, so I, too, put the flimsy bit of paper in my pocket. . . . I am ignorant as to what happened to the nun after this, for I did not go direct to the dungeons, but stayed at the ancient church which is called the Collégiale Saint Ours.

I should write rather of the church's curious architecture, of its nave—a sort of double cube—roofed with stone pyramids, which have an odd appearance both inside and out. This is certainly interesting, but it was the porch which attracted me most, on account of the truly delectable grotesques of its decoration, of which I remember clearly some amiable rabbits, a two-bodied lion, a mermaid, and an acrobat. I came away with the feeling that it must have been very entertaining to be a sculptor of grotesques, especially if one had the knack of caricature, and thus could set the faces of enemies, absurdly bodied, for ever on a church porch.

Following an alley of clipped lime-trees, mounting some steps and ringing a bell with no uncertain touch (sonnez fort is the injunction), one enters the precincts of the donjon. Immediately within the door is a sort of garden-yard, where the wife of the custodian informed me that a party of inspection had just started. She pointed whither they might be found, and soon I was among them—quite a large party, all French, voluble and intensely curious. The guide was middle-aged, dark, alert, dressed in a blue uniform. I discovered later that he is the jailer of Loches, that the donjon is the jail, and that casual prisoners are lodged in the ancient torture-chamber.

With this gentleman leading the way, we descended many turning and twisting flights of steps. We came first to the room where the unhappy Lodovico Sforza was imprisoned during nine years, spending his time in drawing intricate designs on the walls. He died, they say, on the day of his release, so great was his joy in regaining liberty.

Here, and during the remainder of our itinerary through the dungeons, the custodian rose supreme. I do not know if it is by reason of his dealings with modern malefactors that he has become imbued with a sympathy for ancient ones, but he appeared to speak with feeling and certainly with a sense of the dramatic—somewhat exaggerated, it is true. His voice became low and husky, his hands expressive with their quick movements, as he showed us oubliettes, iron-studded doors, niches where men had lain, chained heavily, and dark pits where skeletons had been discovered. The tourists gaped and shivered as the jailer, with the declamatory air of an actor of the Comédie Française reciting Racine, jingled his keys, slammed the enormous doors, told us tales of woe and torture, of nameless prisoners and executioners, and, finally, of Foulques Nerra, builder of the great donjon, who, because his wife gave him no heir, caused her to be burnt, and then, overcome by the thought of what he had done—there is almost a sense of anti-climax here—set off on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem.

After the horrors and histrionics of the dungeons, the room where once men had hung in cages, just like tame birds, did not thrill. Then I realised that I had been using the jailer's imagination, and not my own, so I endeavoured to picture Cardinal La Balue, himself the inventor of these ingenious prisons, pendent from the ceiling, while old Louis XI, having come from the Château Royal by a secret passage, mocked and jibed at the unhappy prelate. But my mental reconstruction was unconvincing, so I climbed up to the roof of a tower, whence I had a view even wider and more aerial than that from the salvia-decked terrace. The great donjon faced me, stern, rugged and defiant; leftwards stood the enviable Sous-Préfecture and the pyramids of Saint Ours; below was the alley of clipped lime-trees and the jailer's garden: things which I knew quite well, but now all set in different perspective. I could see, too, right across the green valley, cooled by the Indre, to the towers of Beaulieu rising from trees; and farther still there were vineyards, and fields and wooded hills. The sky was unstained blue; everything was sharply cut in the clean atmosphere, the colours clear, the sunlight all radiance, the shadows by contrast doubly deep. Up there it was very easy to forget tales of ugliness and torture; one could understand Loches' air of heedlessness. . . .

Walking downward from the Château one treads streets full of character, which boast many sculptured doorways and windows, and a Renaissance façade or two, not to be passed without inspection; while in the Church of Saint Antoine is a noteworthy tryptich painted by a follower of the great Jehan Fouquet.

The square, not far from the station, where I sat under the plane-trees, awaiting my train, is presided over by a statue of Alfred de Vigny—for Loches is his birth-place. He stands on a heavy pedestal, a cloak drooping over his right shoulder, his profile austere and yet a trifle quizzing, as if he were wondering why he is there. Personally, I was more interested in a temporary affair, the Théâtre Verval. It was oblong, barn-shaped, with wooden walls and a canvas roof. The doors were red, with, on either side, large squares of canvas, painted with scarlet balustrades on a blue ground. The programme of the evening announced "L'Arlésienne" to be given with the "concours de la musique municipale." I regretted sincerely that I could not stay for the performance. I had, however, a glimpse of the actors.

At one end of the theatre, presumably near the stage-door, was a travelling caravan of bright brown wood, with white curtains fluttering at the windows. This, obviously, was the house of the actor-manager, and there he was himself, admonishing with a fat forefinger a fox-terrier which sat in the entrance of the van. He was a thick-set, middle-aged man, coatless now, with khaki trousers on his legs and canvas shoes on his feet; his eyes looked intelligent; his hair, sleeky black, was brushed forward so that two dark eaves stood out on each side above his ears. He, I imagined, would be Frédéric, while a woman seated at a table, working a sewing-machine—could she be Vivette? I was afraid so.

Near her were other members of the company. They also were dressed in khaki suits, with tight, close-buttoned coats, and all wore white canvas shoes. They knelt on the ground, hammering fresh green reeds—plucked recklessly from the banks of the Indre—to wooden planks. These, without doubt, were destined for the scenery of Act II: "Un étang en Camargue."

Presently a waiter, from the neighbouring café wandered across the square in his alpaca coat and white apron. He surveyed the industrious actors with tremendous interest. Perhaps he regretted that his life was not one of histrionic vagabondage. . . . Then a troop of cows came past, the first a splendid beast, the colour of coffee, well creamed. There was, too, a black goat, and a dog equally black, who, with a small boy, urged on the slow-moving animals.

The sun slanted downwards behind the silent houses, the plane-trees rustled in the evening wind. It was time to go stationwards. . . .

I was immensely sorry to miss the performance of "L'Arlésienne," for I knew that it would be intense and dramatic, that the audience would be enraptured, that the Musique Municipale would do its best. I hoped profoundly that the Théâtre Verval would play to a record house, and that the "Cinema Gaumont"—just round the corner but in view of Alfred de Vigny on his pedestal—would click away to empty benches.

GUY RAWLENCE.

REVIEWS

Northern Cities and Customs

Capitals of the Northlands: Tales of Ten Cities. By IAN C. HANNAH, M.A. Illustrated by EDITH BRAND HANNAH. (Heath, Cranton and Ouseley. 6s. net.)

THIS, on the whole, is an excellent work, and will be of great service to tourists visiting the capitals of Northern Europe, among which are included such out-of-the-way places as Thorshaven, in the Faroe Isles, and Reykjavik, in Iceland.

The frequent use of William Morris's original and uncouth language is much to be deplored; as it is neither good English nor good Norse, and certainly mars the beauty of the original sagas. If it is necessary to employ old-fashioned English in rendering the original into our tongue, why not use one of our Northumbrian dialects, which are nearer to the original Norse, and easily understood by the majority of Englishmen? The spelling of Norse names is also unusual. Olaf Tryggvason, the great Norwegian King, is called "Olaf Trygvison," Ganger Rolf or Rolf the Ganger, as he is known in Northumbria, is called Rolf the Wendfoot. Ketyl or Ketil, a very common Norse name in Yorkshire, is spelt Cetil. But many of these faults originate in the old translations of the Sagas which the author has used so generously to enrich his work. Anyone who knows both the Scandinavian and English tongues must be aware of the fact that these beautiful sagas can be rendered much better than they are in the numerous quotations cited in this interesting work, which in the next edition it is to be hoped will be freed from these blemishes.

Gakstad, where an entire Viking ship was found, should be Gokstad (see du Challus' "Viking Age"); "Svein Tweibeard" should be "Sven Tvo skägg," or in English "Sven Fork-Beard" (see Longfellow's "Saga of King Olaf"). "Long-Worm" should be in Norse "Ormen Lange," and in English "Long Serpent"; for in this sense King Olaf's dragon ship means a serpent and not a worm, just as Great Orme's Head in Wales means "Great Serpent's Head" and not "Great Worm's Head." As an example of the quaint English this author indulges in, we may give the following sentence: "The Earl wrought many ways to make him gleesom, but the King was short and few spoken!"

A great number of these quotations certainly do not improve the book, but perhaps it would be more just to blame the translator of the sagas and not the author who makes use of them. It is a pity that the Icelandic sagas, which are the most free from bias of any history in the world, and which contain some of the most vigorous poetry ever written, could not be done more justice to than they are here.

Referring to King Valdemar's invasion, the author erroneously states: "He set his face towards Wisby, and the citizens came out and surrendered; for they saw that resistance was impossible. Instead of defying the robber behind their strengthened walls, they abjectly permitted a breach to be torn when he refused to enter the gate." This statement is misleading, and an unintentional injustice to the brave citizens of Wisby, who rashly marched out of the city and fought the Danish army as bravely as their ancestors fought the Swedes. But they were less fortunate; for 3,000 of the burghers fell before the city walls, and were buried where they fell; the beautiful Waldemar cross was erected to their memory. The present writer visited that cross last summer and inspected the battle ground in company with the British Consul of Wisby. A few years ago the enormous grave was opened, and a strange sight met the gaze of the astonished workmen—several hundred skeletons, hacked and broken by the huge swords and battle-axes of that period. Some of the skeletons were still covered with the remains of the armour they wore on that fatal day, when Wisby fell from her high position as head of the Hanseatic League, while in the helmets were the skulls of the brave soldiers who fought and fell on that spot, where many other relics of the slaughter have been discovered.

Waldemar did break down the city wall; but not before the flower of its garrison had fallen in the defence of their famous city. Over the remains of the Goths is still to be seen a Gothic cross with the following inscription: "Anno Domini MCCCLXI feria tertia post jacobī ante portag Wisby in manibus Danorum cecederunt gutenses, hic sepulti, orate pro eis," which rendered into English is: A.D. 1361, 27th July, fell before the gates of Wisby into the hands of the Danes. Here are buried. Pray for them!"

The chapter on Upsala, the seat of probably the oldest Parliament in Europe, is extremely interesting; for in this ninth-century Parliament, which was composed of "Bonder" (yeomen) Earls and freemen, the Bonder spoke to the King almost on terms of equality and bade him do their behests—i.e., make peace or war as they desired. This same spirit is still seen in the 30,000 farmers of Sweden, who recently marched to Stockholm and offered the King their support, if he would promise to take every step to protect their country from invasion. The author truly observes of this class of men, which often has saved Sweden from destruction: "They are no servile breed, these yeomen, who crushed the army of the Empire in the Thirty Years' War." The author evidently understands the spirit of the yeomen of Sweden, who are to this day permeated with a feeling of intense independence, a pride of worth and of class even greater than that of the aristocracy. But with all this independence they are intensely loyal to their king and love their native country; for which they are, as of old, willing to sacrifice their wealth and their lives. The account of the Riddarholm's Church, in Stockholm, is very vivid, but not exactly accurate. The hundreds of banners, standards taken from the Russians, Austrians, Poles, Saxons, and other nations are no longer preserved in this church, but in one of the great museums to which they were removed about two years ago.

Mr. Hannah corrects the prevalent error that the Swedes and Danes are the greatest drinkers in Europe, and shows how, thanks to temperance reform and the excellent Gothenburg system, these nations are rapidly becoming as abstemious as the Latin races.

The description of Stockholm, though necessarily brief, is one of the finest in the book. The writer is wrong when he states that nothing of medieval Stockholm remains. Although the very oldest houses, dating from the thirteenth and fourteenth century, have disappeared, there are a great many to be seen dating from the fifteenth, the sixteenth, and the eighteenth centuries in "Stockholm between the bridges," as this ancient quarter is called.* A good idea of the beauty of this picturesque city can be obtained from reading this work, which will be quite a boon to all who intend making a tour in Northern Europe during the coming summer, now that Sweden and Denmark are becoming new fields for the better class of tourists.

It is evidently impossible to do full justice to so many capitals in such a small volume. Despite its handy dimensions, it is obviously the product of much travel, labour, and patient research. Its value in the eyes of the book collector is much enhanced by the numerous exquisite little etchings of Northern scenes, the work of Mrs. Edith Brand Hannah, the author's wife and valuable helpmate. The chapters on Copenhagen and Christiania are also excellent, and written with enthusiasm and keen sympathy. The skilful etchings of the grand old ruined churches of Wisby are particularly fine and worthy of notice.

The account of Petersburg is very brief—too brief to give one a correct idea of the peculiar life of this international city, which, as the Russians say, "is neither fish nor fowl," neither German nor Russian. Like its founder, it is a strange mixture of East and West, and cannot with justice be called a typical Russian city. Concerning Peter the Great, we may say, in the words of the author: "One's astonishment that he achieved so much is yet further increased when it is realised that his life was devoted very largely to frivolity and amusement." Of no individual that ever lived can it be said that he consciously and deliberately influenced the history of the world to the same extent as the high-thinking, hard-working, hard-drinking founder of St. Petersburg. With this illuminating summary of the Great Tsar we will leave this volume, hoping that it will be brought out in a second edition, but in a binding more worthy of its contents, even if at a trifling higher charge to the purchaser.

WM. BARNES STEVENI.

* There are a great many old houses in the Oster and Wester Long Gatans of old Stockholm, and in the great square, the scene of the massacre of the Nobles by King Christian of Denmark. One of the oldest is "Hotel Frieden," built over the crypts of the Dominican monastery erected by King Magnus Erickson in 1335.

West Country Names

Place-Names of Gloucestershire. By W. ST. CLAIR BADDELEY. (John Bellows, Gloucester. 5s. net.)

THE investigation of topography is a most interesting branch of historical inquiry. The names of our towns and villages, and of the physical features of our country all had at one time a significant meaning of their own. The first process, which involves the greater difficulty, is to discover the ancient orthography. The second, which is comparatively easy, is to determine the meaning of the original form. In the growth of language there are definite laws of sound change, but these are sometimes interfered with by external and other influences. Hence the topographical student has to exercise a careful and patient discrimination, lest he may arrive at too hasty a conclusion.

Although the majority of the names shown on our Ordnance maps are of English origin, there are many other elements—Celtic, Latin, and Scandinavian—while a few belong to a pre-Celtic language. Thus ethnology may be traced in the etymology of place-names, and in the very limited vocabulary of the peasants, who have preserved words which are the common inheritance of the whole of the Indo-European nations.

The place-names of a country have been well described "as a sort of material lexicon of a tongue that has ceased to be vernacular." Sometimes those names record the struggles of a nation—war and conquest, or the competition of commerce. At others they tell of geological changes, about which history is silent. And yet again we find the story or mythology of worn-out pagan creeds, or the triumph of Christianity. Thus the vicissitudes of our race are embedded in the nomenclature of our county. Every contribution to the study of place-names is welcome, and especially one which, like the handbook before us, is the work of a well-known archaeological scholar. It is well arranged and beautifully printed. The names are given in alphabetical order, each being printed in thick black type. The explanations are clear and simply stated. Wherever possible, the root-words are given, together with the earliest-known variants, and references to original sources, as the Cartularies, Patent and Pipe Rolls, Domesday Survey, Registers, Muniments, Inquisitions, and other MSS. There is a most useful appendix of personal and family names, occurring in Gloucestershire topography, which so often puzzle investigators. There are also lists of prefixes and suffixes. Many place-names have disappeared since Norman days. But in his learned introduction Mr. Baddeley points out that these are of almost equal importance with those which have remained, and that, therefore, they are included in his collection.

The Right Hon. G. W. E. Russell has written a foreword to Mrs. Beaney's new book, "Poor Mrs. Egerton," which Messrs. Heath, Cranton, and Ouseley will publish in April.

The Russian Advance in Mongolia

With the Russians in Mongolia. By H. G. C. PERRY-AYSCOUGH, M.A., and CAPTAIN R. B. OTTER-BARRY. Illustrated. (John Lane. 16s. net.)

IN view of the sweeping changes that have taken place in the constitution of Mongolia since the overthrow of the Manchu dynasty, the usefulness of such a work as that which we have here presented is manifest. For the first time we are given access to a lucid narrative of events undeniably of international importance, and in regard to which the world has hitherto had no knowledge, save that to be found in the inadequate sources of the public press. Sooner or later a standard work on Mongolia must be forthcoming. Historically, ethnologically, and politically the region is one of profound interest. The authors of the volume that is before us are modest in their claims, and for the most part have contented themselves with setting down in diary form their experiences along tracks that may be described as beaten, but which are the least frequented of the various routes stretching from Peking across the great Gobi Desert to the borders of Siberia. Until, however, a more comprehensive work makes its appearance, the record under review must hold the field. In that sense, therefore, it is indispensable to all who are interested in the new Far Eastern situation, and would, moreover, be a valuable acquisition to the library of any student of international affairs.

So obsessed has the world been of late with the grave complications arising out of the Balkan situation that events in the Far East, which otherwise would have excited considerable attention, have almost passed unnoticed. Russian diplomacy, ever watchful to seize an opportunity in any part of the world, did not share in this foreshortening of political perspective. Pursuing a policy of peaceful penetration, with an imposing array of force in the background, Russia has to-day acquired a complete mastery of that vast and fertile territory known as Outer Mongolia. The lamentable mistakes that led to a temporary check in Manchuria have not been repeated. The method of absorption, rather than that of frank military occupation, describes the process now actively at work. Although the authors suggest that the time has arrived when the status of Mongolia should form the subject of discussion among the Powers, they do not fail in their illuminating pages to produce abundant evidence of Russia's right to a privileged position. Clearly the intention of the Tsar's Government is to create a buffer State between the Empire and the Republic of China, while keeping at the same time a watching eye upon the activities of the Japanese towards the East. The wisdom and foresight of such policy is self-evident. For, in spite of reverses in the past, the military potentiality of the middle kingdom, with its vast resources of manhood, sturdy and brave, cannot be questioned. Moreover, Russia has her experience of the Japanese to guide her, a race whose strength she underestimated, paying dearly for the grievous error. Viewing the situation altogether from another light, there are very serious reasons why we should be careful not to stimulate an international wrangle over Mongolia. It is now freely admitted that the world did not gain by the Russian repulse and the Japanese assertion in Manchuria. A momentary glance at the map will show that geographically the vast Russian Empire is so placed as to be the natural bulwark of the West against the East. It was Russia, now the protector of the miserable remnant of the great Mongol race, who centuries ago stemmed the Mongol tide in its majestic sweep westwards; and to that historical circumstance we owe not a little of the progress and enlightenment of which we so proudly boast in these islands to-day. Other European Powers are not so situated that they can join Russia in her task; and were they to seek what is commonly known as compensations, then, for the sake of the greed of the moment, they would play false to the civilisation to which they belong and to posterity whose interests are in their keeping.

The Mongols among whom Russia has now firmly and finally established her influence are, as we have said, but a remnant, a mere relic of the heroic hordes that under Jenghis Khan and Kublai Khan founded the greatest Empire that this world has ever seen. Half a million souls are scattered throughout a territory large enough to hold a nation and containing illimitable resources—wide pastures, immense horse and cattle herds, and varieties of rich minerals, principally gold which is believed to exist here to an extent that has no parallel in any other part of the globe. Tribal strife led to their seeking the protection of Peking, and the protection of Peking, as might only have been expected, proved none too beneficent. The influence of Lamaism imported from Tibet completed the ruin of these hapless people. To-day they are described as being so simple as to be at the mercy of any itinerant trader. They still practise archery as a means of defence; but, in spite of their antiquated ways, they are bold and brave, and, being splendid horsemen, literally more accustomed to ride than to walk, they will doubtless one day supply Russia with a fine body of border cavalry. That they have been able at this late stage in their long history to throw off the Chinese yoke would seem to suggest that there is still within them some of that proud spirit which led their remote ancestors in the dim past to conquer nearly half the world. The presence of Chinese colonists and of Chinese military forces aroused their resentment. The revolution against the Manchu dynasty gave them their opportunity, and with little ceremony and some barbarity they bundled out from their midst the representatives of their overlords. Without protection of some kind, however, they could not hope to survive, and naturally they turned towards their Northern neighbour, with whom they found common cause. Russia also was apprehensive because of the presence of Chinese colonists and military forces in Outer Mongolia and within close proximity to Siberia.

It may be that the Mongols have fallen out of the frying-pan into the fire; time alone can decide their fate. From a diplomatic point of view, their present status appears to be somewhat anomalous. Russia, desirous of maintaining peace with China and of standing well with the world, recently recognised that Outer Mongolia was part of the Chinese dominions; but at the same time she induced the Peking Government to accept the autonomy of the region, and stipulated for the mediation of herself in all questions that might arise. Whatever interpretation may be put upon this delightfully ambiguous instrument, the fact remains that Russia is to-day supreme in Outer Mongolia. In all important centres her consular agents are located; everywhere her traders are to be seen; grants from her Treasury are supporting the Principality; her capitalists are eagerly seeking and are securing concessions; while troops of Cossacks are stationed at convenient points, Russian officers are training Mongol horsemen, and in the Trans-Baikalian background, ready for all emergency, stands an army in waiting of some hundred and fifty thousand men.

So far, and we have it on the authority of the keenly observant authors of this book, Russian rule is essentially beneficent. There is no proselytising, no attempt at hustling the East into the mannerisms of the West. Nor are there any grounds for complaint on the score of exclusiveness. Everywhere Russian officials gave a hospitable reception to the English travellers, who, as a result of all that they saw and heard expressed the opinion that foreign capitalists and traders, irrespective of nationality, will be welcome. In other words the Open Door exists in practice in Mongolia; and when we reflect that the average trader in the region looks upon twenty per cent. profit as a small margin, we may realise the valuable reward that awaits enterprise and initiative. It is for Englishmen who claim that they are unsurpassed for these hardy qualities to make the most of the opportunities that await them. For the way, though situated in a far-off land, is open and alluring to those who will dare. L. L.

Tragedy, Tittle-tattle, and a Throne

The Life of the Emperor Francis Joseph. By FRANCIS GRIBBLE. (Eveleigh Nash. 16s. net.)

CERTAIN writers in these days seem to have made the chronique scandaleuse their métier. They specialise in the unsavoury, and devote to the raking up of tit-bits of intrigue and gossip the energies which in the true philosopher and historian would be devoted to research concerning the larger affairs of mankind. Mr. Francis Gribble is an artist in this sort of literary fare. He handles his matter in a way which will tickle the vitiated palate of some, whilst it will induce others to accept him as a credible witness. Not for him did Sheridan say:—

Trust not to each accusing tongue
As most weak persons do,
But still believe that story false
Which ought not to be true.

He rejects the suggestion that tittle-tattle is tittle-tattle and history is history and that the twain can never meet, and carefully examines every line of gossip about the Habsburgs in quest of—truth! How does he know which item is slander and which points to fact? His theory is that, when a story or variant of a story is told sufficiently often, it indicates where the truth is to be found. In the case of the Habsburgs, as in that of any other House, "a stray story of a romantic or scandalous character might properly be ignored as appertaining to the domain of idle gossip; but when stories of that kind meet us at every turn—and meet us with increasing frequency as time proceeds—we are no longer entitled to discuss them with superior indifference. They are significant; the key to the situation is to be found in them." In other words, when tittle-tattle comes not in samples but in bulk, it ceases to be tittle-tattle and "attains the dignity of history." That, at least, is Mr. Gribble's excuse for treating the cumulative evidence of gossip as a legitimate and proper ground-work of history. A lie has only to be started on its rounds, gathering new qualities as it proceeds, and varying in its elements but not its character as it passes from lip to lip or pen to pen, and there you have assurance made double sure that it embodies veracity!

Never since casuistry first made philosophy its hand-maiden have we heard a plea more specious. Mr. Gribble's aim, of course, is truth; but whether it was necessary, even assuming the truth, to serve up afresh the amazing collection of scandals and tragedies associated with the House of Habsburg in the last twenty or thirty years is a question as to which good taste can only provide one answer. The Emperor Francis Joseph in his long reign has had more than his share of sorrows; if his life has not been more saintly than the lives of some of his critics, he has been tried as few of them can have been tried. In his early days on the throne a dreadful curse was pronounced on him and his family by a Hungarian mother maddened by the execution of a son whom it was not in the young Emperor's power to save, and that curse has been almost literally fulfilled. Was it incumbent in the public interests that such a book as this, with every item of tragedy, shame, humiliation, carefully marshalled, should be compiled and published in the last years of the aged monarch's life? Mr. Gribble seems to regard himself partly as political philosopher, partly as scientific investigator, and in that joint capacity to have accepted a challenge—a purely fanciful challenge—to dissect the history of the whole Habsburg family in the present reign. It is a self-constituted task discharged with ruthless disregard of the pain it may give or the mischief it may cause.

This is deeply to be regretted, because Mr. Gribble writes admirably, his industry is great, and he might have given us a powerful work which would have served a valuable purpose without pandering unduly to the morbid craving for sensation and unsavoury detail. As it is, horrors accumulate on horrors' head, and the Emperor is the central figure of a very orgie of murder, madness, and lust. The book is not so much a biography, political and domestic, as an examination into the shocking results, mental and moral, which may follow from a too close inbreeding of the human species. The Habsburgs, more perhaps than any other Royal House, have been determined at all hazards to keep their stock unpolluted by the blood of less exalted mortals, and the consequences are written in terms of ever-growing tragedy. Bismarck declared all the Austrian Archdukes mad, and, though that was far from a nice or precise statement of fact, the strain which intermarriage has put upon the family is obvious. But all the ghastly events which have darkened the life story of the Emperor Francis Joseph were not the outcome of heredity and intermarriage.

The murder of the Empress Elizabeth could not have been avoided by the utmost concession to the demands of eugenics. Nor is an Archduke necessarily a lunatic because he chooses to break the bonds imposed by Royal descent. Love laughs at locksmiths, and Austrian Archdukes, like lesser men, find their master in Cupid. Their choice has not always been unwholesome, and the best instance is provided by the officially-proclaimed "morganatic" marriage of the heir to the Imperial Crown, Francis Ferdinand, as Mr. Gribble himself shows. Mr. Gribble has no page in his book so pleasant as that in which he respectfully salutes the Archduke as one who in his loyalty to and love for the Duchess of Hohenberg "has fought a good fight and not been content with half-successes. His wife is a clever woman who knows how to bide her time and does not go out of her way to make unnecessary enemies. . . . The blow which he has struck at the Habsburg system is the hardest blow which that system has yet sustained, because he has struck it with dignity and self-restraint, gratifying the instinctive Habsburg craving for the infusion of fresh blood without provoking any of those scandals which give the enemy occasion to blaspheme." The marriage will be of happy augury for the House of Habsburg if the morganatic pronouncement is not held for ever binding. The future Emperor will assuredly not be content to regard it so, and the appeal to reason and common sense may yet involve a struggle with those who would buttress hereditary rights with costly superstition. Francis Joseph would spare his house and his country that new trouble if he would see the justice of placing the Duchess on a footing of equality with her husband now and henceforth. It would round off a life which has been great, whatever the shortcomings and the domestic tragedies that have marked it, with a touch of poetry, humanity and romance not given to all mortals to bestow.

A book entitled "The Problem of the Continuation School and its Successful Solution in Germany: A Consecutive Policy," by R. H. Best and C. K. Ogden, B.A., is in the press with Messrs. P. S. King and Son. It has fourteen full-page plates, and will be issued at 1s. net.

Shorter Reviews

Noted Murder Mysteries. By PHILIP CURTIN. With a Frontispiece. (Simpkin and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

MORBID-MINDED people may find entertainment in the perusal of this volume. To our mind, which we trust is a normal one, it has no raison d'être. The cases dealt with in it, in the way Mr. Curtin relates them, are valueless to the law-student, and throw no new light on these so-called mysteries. Scores of books have been published from time to time about these notorious cases, and are accessible to any one who, for one reason or another, takes an interest in such subjects. In their laudatory preliminary notice the publishers, knowing no better, ingenuously state that the Bravo Case, "it is believed, has never before been chronicled." Like the Tichborne Claimant, they may "be surprised to hear" that a most full account of this mysterious affair was published at the time of the event, illustrated by, among others, the late George Cruikshank, jun. Why should the "not proven" trial of Madeleine Smith be revived at this time of day. She was acquitted of the charge, and Mr. Curtin himself speaks of her as "an exceptionally beloved wife and mother." We fail to see, under the circumstances, why her case should be included in a work dealing with murder mysteries. It has never been proved that Angelier was murdered at all, and the judge's summing-up intimated that the death might have been caused through suicide. There was little mystery, if any at all, about the case of La Pommerais. He was an artful and clumsy poisoner, and his guilt was incontrovertibly brought home to him, with the result that he suffered a disgraceful death on the guillotine. Such books as this one, which can do no good, but which may do an immensity of harm in the hands of the budding criminal and the degenerate, should be at once relegated to the Index Expurgatorius—but should it find admittance to the library of the "Devil's Own," it will be "weighed and found wanting."

Everyone wants the BEST

in Everything, so why not have the
BEST LIFE POLICY
by effecting one with

The Legal and General Life Assurance
Society,

10 FLEET ST., LONDON, E.C.

Bonus for over 20 years . 38/- per cent. compound.

The Acharnians of Aristophanes. With a Translation into English Verse by ROBERT YELVERTON TYRRELL, M.A. (Humphrey Milford. 1s. net.)

It needed the genius of a Tyrrell to make palatable to modern tastes the highly seasoned fare of the Acharnians. It has ever been a puzzle to us to conceive the intellectual atmosphere of those who profess to find in the topical allusions of Aristophanes a source of enjoyment comparable with that afforded by modern works. Professor Tyrrell was faced by the insuperable difficulty of every conscientious translator who is called upon to choose between a faithful rendering which is ipso facto pointless in modern ears, and an adaptation to the requirements of hearers who, with extremely few exceptions, must be assumed to be ignorant of more than the bare outlines of ancient Grecian history. The result in the present instance is that, however funny it may be to us to hear a Bœotian speaking what passes on the stage for Irish, it can hardly be said that Aristophanes is the author of our merriment. We wonder if the respectable Athenian of 425 B.C. rocked with uncontrollable laughter every time the Bœotian said "Thabes" instead of "Thebes."

Abu'l Ala, the Syrian. (Wisdom of the East Series.) By H. BAERLEIN. (John Murray. 2s. net.)

THIS poet and philosopher, native of a Syrian village south of Aleppo, lived between 973 A.D. and 1058, the year of the plague. He travelled to Baghdad and other chief cities. His meditations were profound; he was sure of one thing—that no single thing is sure. Pessimist, ascetic, to him virtue was the guiding star; a savant, he was held to be unrivalled, and taught poetry and letters to more than 200 students at once: he studied life, death, and destiny; the social, political, and religious problems. The specimens given of his poems display the Oriental style, something between Hafiz and Omar Khayyám, and will be appreciated by admirers of Eastern poetry. His Diwan (collection) has reached its fourth thousand. This is a worthy addition to the series.

The Church Quarterly has two articles of importance on present-day questions, one on the Separation of Church and State in France, the other on the now famous Kikuyu Conference, by the editor, Dr. Headlam. Those who incline to separation in England should study the position of religion in France, which is well explained by the French author of the first article. The following observation is most significant: "The grand mistake of the Law of Separation, drawn up by a Protestant, who no doubt was a fair-minded man, was that it treated religion as a simple affair of conscience that touches private life alone; whereas Catholicism is a social organism that needed to be treated as such." It is interesting to learn that the inevitable reaction against apostasy has set in. In the face of brigandage, juvenile crime, perverse immorality and ever-increasing suicide, "What is to be done?" was asked the other day by a journal which circulated among the grocers, the commercial travellers and the officials of the bureaucracy. 'Return to the Church' was the answer of most of the readers." On the Kikuyu question the editor writes with a charitable breadth of view and much sympathy with all parties, though we think that he is inclined to underestimate Modernism as a factor in the case. At the same time, he upholds the ancient Catholic principles of the Church, and cites the Bishop of Oxford's grave warning, "That the Anglican Communion would certainly be rent in twain on the day on which any non-episcopally-ordained minister was formally allowed within our Communion to celebrate the Eucharist."

There are several other articles of theological interest in this number, and some good reviews in the short notices of books. We are surprised, however, that the Church Quarterly should traverse Mr. Knox's dogmatic method in "Some Loose Stones"—that admirable reply to the disquieting theology of "Foundations." Historically and intellectually, dogmatic teaching has ever carried greater weight than nebulous uncertainty.

History of the Nations. Part II. (Hutchinson and Co. 7d. net.)

THE second number of this series carries on the history of Egypt, after which China receives attention from the pen of Professor H. A. Giles. Many illustrations are given, including those of prehistoric tree-dwellers and of Great Yü, who is said to have founded the first Chinese Empire in B.C. 2200. Naturally a great amount of legendary information is mixed with the history in the records and papers relating to this ancient kingdom, and in compiling his article Professor H. A. Giles has done well to make this understood. Probably when this exclusive country is not so difficult of access to foreigners more details may be forthcoming with regard to its history. We understand that the sales of the first issue of the "History of Nations" were very greatly in advance of those anticipated. The second number appears to be equal in every way to the one already on sale, so that if each part keeps up this standard the whole work will be one worth possessing.

The Annual Exhibition of the Royal Amateur Society (President, H.M. Queen Alexandra) will be held at Surrey House, Marble Arch, W., from March 22 to 25 inclusive, in aid of London charities. Intending exhibitors should communicate with the hon. sec., the Hon. Mrs. Mallet, 43, Cadogan Gardens, S.W. The loan collection will consist of engraved portraits by Thomas Frye, of Wedgwood ware, and of snuff-boxes of historical or intrinsic value. Those who own any of these, and are willing to lend them, should write to the Hon. Sybil Legh, Artillery Mansions, Victoria Street, Westminster.

Pot-Pourri Parisien. By E. BRYHAM PARSONS. Illustrated. (The Argus Printing Co. 6s. net.)

NOT long ago Mr. John Murray publicly notified his desire to learn the whereabouts of the author of a manuscript entitled "Pot-Pourri Parisien," which had been submitted to his firm and left in its possession for more than two years. As a result, the author, Mr. E. Bryham Parsons, reclaimed his work; and, having apparently developed in the interval that unfavourable opinion of publishers in general which now finds expression in a "postscript" to the volume, he made up his mind to present his recovered bantling to the public himself. This he has accordingly done; and if he does not succeed in convincing us that Mr. Murray has allowed a literary pearl of great price to slip through his fingers, enough recognisable merit is in the book to provide some measure of justification for the bold step which its "only begetter" has taken to ensure its deliverance from the limbo of unpublished manuscripts.

There are fragments of pleasant reading, and evidences of sympathetic observation, to be found in these scrappily impressionist sketches of certain aspects of the life—chiefly the artistic and Bohemian life—of contemporary Paris. Mr. Parsons has evidently enjoyed to the full his periods of residence in the City of Light, and his experiences as a student of the Ecole des Beaux Arts; and he has paid tribute to the outstanding factors of that enjoyment with a kind of jerky vivacity and with a fair amount of literary skill. It is a little unfortunate for him that similar ground has been so well trodden by other English writers with a greater capacity for reproducing in their pages the glow, the atmosphere, and the essential spirit of that Parisian world of which he treats. Comparisons, we know, are odious; but, for all that, it is hard to repress a wistful remembrance of the recent work of Mr. Julius M. Price, in face of Mr. Parsons' rather jejune and heavy-handed impressions of such a function, for instance, as the Bal de Quatz Arts. Perhaps the author of the "Pot-Pourri" is happiest, on the whole, in his character-sketches, some of which are very deftly executed. The illustrations, in colour and in black-and-white, with which he has embellished the volume, are, in the expressive American phrase, "nothing to write home about."

Old Magdalen Days, 1847-1877. By A FORMER CHORISTER. (B. H. Blackwell, Oxford. Paper, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d.)

OLD members of Magdalen College will appreciate this little collection of anecdotes concerning the college celebrities of a generation which has already almost passed away into oblivion. The humour of many of the stories is of that elementary character which is somewhat apt to lose its savour when segregated from the congenial atmosphere of an Oxford common-room. But given such suitable conditions, many a one of these bons mots should be retold and listened to with relish.

Fiction

The Great Attempt. By FREDK. ARTHUR. (John Murray. 6s. net.)

ANOTHER historical novel by the author of "The Mysterious Monsieur Dumont," full of incident and adventure, with a carefully worked-up background of the events leading up to and including the Highland raid of '45, makes excellent reading. The story begins with a thrilling account of a premature rising in Northumberland, the home of the hero's guardian, a Jacobite squire; then the scene shifts to the South of England, and shows how the peace and prosperity induced by the twenty years of Walpole's cautious and diplomatic Government had borne fruit in an apathetic indifference to the Stuart cause. James Radclyffe, under the influence of a mysterious priest-emissary of the Pretender, takes service with the Duke of Berwick in the war of the Polish Succession. Again the scene changes to Rome, where plans are being laid for the raising of the Stuart standard in Scotland; and, when the hour strikes, Radclyffe is sent to London to feel the pulse of the Jacobites in the capital. Finding no response, he joins Charles Edward at Derby, in time to take part in the retreat, and the final débâcle at Drumossie Muir. There is a mild love story winding through the book; and we were in hopes that Anne's loss of ballast on entering London society was intended to justify the transfer of the hero's affections to the passionate and devoted Margaret, who had saved his life at Philippsbourg; but in this we were disappointed.

The story has a purpose, which is to show that, when civil strife arises, each side believes that it has a strong case, and that, whereas the history of it all is always written by the victors, the result follows that the summing up is heavily against the defeated party. And the author in his preface pertinently asks: "Were a similar crisis to arise, in which camp should we find ourselves? Non-juror or Whig, Royalist or Opportunist, political martyr or successful time-server?"

Behind the Veil. By GEORGE R. SIMS. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

IF one took up any weekly newspaper of these days, and read the most interesting of the court cases therein detailed, the result would be about equivalent to reading one of these twelve short stories. Not that the matter of the stories is uninteresting, but the manner is that of a full report of some case in which a clever detective has brought all the details to light. The very title, "Who Killed Lady Lanyon?" has in it a suggestion of a sensational press, and the story justifies this, for it is an explanation of a murder in a Surrey wood, a parallel to an actual murder committed within the last few years. "The Doctor's Secret," "Black Bess," "Alec the Actor," are all stories of things that may or may not have happened, and as the whole collection is labelled "True Stories of London Life," we have no real cause for complaint.

There is cause, however, in the manner of telling these stories, for, no matter how closely fiction copies life, it should serve as a mirror rather than as a bald newspaperish report of things done or imagined as the case may be. There is no art, and there is very little use, in bare, unimaginative statements in the form of stories—the only justification for the composition lies in their power to attract and in the lessons they teach. Meredith's "dramatic presentment of an idea," as a definition of the novel, still holds good, and so far as we can see the only idea embodied in these sketches is to get as near as possible to the "story" method of the ha'penny press—to sacrifice everything to sensation, and leave the real art of story-telling out of the business of producing thrills. We regret to say of the work of such a craftsman as Mr. G. R. Sims that even the thrills are missing here, and that for company on a railway journey we would take a newspaper whose sensational items, however garbled, are or purport to be fact, in preference to this collection of fact pretending to be fiction, or fiction aiming at reality.

Gillespie. By J. MACDOUGALL HAY. (Constable and Co. 6s.)

IN that the story of a man's life, from birth to death, is detailed here, the author might claim to be allowed twice the length of an average novel, but of such interest is the story that no claim is necessary. The book is raw as the mists of the Scotch west coast, where its scenes are laid; there blow through it the roaring gales in which fisher-folk struggle, tainted, gales and people alike, with the reek of gutted herring—and, again, there is the breath of a summer evening laid across the page, for these are characters of sea and soil, hard men and strong women, whose beauty is in their strength and whose characters are determined by the rugged land and cruel sea from which they wrest sustenance.

There is a curse on the house of Strang, but Gillespie Strang, mean son of a noble father, neither fears curse nor courts blessing. He wins his way up by means of poaching and youthful meannesses until he is able, with Farmer Lonend—whose daughter Morag becomes Gillespie's wife—to foreclose on a mortgage and oust one Margaret Galbraith from the farmhouse in which her husband has lately died. By long credit and usury Gillespie gets the herring trade of Brieston, the fishing port in which the story is laid, into his hands, and in a famine-stricken summer he buys half the fishing fleet from the men who owned the boats, thus making them his workmen. Steady and sure is his rise, and his wealth is bought at the cost of women's tears and men's curses, but these are as nought to the man to whom God is a nonentity and right dealing an empty phrase. Morag, his wife, utterly neglected, turns dissolute and vicious; and his elder son, Iain, is drowned in the steamer which Gillespie sent to sea with insufficient coals in her bunkers—but Gillespie goes on undaunted, setting all his hopes on Eoghan, his younger son. Through Eoghan the awful end of one of the grimmest books penned in recent years is compassed. Full vengeance for an evil life is meted out to Gillespie Strang by merciless circumstance and bloodshed by the maniac mother's hand, and the end is fulfilment of the curse on the house of Strang.

We loathe Gillespie, yet read on, realising that, with the exception of Doctor Maclean and Kennedy, Eoghan's schoolmaster, there is not one prominent character to whom we can accord other than despite or pity. The ruthless strength of the work is its justification, and we extend a hearty welcome to this exceptionally powerful and vividly written book.

Seaborne of the Bonnet Shop. By R. K. WEEKES. (Herbert Jenkins. 6s.)

THERE is a certain class of fiction which could be well described as a pleasant half hour series. There are so many stories written that are of no particular merit, although at the same time they serve well to pass a short period of time during which no particular effort is required to rivet the attention. "Seaborne of the Bonnet Shop" is one of this class. Mr. Seaborne, his relations and his friends, are all very nice, amiable people, and the reader knows well enough that the hero is bound in time to fall in love with one of his assistants. It must be stated in passing, however, that this particular shop is run on model lines and is of such interest to its owner that he enters Parliament in order that he may further his ideas with regard to bonnet shops in general. There are some minor complications, but in the end they are straightened out and we leave Mr. Seaborne to establish a model home in the same manner as he established a model bonnet shop.

The Zoological Society of London, following the Example of the American Society, has passed a vote in sympathy with the Plumage Bill.

THE Libraries, Museums and Art Galleries Year Book 1914 is the Manual of Professional Practice. But it is more than this. It tells every Bookman; every educationist; every student where special collections of Books on his particular subject are to be found throughout the country, and how to borrow from them. It also tells him where Special Museum collections are to be found, although these cannot be borrowed.

It is a key to unlock the collected knowledge of the country.

Get the Book: get it somehow. You want it. Buy or borrow the Book: but do not beg for it, nor steal it.

470 p. crn. 8vo. 8/6 net.

Stanley Paul & Co., 31, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

Music

THE Philharmonic Society's Concert last week was one of those which it will be difficult to forget. Herr Mengelberg was the Conductor, and he had one of the finest bands of players to which we have ever had the pleasure of listening. Conductors are, in their way, soloists; they play on the largest and most complex instrument which exists, and, like pianists and singers, it may be supposed that they have their good and their less good days. Sometimes they will perform greater prodigies with a mediocre orchestra than with a first-rate one, inspiring the poor players with something of their own genius. Last week Herr Mengelberg was magnificent, there is no doubt about it, and, on the whole, his performance of Richard Strauss' "Heldenleben" was probably the finest that has been yet heard in London. The work had evidently been rehearsed with a quite special care, for effects of time and tone and phrasing were constantly being made in places where the composer had given no particular directions, and they were achieved with a certainty that could only have come after untiring practice. It was not one of those performances in which details are treated with such importance that, on looking back, the whole seems to have been made up of brilliant fragments, like pieces of quartz in a rock; the story of the Hero's life was told broadly and clearly, without any of that plucking at the listener's sleeve, that interrupting "Look, I am now going to tell you something very wonderful," which is the trick of an inferior artist.

Herr Mengelberg began by presenting to us a man with the stuff in him of which a real hero can be made, the strong, vigorous stuff; one thought of a General Botha and his swift ways of dealing with difficulties sterner than those which were set by the "Antagonists" for Strauss' Hero to conquer. But these antagonists are depicted by the composer with an uncanny skill. Surely we all know them, have suffered, perhaps, from them, these poisonous pin-prickers, these snarling detractors, these obstinate getters-in-our-way. The same skill is there in the painting of the Lady whose help is so vitally necessary to the Hero. Her charm, her caprice, her beauty, her tender faithfulness when her love has been given, we see it all and succumb, as the Hero did, to her. We were spared none of the horrors of the Battle; Herr Mengelberg piled up the agony with relentless hand. But now that we know the worst, having been through the horrid experience several times, we do not mind it as we did at first, when it really seemed but an ugly noise. Only a few years after the first performance, Mr. Ernest Newman could write that many people who "shied nervously" at "Heldenleben" now "took it as easily as a cat laps milk." It is very true. We do not need any longer to brace ourselves up as formerly at the moment when the three trumpeters are seen to disappear from their places in the orchestra. Rather do we feel a pleasurable excitement at the imminence of what Mr. Kalisch calls "the most strepitously scored page in musical literature." The "Works of Peace" section, with its innumerable quotations from Strauss' earlier poems remains the weak spot in a splendid composition, and it is with relief that we listen to the beautiful epilogue which rivals "Don Quixote" as one of the most truly inspired things which the genius of Strauss has given us. It seemed to make a very deep impression, and the audience showed clearly how it joined with the Conductor in the congratulations which he was seen to be giving to the band, and further to Mr. Sammons whose playing of the difficult violin solo had been remarkably spiritual. As an instance of the cleverness with which Herr Mengelberg got his men to play, we may mention that we distinctly heard, and for the first time, the famous passage where the violins and oboes ascend in sevenths. We have tried desperately to hear it before, but the oboes had played with a merciful softness. However, it is not so bad when you do hear it as you had feared. It looks on paper worse than it sounds.

After "Heldenleben" came the first performance of Sir Charles Stanford's new Irish Rhapsody. The composer was present but did not conduct his work. It is called "The Fisherman of Lough Neagh and what he saw." The vision was the triumph of heroism, and the use, to express it, of tunes found in the province of Ulster suggests that the Rhapsody was composed as Sir Charles' contribution to the solution of the Ulster problem. But with his politics we have nothing to do, and are not going to ask whether he offers himself as composer of military music to Mr. Redmond or to Sir Edward Carson. The three tunes which are woven into a rather lengthy piece with Sir Charles' usual skill of varied effect are exceedingly noble and beautiful, so that one could never listen to this Fourth Rhapsody without some delight. But we do not think it is quite as successful in treatment as were the first two Rhapsodies, and the secret of the application to the music of Tennyson's line "Dark and true and tender is the North" was not revealed to us. Mr. Leonard Borwick's playing of Schumann's Piano-forte Concerto was very interesting to hear, while Mr. Cortot's performance, a few days earlier, was fresh in the recollection. Mr. Borwick was not so brilliant in the last movement as the French pianist, but his quiet ease in the first was much more satisfactory, and, by taking the Intermezzo at its proper pace and playing it straightforwardly, he made it appear the beautiful movement that it is.

The London String Quartet has repeated Schönberg's Sextet for Strings, which was so much praised after their first performance of it in January. It is one of Schönberg's early compositions, opus 4, and it is in no sense prophetic of his later manner. The "Orchestral Pieces" scarify the ears of even those to whom the strangest discords of Strauss or Ravel are as dulcet harmony, and someone played three piano pieces of his a year or two ago which were unintelligible to the most practised critics. But the Sextet is full, almost too full, of sweetness, and has no hard passages to frighten the most sensitive ear.

At a first hearing it is undeniably a beautiful work. One is impressed by the consistently good writing for the six instruments. To compose a good quartet or sextet for strings is held to be the most difficult of musical tasks, so that the texture shall be neither too thin nor too closely knit. Mr. Schönberg's skill in this respect is very remarkable in a young composer. The material he employs is frequently reminiscent, especially of the more sentimental style of Richard Strauss, and sometimes of Wagner. But this does not very much matter, considering the good use which is made of the models. We are a little afraid that the sentimentalism of this music would presently make it wearisome. At first it attracts as the "Symphonie Pathétique" once did, and we should not be surprised if our string quartet parties were able to play it into a popularity like that which Sir Henry Wood and his band won for Tchaikovsky's famous Symphony. But it is a piece which we should not choose to hear too frequently, lest its very beauty became cloying. The little Haydn-like piece of Max Reger's which was played before the Sextet, a Serenade in three movements for Flute, Violin and Viola, though an evident imitation of the antique, has a greater freshness than the Sextet, and might prove the more lasting of the two, though on a scale of much less importance.

The Royal College of Music began its last Concert very well with César Franck's Symphony, which is always delightful to hear, though it is at present beyond the powers of the youthful performers at the College. A very pleasant recital has been given by that talented singer Mme. Mys-Gmeiner, who puts a heartiness into all she does that is quite infectious. But she could not make us believe in the worth of the four songs by Mahler, hard as she worked to do it.

Poetry and the Daily Press

IT was in the columns of THE ACADEMY that Richard Middleton discussed in one of his little essays the economic advantages of diverting the cost of a Dreadnought into a fund for State support of a score of poets. The flippancy with which Middleton tricked out his inspiration, while making his writings infinitely entertaining, weakened their effect upon the mind of the English middle-classes, who, while they neglect poetry and scorn its makers who happen to be their contemporaries, nevertheless regard a poet who appears to make light of his art with much the same condemnation as they regard a Christian who is irreverently reverent. The underlying irony was too subtle for their atrophied instincts to detect. To those who knew him and his ideals, Middleton's suggestion reads as the lightly bitter counsel of a despairing man; counsel which he knew to be futile and falling upon deaf ears, even while he spoke. Since he wrote that essay, Dreadnoughts have been superseded by super-Dreadnoughts, but poets remain unpensioned, and the pages of the morning papers are still barren of poetry. As customs are sacred, so are editors infallible, yet it seems to some of us that those who are responsible for the policy of modern morning journalism are mistaken in ruling poetry out of the province of that policy. Despite the materialism of the age, poets are still, as Shelley said, "the unacknowledged legislators of mankind," and the influence of poetry remains the most potent and permanent in the domain of human activity. It is they who interpret the spirit of the age, they who see through the telescope of inspiration the goal of incoherent tendencies, to them alone is given the power to explain and judge the inarticulate motives that stir mankind to energise far-reaching movements which are only dimly understood.

Poetry is the highest authentic literary voice of the soul of man, guiding and interpreting its passions and ideals. Why, then, is it denied utterance in the one universal organ of social communication and expression of to-day? The newspaper has justified and fulfilled Carlyle's prophecy, in "Sartor Resartus," in which he declared that the influence of the preachers was shifting from the pulpit to the Press. It is impossible to deny that the collective mind is moulded and directed by the newspapers to an extent more embracing than is possible to any other means of influence; and it is in view of this fact that it is urged that the mandarins of journalism are either misled or fail in understanding the immensity of the power they wield, in shutting their doors upon the poet. Dismissing as too spasmodic for serious consideration verse written for special occasions, the daily, as distinct from the evening, press is practically barren of essential poetry. There are one or two notable exceptions, and the happiest of these is to be found, not in Fleet Street, but in Scotland, in a praiseworthy column of the Glasgow Herald. Also, until a year or so ago, the old Daily News fostered a little band of poets, among whom may be mentioned W. A. Mackenzie and O'Neill Gallagher, but since the amalgamation of the paper with the Morning Leader even their small voice has been silenced. True, many of the morning papers print light verse, but this class of scribbling bears about as much relation to poetry as the pictures in a cinematograph theatre bear to the masterpieces of the National Gallery or the Louvre.

There can be no question that the most powerful reason for the exclusion of poetry from the daily press is born of the belief prevalent in the editorial mind that readers do not want it, are indifferent to it; and perhaps this belief is justifiable—but it has not been proved. Part of the responsibility, however, is due to the insistence upon the purely literary character of poetry, as though its appeal were only to people of distinctly literary temperament. This attitude is utterly false, for the message of literary art is to the ordinary man equally as is that of pictorial or plastic art, and the more lucid and understandable that message is, the nearer perfect is the artistic accomplishment of the poet. Obscurity is an attribute of diseased and petulant art, and is at variance with the true ideal of the artist, which is to strip beauty of its trammels and reveal it pure and visible to the consciousness of man. The poetry that is wanted by the masses of mankind is of a nature that is in keeping with the limitations of newspaper columns, and it is only through this medium that the influence of poetry can be brought to the bosoms of ordinary men. If he reads nothing else, the average professional and working man reads his newspaper regularly, and in the majority of cases takes from it his cue as to what is fit and proper and fashionable. Poetry, at present, he is apt to regard, chiefly because of its absence from his newspaper, as a trivial pursuit of dreamy and rather useless persons for the entertainment of very serious or very sentimental readers. Of the fact that it is the most vital power wielded by man he is pitifully ignorant; that, despite its handicaps, it shapes the destiny of the race, he never dreams, believing it to be a hobby of those quaint creatures who find pleasure in the jingle of rhymes. He is not to be blamed for this: he judges according to his lights, and all that is needed for his enlightenment is that he shall find in the sacred columns which represent to him the criterion of fashionable taste, a daily poem.

To assert that the regular printing of a poem in each of our morning journals would have an immeasurably ennobling influence upon mankind is, in these days, to admit tacitly being guilty of exaggerated idealism. Yet such a claim is justified by experience; none who reads aright the story of human advancement can deny that all great movements towards the amelioration of conditions and essential betterment of the race have originated in the inspired minds of poets and prophets. We may not know wherein lies the precise difference between these seers and other men, but we recognise the difference, and experience forces us to admit their superiority, their right to be heard with deference and respect. The poet's place is by divine right on the most influential rostrum of the age—in this age, the columns of the daily newspaper. How long, then, is he to be denied the platform from which his voice can be heard by all who have ears to hear?

ANDREW H. DAKERS.

J. W. Arrowsmith, Ltd., announce that they will shortly publish "Our Lady Cinema," written and illustrated by Harry Furniss. This versatile artist presents to the reader a most interesting picture of the photo-play world. It will be issued at 1s. net, and the publishers anticipate a wide demand.

Part II of Mr. R. A. Peddie's "Conspectus Incunabulorum," announced by Messrs. Grafton and Co., is a catalogue of all known works printed before the year 1501, and is invaluable to librarians, booksellers, and those who handle early printed books. The part of the work now announced includes entries C to G.

Foreign Reviews

DIE DEUTSCHE RUNDSCHAU.

JANUARY.—Baron von Sodon analyses carefully and perspicaciously the symbolism of "Parsifal." He professes to put nothing into it that Wagner had not put into it himself, and concludes: "Es soll keine kritik sein, sondern Feststellung einer vielleicht Wagner selbst kaum bewussten, aber sehr interessanten Tatsache: In dieser Religion fehlt alles Überweltliche. Sie ist ganz diesseitig, innerweltlich." Vice-Admiral Hoffman begins a historical and technical account of the Panama Canal. The articles on Hoffmann at Plock are concluded; the letters given are characteristic and unique. There is an account of Friedrich von Motz, the only great Prussian statesman of the period after the War of Liberation, and who was most responsible for the Zollverein.

LA REVUE.

January 1.—An interesting "enquête" is entitled "Comment combattre la Criminalité?" Among the witnesses are MM. Boutroux, Ribot, Cruppi, Joseph Reinach, and Max Nordau. M. Faguet examines M. Wilfrid Monod's book, "Aux croyants et aux athées." Princess Radziwill continues her souvenirs of the Court of Berlin. M. de Nolva reports his conversations with surviving disciples of David Lazzaretti, the "apostle" of Monte Amiata. Souvenirs of Bizet, by the late Pierre Berton, contain an interesting analysis of the circumstances that caused the initial failure of "l'Arlésienne" and "Carmen."

January 15.—The Bizet souvenirs are concluded. M. Finot writes on the idea of progress. M. d'Estournelles de Constant gives the case for American abstention in Mexico. Mme. Ellen Key appreciates Romain Rolland. The souvenirs of a Greek, serving as a Prussian officer in 1870, "sont négligeables," says M. Chuquet—but they are worth reading. M. Faguet reviews and quotes to some purpose the "Epigrammes Françaises," edited by M. Maurice Allem. M. Hinzelin gives delightful instances of Alsatian humour. M. Prunières contributes a brilliant article on "Mazarin et la première troupe d'opéra à Paris"; he shows how music was a political weapon in Mazarin's time, and how he used it to arrive; how Louis XIII composed motets, how singers made Popes, and how Leonora Baroni helped the cardinal. The biographies of Labouche and Stead are noticed by M. Saint-Aubin.

LE MERCURE DE FRANCE.

January 1.—M. Paul Louis, at the conclusion of a gloomy survey of the social-political condition of England, gives us back Lord Chesterfield with interest—"lorsqu'une crise révolutionnaire de cette ampleur s'ébauche et s'élabore, engendrée par des conditions sur lesquelles il n'appartient plus à personne d'agir, il faut qu'elle éclate"; our only consolation is that we are not long to be alone. M. Caussy shows Voltaire as a "gentilhomme ordinaire" of Louis XV. M.

Boussac is very interesting on the Blemmyes, a lost people who were fanatical guardians of the Temple of Isis at Philae. Translations of Lafcadio Hearn, by Marc Logé, and of important letters of Oscar Wilde, are also to be found.

January 16.—M. Beauduin, in a very interesting discussion of "la poésie de l'époque," seems to find a good formula for the less exaggerated revolutionism in poetry—"pleine sympathie et communion avec ce qui l'entoure . . . un appel à l'action." M. de Morsier describes the genesis of "Parsifal." Mme. Charasson discusses Ernest Dowson. M. Davray reviews a considerable number of English books.

LA REVUE BLEUE.

December 20.—M. de Morsier disposes of Wagner's alleged Gallophobia. M. Flat gives a sketch of M. Hanotaux. M. Firmin Roz discusses the performance of the "Playboy of the Western World" at the Théâtre de l'Œuvre.

December 27.—Chateaubriand's diplomatic correspondence is concluded. M. Landry discusses the deficit.

January 3.—The excellent habit of the Revue Bleue of giving important lectures in full enables us to read M. Camille Jullian's inaugural lecture at the Collège de France on "Les Anciens Dieux de l'Occident." M. Péladan is afraid for "Parsifal" in Paris; he urges carefulness in the production and reverence in the assistance.

January 10.—M. Flat gives an interesting study of M. Maurice Barrès. M. Ferte's impressions of a journey "de Scutari à Dulcigno" begin in this number and are good reading. A chapter of M. J. Kapp's forthcoming "Richard Wagner et les Femmes" is printed. M. Lucien Maury does for M. Henry Bordeaux what MM. Lemaître and Anatole France did for M. G. Ohnet.

January 17.—M. M. Croiset's inaugural lecture at the Collège de France on "l'Etat Religieux de la Grèce vers le VIII^e Siècle" is printed in this and the following number. M. Risal is very interesting on the present and future of Salonica. A military article shows that, if the Bulgarians were the real aggressors in the recent Social War, the Servians managed to get the initiative.

January 24.—M. Edouard Schuré believes that the future of France belongs to the Celtic spirit. M. Menant gives a sketch of Behramji Malabari. M. Boulenger begins an account of the flight into Spain of the Duchesse de Chevreuse in 1637. The review that appeared in THE ACADEMY for January 17 of Miss Weston's "Quest of the Holy Grail" is reprinted.

REVUE CRITIQUE D'HISTOIRE ET DE LITTÉRATURE.

December 20.—Dr. Strachan-Davidson's "Problems of the Roman Criminal Law" receives the highest praise, and Dr. Warde Fowler's "Religious Experience of the Roman People" is only blamed for the omission of reference to French authorities.

December 27.—M. Loisy concludes a lengthy, approving discussion of Mr. Leuba's "Psychological Study of Religion" with the reservation, "Ce n'est pas sur des théorèmes abstraits que se construisent les religions vivantes, et ce ne sont pas des savants qui les fondent." Mr. Arnold's "Preaching of Islam," second edition, is reviewed.

January 3.—The German translation of Dr. Rice Holmes' book on Cæsar's campaigns is noticed.

January 10.—M. Thomas discusses Dr. H. Leo's "Geschichte der römischen Literatur"; Mr. Warren Wright's "Studies in Menander" and M. L. Madelin's "France et Rome" are also reviewed, the last being accused of journalism.

January 17.—Works on Sanskrit by Mr. Avalon are among those discussed.

January 24.—"Hermathena"—a Trinity College, Dublin, publication—is summarised. The correspondence of Manzoni, already noticed in THE ACADEMY, is welcomed. M. Loutchisky's "Remarques sur la vente des biens nationaux" are roughly handled by two separate reviewers.

LA SOCIÉTÉ NOUVELLE.

The December number is devoted entirely to Georges Eekhoud, "le Zola des Flandres, comme on l'appelle parfois, quoique assez inexactement." Many aspects of the writer are dealt with by various contributors—one takes his poetry for instance, another his position abroad. A particularly interesting article, by M. Eggermont, is concerned with Eekhoud as literary historian and his translations and appreciations of Elizabethan dramatists. M. Verhaeren contributes a "Salut."

A Great Refusal

IN a lecture reprinted in two recent numbers of the Revue Bleue, M. Gabriel Hanotaux gives a circumstantial account of the abortive project for a Legitimist Restoration in 1873. The details of this business have been the subject of much discussion, and the "geste" of the Comte de Chambord in refusing to furl the too symbolical "drapeau blanc" has been variously judged. M. Hanotaux utters no explicit judgment on this refusal, though his opinion of it may, we think, be inferred, but he gives a clear and impartial account of the events as they occurred.

In the summer of 1873 the Restoration of the elder branch of the Bourbons seemed assured. The Comte de Paris had been to Frohsdorf and merged his claims in those of the Legitimist representative. A strong Royalist majority in the Assembly held itself in readiness to carry out any reasonable plan of campaign. President MacMahon was unequivocal in his promises of support. The question of procedure indeed contained difficulties, but not of an insurmountable kind. There remained the two questions of the constitution and the flag. The former was settled satisfactorily, in spite of the Comte de Chambord's condemnation of a "monarchie de circonstance, destinée à légaliser les courants révolutionnaires." On the question of the flag the enterprise suffered shipwreck.

In 1871 the Comte de Chambord had declared himself as committed to the white flag. In 1873 a Royalist committee of nine, presided by the Duc d'Audiffret-Pasquier, was formed to negotiate with the Count and to make him hear reason. MacMahon had summarised the situation in his declaration: "Si le drapeau blanc flottait à une fenêtre, les chassepots partiraient tout seuls." M. Chesnelong was deputed to convey to the Count the feeling of the Royalist party. In the course of a long interview at Frohsdorf the battle was won and lost again; the Count would commit himself to no compromise. The envoy, however, preferred to believe what everyone wished to believe, and came back with an unauthorised message of conciliation. A bill for legalising the Restoration was drafted, uniforms and coaches—for the triumphal entry into Paris—were ordered. Confidence was universal.

In the middle of the preparations came the letter of the Count: "On me demande aujourd'hui le sacrifice de mon honneur. Que puis-je répondre sinon que je ne rétracte rien, que je ne retranche rien de mes précédentes déclarations?" All was lost. Nothing remained but to regularise the Republic, and to hope that a change might come, and not too late, in the disposition of the Comte de Chambord. MacMahon became president for seven years and constitution-making began.

Before the presidential law had been passed by the votes of the Royalist majority, "la mort dans l'âme," it had become known that the Comte de Chambord was himself at Versailles. A supporter had recognised his valet de chambre. But this escapade was the merest futility. MacMahon, when asked to go and interview the Count, replied "Je serais heureux de lui sacrifier ma vie, mais je ne pourrais lui sacrifier mon honneur." The Count had spent many days in Versailles without revealing himself to any of his supporters. Had they known of his presence, they surely would have attempted—perhaps achieved, qui sait?—the impossible. The Comte de Chambord had cast away an almost certain crown; at least he had not given up what seemed to him—to him alone, perhaps—his panache—the flag of his race. That is his epitaph. "Quelle sottise!"—"Mais quel geste!"

On the occasion of the Holy Week in Rome, the Continental and English railway companies have arranged to issue, by specified trains, on April 2 and 9, cheap tickets for independent travel, available 33 days from London; the highest return fare from London to Rome, via the Mont Cenis route, is £10 4s. 9d., first class, and the lowest is £4 13s. 2d., third class. The Riviera route can be chosen at a slightly increased cost. Full particulars are to be found in a leaflet obtainable from any tourist agency, or from the P.L.M. Railway Offices, 179, Piccadilly, W.

The Theatre

"The Joy-Ride Lady" at the New Theatre

OUR playwrights are becoming just a little trying in regard to the titles they give to their most amusing or even most earnest attempts. This week we have a kind of national shame in regard to the extreme banality of at least three titles of plays with which we deal.

But the name of "Joy-Ride Lady" is the worst point about this lively, irresponsible, brilliantly dressed musical production.

Its rather complicated genesis is not an altogether uncommon one in the history of our stage plays. MM. Georges Berr and Pierre Decourcelle write a French farce. Mr. Jean Kren and Mr. Alfred Schönfeld turn it into a farcical comedy, with plenty of songs and dances; this they call "Das Autoliebchen." The gay and successful composer of "The Girl in the Taxi," Mr. Jean Gilbert, writes the simple lilting, alluring music, and then Mr. Arthur Anderson and Mr. Hartley Carrick make their English version and, incidentally, write the lyrics and dialogue uncommonly well, and Mr. Sydney Ellison produces the play with gorgeous effects and neat stage business, and Mr. Durrant Swan presents it to us.

At the end of the first performance there were calls for everybody, several times. The last we saw of "The Joy-Ride Lady" was a long row of ladies and gentlemen smiling and bowing to the enthusiastic audience. In the middle of the gifted people stood Sir Charles Wyndham. It was very nice to see him looking young and splendid; but just why he was there was one of many little mysteries and irrelevant affairs that happen throughout the entertainment. But what does that sort of thing matter? What does the plot about the banker, Morny, having taken the name of his partner, Bonnet, and vice versa, matter? Who really cares as to the individuality of the person who got into the motor-cab with that charming singing widow, Fifi du Barry? Nothing matters, except that the authors produce an effect of wit and gaiety, an atmosphere of waltz-time romance, an air of enjoyment; life, and colour. All this is done with easy grace.

Miss Thelma Raye, as the widow Fifi, sings unusually well for musical comedy; Mr. Bertram Wallis is large and bold as Morny, the banker and lover; Mr. Lawrence Grossmith shows himself once more as our most distinguished actor in this sort of piece; he is called Paul Bonnet, but that does not matter; Miss Enid Sass is delicate and charming; Miss Sybil Arundale bold and handsome; Miss Julia James, in a delightfully simple dress, is more engaging than ever. Added to these is Mr. Rutland Barrington, with a part likely to develop rapidly, but not at present very amusing; and Miss Aïda Jenoure as the mother of the widow in a not yet very funny character. Then there is Mr. Ernest Thesiger as a grotesque footman, who causes an immense amount of laughter; and Mr. George Lestocq dances with extraordinary verve. There are four gifted ladies dressed in early Victorian costumes, who perform a charming little ballet to the sweetest of airs, and there are songs and choruses throughout the entertainment which fill the ear with delight. Everywhere there is a quick, quaint humour, and music easy enough to understand and remember, but never familiar. We gather that the term "a joy-ride lady" is a sort of insult, for the heroine resents it for two acts, and it is certainly not a compliment to this lively and engaging production. "Das Autoliebchen" is not a beautiful name, nor a very meaning one, but it is much better than the English or American one. But, still, even naming their gay entertainment "The Joy-Ride Lady" will not kill the fun and vivacity of the work of Mr. Anderson, Mr. Carrick, and Mr. Jean Gilbert.

"A Pair of Silk Stockings" at the Criterion Theatre

ONE more rather silly title for a comedy that is quite charming, light, excellently written, and admirably played, is that given to the play at the Criterion Theatre.

Mr. Cyril Harcourt, who wrote so smartly in "A Place in the Sun," shows an increase of wit in "A Pair of Silk Stockings." His plot is, however, a little unconvincing, and his characters personages born into the world for stage reasons. But when Miss Lottie Venne takes in hand the part of the hostess of the pleasant country house where all the characters meet we may be sure of one lively and telling performance at least, and as Lady Penelope Gower she gives us of her best.

Sam Thornhill, Mr. Sothern, has been divorced from his wife because he was angry about a motor-car and would not trouble to tell her the facts of the case. But after the affair is over, and before the decree, this lady, Molly Thornhill, Miss Enid Bell, has thought perhaps she was in the wrong, and comes to Sir John Gower's house, where Thornhill is staying. She has a story about some accident to her motor. Soon violent complications set in, when the room she is sleeping in has been entered from without by Major Bagnal, Mr. Allan Aynesworth, an old love of hers, who is supposed to have returned to town for the night, but has lost his train. Sam has hidden himself in a cupboard in Molly's room, in the hope of having some explanation with the wife he loves. He is disguised for some theatricals which were being rehearsed in the house. Soon after Bagnal enters the room, Thornhill is discovered, and the Major and Molly, thinking, of course, that he is a burglar, tie him up in the bathroom. Then, to them, enters Pamela Bristowe, Miss Marie Hemingway, who is now engaged to marry Bagnal. Thus, you see, the plot is getting very complicated, but there are no end of surprises in store for the interested audience. It is not, however, the elaborate stage machinery of the play that gives much pleasure, but rather the quaint, original dialogue and turns of character wherewith the clever author clothes the personages of his comedy.

Before the three acts are out, all is happily settled and the audience has been thoroughly amused, if not very fully convinced. No doubt Mr. Aynesworth and Mr. Bronson Albery, who are the present managers of the Criterion, and Mr. Harcourt, know their public, and feel that the laughter many of the situations and turns of dialogue provoke will prove a sufficient attraction. Personally we feel the comedy is rather too slender, the art of the thing a little too intentional for a lasting success—but we trust we are wrong.

The comedy is preceded by

"STATE SECRETS."

Captain Harry Graham has given us so many amusing things that we have great hopes for him as a writer for the stage. This short play is at least one of promise, for it gives us a tiny melodrama wittily set forth, characters well drawn, and a touch of tragic horror, all of which suggest the author has no small sense of the theatre. The scene is a room in the Foreign Office at Whitehall. Some immensely important papers are being dealt with. We see how the agent of some interested Power attempts to steal these documents, and how he in the end fails and suffers. The little play should be seen; to tell the plot would be to rob it of its interest. It is admirably played by Mr. Frank G. Bayly as Sir Henry Trevor, assistant under-secretary, by Mr. Bertram Phillips as the thief, and by some three other actors in the cast. We hope to see more of Captain Graham's work on the stage. Judged by "State Secrets," he, at least, has the root of the matter in him.

M. Eugène Brieux's "Les Avariés" in English

A PRIVATE VIEW AT THE LITTLE THEATRE MR. JOHN POLLOCK gives us an admirable, simple, and direct translation of this wise and serious play. Unfortunately his title, "Damaged Goods," like so many others this season, is not a very happy one. In the German translation we think the word used means "The Shipwrecked" or "The Wrecked." Perhaps "Victims" would not be a bad title, for the play deals with the disease which is perhaps the greatest of human scourges. We are entirely on the side of candour and the braving of the many terrible physiological and pathological problems which face our generation. But we doubt if M. Brieux's powerful dramatic sermon will greatly help forward a sensible reform. Notwithstanding the things we were told by a labour leader who spoke from the stage before the play was produced, we hold that such a work does not appeal to the democracy. They like to see "The Bad Girl of the Family" or a Lyceum success, but they would fall away disgusted before so courageous a statement of a somewhat special case as is shown in "Les Avariés." But if Mr. Pollock's effort on the behalf of the Society for Race Betterment may not do much to correct the defects of life as it has been handed on to us in the twentieth century, his translation certainly provides powerful parts in which to display the wide-reaching art of acting. As the doctor who argues and demonstrates M. Brioux's point of view, Mr. Fisher White was, especially in the second and third acts, utterly convincing. As the father of the child on whom his complaint has fallen, and as the mother, Mr. Owen Roughwood and Miss Helen Brown, respectively, played with great feeling. The grandmother of Miss Ruth Mackay gave a powerful expression of devoted egotism, and the rustic nurse, who might suffer from the circumstances of the case, was admirably depicted. In the last scene Miss Hilda Sims, as a woman who greatly suffers, and Miss Grace Croft, as a girl who takes her misery with a life-like but shocking humour, were invaluable in creating the general effect intended by the author and translator.

Mr. Arnold Bennett's Little Play at the Palace

EVERYTHING appeared to be about to vanish from the stage next week, when we happened to visit this always entertaining theatre. No doubt this is because of the welcome advent of Nijinsky, who will be supported by many famous members of the Imperial Russian Ballet in various of his already well-known parts, and, we hope, in some new ones. Much as we again look forward to see the beautiful and inspired dancing of this master of his art, we still regret the retirement of "Rivals for Rosamund," for we enjoy Mr. Bennett's work in almost whatever form he cares to present it. In this one-act comedy he is in his most casual mood, but inspired with wit and curious and convincing touches of character. Miss Madge Fabian is a delightful Rosamund Fife, an independent and beautiful young lady who has had, we should think, a good many flirtations. The most serious have been with Gerald O'Mara, Mr. Lionel Atwill, who has loved after his charming Irish fashion and then gone far away for four years, and James Brett, of the W.O., Mr. Ronald Squire, who is going to marry her the very day Gerald comes back. The complications which ensue are worthy of Mr. Bennett's skill in that amusing direction, and eventually, of course, James and Rosie go off to get married, and Gerald helps them in some way.

Other parts of the Palace programme will not be greatly missed. Although Miss Irene Bordoni looks delicious as Lucette in "L'Impresario," in which M. Severin-Mars gives a clever representation of a madman, the little piece did not appear to delight. Also, we do not believe that Miss Anka Layewa, who had the misfortune to learn the folk-songs of Servia and Croatia from gypsies and peasants in her youth, will be greatly regretted. Her voice is powerful, but the characteristic melodies by the Austrian composer, Mr. Egon Stuart Willford, tried our nerves almost to breaking point. But there are many delightful and amusing things in the long programme, of which the "Nicely, Thanks," people in the clever burlesque oratorio are among the most enjoyable.

EGAN MEW.

The National Portrait Society

THE Third Exhibition arranged by this Society opened last week at the Grosvenor Gallery, and the show is decidedly an interesting one. But it is not of happy augury that some of the worst work in the room is that by its President, Mr. Augustus John. One particular Dutch doll in a scarlet upper garment, leaning woodenly against something, is a subject for tears—or laughter, as the mood may take us. Luckily, however, it would be exceedingly unfair to judge the Exhibition by the jesting contributions of its President. Several of the pictures upon its walls are indeed exceedingly good, and such as live in the memory.

The entrance Corridor is, as usual, occupied by drawings and sketches of varying merit, but the average of technique is high. There are some excellent outline portraits by Mr. Rothenstein; Mrs. von Glehn contributes two clever portraits, one in pencil and chalk and the other in pencil only; and Mr. W. Russell's "Girl's head" and Miss Kate Morgan's "Mademoiselle V., danseuse," both deserve mention—the former for its charm, and the latter as a tour de force, though not a specially pleasing one. Mr. B. S.

By Appointment

FORTNUM & MASON'S

FINEST SCOTCH PRESSED BEEF

IN

2-lb., 3-lb., and 4-lb., PIECES

:: at 2/- per pound. ::

Postage and Packing charged

:: 2d. per lb. extra. ::

FORTNUM & MASON, Ltd.
182, Piccadilly, London, W.

Pedder sends some very clever portraits in charcoal and water-colour, which are as strong in execution as they are clever in characterisation.

The first work in the Large Gallery is Mr. Basil Gotto's marble head of "Nausicaä," a portrait of rare loveliness; the youthful charm of the girl with eager, parted lips, has an unusually haunting quality. Next to it hangs Mr. Harrington Mann's clever sketch-portrait, boldly rendered in vivid reds, of Mrs. Ralph Peto—a live piece of work; and close by is Mr. Orpen's virile three-quarter length of Mr. Leonard Stokes—a powerful rendering of a strong personality, in no way weakened by the meticulous care with which every detail of face and attire is rendered, or even by the rather drab note that pervades the colouring of the whole. This stands out in the memory as one of the best things in the Exhibition, a rare achievement of detail and breadth of handling combined. Another remarkable work is Mr. Philip Connard's large-scale picture of "Helen and Jane"—two little girls "taking a call" at the front of a stage, quaint little figures with plaid frocks and beaming faces, marred only by slightly faulty drawing of one of the legs, and a want of clearness in the complexions. The last-named fault is repeated in another child-portrait from the same hand, which hangs close by. The other two works by Mr. Connard, "The Harlequin" and "Mrs. William Murray in Fancy Dress," are poor by comparison. Mr. de Laszlo's standing portrait of Lord Chelmsford is, like all his paintings, clever and meritorious, but the subject, a young English gentleman in a stiff uniform, does not give an artist much chance; yet it shows an earnest, clear-cut face, of a high-bred type which used to be more commonly seen than it is now. Another large-scale work that compels attention is Mr. Glyn Philpot's "Lady in Rose and Blue." The face is marked by character rather than by beauty, and the draperies are cleverly managed so as to produce a shimmering, iridescent effect, though with rather sombre tints than otherwise.

The small Whistler portrait of the late Robert Barr gives little idea of the genius of the painter. Mr. William Ranken has torn himself from his rather wooden Guardsmen to paint a very clever study of London flower-girls in "Flash Emma," in which their characteristic personalities and the faded dinginess of their attire are capably caught and expressed. Another striking portrait by Mr. Glyn Philpot is that of Mrs. Pike, a three-quarter length of a lady in dark dress and furs exceedingly gracefully posed, with a sweet face, full character, and haunting charm—a portrait which the artist clearly "felt pleasure in creating," and the world in its turn will love to contemplate. To our mind this shares with Mr. Orpen's picture already noticed the honours of the show. But their precedence is closely challenged by Mr. Wilson Steer's "Lady in White," a very clever seated figure, of a strongly original type of face, in white draperies handled with uncommon skill and brilliancy. Mr. William Orpen's portrait of the Countess Crawford, seated at needle-work in a large room, with the light falling upon her through an open French window, is as clever a tour de force as one could desire and full of careful detail, but its appeal does not go much deeper. The group of portraits by Mr. William Strang is marked by his usual mannerisms and merits—hard outlines and stiff poses, redeemed by exquisite colouring and no little power of characterisation. One longs to see him "let himself go" and endow his creations with life and movement as well as with cold loveliness. Mr. Somerville's "Gipsy" is also a striking work in many respects.

In the Small Gallery are several more of Mr. Rothenstein's portrait. A brilliant and pleasing blaze of colour is "Rachael Queen," a child in royal robes of scarlet and gold. Mr. Kelly has another of his Spanish studies in "La Maja," and Mr. von Glehn a bold and brilliant portrait of "the Hon. Mrs. Harold Robson," full of life and colour and noble breadth of handling. The same artist is responsible for "The Four-post Bed," in which the light from a shaded lamp on a side-table falls upon a lady lying in the bed with her face in luminous shadow—a wonderfully clever achievement. Mr. Harold Speed has a pleasing picture of a pretty girl kneeling on a sofa by a window—it is not wildly original, but nobody need quarrel with a painter who sets out to please and does so. Mr. de Laszlo's two child-portraits are exceedingly bright and clever, like the rest of his work.

Over the remainder of the Exhibition we must pass more briefly. One "artist" contributes some post-impressionist nightmares, with green faces and non-descript shadows and generally lurid tout-ensemble; some of the subjects are members of his own family, who will doubtless appreciate the compliment he pays them. A beautiful personality is shown in Mr. Campbell Taylor's "Lady of the Castle," and Mr. James Quinn gives a delightful portrait of "A Japanese Lady"—excellent in delicacy of colouring and characterisation. In her "Portrait of the Artist" Miss Edis follows the example of an earlier woman-artist, Madame Le Brun, and gives an eminently pleasing rendering of herself in a delightful picture; and Mrs. Laura Knight treads in her steps with nearly equal effect. Mr. Kelly has another Spanish study and one of the best of them in "The Sisters," a very natural and attractive work, full of subtle appreciation of the more sombre notes of the chromatic gamut. For a brilliant tour de force we do not recall anything finer than Mr. Frieske's "La Poudresse," though it is drawn from the standpoint of a fly far up on the wall; it is full of soft colour and fine draughtmanship. Mention must also be made of Mr. Alison's portrait of Miss Alison and of Mr. Milbanke's Mrs. Stewart.

Last week's issue of the Field contained a beautifully illustrated article on "Memorials of the Washington Family in England." A certain number of copies of this issue has been reserved by the publisher, and single copies will be sent post free to any address in the United States for ten cents.

Indian Reviews

THE Wednesday Reviews (Trichinopoly) of December 31—January 7 devote their attention chiefly to the annual conferences and the South African question. The Chairman of the Social Conference attacked the patriots who attended the National Congress, but neglected social questions which they might influence. The Viceroy's reply to the All India Temperance League, though regarded as sympathetic, is freely criticised, and the administrative difficulties are ignored, as if Lord Hardinge had never spoken; though he carefully pointed out that the Government could not part with its final powers. The reform of the Council of India, contemplated by Lord Crewe, now presents the opportunity of gaining more appointments for Indians. Their ambitions are insatiable; their agitation will doubtless be successful, as usual. Indian journals are now constantly aiming at influencing the Moslem League to co-operate with the National Congress. Before Hindus and Mahomedans can combine, the latter would have to forgo their communal representation, their only safeguard against the Hindu majority: this they are not likely to yield. The crisis in native banking in India has so deeply injured Indian credit that the editor takes the line of attacking Western methods of banking and of claiming a right that Indians should be given opportunities by the successful Presidency banks to learn the theory and practice of banking. But the fact cannot be concealed that the native banks were imprudently managed and by criminal speculators. As to South Africa, it is now suggested that either the British garrison in India should be charged to Imperial funds, or the South African garrison should be charged to South Africa. The logic of the suggestion is unanswerable; but the Government is not likely to accept either alternative. A dearth of students in the agricultural colleges is explained by the objection they entertain to undertaking manual work.

The Wednesday Reviews (Trichinopoly) for January 14-21 continue to harp on the South African muddle. The suggestion offered, that the Imperial and Indian Governments should act together and compel General Botha to treat Indians properly, is not likely to bear fruit. Had compulsion been possible, it would have been adopted long ago. But the subject is too good copy to be dropped. The dilatoriness of the English Government in establishing a School of Oriental Languages is unfavourably noticed; the delay has been very unsatisfactory. The attempt made in Council to render the Press Act ineffective is supported, but weakly, by this journal. The educational policy of the Government is criticised, of course: this time the plea is for extended numbers of students, regardless of their quality. The resolutions of the Karachi Congress are restated, without any contribution of novelty. Surely they might now be pigeon-holed. An idea having been started in London that there should be an interchange of editors between leading newspapers of England and America, this journal now proposes an interchange between Indian and English editors; or, at least, that there should be an Indian journalist to edit Indian affairs. It would be as reasonable to ask a Unionist paper to appoint a Liberal editor for its political articles. An English writer urges that every young Indian going to England should be "a guest and a son in a good English family, where he will be as one of the family in health and in illness," and should remain a Fruitarian. How many good English families would care to accept the risks involved in such a proposal?

The Collegian and Progress of India (Calcutta) of December reports a few matters fully, such as the Calcutta University Convocation, which for the first time was, for the Viceroy's convenience (to use a euphemism), held at Government House. Under the present Vice-Chancellor, the University has made great progress, and bids fair to become a recognised centre of high intellectual activity in the love and pursuit of learning and research. The first occupant of the Hardinge Chair of Mathematics delivered an admirable inaugural lecture on his subject, fully rising to the height of the occasion: his presence and influence ought to elevate the study of mathematics, in which Indians are as naturally capable of excelling as Western students. A Mahomedan Judge made an eloquent presidential address at the Agra Educational Conference. In talking and writing, India has little to learn nowadays. Action and character are the desiderata in her education.

The Collegian and Progress of India (Calcutta) for January, No. 1, is an unusually good issue. It reproduces the substance of a highly learned and sober appreciation of the idealist literature of Dr. Rabindranath Tagore, the poet, winner of the Nobel Prize, who is now being boomed by all Bengal and India. There are many who like the idealism, or the mysticism, this poet provides, but it is a matter of taste. The criticism of his work is favourable and masterly. Mrs. Besant's new journal is said to show sufficient promise, and is not meant to be profitable as a business concern. The institution of scholarships for lady students at a Delhi medical college should eventually provide lady doctors, who are much required in India. The cessation of the Indian Spectator, the late Mr. Malabari's journal, is a loss; it was one of the few Indian newspapers of any value. Personality goes far in India. A Madras University address to the Viceroy admits to progress made since the passing of the Universities Act of 1904, for which Lord Curzon was so vehemently abused. The formation of an association of University women in India, in imitation of a similar federation in England, should conduce to the elevation of the sex. Papers on the Technological Institute for Calcutta and on Studies in Educational Psychology (by an American) are full of ideas worthy of consideration.

Two lectures on the history of the Printing Press and Printing Machinery will be delivered at the Saint Bride Foundation, Bride Lane, E.C., by Mr. R. A. Peddie, on Mondays, March 2 and 9, at 7.30 p.m. Admission is free.

At St. Stephen's Shrine

BY A REGULAR DEVOTEE.

BONAR LAW is a very good chess player, and sees more moves ahead than many people. Then again he has much inside information that is denied to us. These reflections are keeping the more turbulent members of the Unionist Party quiet, and thus the debate on the Address proceeds quietly—not to say dully—from day to day, as if it were an ordinary Session.

On Wednesday, the 18th, it was again the turn of the Labour men "to have a go," and they took up the cudgels on behalf of the strikers in Dublin—two of whom had been "murdered," and some more had been bashed about by the Dublin police. Now the police of the capital of Ireland are not like our Metropolitan Police, under the control of the Government; the former are under the control of the Dublin Corporation, and as that is a Nationalist body, the Nationalists thought it rather officious of the English Labour Party to interfere. This showed itself early in the debate, and the Labour men began to get uncomfortable. Then some young Unionists began "to sit up and take notice." There never was the slightest chance of the Unionists backing up Larkin and his strikers, especially when Birrell explained how sorely these men had been tried.

A Dublin crowd of hooligans, if they can get a policeman down by throwing a shower of broken bottles at him, do not show him much mercy when he is on the ground, and it is not to be wondered at if his comrades hit hard in return.

Directly the Labour men saw that we did not mean serious business and that the Government was safe they poured into the Lobby against the Government.

On Thursday, 19th, "Jan" Spear from Tavistock spoke about the increasing burden of local taxation and pleaded for such a rearrangement as would provide from the Imperial exchequer larger sums for education and for the maintenance of the main roads. "Sir Jan" is a great favourite in the House; people like his soft Devonshire accent, his straightforward style of speaking, and his agricultural knowledge. He is a large farmer at Tavistock, and is such a wonderful judge of beasts that any constituent would have to get up very early in the morning to get the better of a bargain with their Member. At Widdicombe fair he is a match for "Uncle Tom Cobley and all."

Lloyd George was mildness personified. He agreed with everybody. The Government had come to the conclusion that the demand was serious and urgent, and he hoped in the course of the present Session to deal with the problem.

These frank admissions killed all interest in the debate, and on Walter Long extracting further definite pledges from Herbert Samuel, who spoke for the first time as President of the Local Government Board, the amendment was withdrawn at five minutes to 11.

Lord Robert Cecil got up to move his amendment, regretting that the Government did not propose to take any steps to prevent the growing debasement of the accustomed standard of purity in public life. This was closed at 11 amid Unionist protests, but the Address was agreed to without a division.

In the Lobby and smoking room there was more betting than I have ever known before on the result of an election. The figures for Bethnal Green were expected at any moment. It was felt that it would be a near thing either way. On the one hand was Home Rule and the Insurance Act; on the other, a two hours' extension of the Poll for the first time under Limehouse Pearce's new Act, and the Cabinet rank of the sitting Member, Masterman. At 5 o'clock the betting was level; at six it was 5 to 4 on Masterman; at 8 o'clock it was 6 to 4. Some of the Irish crowded round the telephones. "What can they know?" asked the Tories. Some lie started at the last moment probably was the unchristian suspicion. At ten the betting was back to level money—and at that a considerable sum changed hands.

Muldoon, a Nationalist, was protesting with regard to the iniquity of the G.P.O. for not insisting on the Cunarders stopping at Queenstown for the mails, when Page Croft and Eyres Monsell dashed in with the figures—our man was in by 24. A really notable victory which, coming on top of South Bucks, made the Radicals very glum and silent, while we cheered until we were hoarse. Muldoon had to stop until all our breath was gone, when he continued: "I was calling attention to a really important matter." This sounded so funny that everybody laughed and nobody stopped to listen to the wail of Muldoon.

On Friday, the 20th, the final of the private Bills came on, and after an exciting and exhausting week, during which the Government had received some very hard and variegated knocks, men were not inclined to trouble to come down. The Bill in question was one of those social reform measures now so popular. Everybody loves amateur law-making, and many of the younger men on both sides join in the pastime. This was a non-party measure backed by an equal number of back-benchers on both sides. It was a childrens Bill to enable local authorities to raise the school age to 15, to abolish half-timers under 13, and only allow the latter at all if in the opinion of the local authorities it was not for the benefit of the child. This meant that some bureaucrat in an office knew what was better for the child than his parents, and "Peckham" tore the Bill to ribbons. It was taking all the responsibility off the father and transgressed all the principles which had made England great. Trevelyan, on behalf of the Education Office, approved of the measure, and it finally got a second reading by 183 votes to 37.

On Monday, the 23rd, there was not—to use the language of the Stock Exchange—much doing, so I strolled into the Lords to hear Selborne move his resolution to the effect that contributions to party funds should not be a consideration for honours, that effective measures should be taken to put a stop to it, and that the House of Commons should be told about it. Selborne made an admirable speech, weighty and serious. Everybody was talking about the sale of honours, and it was scoffed at even in the theatres.

Lord Willoughby de Broke was trenchant, but a little flippant. Ribblesdale followed in much the same vein: "What was the use of a Royal Commission? Its report was either so comprehensive that the Government was not able to do anything, or it was so brief that it was not worth doing; besides, the custom had been going on for a long time, and the price of everything had risen, from washing bills to peerages!"

Crewe, on behalf of the Government, took the line that it was not practicable. "You could not bar a man to a well-deserved honour because some time in the past he had given a subscription to party funds."

But this was not the point, and Milner and Lansdowne brought the debate back to seriousness, and the resolution was carried.

Before I left the Commons I saw the new Members take their seats amid tremendous cheers and counter-cheers. "Scatters" Wilson, the new M.P. for Bethnal Green, got a tremendous ovation, and it only just eclipsed Yeo from Poplar, because in addition to the Radical cheers he also received ironical cheers from the Unionist Party—on account of the tremendous reduction in the majority.

After that, as Asquith shrewdly judged, the House settled down to the routine of discussing the Supplementary Estimates in Supply. The House must do something while they are waiting for his proposal with regard to Ulster, and how could they be better employed than carrying on the business of the nation; so they talked about Foot and Mouth Disease in Ireland and the cost of a new staircase to the dining-rooms in the House of Commons. A great many people are getting very impatient at this tame acquiescence in the tactics of the Government.

On Tuesday, the 24th, Sir Gilbert Parker made a spirited attack on the Government policy in Somaliland. From the days of General Gordon the Radical Party have always been inclined to scuttle, and it seems perfectly clear that timid action resulted in the disaster to Corfield, whose memory Sir Gilbert Parker warmly defended. Lulu Harcourt was as bland as usual; he pointed out that Corfield directly disobeyed orders, and although he had paid for his disobedience with his life, he trusted that disobedience to orders was not an Imperial ideal. He thought it would be a bad day for this country if such a pernicious doctrine were to sink into the minds of Army, Navy and Civil servants.

At 8.15, Falle of Portsmouth having won the ballot for motions, had, to the annoyance of the Government, put down Home Rule as the subject. He made a carefully prepared speech which he partly read from elaborate notes, and was followed by that stout Nonconformist Unionist, Sir John Randles, but the whole affair was really very ineffective. Asquith got up and declared he was not going to be intimidated, and said he would declare what he was going to do in his own good time. Bonar Law made a first-rate speech in reply, and quoted Lord Chatham's warning at the time of the American war.

And so it goes on. We debate and debate and debate. We are drifting nearer and nearer to a great catastrophe.

Notes and News

Mr. Max Goschen announces for early publication a first novel of unusual literary interest, called "The King of Alsander." The author of this romance is Mr. James Elroy Flecker, whose book "The Golden Journey to Samarkand" was one of the successes of last year.

The authors of "Wisdom While You Wait," "Hustled History," and other products, now, after a period of quiescence, reappear in "All the Papers," illustrated by George Morrow, which Sir Isaac Pitman and Sons, Ltd., announce for immediate publication at a shilling. The characteristics of each one of the leading journals are snapshotted and reproduced.

A book for climbers and those interested in exploring adventures is "A Climber in New Zealand," by Malcolm Ross, published by Mr. Edward Arnold. Mr. Ross is vice-president and one of the founders of the New Zealand Alpine Club and edits its journal. He describes the charm and adventures attendant upon exploration in the Alps of a new country. The book is illustrated with a series of beautiful views from the author's own photographs.

Mr. Lee Warner announces, on behalf of the Medici Society, that two new volumes from the Riccardi Press may be expected about Easter. "The Book of Genesis," in the Authorised Version, has ten water-colour illustrations by Mr. F. Cayley Robinson, A.R.W.S. "C. Juli Cæsaris Commentarii rerum in Gallia Gestarum" will be printed, by permission, from the new text prepared for the Clarendon Press by T. Rice Holmes, Litt.D.

Messrs. Maunsel and Co., of Dublin, announce two new numbers of their Abbey Theatre Series, "The Country Dressmaker," by George Fitzmaurice, which has been played many times in Dublin and London, and "The Bribe," by Seumas O'Kelly, dealing with "jobbery" on a Board of Guardians, which has not yet been played in London. Another Irish play, "The Revolutionist," by a new dramatist, T. J. McSwiney, will be ready immediately.

The Mayfair School of Music (which has recently been honoured with Royal patronage) has just opened an additional section in all branches of both music and dramatic art, under an entirely separate staff of teachers. A new departure is made, in that the pupils of this section will be under the immediate supervision of the directors and principal professors of the Mayfair School, and by a special reduction of the fees in this section these advantages are brought within the reach of all.

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

BY LANCELOT LAWTON

THE MEXICAN CRISIS

SO chaotic has the state of Mexico become that it is difficult to see how America can any longer maintain her policy of drift. The latest crisis arising out of the murder of Mr. Benton, a British subject, involves a set of complications baffling in the extreme. General Villa, at whose instigation the crime was committed, is the protégé of the Washington Government; and it was hoped that his successes in the field would bring about that which the United States hesitated to accomplish on her own account—the removal from the scene of Huerta, the President with the blood-stained hands. In a land where brigandage has developed into a pastime of the leisured classes, Villa formerly enjoyed a sinister reputation. American Senators, however, who in some respects are very child-like personages, had been persuaded that the Mexican bravo had reformed, and that he had become a quite respectable General. Up to the present they have endorsed the policy of the President, which consists largely of patience mingled with a not inconsiderable amount of optimism. As events appear to-day, it looks as though the States have unconsciously set one thief to catch another, and that so soon as this object has been accomplished they will be compelled to restore order by hanging both.

The international aspect of the situation clearly calls for careful handling. The States have rigidly applied the Monroe doctrine to Mexico, and while thus warning off other Powers undertook to protect the lives and interests of foreign subjects resident in the country. Their sincerity cannot be called into question. President Wilson is the head of an Administration whose chief aim is the peaceful advancement of civilisation. The difficulties with which he is confronted in regard to the Mexican problem are exceedingly grave. Intervention in Mexico would most probably unite in one patriotic mass all the elements that are at present contending. Intervention, moreover, to be effective, would call for conquest. To be successful, a campaign waged with that object could not possibly be conducted on a scale less than that which Great Britain undertook in South Africa. All the obstacles that confused the British army in South Africa would oppose American forces in Mexico. In his own territory the Mexican is a cunning and merciless fighter, skilled in the arts of guerilla warfare; while the country must be regarded as terra incognita as far as the American General Staff are concerned. Leaving altogether on one side these considerations, sufficiently strong in themselves to counsel caution on the part of the Washington Government, there is influencing them one decisive factor—the unpreparedness of the American army. According to the public statements of prominent officers, the military forces of the nation are inadequate and unready to take the field against any well-equipped enemy. On the whole, then, it may safely be assumed that, apart from the desire to adhere to cherished principles, President Wilson has no other alternative at this stage than the pursuance of a policy of watching and waiting.

In these circumstances we may all the more readily appreciate the calm attitude of Sir Edward Grey, who has not been slow to announce that we place complete confidence in the honesty and integrity of the United States Government. We have recognised, as we were bound to do, the awkward dilemma in which America finds herself. To hold her responsible for the acts of Villa would be to lay ourselves open to the charge of oblique vision. Indeed, were we to adopt such a course as is here implied our policy would not only be wrong-sighted, but might conceivably provoke a casus belli. As a matter of fact, at no time in history were relations between Great Britain and her sister nation more friendly than they are to-day. After many years of arduous propaganda on both sides of the Atlantic we see at last firmly established, and mutually recognised, the great principle that under no circumstances shall the two countries ever resort to war. In consequence of this state of harmony no longer does England include America in her naval calculations. The rejection of the general arbitration Treaty because it offended the sensitiveness of the Senate was but little loss. The principles which it contained were better written in the hearts of the two peoples than in the form of any signed and attested document. For history, both recent and remote, proves beyond doubt that treaties between nations are the least indestructible of all documents that regulate human relations.

Because, however, Great Britain and the United States, who are admittedly in the van of world civilisation, decide in their wisdom that mutual understanding and friendship shall dominate and determine mutual policy, the scum of Mexico must not imagine that the day of reckoning is long to be deferred. It is altogether an insufficient defence of Villa's conduct that a drumhead court-martial in camera had been duly held before Mr. Benton was taken out and shot like a dog. The attempt to seek justification by casting a slur upon the hapless victim's memory will awaken something more positive than mere scepticism. It has yet to be proved, as alleged, by the reformed brigand chief, that Mr. Benton was hot-headed. Assuming the worst, however, that he was somewhat indiscreet, we must confess that we are not a little proud of Benton. Men of his character, frank and fearless, are of the essence of the breed that goes to make our race. Naturally, we do not expect the Foreign Office to lead the way in promoting a monument to his memory. But if we may be permitted to write an epitaph to which even diplomats may subscribe, we would say that in life and in death the bravery of this rugged man has added glory to our race.

Mr. R. E. Prothero's work, "The Psalms in Human Life," which has been reprinted twelve times since its original publication in 1903, has been considerably enlarged by the author, who has added many new examples from history. The new edition will be published by Mr. Murray next week.

MOTORING

THE Royal Automobile Club and the Automobile Association and Motor Union have had under consideration a number of Private Bills introduced into Parliament in the present Session, and it has been ascertained that in several instances the promoters are seeking various powers which, if granted in their present form, would be inimical to the interests of motorists. For example, local authorities in various parts of the country have promoted Bills proposing to impose extra charges for water used in washing private motor-cars. This, of course, is directly opposed to the well-established principle that, generally speaking, water used for washing private cars comes within the "domestic purposes" clause, and, except in cases where the suppliers have special powers, any extra charge is illegal. Careful consideration has been given to these Bills by the two motoring organisations, and all possible steps are being taken to prevent the objectionable proposals becoming law. Among the other Bills receiving attention are (a) Railway Bills in which the promoters propose to cross certain roads on the level, and (b) Tramway Bills in which municipal authorities have applied for powers to erect tramway equipment. These proposals are being investigated with a view of ascertaining what steps can be taken to protect the interests of road users and to avoid the obstruction of the highway. It is also worthy of note that in several instances local authorities are seeking powers to aid them in dealing with traffic congestion, as, for example, the Bill of the Bolton Corporation, in which there is a provision rendering it compulsory for slow-moving vehicles to keep to the near side of the road. This is undoubtedly a step in the right direction, and it is to be hoped that other local authorities will take similar action.

* * *

The many motorists who are now using benzole in place of petrol are likely to have an unpleasant surprise when the forthcoming Budget makes its appearance, rumours being current in well-informed circles to the effect that the Budget statement will include an announcement by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the tax on benzole will be levied forthwith. As is generally known, this home-made spirit comes equally with petrol within the scope of the duty, but up to the present no attempt has been made to levy the tax, doubtless because the authorities have considered that its consumption has been too small to make the collection worth while. In fact, as The Motor remarks, it is difficult to see, even with the increased consumption, how the cost of the necessary machinery for collecting such a tax will be warranted by the net receipts. Be that as it may, however, the inevitable result of any such step as appears to be contemplated will be to seriously check the growth of the home-produced fuel movement, and to play directly into the hands of the petrol monopolists.

"The Champion of Six-Cylinders."—Daily Telegraph.

The NOISELESS NAPIER

The Original and Proved BEST SIX-CYLINDER.

45 H.P. Six-Cylinder Noiseless Napier Chassis, complete with Tyres, Lighting Dynamo, and R.W. Detachable Wire Wheels - - £850

LORD LONSDALE, the eminent Sportsman and owner of a large fleet of Napier Six-Cylinders, says:

"There is Nothing Better on the Market than the Napier."

Please arrange for trial run on one of these famous SIX-CYLINDERS.

D. NAPIER & SON, LTD.,
14, NEW BURLINGTON STREET, LONDON, W.
Works: ACTON, LONDON, W.

We have just received a copy of the certificate issued by the Automobile Association and Motor Union in respect of the competition for the best records of low upkeep charges and running expenses of Napier cars during the six months that ended October 15 last. The results attained by the twelve prize-winners are really extraordinary, and constitute a conclusive proof of the value of such competitions from the car-owners' point of view. It is certified that the six six-cylinder Napiers whose drivers were awarded prizes covered in the aggregate during the six months 41,759 miles with an average petrol consumption of 17.01 miles to the gallon, and a total cost for repairs of £1 8s. The six four-cylinders covered 36,948 miles, with an average petrol consumption of 22.15 m.p.g., and a total cost for repairs of £2 4s. 6d. Such figures as these require no further comment.

The "Celtic" is the name of a comparatively new tyre, the sole British agency for which has been secured by the St. Martin's Motor Works, the motor accessory house in Upper St. Martin's Lane, W.C. It is claimed on behalf of this tyre, which is of the conventional pneumatic type, that the special canvas used in the manufacture and its treatment during construction, together with the special process by which the canvas and the rubber are amalgamated, render it practically unburstable. In the catalogue sent to us are copies of letters from users which are certainly striking testimonies to the strength and durability of the "Celtic," the prices of which appear to compare favourably for all sizes with those of the recognised standard tyres.

EVERY time experienced motorists have their first ride in a Vauxhall, they are most profoundly impressed by its combination of good qualities. Professional critics not predisposed to favour the Vauxhall confess that its behaviour on the road singles it out as a car extraordinary.

Make a point of trying the Vauxhall on the road. Its performance will convince you that in all the essential qualities of the highly efficient machine it has no rival, and on top of this it is noted for its perfect suspension (hence its comfort) and fine bodywork.

Trial drives can be given in any part of the country.

THE BE VALUE IN HIGH-GRADE CARS
Complete 16-20 h.p. four-seated car electrically-lighted, hood and screen, spare wheel and tyre, £485

Vauxhall
THE CAR SUPEREXCELLENT

VAUXHALL MOTORS, Ltd., 174-182, Gt. Portland St., W.

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

BUSINESS on the Stock Exchange is quite dead. The public has lost far too much money during the past few years, and has now become educated. Booby traps that would have caught the foolish a few years ago attract no one to-day. Even a strong Board on a speculative concern quite fails in its object. Really good things go well; nothing else goes at all. The Hungarian Loan is said to have been subscribed two or three times over in every capital on the Continent. Unfortunately for this statement, the loan is quoted at a discount. It looks very much as though the issue was placed but not properly subscribed. I think it a good security and advise my readers to buy at the present discount.

Not quite so many new issues have made their appearance during the past week. The City of Constantinople Telephone, in spite of the fact that Mr. George Franklin was on the Board, appears speculative. The Terek General Oil is a promotion of the Spies Petroleum. It is clearly on a good oilfield, for two of the wells are producing; but why should the Spies wish to get rid of their shares even at a premium? The City of Dunedin asked us for a small loan and will certainly get the money. The South American Stores offer ordinary shares at 1s. premium. The weak feature of Gath and Chaves is the huge amount standing in the books as stock. Trade in the Argentine is falling away, and stock in a store like this soon becomes unfashionable; I cannot advise anyone to apply for these shares. The British Empire Steam Navigation Co. asks for £250,000 debentures to secure upon ships now building. The company is to be run when the ships are ready by the Empire Transport and is one of the Furness, Withy group. The offer is not particularly attractive in view of the fall in freights and the high price that the ships must cost. The Royal Mail offers some second debentures; this is a fair Shipping security. Messrs. Baring Bros. have offered a 5 per cent. loan on behalf of the City of Buenos Ayres, secured on a special tax. There is no doubt that this is an excellent South American security, for Buenos Ayres has a population almost as large as Paris and is rapidly growing. The North Glamorgan Waggon is a small concern asking for money locally. South Wales people might be inclined to speculate.

MONEY.—The Money market supplied the Stock Exchange with all the money it required at the settlement without much difficulty, but the demand was much smaller than anyone expected, and it is clear that any "bull" account open is being financed by the banks and not by the House moneylenders. These hidden "bull" accounts are a dangerous feature of modern finance. All the gold coming into the market this week went to the Continent. It is a curious thing that Russia and France, whose banks carry nearly 350 millions between them, should be still greedy for gold—a very disquieting feature of the present situation that no one in the City pretends to explain. Our own bank return was fairly good, but if the Continent continues to draw the whole of the gold, we shall certainly get a rise in the rate. The India Council is already obtaining a better price than it did a few weeks ago.

FOREIGNERS.—The situation in Paris grows worse. The public cannot say they have not been warned. Months ago

I published some remarks made to me by one of the greatest of the French bankers, who spoke in the most pessimistic fashion. Every word that he said has come true. We are told that the Victor troubles have all been arranged. I remain sceptical; I am afraid that there are still worse banking troubles in front of us in Paris. We must not forget that the French banks lent huge sums of money to the Pearson and Farquhar group and that the depreciation on these loans is stupendous. On the Brazil Railway common stock alone there has been a depreciation of 100 points from the top. Almost all Mexican things are now quite unsaleable and there seems no chance whatever of peace. Indeed, the murder of Mr. Benton will only hasten the inevitable intervention of the United States. As the United States army consists of 30,000 men, anybody can calculate how many years it will take before such an army can control a country nearly as big as Europe, almost every inhabitant of which is armed and thinks no more of killing a man than we do of killing a mouse. The plain truth is that the Mexican has reverted to his normal condition, and investors in that happy country may just as well write off their securities as gone. The position in Brazil has not been improved by the revolution in Ceara. Sooner or later the North will separate from the South; in the meantime, it will be a safe thing to sell all Brazilian stocks. The state of the country can be seen by the latest figures of the Port of Para and the Madeira-Mamore Railway.

HOME RAILS.—The Home Railway market, like every other section of the Stock Exchange, has gone dull. The dividends have in most cases been admirable. The Great Western quite came up to expectations; the London and South Western was equally good; yet the quotations in each case are weaker than they were a fortnight ago. However, this need not trouble the steady-going investor who now has the opportunity of buying a cheap stock to yield him over 5 per cent. The Underground Electric report is not good. The item of £474,000 preliminary expenses still remains as an asset, and the bulk of the profits would appear to come from the new company, which only made its appearance last year, called the Associated Equipments. The House did not like the figures.

YANKEES.—The American market is still uneasy. It is said that the great Insurance companies have now decided to join hands with those who are opposing the bonus in Union Pacific; if this be true, then it will be a long time before shareholders in Union get their 33 per cent. Sir Thomas Shaughnessy definitely denies that the Board of Canadian Pacific has ever considered the question of buying, leasing or taking over the Canadian Northern. Technically, this denial may be true, but I am assured that Sir Thomas himself has often discussed the question and it has been common talk in Montreal for the past six months.

RUBBER.—The Rubber auctions are now on. Rubber was marked down to 2s. 4½d. a pound, but it does not appear to produce much effect on the stock and share market. No reports have made their appearance. Dealers inside the House declare that the public is not buying and that the marking up that has taken place is entirely due to insiders. I think that it is quite safe to sell Rubber shares to-day, although, no doubt, an attempt will be made to keep up quotations for a few weeks longer.

OIL.—Oil shares have been a little harder; this is not due to any public demand, but simply to the fact that a certain number of bears thought it wise to buy back before the settlement. The news that the Standard Oil had arranged with the Chinese Government to exploit the vast Oil territories in China on the basis of half profits has not affected the Shell, but as soon as China begins to

"ROYAL YORK" HOTEL, BRIGHTON

Supreme Comfort in a Warm and Sheltered Position. Excellent Sea Views

SOME PRESS OPINIONS.

"To the Cuisine particular attention has been paid, and no expense spared, whilst the service is absolutely perfect."

"And in the Royal York you have the perfection of an English hotel and English cooking."

AND—

Colonel NEWNHAM DAVIS says:—"The Chef makes soup like a Frenchman, grills like an Englishman, and fries like an Italian."

Telegrams: "Presto, Brighton"

Telephones: 206 Post Office, Brighton.
293 Brighton.

THE KARSINO and NEW ISLAND HOTEL HAMPTON COURT.

Proprietor: Mr. FRED KARNÖ.

Tel.: MOLESEY 1.

*The only Residential River Hotel open
all the Year round.*

THE RIVIERA OF LONDON
THE FAVOURITE RESORT OF LONDON SOCIETY.
LUXURIOUS PALM COURT.
DANCES & ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

For Illustrated Brochure & Tariff, apply Manager.

produce large quantities of oil there is no doubt that both Shell and Burmah will feel the pinch very severely.

MINES.—The "bears" in the Kaffir market decided that they had better take their profits, and those who had sold short of Chartered also bought back at the beginning of the week. Thus we have seen a sort of false hardness. There was a quick rise in Russian Mining Corporation on the story that this company had acquired the Altai property of the Prince of Thurn and Taxis, but the public could not be attracted and the rise died away. The Dolcoath report is one of the worst ever issued by that famous mine, and the shares look almost cheap to-day.

MISCELLANEOUS.—In the Miscellaneous market all the Electric Lighting companies continue to issue excellent reports, and it is very difficult to buy the shares. County of London pays 7 per cent. and London Electric Supply have also increased their dividend. Metropolitan Electric figures are good and it can safely be said that not a single one of the Electric Light Corporations has issued a disappointing balance sheet. As I have been advising the purchase of these shares for the past twelve months, I must congratulate those of my readers who have followed my advice.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

The Industrial market is destined to play an important part in the Stock Exchange revival which has now set in. Amongst the shares of the leading motor manufacturing companies which for some time past have proved popular with investors by reason of the good profits earned and the prospects of larger profits in the future is that of Straker-Squire (1913). Although the Company was only formed in November last, it has already justified the anticipations contained in the prospectus, and there is good reason to believe that the shareholders will receive a good dividend. At the statutory meeting it was announced that during the last year the sales, both for cars and heavy vehicles, including omnibuses, had shown an increase of 30 per cent. The profits estimated at the flotation of the Company for the current year were £18,000, and the prospect of this sum being exceeded is particularly promising. The Company's shares are being confidently talked up in the market to 30s. or over.

CORRESPONDENCE

"GLUMS AND GAWRYS, OR MEN AND WOMEN THAT FLY."

VOLATION RATHER THAN AVIATION.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—At the present day, when the ancient dream of the conquest of the air is become a very practical, but still funereal, reality, it is interesting to note how the art appeared to a British writer in 1751, by referring to "The Life and Adventures of Peter Wilkins, A Cornish Man; Relating particularly, His Shipwreck near the South Pole; his wonderful Passage thro' a subterraneous Cavern into a kind of new World; his there meeting with a Gawry or Flying Woman, whose Life he preserv'd, and afterwards married her; his extraordinary Conveyance to the Country of Glums and Gawrys, or Men and Women that fly. Likewise a Description of this strange Country, with the Laws, Customs, and Manners of its Inhabitants, and the Author's remarkable Transactions among them. Taken from his own Mouth, in his Passage to England, from off Cape Horn in America, in the Ship Hector. With an INTRODUCTION, giving an Account of the surprising Manner of his coming on board that Vessel, and his Death on his landing at Plymouth in the Year 1739. Illustrated with several CUTS, clearly and distinctly representing the Structure and Mechanism of the Wings of the Glums and Gawrys, and the Manner in which they use them either to swim or fly. By R. S. a Passenger in the Hector. In Two Volumes. LONDON: Printed for J. Robinson, at the Golden Lion, in Ludgate-street; and R. Dodsley, at Tully's Head, in Pall-Mall, M.D.CCLII."

The Dictionary of National Biography contains a very good account of Robert Paltock (1697-1767), a Londoner, who was the author of these volumes. At the end of the second, Boitards six Plates shew: 1, The Front of a Glumm Dresst. 2, The Back of a Glumm Dresst. 3, A Gawrey Extended for Flight. 4, The Use of ye Back flap, when ye Glumm flyes. 5, A Glumm Swimming (He is lying on his back upon his battish skreen). 6, Nasgigs Engagement with Harlokens General. (A fight in the air.) There is also "A Table of the Names of Persons and Things, mentioned in the Two Volumes." These words appear to have been coined out of the imagination of Paltock. On p. 291, he says 'Gawrey, A Woman. Glumm, A Man. Glumm Boss, A young Man. Gowren, Women. Mr. E. O. Winstedt, of the Bodleian Library, points out on pages 38 & 39 of "The Dialect of the English Gypsies. By Bath C. Smart, M.D., F.E.S." (Appendix to the Transactions of the Philological Society for 1862-63) the item "Gairy. A Woman. Gwraig (Welsh), κρῖα." One may also suggest "An old woman, gwrah, gruah, gurah," which occurs in "An English Cornish Dictionary. By F. W. P. Jago (London: 1887," of which the second edition, unpublished, was secured, about three years before its authors death, by the Royal Institution at Truro). For "Gawri, v. to shout, to bawl"; in "A Dictionary of the Welsh Language," by W. Spurrell; and "Gaury = luxuriant, healthful, quick-growing," in A Dictionary of the English Dialects are too distant in sense to serve as an explanation. None of these words, however, connotes flying.

Yet equally remote is aviator. It is also longer, and it ignores the rights of women for non-masculine treatment; though Martial, the Spaniard, used viatrix. Certainly aviator is a barbarous word, unknown to the Romans. They would no doubt have understood it, as synonymous with deviator. For it is obvious that it can mean only "one who strays off the road, away from the way." But that is a thing that those who are flying at a great height from the ground or the surface of the water do not wish to do. The only rational defense of the words aviator and aviation that has been given, is that they refer to travelling away from, i.e., without, roads, as if the initial were alpha privative. This is better than the explanation given in certain wordbooks, namely that they come from avi = bird! That is an insult both to birds and to the Latin Language, which is a very regular and law-abiding machine. The birds indeed must mock at all the homicidal failures of airmen in the last decade. The second a in aviation renders that explanation impossible; avi-arius, avi-arium being alone proofs to the contrary. One might just as well use api-ation in the sense of be-ing, or sting-ing! Moreover, birds are not the only creatures whose flight men have to imitate. And the surface of the ocean is also as roadless in character as the atmosphere. All that nature does, man is intended to do in some way or other. The fallen tree-trunk rolling before the wind taught him to make wheels, as surely as frogs taught him to swim. So he has to learn from bats, fish, and insects, as well as from birds, how to pass through the air. Therefore, the general term volation has a much better raison d'être than aviation, which is not a λόγος at all, but an ill-made sort of vol-au-vent, a mere string of letters making a sound. Now VOLATIO has the great authority of a luminous and voluminous writer for whom Latin was a living tongue, St. Augustin of Hippo. If we turn to the Dictionaries or phrase-books of that great instrument of European Civilisation, we find avia = "grandmother, prejudice, old wives fable"; avia = "groundsel" (good for canaries which fly by nature); avius = "that is out of the right way; astray; leading away from the undertaking"; avia = "roadless" places. Flying-men, airmen, may not choose to be called glums; because the word sounds gloomy. But, even if they heroically soar to unroady avia, they must highly regret "the noble army of Martyrs," whose liberty of unlicensed flying has led them, in far too great numbers already, into the way of the undertaker. All honour to the progress of Science which has been effected by them! I am arguing only this, that the words aviator and aviation are superfluous burdens, which deserve no place in our Dictionaries. Aviación was used in Castilian, long before artificial flight came into practice, in the sense of setting out, or starting, upon the road, either walking or riding, being derived from a via which represent a (d) via (m) = to, or towards, the road. Why should Spaniards now force it to fly away from its roman road, to serve their modern airy needs? Englishmen at least ought to be content with fly, flier, flying. Applied to human beings they ipso facto imply artifice. Airman is also a legitimate word. Shortness in speech and writings is a great step forward, helping thought to fly by the right way, or as the Basks say, roadily, bidezki. EDWARD S. DODGSON.

The Oxford Union Society, Oxford,
February 21, 1914.

WATERLOGGED.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—The sensation which has just been experienced in the business world through the appointment of an American to the general managership of an English home railway deserves closer attention than it has yet received.

As a matter of course, it was followed by an outburst of heterogeneous opinions, with respect, not only to the appointment itself, but to the cause which led Lord Claud Hamilton to make it.

Now, the only thing worth studying is the appointment, because if it is, indeed, pregnant with qualifications which are absolutely necessary to successful management, and which are believed to be obsolete as home products, the action of the noble lord stands fully justified, apart from all comment. The difficulty lies in results, and, therefore, in the proofs of trial; and the primary question to be answered is why an American obtained precedence over an Englishman. The very fact of this is an indictment against the choice, because it is proof, not of English incapacity, but of departmental ignorance. For the action stands out, not merely as a special, but as a whole or complete, form of condemnation. The Chairman, as it were, stands self-convicted by his vindicated choice of an outsider, since, as one of the heads of a system needing reform, he is part and parcel of its degenerate state.

What, then, do we arrive at? We have one of our great railway companies in such a forlorn and waterlogged condition as to be out of proper control. It is, seemingly, a fault of those who have absolute command—the head, as it were, is completely out of touch with the body of the mechanism. Personally, I cannot see how Lord Claud Hamilton can indict himself to a greater extent of an incapable directorship than by this same choice of an American. And this is said with all due respect for the Americans' high qualities of organisation. But, unfortunately, the matter does not begin and end with an English railway company. The nation, at large, may be said to be in this water-logged state. A disaster to a ship invariably brings with it an arraignment of its captain. He, not the officers, is held responsible. So it must be with this question of a general or national state of instability. Capacity is more needed in the directorships of large public companies, in responsible and influential positions, in the control of Church and State offices, than in the captaincy of the largest vessel afloat, because a whole nation is in one sense involved, and not merely a few thousand souls. What sane nation would think twice in respect to captaincies of vessels being merely a matter of £ s. d. or log-rolling? Yet, when a just comparison is made, the fate of a nation is fundamentally based on money and influence rather than merit. Let us remember that the captaincy of a vessel is never disassociated from results of certain practice, whereas, wherever this may be found in our directorships, positions of rank or influence, or Church and State offices, the certainty of merit in these latter are a long way from being proof against the degenerate influences of money or sheer selfishness.

For the safety of an entire people it should be impossible for money—no matter by whom possessed—to interfere with the ordering of merit. It is never allowed to do so where the safety of human life is concerned at sea, and why should it be allowed to do so on land, where the safety of human life, from its vast numbers, is more important?

Is Lord Claud Hamilton, like the captain of a ship, in touch with every individual working under his orders?

If so, and he is justified in his recent choice, the smartest man America can produce will not put life into a dead mechanism, for a new body, besides a new head, will be required; that is to say, a new staff will be needed throughout to get anything like sympathetic results.

Should Mr. Thornton succeed with the old staff, it will be, not because, but in spite of this gentleman's genius. He will merely do what the Chairman himself could have done—give free vent to existing merit. Give English-

THE Sunday Times

THE LEADING SUNDAY PAPER SINCE 1822.

"City Chatter" by "Magpie"

is acknowledged by all experts to be the most interesting, instructive and accurate article on current financial matters.

Of all Newspapers.

Price One Penny

men real freedom, and we shall soon show proof of our real value, as we did in days of yore, when England was in the building.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
H. C. DANIEL.

Peckham, February 20, 1914.

PSYCHICAL RESEARCH AND SURVIVAL.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Dear Sir,—In one of your recent issues there is a review of a book by James H. Hyslop entitled "Psychical Research and Survival."

It is only one of many signs of the increasing attention paid to this subject. Residence abroad for some years has brought the present writer into touch with a powerful and widely-known writer on this and cognate subjects. Owing to barriers of language, his works are not nearly as well-known in England as in other countries, although several are now to be had in English.

The works are by Rudolf Steiner, Phil.D., Vienna, and they are of a varied character. His earlier works, such as his "Erkenntnis Theorie" and his "Philosophie der Freiheit," "Das Christenthums Mystische Tatsache," etc., stamp him as a thinker of rare originality and power. Not only that, but these books form a valuable contribution to the solution of that problem which faces, and has always faced, Philosophy, Science and Religion—the relationship of man to the universe.

It is his more recent works, such as his "Theosophy" (Kegan Paul, London) and his "Geheim Wissenschaft im Umriss," that have a more direct bearing on psychic matters. His book, "Die Mystic," for instance, translated into English under the title "The Mystics of the Renaissance" (Gysi, Hampstead) contains a sketch of Paracelsus. In it there is a reference to suggestions, which, taken in connection with the book "Theosophy," provides an explanation of the phenomenon of "suggestion." The problem of existence after death is also dealt with in this work, and the fact of man's existence after "death" is proved by means of a factative logic, logic-of-facts as organic and necessary as that of Mathematics.

There are probably many of your readers who will be interested to hear of contributions on these subjects from an individuality who unites in himself scientific training and ideals, erudition of an unusual catholicity and thoroughness, and powers of seership attainable only by those who add to a thoroughly trained intellect, deep spirituality and the most painstaking accuracy and methods of science.

I am, yours faithfully,
E. D. SHIELDS.

8, Lancaster Road, N.W., February 18, 1914.

BOOKS RECEIVED

MISCELLANEOUS.

Heroes of Exploration. By A. J. Ker and C. H. Cleaver, B.A. (Blackie and Son. 1s. 6d.)

Heroines of European History. By A. R. Hope Moncrieff. (Blackie and Son. 1s. 6d.)

Progressive Précis Writing. By H. Latter, M.A. (Blackie and Son. 3s. 6d.)

Contes de l'Heure Présente. Annotés par J. S. Norman, M.A., et C. Robert-Dumas (Blackie and Son. 10d.)

L'Oncle Scipion et Sa Promesse. Edited by J. P. Park. (Blackie and Son. 8d.)

Souvenirs de Madame Le Brun. Chosen and Edited by Edith H. Herbert. (Blackie and Son. 4d.)

Laurette, ou Le Cachet Rouge. Edited by T. Keen, M.A. (Blackie and Son. 4d.)

Récits des Temps Mérovingiens. Edited by Taylor Dyson, B.A. (Blackie and Son. 4d.)

Village Silhouettes. By Charles L. Marson. Illustrated. (The Society of SS. Peter and Paul. 2s. 6d. net.)

An Introduction to the Study of the Renaissance in its Relation to English Literature. By W. F. French. (Hodges, Figgis and Co., Dublin. 6d.)

The Tower of the Mirrors, and Other Essays on the Spirit of Places. By Vernon Lee. (John Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

THEOLOGY.

De Haeretico Comburendo, or The Ethics of Religious Conformity. By G. M. Trevelyan. (W. Heffer and Sons. 6d. net.)

Vital Problems of Religion. By the Rev. J. R. Cohu. (T. and T. Clark, Edinburgh. 5s. net.)

Judaism and St. Paul. Two Essays by C. G. Montefiore. (Max Goschen. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Concept of Consciousness. By Edwin B. Holt. (George Allen and Co. 12s. 6d. net.)

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS.

C. F. Meyer: La Crise de 1852-1856. By R. d'Harcourt. (Félix Alcan, Paris. 5 fr.)

An Outline of Ireland's Story. By the Author of "Christianity in England before Augustine." (Elliott Stock. 6d. net.)

Cavour, and the Making of Modern Italy, 1810-1861. By Pietro Orsi. (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 5s. net.)

History of the Nations. Part II. Illustrated. (Hutchinson and Co. 7d. net.)

Remarkable Women of France. (From 1431 to 1749.) By Lt.-Col. Andrew C. P. Haggard, D.S.O. Illustrated. (Stanley Paul and Co. 16s. net.)

On the Left of a Throne: A Personal Study of James, Duke of Monmouth. By Mrs. Evan Nepean. Illustrated. (John Lane. 10s. 6d. net.)

FICTION.

Gilbert Ray. By Mrs. E. Hughes-Gibb. (Heath, Cranton and Ouseley. 6s.)

Dorothea of Romney Marsh. By Alice Cunningham. (Heath, Cranton and Ouseley. 6s.)

"It will be All Right!" By Tom Gallon. (Hutchinson and Co. 6s.)

The Path to Honour. Third Impression. By Sydney C. Grier. (Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 1s. net.)

The Strong Heart, being the Story of a Lady. By A. R. Goring-Thomas. (John Lane. 6s.)

PERIODICALS.

Literary Digest; La Revue; Atlantic Monthly; Constitution Papers; Wild Life; Cambridge University Reporter; Mastery; Bookseller; Publishers' Circular; Cambridge Magazine; Revue Bleue; Wednesday Review; The Collegian; London Diocese Book, 1914; Revue Critique; The Genealogical Monthly.

THE ACADEMY

A JOURNAL OF LITERATURE. ART, FINANCE & POLITICS

No. 2183

[Registered as a
Newspaper.]

MARCH 7, 1914

PRICE THREEPENCE

SHEFFIELD SIMPLEX

PRESS OPINION:—

*"The highest point to which motor design
has yet attained."*

The "TIMES," 8/11/13

The Connoisseur

who demands smart appearance, and the experienced motorist who desires chassis efficiency, have their ideals in the present 30 h.p. six-cylinder Sheffield-Simplex chassis.

Write for Illustrated List of complete cars, with beautiful bodies by Vauden - Plas, or better still, arrange a trial. Both are free.

Sheffield-Simplex Motor Works, Ltd.

20, CONDUIT STREET,
LONDON, W.

Works: Tinsley, Sheffield

30 H.P. 6-CYLINDER CHASSIS. STANDARD EQUIPMENT INCLUDES U. S. L. ELECTRIC SELF-STARTER AND LIGHTER, ALL LAMPS, ELECTRIC HORN, SPEEDOMETER CLOCK, COMPLETE SCUTTLE DASH, WITH ALL INSTRUMENTS, £8 8s. TAX.

PRICE £885.

LATEST DESIGN TORPEDO — WITH CONCEALED HOOD

ALLIANCE ASSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED.

Head Office:

BARTHOLOMEW LANE, LONDON, E.C.

ASSETS EXCEED £23,500,000.

Chairman:

The Right Hon. LORD ROTHSCHILD, G.C.V.O.

Business transacted by the Company:—

- (1) LIFE INSURANCE, with and without Profits, with special provisions for the payment of Estate Duties.
- (2) FIRE INSURANCE of every description.
- (3) INSURANCES TO COVER LOSS OF RENT, Interest and Profit consequent upon Fire damage to property.
- (4) MARINE INSURANCE.
- (5) BURGLARY, THEFT and PLATE GLASS INSURANCE.
- (6) ACCIDENT, including PERSONAL ACCIDENT, Motor Car and Employers' Liability Insurance.

Fidelity Guarantee and Sinking Fund Policies are also granted.

Applications for Agencies are entertained, and Prospectuses with other papers may be had on written or personal application.

ROBERT LEWIS, General Manager.

With the Next Issue of
THE ACADEMY

a Series of

Literary Competitions

will begin, of great interest to all Readers. Full particulars will be given next week, March 14th.

BARGAINS IN BOOKS.—

Kipling's Complete Works, 25 vols., half calf, gilt, fine set, £12 12s.; Hamilton's Parodies, 6 vols., £2 10s.; Jesse's Historical Works, 30 vols., Nimmo, 1901, £7 17s. 6d.; Thackeray's Centenary Biographical Edition, 26 vols., £6 6s.; Barrington's Graham of Claverhouse, 30s. net, for 10s. 6d.; Purchas's Voyages, 20 vols., £9 9s., Glasgow, 1905; Slaters' Engravings and their Values, 1912, 18s.; Chaffer's Marks and Monograms on Pottery and Porcelain, 1912, 42s.; Baily's Magazines of Sports and Pastimes, 64 vols., £7 10s.; Grimm's Fairy Tales, large paper, illus. by Rackham, £2 2s.; Proc. Inst. Civil Engineers, 142 vols., cloth, £16 16s.; Pinkerton's Voyages and Travels, 17 vols., 1808, £5 10s.; Porter's Knights of Malta, 1858, 2 vols., £3 3s.; Burton's Arabian Nights, 17 vols., illustrated, £17 17s.; Gould's History Freemasonry, 3 thick vols., morocco binding, £2 2s., cost £6 6s.; James' Painters and Their Works, 3 vols., £3 3s.; Habershon Records of Old London, Vanished and Vanishing, coloured plates, folio, £2 2s.; Yeats' Collected Works, 8 vols., £3 3s.; Walpole's Letters, large paper, 16 vols., £7 10s.; Oscar Wilde, by L. E. Ingleby, 12s. 6d., for 4s. 6d.; Ditchfield Vanishing England, 15s., for 6s. 6d.; Landor's Lhasa, 2 vols., new, 42s., for 14s.; Spenser's Faerie Queene, 2 vols., Cambridge University Press, £3 13s. 6d., for 32s. Will take any good books in exchange for above.—BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

£10 or offer, worth double. Beautiful Japanese Carving. Juggler with Monkey, carved by Massauowri out of a solid Ivory tusk. Apply R., c/o ACADEMY, 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

LITERARY MSS. should be typewritten. We do it under expert literary supervision. Neatly, quickly, accurately, cheaply. Work returned same day as received. A. B. BRIDGES, 20, East Parade, LEEDS.

JOURNALISTIC and SECRETARIAL TRAINING FOR LADIES.—

Rapid systematic coaching. Special course in Journalism. Excellent introductions given.—Telephone or write, THE TRIANGLE SECRETARIAL OFFICES, 61, South Molton Street, W.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

EPSOM COLLEGE.

The Head Mastership will become vacant in July next by the resignation of the Rev. T. N. H. Smith-Pearse, and the Council are prepared to receive applications for the office from candidates not over forty years of age. The Head Master must be a graduate of Oxford or Cambridge University, not necessarily in Holy Orders. The emoluments amount to at least £1,100 a year, together with a house in the College grounds, free of rent, rates, and taxes. Applications, with not more than six testimonials, which must be recent, are to be sent, on or before the 16th day of March, addressed to the Secretary, at the Office of Epsom College, 37, Soho Square, London, W., who will furnish any information that is required.

By Order of the Council,

J. BERNARD LAMB, Secretary.

17th February, 1914.

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Fourteen years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE AND ART
PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION: Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free.

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Offices of
THE ACADEMY, 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

To

.....

Please send me THE ACADEMY for the next..... months.

I enclose remittance value

Name

Description

Address

CONTENTS

	PAGE		PAGE
Notes of the Week	291	Some New French Plays ...	308
Communion	292	In the Learned World	310
Covenanters—Old and New	292	The Theatre :
The Spring Books	293	"The Land of Promise"
Reviews :		at the Duke of York's
Royal Academician and		Theatre	311
Rector	295	Two New Plays at the
Education Controversy ...	296	Royalty Theatre	312
Papua in Transition	298	Saison Nijinsky at the
The Forerunners of the		Palace Theatre	312
"Grand Siècle"	299	A Lecture by "Charivaria"	313
Shorter Reviews	300	At St. Stephen's Shrine ...	313
Fiction	302	Imperial and Foreign Affairs	315
Music	303	Motoring	317
The Musical Awakening in		In the Temple of Mammon	318
Russia	305	Correspondence	320
Unbeaten Tracks	306	Books Received	320

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post-free.

The EDITORIAL AND ADVERTISING OFFICE is at 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

Notes of the Week

MR. GULLAND, the Scottish Radical Whip, no doubt thought that he had purged his contempt when he made an humble apology in the House of Commons disclaiming any intention in the speech which he made at Wick of holding out an improper inducement to electors to vote for the Radical cause. Mr. Asquith accepted the apology in his most frigid manner, and Mr. Gulland, we suspect, imagined that by incurring a certain diminution of the personal estimation in which he was held, and also of his astuteness as an advocate of the incorruptibility of the present Government, the whole matter was res judicata, and that nothing more would be heard of it. Mr. Steel-Maitland is, however, a past-master in pinning beautiful winged insects in show-cases, and carries his activity in that direction into his political excursions. In an admirable letter he has shown that Mr. Gulland (on whose name we should not like to pun) omitted, doubtless in the confusion of the moment, to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Had Mr. Gulland's lapse been an isolated one, various explanations might have been offered; but, as Mr. Steel-Maitland is able to show that the hon. gentleman pursued a consistent course, during his pilgrimage in the Scottish constituencies, of performing miracles with one and the same stock-in-trade, we are much afraid that at least a true bill must be returned against the "second whip," and that he is now up against a fence which the party horse will find some difficulty in negotiating, even with such a skilled horseman in the saddle.

It might be assumed that if one portion of this earth more than another was secure from competitive explorers it would be the South Polar region. Even if two or three, or six or seven, expeditions were projected in the same year, one imagines that they would be safe from collision or annoyance. But no—Dr. Felix Koenig, leader of the proposed Austrian expedition, is quite upset because Sir Ernest Shackleton happens to have decided upon the same base. "Kindly move to another part of the Antarctic," is the burden of his request; and Sir Ernest, with cordial good wishes to his rival, refuses, precisely as we should expect him to do. "If you really think there is no room for both of the expeditions in the Weddell Sea," he writes, "may I suggest that you should make some other base, which would be equally convenient for the exploration and scientific observations that you have in view?" Quite a pleasant, courteous, and we hope effective reply!

Love, according to a contributor to the British Medical Journal, is a very risky thing. If not checked, it leads to neurasthenia; it also opens the system to the attacks of tuberculosis; and the blood of people in love, says this daring investigator, is in a state of "marked leucocytosis"—contains, that is, an excessive number of white corpuscles. He is of the opinion that a form of medical treatment should be discovered by which this dangerous disease may be stopped. Ruin threatens us—let us all be inoculated against the plague; let the poets hawk their songs in vain; and let Abelard and Heloise, with other immortal lovers, be blotted from our memories! Only one stern fact seems to confront this energetic reformer: most of us have been in love, and most of us bear up remarkably well—keep, in fact, quite healthy—under the trial!

It has been decided, after consultation with some of the leading representatives of the overseas Dominions, to publish from time to time in THE ACADEMY articles relating to a new aspect of Imperial affairs. The view has been put before us that at present no paper of the standing of THE ACADEMY attempts to discuss adequately the social and literary developments that are taking place throughout the Empire. It is true that the daily press devotes space to Imperial matters, but in a manner which unfortunately suggests to the reader that he is perusing a series of trade reports or statistical data. This paper will not neglect description of the wonderful resources contained within the Empire, nor will it fail to notice the great commercial enterprises which are bound up with its prosperity; all these important subjects will be dealt with, it is hoped, in a literary style, sympathetic with Imperial interests, and with the aim of promoting everything appertaining to the Imperial idea.

Communion

When the light of morning breaks,
 When the sleeping east awakes,
 And the green hills' lofty summits rear their banner's flaunting sign,
 Lo, where grey mists stop to dally
 Go I forward through the valley
 And the spirit of the morning is a spirit one with mine.

When the morning's lady passes
 And above the tall hot grasses
 Noon arises, Noon the splendid, Noon the blazing,
 Noon the fair—
 When her fiery foot treads over
 Fields of corn and scorching clover,
 From the shade I reach my fingers for the glory of her hair.

When the partridge sounds its drumming
 Music, 'mid the insects' humming,
 And the pale moon halts her coming, peering through her cloudy bars,
 Then I wander on the hoary
 Cliff, partaking of the glory,
 The compassion of the night-time and the fellowship of stars.

HARRY FOWLER.

Covenanters—Old and New

THE people of Scotland, if they are indifferent to the crisis of to-day, must have changed in their basic characteristics. Their spirit of enterprise leading to their diffusion throughout the world, civilised and uncivilised, has built up in no small degree the British Empire in some countries, and the supremacy of British talent in the domain of commercial success in others, which owe no allegiance to the national flag. "Civis Romanus est," or, as Lord Palmerston used to phrase it, "Civis Romanus sum," led the man of Scottish origin to believe that it was open to him to make use of his talents and opportunities in any part of the world with perfect immunity from oppression—religious or civil. The Scottish people are usually credited with being by temperament eminently practical and gifted with an instinct—approximating to the national attribute of second sight—as to the direction in which their personal interests lie.

The sound thinker, as opposed to the Socialist tub-thumper, knows that such personal attributes, whether he admires them or whether he does not, are essential to the progress of the world. Is it possible to conceive that Scotsmen are going to vote blindly to retain in office an administration which has been careful to give the lie to every stand-by of the marvellous prosperity which individual members of their nationality have been and are daily accomplishing?

The Governmental paralysis in the case of Benton is bad enough. The half-sheet of President Monroe, promulgated in a different age and with a different object, has been converted into a shibboleth of faith to shut out every nation from protecting its own subjects on the sacred soil of the Central and South American Republics. International law requires that a protectorate, in order to claim recognition, should be effectual, and yet it is observed that the Government of the United States has no more control over brigandage in Venezuela, or murder in Mexico, than Mr. Gladstone's Government were able to exercise over wayside murderers, farmhouse murderers, boycotters, et hoc genus omne, in the roaring days of the Land League. The iniquities perpetrated in those days at the behest of the soft-tongued, astute accomplices who did the talking in Parliament have been, it would seem, unhappily forgotten—we should hate to say condoned—by the Scottish elector of yesterday. Will the Scottish elector of to-morrow betray all the traditions as well as the hegemony of his race in return for the satisfaction of maintaining in power a corrupt conspiracy aimed against both?

In this article we are making an especial appeal to the Scottish conscience and intellect, wherever they exist. In earlier days, that conscience and that intellect would not consent to allow religious principles and civil liberties to be trampled under foot even by sovereigns of their own nationality. Their protests range over a period of nearly one hundred and fifty years of their history. Are the descendants of those who suffered for their unswerving loyalty to the "Solemn League and Covenant," about to abandon those of their kith and kin in Ulster who have now entered into their League and Covenant—no less solemn and no less sincere? Are they about to disregard the Covenant, to which the most distinguished Scotsmen, very eminent Englishmen, and the national asset, Lord Roberts, have set their signature?

In 1647, Charles I coquetted with the Covenanters, but they were of stern stuff not unlike to the Ironsides, and the King could prevail nothing. In 1914 is a hireling coalition, controlled by sedition—with the aid of Scotsmen—to wipe out the memory of the "Solemn League" by betraying the Calvinistic faith in the interest of the dogma of Rome?

In England, the Protestant and the Roman Catholic in the main are without antagonism, and respect each other. There is no contest because Protestantism is enormously in the ascendant, and is eminently tolerant. In Ireland, the conditions are reversed, and a Church which—with all its splendid traditions—disclaims tolerance as one of its virtues, is claiming a preponderance which it will use—if it can—to extirpate those who belong to a different communion.

Shall such things be? Are we to revert to the barbarism of the Middle Ages? Are Scotsmen so fickle to their faith and their convictions that they will tear to ribbons the Solemn League and Covenant, which Sir Walter Scott described as the "Magna Charta of the Presbyterian Church"?

CECIL COWPER.

The Spring Books

THE mutter of the storm of the publishing season has swelled to its full roar, and, if it seems not quite so furious as usual, there is still an energy about it which cannot be ignored. Whatever happens, authors and publishers make themselves busy, and, among a good deal that is negligible, we must point out certain items that are worthy of attention.

Messrs. Macmillan may be congratulated on the concluding volumes of "The Golden Bough," which Dr. Frazer has made a really great achievement; these were recently reviewed in our columns. The second part of Mr. Henry James's reminiscences is due, under the title of "Notes of a Son and Brother"; this continues the charming story of "A Small Boy and Others," which appeared last spring, and will refer to the first number of the Cornhill, the days of George Meredith's prime, of Charles Reade, Millais, and George du Maurier. In April, "The Day's Work" and "Stalky and Co." will be added to the fine Bombay Edition of Kipling's works, and in May Mr. Wells's "The World Set Free," now appearing in the English Review, will appear in book form at 6s. An important philosophical treatise just issued by this house at 21s. net, in two volumes, is "The Mediæval Mind," a history of the development of thought and emotion in the Middle Ages, by Dr. Henry Osborn Taylor, and a "Theory of Poetry in England," giving its progress in doctrines and ideas from the sixteenth to the nineteenth century, by Professor R. P. Cowl, will be awaited with interest. Five new books, by Maurice Hewlett, are announced in the "Sevenpenny" Series.

Eight years ago Messrs. Dent introduced something new in the publishing world by bringing out the first volumes of "Everyman's Library." Its aim was to reproduce the greatest classics in a handy size and at a moderate price, and there is no doubt that it was—and is—a successful venture both from the publishing and the literary point of view—two points which, as we all know, do not always coincide. This enterprise is now supplemented by another series, the first twelve volumes of which are just on sale. The object of the fresh departure is to present the lighter field of literature in a pleasant, attractive manner. Six divisions will classify these books: Romance and Adventure, Social and Domestic Fiction, Historical Fiction, Humour, Belles-Lettres, Travel and the Open Air. The first issue of a hundred will appear at the rate of twelve each month, and, judging by the specimens we have seen, this "Wayfarers' Library" ought to be as welcome as "Everyman's." Arnold Bennett, H. G. Wells, A. E. W. Mason, H. de Vere Stacpoole, and Perceval Gibbon—these carry off the "Romance" excellently, and we are pleased to see Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch's "Troy Town" in the department of "Humour," though we really think the "Essays of Elia" might now be allowed to rest awhile. Dorothy Osborne's "Letters" and G. K. Chesterton's "The Defendant" are welcome. As to style, it is wonderful at the price of a shilling; the end-papers are dainty, the type is perfectly clear, the various distinctive shades of the binding are attractive. We congratulate the publishers on their idea, and are pleased to have their assurance that no "problem" novel or morbid book will find a place in the collection.

Messrs. Heath, Cranton, and Ouseley have some excellent things in their catalogue. "The Evolution of the Olympic Games," by F. A. M. Webster, is specially illustrated, and has an appendix giving the complete results of English and American championships; at 6s. this is a valuable reference book for those interested in athletics. A volume on a novel theme is "The Ban of the Bori," an account of demons and demon-dancing in Africa, by Major Tremearne, M.A., who has seen many years' official service in West Africa and studied deeply the superstitions of various remote tribes; this will be issued at 21s. net, and will be fully illustrated. This firm has also a good list of fiction, items from which are frequently noticed in our columns.

Some notable biographies come from Mr. John Murray. The "Life of Sir Frederick Weld," Premier of New Zealand during the Maori War, by Alice, Lady Lovat (15s. net); the "Life and Letters of Lady Hester Stanhope," by the Duchess of Cleveland (15s. net); the third volume of Disraeli's life—these are standard books, and, with others of the same style, form an asset for the student of history. Mr. Roosevelt's "History as Literature" is just out, and the third volume of Professor Baldwin Brown's work, "The Arts in Early England," is in the press, dealing with Anglo-Saxon art and industry in the Pagan period. Some excellent novels and many educational books come from this centre.

Messrs. Herbert Jenkins, Ltd., also announce certain important biographical works. "The Wellesley Papers" and "The Windham Papers," both published at 32s. net, with portraits and other illustrations, may be regarded as companion-books and invaluable to those who are interested in the times of Pitt, Canning, Fox, and Peel. In another sphere Mr. Watts-Dunton's famous essays on "Poetry" and "The Renaissance of Wonder," now in book-form and to be bought for 5s., will be gratefully received; they are real contributions to criticism. A fine travel book is "Forty Years in Canada," by Col. Steele, C.B., late of the North-West Mounted Police (16s.), with an introduction by the late Lord Strathcona. The fiction list of this house is a strong one.

The catalogue of Messrs. Stanley Paul and Greening is very attractive in outside appearance, and contains many tempting titles. Early this month this firm publishes Christopher Hare's new book, "Men and Women of the Italian Reformation." Mr. Charles E. Pearce has written "The Jolly Duchess" (Harriott Mellon, Duchess of St. Albans), with memories of Sheridan and the old days of Drury Lane (16s. net); there is a long list of novels, and we note some remarkably interesting travel records and memoirs.

A book which will arouse considerable interest in Manchester, Glasgow, and Edinburgh, where the author was well known, is "Apostolic Religious Instruction," by the late Dr. Robert Craig; Messrs. Holden and Hardingham are about to issue this. They publish this week "The Whip," a novel on Mr. Cecil Raleigh's drama, illustrated, and new novels by Dolf Wyllarde, B. Landor, and N. Danchenko—the latter translated from the Russian by Dr. Rappoport. Another item of Russian interest is announced. After a period of friendship, Dostoieffsky and Turgenieff quarrelled violently, with the result that Dostoieffsky introduced a satiric portrait of his rival into "The Possessed." The actual cause of the break has never been clearly understood; but Messrs. Chatto and Windus have arranged to issue a volume of hitherto unpublished letters from Dostoieffsky, throwing new light on the matter. The English translation of these letters is now in active preparation, and the book will further contain personal recollections of Dostoieffsky by his intimate friends. The same firm will shortly publish "Miss Fortescue's Reminiscences" (16s. net), which is full of anecdotes of the days of Cecil Rhodes, Gilbert and Sullivan, and other interesting people. "The Book of the Bayeux Tapestry," by Hilaire Belloc, will be ready later in the year.

From Messrs. Constable many volumes of permanent value always come. M. Louis Bertrand's "Life of St. Augustin" has been translated by V. D. O'Sullivan, and will be issued at 7s. 6d.; "Mont St. Michel and Chartres" (25s. net.) is really a study of mediæval times in France, by Henry Adams; and "Thirty Years in Moukden," by Dr. and Mrs. Christie, will be one of the most fascinating books of the year on the Far East. Education and travel are two very strong subjects with this firm, and their technical text-books on various themes are famous.

The manuscript of Mrs. Mary Gaunt's new book, "A Woman in China," has arrived in London, and will be published by Mr. Werner Laurie later on; meanwhile many capital items can be found by a glance through his tempting list. "Saints and their Emblems," by M. and W. Drake (42s. net), should be a standard reference-book for the ecclesiologist, and the "Study of Gothic Architecture," by T. Francis Bumpus (10s. 6d. net), contains examples found in no other work of the kind. Mr. Laurie specialises on sound fiction, and his programme for the season is on a high level.

Mr. John Lane informs us that he has taken over from Messrs. Colnaghi the remaining 150 copies of "The Works of John Hoppner, R.A."—a magnificent book, exhaustive and authoritative; the price is five guineas, and it is illustrated with many plates taken from pictures never before reproduced. Among other fine volumes, one on "Oriental Rugs, Antique and Modern," by W. A. Hawley, at 42s., is to appear this week, and seems to touch new ground; colour and half-tone illustrations are a feature of this book. At 10s. 6d. Mr. Lane has just issued "Napoleon at Bay," by F. Loraine Petre; "On the Left of a Throne," by Mrs. Nepean; and "The Greatest House at Chelsea," by Randall Davies, all illustrated. The Bodley Head novels are, of course, in full stream, and will be referred to in our reviews.

Novels by such noted authors as Lucas Malet, Edgar Jephson, May Sinclair, R. H. Benson, and M. P. Willcocks are a strong feature of Messrs. Hutchinson's latest catalogue. A new volume is out in the "Nature Library," entitled "Insect Artisans," by Edward Step (6s. net), who is also preparing for immediate publication a fine fortnightly series on "Marvels of Insect Life." Some capital books of travel also are promised, and a volume which is sure to be exceptionally interesting—"Italian Yesterdays," by Mrs. Hugh Fraser, sister of Marion Crawford.

In Messrs. A. and C. Black's selection we notice some good travel items; "The Cradle of Mankind," by W. A. Wigram, is a description of life in Eastern Kurdistan, the borderland of Asiatic Turkey and Persia (12s. 6d. net), and has forty full-page illustrations, and "The Venetian Republic" (42s. net), by W. Carew Hazlitt, in a new edition, will have a vast amount of information added to the original work of 1860, collected by the author assiduously until his recent death. A useful book, "Careers for our Sons," by G. H. Williams, M.A., will come out in a new edition in July at the price of 5s. Many practical medical books and educational works are issued by the same firm.

Some reminiscences of Ernest Dowson, with hitherto unpublished letters, by Victor Plarr, will appeal to many students of the period when the French influence was very strong with a certain group of poets; this is to be published by Mr. Elkin Mathews; Lionel Johnson's collected poems is another tempting item in the same list. "In the Fall of the Leaf," by Stanhope Bayley; "Cubist Poems," by Max Weber; and "The New Circe," by F. G. Miller, are three new volumes in the famous Vigo Cabinet Series. Mr. Mathews has just issued a book by Professor Knight, "Coleridge and Wordsworth in the West Country," which contains some new information about the interesting friendships of the well-known group, and there are many other exceptionally good things coming from Cork Street in due season. Maurice Hewlett's "Visions and Dreams" is postponed until the autumn.

Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co. inform us that a fifth edition of the Journals of Captain Scott in the Antarctic is in the press. These two volumes have been, of course, the most noted publication of this firm for some time; but there are many books from the same list that should not be overlooked. "Egypt in Transition," by Sidney Low (7s. 6d. net), with an introduction by the Earl of Cromer, is a valuable contribution to the political and social administration of Egypt and the Sudan; "Hunting and Hunted in the Belgian Congo," by R. Davey Cooper, illustrated, includes some exciting adventures with elephants and with unfriendly natives; and in another sphere Sir Henry Lucy's book, "Sixty Years in the Wilderness: Nearing Jordan" (10s. 6d. net), will fascinate all who follow the genial pages of "Toby, M.P." Several excellent novels are just issued by the same house.

Messrs. G. Bell and Sons have a valuable list of books on Sociology. The first part of a "History of English Socialism," by M. H. Beer, is about to be issued, and will deal with Mediæval Communism, the Communists of the Civil War, and the fuller history of the movement to the end of Chartism; the second part will appear in the autumn (7s. 6d. each). "National Guilds," by A. R. Orage (5s.), and "Railway Rates and Traffic," a translation from a French authority (2s. 6d.), are two other books in this department. In other sections we notice many interesting publications; "Round the World in a Motor-Car," by J. J. Mann, with over 75 half-tone illustrations, is to appear at about 7s. 6d. net; the last volume in the Swift Series, the "Correspondence," is due; a new volume in the Bohn Standard Library, "Butler's Sermons," with notes, is announced (3s. 6d.); and next week the "Popular" Library will have its third instalment on sale—several of Anthony Trollope's novels, the fifth of the Emerson books, and Macaulay's essays being the principal features. Other historical and miscellaneous books of great interest from York House might be mentioned if we had space.

The next series of lectures at the Victoria and Albert Museum will have reference to the Ceramic and Textile Departments. The first, on "Stained Glass," will be given on Thursday, March 12, by Mr. Noël Heaton, B.Sc. It will be followed by lectures on "Italian Majolica," by Mr. Bernard Rackham, M.A., on the 19th; "Embroideries of the Greek Islands," by Mr. A. J. B. Wace, M.A., on March 26; "Some Sources of Modern Textile Design," by Mr. A. F. Hendrick, B.A., the following week. The above will be the last of the current session. It is hoped to arrange further lectures in October next.

REVIEWS

Royal Academician and Rector

*Matthew William Peters, R.A. His Life and Work.*By LADY VICTORIA MANNERS. (The Connoisseur. 10s. 6d. net.)

PETERS lived in the second half of the eighteenth century, when it was even easier than at the present day to mark what ills the writer's or the artist's

. . . life assail—
Toil, envy, want, the patron, and the jail.

But the famous painter, who became a parson, proved more worldly-wise than many an artist we have known, and was fortunate in his patrons. If he knew something of toil and envy he avoided the other ills with ease. One of the great men of the day who valued his work most highly was Charles, Fourth Duke of Rutland, who, with his beautiful wife, Mary Isabella, aided his career immensely. The duke and duchess were rewarded by the possession of some of his finest pictures and such immortality as an accomplished eighteenth-century painter can confer. Thus it comes about that Lady Victoria Manners, the sister of the present duke, is by far the most suitable writer of a monograph on Peters, and thus it happens that many reproductions in this delightful volume come from the home of the Rutlands. The Connoisseur, too, is an eminently appropriate publisher for the volume; the managers of that magazine have always worked nobly to keep alive the memory of artists and craftsmen of other days. And it must be owned that some ten or so years ago the reputation of William Peters as a painter was almost wholly submerged by the fame of various splendid mezzo-tints after his works by eighteenth-century masters.

Long ago we used frequently to visit a room in an old country house in the Isle of Wight—the artist was born in the Island, 1742—in which hung for very many years reproductions of what we still are inclined to consider his two best genre pictures. These were "The Fortune Teller" and "The Gamesters." Although we may have looked at them and spoken of them hundreds of time, we never then heard them mentioned except as being, the former, a fine example of the work of J. R. Smith, and the latter, a deep and splendid mezzo-tint by William Ward. We knew that "The Gamesters" was supposed to be something of a moral lesson and that it bore the legend, "To the Young Nobility of England this Plate is most humbly Inscribed by their devoted and obedient servant, J. R. Smith, 1786," for Smith was the publisher. But as to William Peters, he seemed to have dropped out of the affair in much the same way as he shed his first name of Matthew.

Years afterwards we happened on a work by Caravaggio (1569-1609), which shows the same three characters as those in "The Gamesters," but dressed in sixteenth instead of eighteenth-century costume. This matter gave us some interest in Peters, who, gifted as he often proved himself, was not disinclined to adopt a style or method or, in this case, an actual composition, from a greater artist than himself. Among the very many admirable illustrations which Lady Victoria gives, this particular picture is not reproduced. Nor does she mention how directly it is adapted from the picture by Caravaggio. The author tells us, however, that "The Gamesters," in which a handsome boy of eighteen is being tricked by two sharps, contained portraits. It has been said that the boy was the Prince of Wales, afterwards George IV, or his brother, the Duke of York, but a better guess is that the faces are those of Lord Courtenay, his son, and Rowlandson, the famous painter. These discoveries are also rather doubtful, as are many of the other names given to personages in the pictures of Peters. We should like to believe, for example, that the girl in one of the artist's most beautiful paintings, "Love in her eyes sits playing," was really the charming Mrs. Jordan, the admired actress and mistress of the Duke of Clarence, but we fear that the date of the painting does not admit of this generally accepted supposition. Perhaps the companion picture was a portrait, as is usually stated, of the lovely model of Sir Joshua Reynolds, Miss Kitty Fisher, but like many another work of the artist which bears a poetic or sentimental name, the actual sitter is very doubtful. But there are still plenty of perfectly well-known portraits from his brush, such as the fine group "Morris Robinson and his Family," or the sterling Edward Wortley Montagu; the brilliant Miss Eliza Phelps, or the Reynolds-like Lady Charlotte Bertie, or the convincing Duke of Rutland and his Duchess. But portraiture is only one department of this artist's many-sided work which is engaging from whatever point of view we look at it.

We fully agree with Lady Victoria when she says that "To the student of the Early English School, Peters' work will always have an abiding interest and charm, for if his productions

NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE

INSURANCE COMPANY.

Funds Exceed £23,000,000.

"An old and first class office. Low rates a distinctive feature."—The Times.

Chief Offices :—LONDON : 61 Threadneedle Street. EDINBURGH : 64, Princes Street.

are frequently unequal and his drawing sometimes faulty, these defects are outweighed by his fresh and beautiful colour, and by his often brilliant execution and rich impasto and his simple and direct method of painting. His pictures remain in most cases as fresh and brilliant in tone as when they were first painted; neither do his canvases crack and fade—in striking contrast to his great contemporaries, Reynolds and Gainsborough." This is well and truly stated, and if we may judge by auction-room figures, Peters may be said to be a very rising stock. This is partly owing to the fact that comparatively few of his pictures are known. Although he worked with great success for about thirty years before his clerical duties led him away from the studio, we seldom see his paintings. It is true that a considerable number were burnt in various fires, but as he seldom signed his work and painted sometimes in the various styles of his contemporaries, it is supposed by many, as by Lady Victoria, that his works are often attributed to better-known names.

Portraiture; the delicate paintings of women, idealised and given sentimental names, which were considered by Peters himself and a somewhat absurd generation to be of a risqué character; many delightful pictures of children; gay compositions like "The Fortune Teller," and Shakespearean illustrations, go to make up the sum total of his work as we know it. His biographer thinks there must be much more which is lost or hidden under other names. In that case, the agreeable work of Lady Victoria Manners will do much to encourage others to trace and make public these works.

The life of Peters, which also comes within the scope of this book, is not easy to trace, nor are his circumstances, psychology and ambitions readily set forth. As with most of us, his motives throughout life appear to have been mixed; when we are quite sure he is devoted to art and is learning to master his difficult profession, we find him casting his eyes upon the loaves and fishes of the Church—the Church of which he became an admirable servant. So gifted and complex a personage requires accomplished handling, and we fear that Lady Victoria is occasionally a little impatient of her rather large undertaking. Sometimes she writes well and clearly, then there are chapters that seem to be confused repetitions of the affairs that have been spoken of before.

But hitherto the subject has been so neglected that we feel greatly indebted for such work as the author of "Matthew William Peters, R.A.," cares to give us, and advise all interested in art to read this monograph, from which the once famous painter and well-known parson emerges as a clever and generous, large-minded and lovable personality. E. M.

On March 3, Mr. Herbert Jenkins published "The Year-Book of the Universities of the Empire," giving a concise account of the constitution, curricula, degrees, libraries, laboratories, of these centres. This book is published under the direction of the Committee of the Universities Bureau of the British Empire.

Education Controversy

What is Education? By STANLEY LEATHES, C.B., M.A. (G. Bell and Sons. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Dignity of Business; Thoughts and Theories on Business and Training for Business. By H. E. MORGAN. (Ewart Seymour and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Unfolding of Personality as the Chief Aim in Education. By H. CHISELTON MACK, D.Lit., B.Sc. (T. Fisher Unwin. 1s. net.)

OF making books on education there seems no end, and much study of them is a weariness to the spirit. Of pedagogues who rush into print, each and every one thinks that he has discovered the panacea for all evils. By faddists we are simply overrun. It is refreshing, then, to read a book by a competent and observant scholar who possesses also a really liberal outlook. Mr. Stanley Leathes has written a really shrewd inquiry into the principles of education and the defects of our modern system. "Education," he observes, "used to be natural, automatic, instinctive: it has become self-conscious. Education used to be individualistic; it has become socialistic. The immediate result is a greater consumption of energy; with a loss of efficiency in many directions." In another place, he points out, that, "after more than forty years of State elementary education, it is still held by many that what the majority require is more book-learning." Now, by whatever circumlocution education may be defined, all sound definitions resolve themselves into one simple statement, viz., that education is the preparation for the whole business of life. "Yet for a large proportion of the community, book-learning has little bearing upon business. Agricultural labourers, miners, porters, railwaymen, navvies, labourers, machine operatives, carters, domestic servants—in all these classes intelligence is valuable, but not book-learning. In almost all the skilled manual trades book-learning is not directly useful. If book-learning does not develop intelligence and love of work it is useless in all these occupations. It must be admitted that the results of compulsory State education are hitherto disappointing, from the point of view of business. The population has more book-learning, but it is not yet more efficient. It is not right, nor is it needful, to teach the multitude things that can be of no use to them, in order that the few may profit if their chance arrives."

We have purposely given these quotations at length, because, from a long experience of elementary education, we are persuaded that Mr. Leathes here strikes at the greatest defect in modern State education. The teaching faddists have invaded our schools, and have substituted for the old solid elementary groundwork the smatterings of innumerable unnecessary subjects. For example, what can be more absurd than to see a town-bred, college-taught mistress taking country children, brought up on the land, for a nature-study walk? No doubt the teacher may learn a good deal more than she can find in her little natural history primers. But what waste of valuable time for the children. Or, again, the farcical nonsense of teaching drawing with coloured chalks to boys destined to follow the plough. Or the modelling of birds' nests in mud and sticks to girls, who should be much more wisely employed in learning to sew better.

Mr. Leathes has the courage to say that "even for clerks, half the things they have learnt at school have no business value. Their reading, their spelling, their handwriting, their arithmetic, their English, will stand them in good stead." Here is the whole truth in a nutshell. The old proficiency in this solid ground-work, thoroughly taught and thoroughly learnt, is now often lost in a maze of bewildering subjects which merely waste valuable time. Children in the State schools, if thoroughly grounded in the elementary work, have the means of educating themselves in an age when books are cheap and opportunities manifold. Those who are really clever or above the average will rise to high place more easily from solid bed-rock teaching than from a general ignorance or incapacity which is the result of half-learning too many things.

For example, we look in vain to-day for the natural instinct of the handicraftsman of the Middle Ages, which produced such splendid art work. Mr. Leathes has a good deal to say about education in secondary schools on the vexed question of compulsory Greek. He is an opportunist, and thinks that headmasters should aim at making Greek and Latin a prize for those boys who proved themselves capable of learning other and easier languages. But he says nothing of the special and great importance of Greek for science students in helping them to really understand the terminology of science, which they have to read and use every day. It was on this ground that Lord Kelvin strenuously defended the retention of Greek. At the same time he makes a very sound observation about the love of literature for its own sake, which applies to the English as well as the Greek and Latin classics. "The humorists of the Renaissance were lovers of literature, but they loved not the mere history and criticism of books, but the wisdom and humane love that the books contained." Literature, when got up for modern examination, is often completely spoiled by notes more voluminous than the text, which tend to disgust the unfortunate student, and even arouse an aversion from the great authors.

As Mr. Leathes observes, with delightful humour: "To examine in English literature is like opening a coal-mine in the Lake District." The controversy of religion is avoided, but it is worth while noting that Mr. Leathes does not see why any person who is to live in this country or this Empire should demand to be ignorant of the four Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles in the Authorised Version. Elsewhere he speaks of the great importance and value in education of the literature of the Bible. On the whole, we may securely say that his book is one of the best answers we have seen to its own title, "What is Education?"

Mr. H. E. Morgan pleads for a strictly business education on commercial grounds, to meet the severe Macmillan's New Books.

VOL. II. NOW READY.

MACAULAY'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND: ILLUSTRATED EDITION.

Edited by C. H. FIRTH, M.A. With 900 Illustrations, including 44 in Colour and Photogravure Portrait. In 6 vols. (Published Quarterly.) Super-royal 8vo. Vols. I. and II., 10s. 6d. net each.

Illustrated Prospectus Post Free on Application.

SATURDAY REVIEW.—"This illustrated edition of 'Macaulay's History,' which Mr. Firth has taken charge of, is sure of a wide welcome. His great book will always be one of the glories of English literature."

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE PRINCIPLES OF WAR HISTORICALLY ILLUSTRATED.

By MAJOR-GENERAL E. A. ALTHAM, C.B., C.M.G. Vol. I., with an Introduction by General SIR HORACE L. SMITH-DORRIEN, G.C.B., D.S.O., etc., and a separate Volume of Maps. 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

[Military Text-Books.

*. An attempt to illustrate the principles set forth in Field Service Regulations, Part I., by a study of recent campaigns.

NEW VOL. JUST READY.

WESSEX EDITION OF THE WORKS OF THOMAS HARDY.

In 21 vols. 8vo. Cloth gilt. 7s. 6d. net each. With Preface, Frontispiece, and Map in each Vol.

Vol. 18. A Changed Man, The Waiting Supper, and Other Tales, concluding with The Romantic Adventures of a Milkmaid.

NEW BOOK BY

AUTHOR OF "PRO CHRISTO ET ECCLESIA."

THE PRACTICE OF CHRISTIANITY.

By the Author of "Pro Christo et Ecclesia." Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net.

THE TIMES.—"The book is a call to a new social life, and a challenge to many schools of religious and social thought. Whether right or wrong, it is one of those books which do much to clarify and stimulate religious thought."

THE OWNERSHIP, TENURE, AND TAXATION OF LAND.

Some Facts, Fallacies, and Proposals relating thereto. By the Right Hon. SIR THOMAS P. WHITTAKER, P.C., M.P. 8vo. 12s. net.

ECONOMIC NOTES ON ENGLISH AGRICULTURAL WAGES.

By REGINALD LENNARD, M.A., late Exhibitioner of New College, Oxford. 8vo. 5s. net.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

FOR SALE.

Several Hundred Copies of a Specially Prepared Map of South America

Printed in Colours, showing the Produce and Chief Characteristics for which each District is noted.

For particulars apply

ACADEMY OFFICE,
63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

competition of Germany and America. To this end he is particularly anxious to capture the Public Schools and the ancient Universities. He does not see any reason why Oxford and Cambridge should not reconcile business with what he curiously calls their "romantic mission." Though he believes in the prestige, tone and general training of these Universities, like Cecil Rhodes he probably regards Oxford Dons as "babes in business." In fact, he says that "on the whole there exists at both Universities a profound and astonishing ignorance of all that business means." The real truth is that he is sensitive because he imagines that the Universities look down on commerce as upon a "lower level than school-mastering, doctoring, or engineering." Or, that they regard the business man as a vandal? Surely all this is a little beside the mark. There are plenty of cultured business men. But would it help their culture to modernise the Universities into schools of business? And, practically, how is it to be done? Colleges cannot be turned into counting-houses. Would the suggested Business Diploma as a post-graduate course have any real value? Would it not be theoretical and academical as compared with real knowledge gained in a large business house? True, there are business Universities, like Owen's College, Manchester, but thus to modernise Oxford and Cambridge would be little short of disaster. The real remedy would be for the old Universities to receive students (as in the past) some two years younger than the present customary age, so that they might graduate earlier, and then proceed to the counting-house. As things are, it is remarkable how anxious great business houses are to welcome Oxford and Cambridge graduates who have had no special business training. Their education, however unbusiness-like, has its own particular value in business.

In "The Unfolding of Personality," Dr. Thiselton Mack has written an interesting inquiry into the psychology of child-study. He examines at length the instinctive tendencies of human nature, and the general mental process, and sub-conscious action in the evolution of personality. Such inquiries have their value for those who possess sufficient discrimination to use them rightly. But we are inclined to think that child-study may be overdone and that children themselves are sometimes suffering nowadays from being the unfortunate subjects of too drastic an experimental psychology which, wrongly used, tends to make them hyper-sensitive, and even morbidly self-conscious, to the oversetting of the proper relations between teachers and taught. There is something unnatural and even unwholesome at times, in the subtle analysis of every movement, thought, and action. One of the greatest defects of our modern system is that most children go to school far too young. Psychological faddists would like to experiment on babies. Given the best intentions, children are still the victims. There is much talk of natural development, but this is the last thing allowed to the rising generation, whose training daily becomes more and more strained and artificial. Nietzsche was right when he spoke as one crying in the wilderness, "Educate the educators."

Papua in Transition

In Far New Guinea. By HENRY NEWTON. Illustrated. (Seeley, Service, and Co. 16s. net.)

IT seems only the other day that Great Britain—or rather Queensland, acting without authority in the name of Queen Victoria—took possession of the south-eastern part of New Guinea, or British Papua as it is now called. Yet that was thirty years ago. A new generation of Papuans has come into existence in the interval; British authority, British enterprise and well-directed missionary efforts have effected changes which amount to economic and social revolution. Cannibalism has been destroyed, except, perhaps, among the more inaccessible of the tribes of the interior and some of the adjacent islands; sorcery, which was the most potent of all native customs, is officially suppressed, and, in fact, only exists where the sorcerer thinks he is safe from the police; industries, mainly of the plantation order, have been introduced, which bring unwonted opportunities to the natives of earning what to them will be riches.

Will the changes which are rapidly taking place be for the good of these primitive folk, now being led out of some of the worst forms of barbarism? So far, there can be no sort of question that the coming of the white man has been a boon to the Papuan. Where British authority obtains, he can at least till his much-prized garden in peace. Mr. Newton properly calls these people children of Nature. Their skulls, which even a falling cocoanut, he suggests, would hardly hurt, are beginning to absorb ideas wholly different from those of their fathers, and their totems and traditions, some making for good, some for mischief, will not indefinitely survive the influence of civilised government, the school-teacher and the missionary. Mr. Newton seems to fear the effect of the opening up of the country by syndicates: a corporation (which is printed "co-operation," one of too many absurd misprints in the book) has neither body to be kicked nor soul to be damned, as he says, and when its interests come into conflict with the native, it is usually the native that has to go.

The breaking up of native customs in itself is a danger. No doubt many of the superstitions and practices which appear to the enlightened European mind gross and ridiculous have their origin in utility. The sorcerer who casts so unnerving a spell that even death is not beyond his powers probably derived his earliest influence from the necessity of bringing recalcitrants to book. Why is it, to take a simple illustration from these very suggestive pages, that New Guinea children, who have been taught and practise tidy habits at home, in the mission station, throw off all regard for decency and are wilfully destructive of or indifferent to the very things they have respected in their native village? Is the change due to anything else than the realisation that evil spirits have no place in the mission house? "External custom and tradition rule their lives, not moral sense," says Mr. Newton, and the problem before Government of finding equally potent moral substitutes for the influences they remove is an anxious one. But the fringe of Native New Guinea in that section of it which is under the British flag has yet only been touched, and the sort of material on which the Government has to work is admirably shown both by text and picture in this account of a missionary's observations and experiences.

The Forerunners of the "Grand Siècle"

L'Esprit Classique et la Préciosité au XVIIe Siècle.
By J. E. FIDAO-JUSTINIANI. (Auguste Picard, Paris. 3 fr. 50.)

WE have never been able to discover—perhaps it is for want of proper diligence—the French equivalent for that admirable piece of English slang, "shop." But if the French have not the word, they have at least realised the idea. More than once in their history they have placed a stigma on "gendeletterie," and the whole of the "Grand Siècle" was a reminder to poets and writers that they, too, were men. "Le bel air," the ideal of the seventeenth century, "exigeait d'abord," says M. Fidao-Justiniani, "qu'on ne fût point l'homme, exclusivement, d'un métier." If Chapelain did nothing else for his age, he at least taught it a disgust for inky fingers.

Chapelain is one of the vanquished of literature. Nobody reads his prose, except to confirm or refute a theory about French literature. The two specimens printed at the end of M. Fidao-Justiniani's study are, however, by no means without interest or savour. Chapelain's poetry apparently failed to excite the applause even of his most sympathetic contemporaries. We have read somewhere that Chapelain was the only poet brought up for the profession; if that be true, it is an argument against technical education.

Everyone wants the BEST

in Everything, so why not have the
BEST LIFE POLICY
by effecting one with

The Legal and General Life Assurance
Society,

10 FLEET ST., LONDON, E.C.

Bonus for over 20 years - 38/- per cent. compound

From SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S List

EGYPT IN TRANSITION.

By SIDNEY LOW, Author of "A Vision of India," etc. With Portraits and an Introduction by the Right Hon. the EARL OF CROMER, O.M., P.C., G.C.B. Small Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

COUNTRY LIFE: "The book has a story to tell of infinitely greater interest than that in any novel."

FOLK OF THE FURROW.

By CHRISTOPHER HOLDENBY. With a Preface by the Right Hon. SIR HORACE PLUNKETT, D.L., P.C. (Ireland), K.C.V.O., etc. Large post 8vo. 6s. net.

DUBLIN DAILY EXPRESS: "We consider Mr. Holdenby's intimate and loving picture of the English agricultural labourer as informing and suggestive as it is opportune."

THE HORNS OF TAURUS.

By J. GRIFFYTH FAIRFAX, Author of "The Gates of Sleep, and other Poems," "The Troubled Pool, and other Poems," etc. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

CANADIAN NIGHTS.

By the Right Hon. The EARL OF DUNRAVEN, K.P., C.M.G., Under Secretary to the Colonies 1885-1887, Author of "The Great Divide," "The Upper Yellowstone," etc. Small Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

HUNTING AND HUNTED IN THE BELGIAN CONGO.

Being the Account of a Trip in the year 1910. By R. DAVEY COOPER. Edited by R. KEITH JOHNSTON. With 24 Illustrations and a Sketch Map. Small Royal 8vo.

POT-POURRI MIXED BY TWO.

By Mrs. C. W. EARLE, Author of "Pot-Pourri from a Surrey Garden," etc., and Miss ETHEL CASE. With Illustrations. Small Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

MALCOLM MACCOLL: Memoirs and Correspondence.

By the Right Hon. GEORGE W. E. RUSSELL, Author of "Collections and Recollections," etc. Small Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

WHERE NO FEAR WAS.

By ARTHUR C. BENSON, Author of "The Upton Letters," "From a College Window," etc. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

FRIENDS ROUND THE WREKIN.

By LADY CATHERINE MILNES GASKELL, Author of "Spring in a Shropshire Abbey," etc. With Illustrations. Small Demy 8vo. 9s. net.

A MEMOIR OF JOHN WESTLAKE.

Contributed by some of the many friends of the distinguished International Lawyer. With Portraits. Large Medium 8vo. 6s. net.

ST. MARGARET'S, WESTMINSTER.

By the Rev. H. F. WESTLAKE, M.A., Custodian and Minor Canon of Westminster Abbey. With 16 page Illustrations. Small Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

LOMBARD TOWNS OF ITALY.

By EGERTON R. WILLIAMS, Author of "Hill Towns of Italy," "Plain Towns of Italy," etc. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

SHAKESPEARE PERSONALLY.

By the late PROFESSOR MASSON; Edited and Arranged by ROSALINE MASSON. Large Post 8vo. 6s. net.

NEW 6/- NOVELS.

PARIAH AND BRAHMIN.

Austin Philips. THE CIVILIAN: "There is not a single Civil Servant, who has the interests of the Service at heart, who is not indebted to the author for this volume. It is a study of the caste of the system."

LOVE THE HARPER.

Eleanor G. Hayden. (March 19.)

MATTHEW HARGRAVES.

S. G. Tallentyre. (April 2.)

THE PASTOR'S WIFE.

By the Author of "Elizabeth and Her German Garden," etc.

THE LOST TRIBES

George A. Birmingham.

JOHN BULTEEL'S DAUGHTERS.

Katharine Tynan

CHIGNETT STREET, A PROVIDED SCHOOL.

B. Paul Neuman.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

About Chapelain the poet no one nowadays need bother to form an opinion; if he did take this trouble, the opinion would probably, when formed, give him no greater satisfaction than a successful piece of stenciling. But Chapelain the critic, the herald of a literary coterie, is by no means without his importance in literature. Chapelain was the accredited representative of the Précieux. Now, the Précieux have fared at the hands of history even worse than their spokesman. He is forgotten; they have become a by-word. Boileau killed Chapelain, rather, if M. Fidaio-Justiniani is to be believed, as the ungrateful serpent his benefactor; Molière made the Précieux immortal in their most mortal part.

The thesis of M. Fidaio-Justiniani may be quickly summarised. The précieux movement was not an irrelevant and regrettable incident in the development of the great French literary period; it was, on the contrary, an integral factor in that development; it was in the true direction of French thought and feeling. The movement had its excrescences; there were undoubtedly the "Précieux ridicules," but there were, no less undoubtedly, the "grands Précieux." It is the purpose of this little book to show that the latter more than excuse the former. Every great literary movement groped a little at its beginnings; even the youthful genius of Goethe was nourished in the Dictæan cave of "Sturm und Drang."

"Précieux Ridicules" and "Grands Précieux"!—"Le siècle de Louis le Grand fut précieux d'un bout à l'autre, et je crois bien qu'on y rencontre, d'un bout à l'autre aussi, des précieux de la première espèce côte à côte avec des précieux de la seconde." M. Fidaio-Justiniani is convinced that the précieux movement was the corner-stone of the Classical school. Even Racine, even Corneille, in spite of the battle round the "Cid," continued the Précieux. The twin conceptions of love and glory that inform the great classical drama are marked with the précieux stamp. Madame de Sévigné was the pupil of Chapelain. The rules, the famous rules, of Classicism, were formulated for French use by these disowned predecessors of Boileau; they had long been formulated in Italy. And Chapelain, before Boileau, had realised that it was not "les règles" that matter, but "la règle."

It is the age of rehabilitations. Many a reputation has revived when once the arrow of calumny has been withdrawn; but when the point of the arrow is steeped in ridicule, recovery is less certain. Anyhow, M. Fidaio-Justiniani has given good evidence for his contention that, at a given moment, "la société précieuse, c'était toute la France," and that the Seventeenth Century was a précieux century. He has emphasised the very just distinction between the "Précieux ridicules" and the "grands Précieux," and holds, of the latter, "qu'ils aient fait de l'artifice, ou de l'affectation, un dogme ou une règle, et qu'ils aient assisté ou encouragé les femmes savantes, c'est ce qu'on n'a pas encore prouvé; et on peut prouver le contraire." One can prove anything.

Shorter Reviews

Les Prêtres Danseurs de Rome: Etude sur la Corporation sacerdotale des Saliens. By RENÉ CIRILLI. (Paul Geuthner, Paris. 7 fr. 50.)

THE Saliens have often puzzled commentators—of Horace, for instance—and the commentators have often puzzled inquiring students on their subject. M. Cirilli has gathered into the present volume all there is to know about the Saliens, and has propounded one or two theories about them. All the inscriptions relating to this priestly corporation have been reproduced, as well as the principal references to it in Classical Literature.

M. Cirilli believes that the Saliens were essentially an Italian institution. Their accoutrement, varying but slightly from town to town of Central Italy, indicates it. The simultaneous existence of two "colleges" of Saliens, on the Palatine and the Quirinal respectively, points to very early and intimate facts in the history of Rome as being associated with their origin. The choice of divinities to be invoked is subject to evolution and proves little, but the permanent patrician qualification is a strong argument for the national thesis.

Cognate rites and cults abounded, and M. Cirilli goes very thoroughly into the whole subject of palladia. The dress and the dance of the Saliens is discussed, and their itinerary for festivals is traced. The notes to Horace, Odes I, 37-2, and IV, 1-28, will have to be expanded.

The Comic Kingdom: Napoleon, the Last Phase but Two. By RUDOLF PICKTHALL. Illustrated. (John Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

HAVING explored the island of Elba in the company of a few friends and acquaintances, and with the assistance of a highly incompetent but self-satisfied guide, Mr. Pickthall presents us with quite an amusing book, adorned with photographs that vary in merit with the amount of sea included in them. "The Comic Kingdom" is really nothing but a piece of purely tourist experience, grafted on an account of Napoleon's doings in the island. But the tourist part is entertainingly done, and the unscrupulous guide, Orestes, if he does not exist, deserves to do so, for having said of a complaining "Milord"—"'E no dam good. 'E afraid of dis water from de clouds because dere is no soap in it.'" The prisoner and "Comic King" of Elba is portrayed by a gradual and somewhat random process. He is shown taking his diminished responsibilities with a feigned seriousness, and, by arts comparable to those of Lucius Junius Brutus, lulling the vigilance of his spies and warders. He chases chickens and he conquers Pianosa. An incident well narrated is the visit of Mme. Walewska to the island.

Some Counsels of S. Vincent de Paul, to which is appended The Thoughts of Mademoiselle le Gras.
Translated and Selected by E. K. SANDERS.
(Heath, Cranton, and Ouseley.)

ALTHOUGH nearly three centuries have elapsed since S. Vincent de Paul delivered his short sermons to the Companies of Mission Priests and Sisters of Charity in France, the exhortations come as fresh to, and are as needful for, those who follow in the footsteps—either cloistered or in the world—of the earnest men and women to whom they were first addressed. Conditions and environment may change, but human nature ever remains the same, always striving and seeking for a light greater than that contained in the best among us. And it is to satisfy this need and to give encouragement to souls who grow weary, to those who are irritable, those who are slack, that the counsels of so long ago are translated and selected for English readers. They are simple and direct, can give offence to none—should that be counted as a quality—and must certainly prove helpful to many who sometimes find it difficult to keep a clear view of spiritual matters amid so much that is worldly and distracting. Mademoiselle le Gras' thoughts form a suitable close to the longer counsels.

EDUCATIONAL

We have received from Messrs. Macmillan and Co. "Test Papers in Elementary Algebra," by Clement V. Durell, M.A. (3s. 6d.). This collection of papers, designed primarily for out-of-school work, is intended to supplement those given in existing text-books. It contains a number of questions taken from the examination papers of leading authorities.

Messrs. George Philip and Son send us Junior Book VII of the "Piers Plowman Histories," by E. H. Spalding, M.A., and Phyllis Wragge (2s.). This volume deals with the nation and its government from 1485 to the present day. It is plentifully illustrated with reproductions of old paintings, engravings, and carvings, and contains in addition several maps, some in colour. At the end are genealogical tables and a very useful list of dates.

Messrs. Blackie and Son have recently added to their admirable series, the "Little French Classics" (4d. each), Alfred de Vigny's pathetic story, "Laurette, ou le Cachet Rouge," edited by Thomas Keen, M.A.; "Souvenirs de Madame Le Brun," chosen and edited by Edith H. Herbert; and Augustin Thierry's "Récits des Temps Mérovingiens," edited by Taylor Dyson, B.A. De Vigny's story is the first of the three forming his "Servitude et Grandeur Militaires," which was mainly based on the recollections and experiences of former companions in arms. "Laurette" is a terrible episode of the time of the Directory. That prolific painter, Madame Vigée Le Brun, who executed no fewer than 662 portraits, painted her mother when only fifteen, and was still painting vigorously at the advanced age of eighty. M. Thierry is probably best known to English readers by his account of the Norman Conquest. He belongs to the narrative school of historians, and has produced some splendid examples of the heroic treatment of history. These three booklets are capably edited, and are provided with excellent explanatory notes and various exercises.

All Society curious to know

"Who has Written this Clever Novel?"

But the Author for the present remains anonymous.

The LADY of GROSVENOR PLACE

By a TITLED MEMBER OF SOCIETY,
IS CAUSING A SENSATION.

First supplies at once exhausted.

The publishers have now executed all large repeat orders so that you should OBTAIN AT ONCE. 6s.

"Makes a strong appeal to the reader."—THE TIMES.

"Incidentally exposes a Scandal of Fashionable Egypt."

The THRICE BORN

By THEODORE FLATAU, Author of "Soul of the Dancer."

Ffynon THE SIN-EATER

By "A WHISPER," Author of "Black Mask."

THE TIMES: "Its writing and its craftsmanship deserve all praise."

THE TIMES: "A cloak and sword romance very popular in France."

BLUSH ROSE

By ERNEST VIZETELLY.

Has been compared to "The Three Musketeers," and gained for its French author the Cross of the Legion of Honour.

DAILY CHRONICLE: "It would sound like exaggeration to declare the book was of the same breed as the immortalities of Dumas; but it is not so unlike, and shows an extraordinary fertility of invention. It were as easy to put Vesuvius in a pill-box as adequately to suggest or epitomise the varied interest."

THE ACADEMY: "One more romance of war and stirring events. . . The reader hurries on breathless to know what will happen. . . Thanks are due to Mr. Vizetelly."

The Novel of OECIL RALEIGH'S Great Drury Lane Drama.
THE WHIP

With Illustrations from the Play. 6s.

THE PURPLE LIGHT

By BUCHAN LANDOR,

Author of "The Mystic of Prague."

NEXT WEEK.

DOLF WYLLARD'S Great New Novel

IT WAS THE TIME OF ROSE 6s.

THREE IMMENSE SUCCESSES

RED PEARLS

By CHARLOTTE MANSFIELD, Author of "Love and a Woman." 6s.

FRUITS OF PLEASURE

By FARREN LE BRETON. 6s.

HYLDA RHODES' Fine Novel

A VASE OF CLAY

By a Sister of the Gifted Authoress KATHLYN RHODES, Author of "The Straight Race." 3rd Edition. 6s.

LONDON: HOLDEN & HARDINGHAM.

Fiction

South Sea Shipmates. By JOHN ARTHUR BARRY. (T. Werner Laurie. 6s.)

ANYONE who enjoys a pipe and a book will find Mr. Barry's collection of sea stories excellent company. The author unfortunately died before the publication, but he was evidently a man of many parts and varied experiences, equally successful in realistic description of the Australian Bush as in the chequered sea life which he so vividly describes in vigorous vernacular. On clippers, tramps, and "windjammers" he was equally at home, and the many adventures with cannibals, thieves, and all sorts and conditions of men—and a few women—complete a book which lovers of the sea will find particularly fascinating. The quaintest of the stories is "How the League Went to Sea"; whether founded on fact or not, it is quite refreshing. Just a touch of love affairs ends the last story of the volume, and leaves our heroes in a safe and pleasant haven after all their buffetings and hard luck on the high seas.

The Split Peas. By HEADON HILL. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

The Ransom for London. By J. S. FLETCHER. (John Long. 6s.)

THERE is something in common in these books, as the plots both deal with a contemplated injury to England and its people.

Taking the first, we have a Prime Minister, his daughter, and an officer in the Guards; a conspiracy to undermine the loyalty of the Army generally—the Guards in particular; and Windsor is the locale of much of the story. Two Eton boys appear who start emulating Sherlock Holmes, a foreign element of Socialists whose headquarters are, of course, Soho, and a beautiful Foreign Attaché, who disguises himself as an old Jew and is hand-in-glove with the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Add to this a powerful daily paper called "The Lynx," run by a peer, and the materials for the pudding are collected. All ends well.

The other book is more ambitious. We have German and Italian scientists, a Prime Minister, his daughter Lesbia, a Private Secretary, and an American millionaire. A scheme is set going to terrorise the powers that be by first killing the Prime Minister's herd of show oxen without leaving a trace, then a young millionaire (American) and his eighteen friends. The Prime Minister is frightened to death—en passant—and ten millions is demanded as the ransom for London and its inhabitants being spared. What we would like to know is first: Could ten million pounds' worth of diamonds be obtained even in London in three days? and secondly, if the deadly secret was a poisonous ether, who applied it and with what results to himself? The three conspirators apparently take a whiff too much themselves and the nation at large is saved. A quiet wedding follows, and the diamonds are restored to the nation. How this is all done a quiet hour and the book will explain.

The Crimson Honeymoon. By HEADON HILL. With Frontispiece. (Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.)

IN this his latest novel Mr. Headon Hill surpasses even himself. Gory episodes, villainous incidents, and gross improbabilities succeed each other in rapid succession, and hold the reader breathlessly enthralled and spell-bound, until he wonders whether he is yet on this planet of ours, or sojourning in a certain warm place not mentionable to ears polite. The characters are as varied as the incidents they create, and throughout this rattling story it is a continuous question of diamond cut diamond between them. At the end, however, the result is as it should be—the two principal villains are wiped out, and truth and justice are triumphant. We are sorry that Mr. Headon Hill should apparently have become exhausted after recounting all the horrors attendant on the crimson honeymoon, for he deprives his readers of a double peal of wedding bells to which they are fairly entitled. But perhaps honeymoons with love instead of gore are too insipid for his powerful pen.

In the exhibition of the National Portrait Society, which has recently been opened at the Grosvenor Gallery, the section devoted to sculpture is small, but the work shown is of exceptional interest. We note that M. Rodin, whose strength has long ago been proved, and whose art seems to grow in impressiveness as the years go by, exhibits two busts, one of the late Right Hon. George Wyndham, and the other of Lord Howard de Walden. Both of these are treated with fine distinction. Other striking items in the same room are Mr. Derwent Wood's "Bust of Peter Petretti," Mr. Basil Gotto's "Nausicaa," and Mr. Epstein's "Head of a Girl."

THE Libraries, Museums and Art Galleries Year Book 1914 is the Manual of Professional Practice. But it is more than this. It tells every Bookman; every educationist; every student where special collections of Books on his particular subject are to be found throughout the country, and how to borrow from them. It also tells him where Special Museum collections are to be found, although these cannot be borrowed.

It is a key to unlock the collected knowledge of the country.

Get the Book: get it somehow. You want it. Buy or borrow the Book: but do not beg for it, nor steal it.

470 p. crn. 8vo. 8/6 net.

Stanley Paul & Co., 31, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

Music

ALADY who is incontestably in the front rank of concert singers, one who will come, we believe, to occupy a very distinguished place there, has stolen her way into our midst, and captured the hearts of all who were fortunate enough to hear her. No "puff preliminary" had warned anybody that Mme. Ilona Durigo was a singer worth going a long journey to hear, one of those rarely gifted beings to listen to whom is sheer delight, one who suggests no comparison with any other artist, because she is at once found to be unique. We went to Bechstein Hall in the expectation of hearing some talented singer perhaps, but quite possibly an indifferent one. Before Mme. Durigo had got to the middle of her first song, D'Astorga's "Morir vogl'io," we knew that she was a singer with an exceptionally beautiful voice and with an entirely uncommon accomplishment.

At the end we wished the recital to begin all over again; for we had enjoyed it as we have not enjoyed a recital of any lady singer since the days of Mlle. Camilla Landi. As we have said, we will not compare Mme. Durigo with this or that great artist; she is herself, and the charm is all her own. That charm comes, surely, from the absolute simplicity of her style. We could write pages, glowing with pleasure, about the lovely quality of her voice, about the perfection of her technique, about the purity of her interpretation and expression, but it is enough if we say that what struck and delighted us chiefly was the unvarying simplicity with which she sang. Her programme consisted entirely of songs that are known by heart, so often have they been sung. But she made them all fresh—new messages from the hearts of the different composers, or from the clever head—shall we say?—of such composers as Paisiello, Dalcroze, and Debussy. Her Italian songs were phrased as a great violinist would have phrased them; her Schubert made its utmost appeal, without any insistence on the poignancy of "Am Meer" or "Litanei"; her songs by Grieg and Kjerulf were light and delicate as snowflakes in a kindly spring. She was accompanied by Dr. Kasics Durigo, and the audience recognised her gifts at once. She is not one of your dramatic singers who storm and take captive, but one who persuades you, without seeming to have any intention of doing so, that her way of singing each song is the best possible way.

At the Opera the performances have been good, but not specially distinguished. When Mme. Von der Osten sang Sieglinde, it was understood that she was not at all well, and therefore any disappointment about her could be easily accounted for. Herr Bender is certainly one of the most bearable Wotans we can call to mind; without a great voice like Van Rooy's he succeeds with his trying part as well as Van Rooy did. Mme. Kurt sang well, but she has not enough of the Mrs. Siddons in her for Brünnhilde. Herr Urlus sang the music of Siegmund very beautifully, and

HEATH, CRANTON & OUSELEY.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

CAPITALS OF THE NORTHLANDS.

IAN C. HANNAH, M.A., Author of "Eastern Asia, a History," "The Sussex Coast," &c. With Twenty-two Illustrations, and Four Plans. 6s. net. [Just Ready.]

SOME COUNSELS OF S. VINCENT DE PAUL.

E. K. SANDERS. 1s. net. (Devotional.) [Just Ready]

THE GODHEAD OF JESUS.

G. S. HITCHCOCK, D.D. (Doctor of Sacred Scripture, Rome.) 2s. 6d. net. [Just Ready.]

BONDS OF SOCIETY.

JOHN SUTHERLAND, M.A. 10s. 6d. net. [March.]

THE BAN OF THE BORI.

AN ACCOUNT OF DEMONS AND DEMON-DANCING IN WEST AND NORTH AFRICA. MAJOR A. J. N. TREMEARNE, M.A., Dip. Anth. (Cantab.), F.R.G.S., F.R.A.I., sometime Scholar and Prizeman, Christ's College, Wort Travelling Student and Hausa Lecturer, Cambridge, Barrister-at-law, of Gray's Inn. Author of "Hausa Superstitions and Customs," "The Talled Head-Hunters of Nigeria," &c. With Coloured Frontispiece, 60 Photographic Illustrations, and 47 Figures in the Text. £1 1s. 0d. net. [April.]

A TRANSLATION OF THE "BACCHAE" OF EURIPIDES.

F. A. EVELYN, B.A. (Balliol College, Oxford). 1s. 6d. net. [Just Ready.]

WAR AND SPORT IN INDIA, 1802-1806:

An Officer's Diary.

With Frontispiece and Map. 15s. net.
The Spectator.—"The Diary gives a picture of campaigning that must be almost unique. . . . Such a book has a particular value because the period of Lake's campaigns, we think, has never been exalted to its proper dignity in general esteem."

ENSLAVERS OF KINGS.

THORNTON HALL. 16 Illustrations. 15s. net.
The Globe.—"The Book of the Day."

FEUDS OF THE FURTIVE FOLK.

F. St. MARS. Author of "On Nature's Trail," &c. Illustrated. 5s. net. [Just Ready.]

CATHOLIC DEMOCRACY, INDIVIDUALISM, AND SOCIALISM.

FATHER HENRY DAY, S.J. With a Preface by CARDINAL BOURNE. 6s. net. [March.]

THE CODEX LAUDIANUS (L[Wordsworth's O.] of the Epistles of S. Paul.

Numbered Laud Lat. 108 in the Bodleian Library at Oxford. Now First Edited with Four Colotype Facsimiles. E. S. BUCHANAN, M.A., B.Sc. 12s. 6d. net. [Ready.]

THE EVOLUTION OF THE OLYMPIC GAMES.

1829 B.C.—1914 A.D. F. A. M. WEBSTER, P.A.S.I., Hon. Sec. Amateur Field Events Assoc., Hon. Adviser on Field Events to the London Polytechnic. English Javelin Throwing Champion, 1911. Specially Illustrated with 100 Line Drawings—and by Photographs and Reproductions of Old Prints. 6s. net. [April.]

THE RUBAIYAT OF A MINOR STATESMAN.

G. WILLIAM S. SPARROW. The object of these verses is to show how little change is needed in the lines of Omar Khayyam (written some 800 years ago) to make them fit the events of the present day. 1s. net. [Ready.]

6s. FICTION (At all Libraries and Booksellers).

SUNSHINE.

MARY OPENSHAW. Author of "Little Grey Girl," &c. [Ready.]

SINK RED SUN.

JESSIE LIVESAY. Author of "The Little Tin Gods," &c. [March.]

THE WOMAN FROM THE UNKNOWN.

STEWART WREN. Author of "The Willow Brunting Mystery," &c. [Ready.]

THE KING CALLED LOVE.

MAY ALDINGTON. Author of "Love Letters that Caused a Divorce," &c. [Ready.]

THE MINOTAUR OF CAPRI.

ALECK T. ELLIS. Author of "The Vision of Hermione," &c. [March.]

THE STRENGTH OF A CHAIN.

HESTER WHITE. Author of "Mountains of Necessity," "Uncle Jem," &c. [Ready.]

THE SUN GOD.

The Rev. ARTHUR WESTCOTT. [March.]

"PHOEBE MAROON."

MARY F. RAPHAEL. Author of "An Island Interlude," &c. [Ready.]

THE PURPLE FROGS.

H. W. WESTBROOK and LAWRENCE GROSSMITH. [March.]

GILBERT RAY.

E. HUGHES-GIBB. Author of "The Soul of a Villain," &c. [March.]

THE AGITATOR IN DISGUISE.

MRS. LANGFIELD SAWKINS. Author of "Ladye Bertha of Romrow," &c. [March.]

A DAUGHTER'S INHERITANCE.

G. S. REANEY. Author of "Just in Time," &c. [Ready.]

DOROTHEA OF ROMNEY MARSH.

ALICE CUNNINGHAME. Author of "The Love Story of Giraldus," &c. [Ready.]

DOWN IN DEVON.

Humorous Tales told by UNCLE TOM COBLEIGH. Author of "The Talk of Uncle Tom Cobleigh," "Zum Vunny Demshur Tellin's," &c. [Ready.]

A Delightful Book for Girls (6s.):

CINDERELLA'S SISTERS.

FLORENCE SCANNELL. Author of "In the Time of Roses," "Christmas in many Lands," &c. With 8 charming illustrations in colour by EDITH SCANNELL. [April.]

Send for Complete List:—

FLEET LANE, LONDON.

Fraulein Morena was better in Sieglinde than as Isolde. She is an excellent actress and sings very well, but her voice is not equal to all the demands that Isolde makes upon it. "Die Meistersinger" must always give pleasure, but its performance was not, on the whole, more than moderate.

Mr. Josef Holbrooke does not relax his efforts on behalf of modern British Chamber Music, and he has begun his thirteenth series of concerts. Compositions of his own formed the pièces de resistance of his first programme; for his Quartet for Piano and Strings, No. 1, in G minor, was substituted "by desire," for a Pianoforte Quintet by Mr. Arthur Hinton, and the concert began with his Clarinet Quintet. However, it must be said that, though Mr. Holbrooke's music dominated the evening, the effect was by no means monotonous. One recognises that the composer has fertility and variety of musical thought and of means of expression, these means being, at times, very ingenious and effective; that his temperament is virile, and that he knows the secret of a fine climax. There is also, but not too frequently, a charm of melody; there is rhythmic life, and the character of different moods is clearly brought out. Yet the general effect is not so satisfying as could be wished. Now it is that trivial passages get mixed up with what began by promising so well; now the treatment is diffuse and dry; now it is hard to suppress the feeling that the music is a little too obviously clever, the random writing of a skilled and practised hand. The variation in the Clarinet Quintet showed Mr. Holbrooke at his best.

The performance was very good indeed, such brilliant artists as Messrs. C. Draper, J. Saunders, C. Woodhouse, L. Tertis, and H. Withers having been engaged. Miss Waterston did not make much effect with songs by Elgar, O'Neill, and Delius, nor yet with three by the concert-giver, in which the melodic interest is small, though there are bits of effective declamation in "The Requital," and some interesting harmonic progressions. Some pianoforte pieces were very well played by Mr. E. Mitchell, his own compositions, "Reverie," "Dance," and "Autumn," though not strong in ideas, being well written for the instrument and attractive, and certainly superior to two pieces by Mr. F. Kitchener. The concert was given at the "Arts Centre" in Mortimer Street, in a good room which was darkened. The audience was not large, but it was appreciative.

It was unfortunate that this concert "clashed" with that of Herr Hubermann at Queen's Hall, for, although that fine violinist has no need of praise from us or anybody else, so sure is his position in the esteem of musicians, he brought with him to direct the Symphony Orchestra a young conductor from Germany, Herr Schuricht, who is making a great name for himself, and whom it would have been very interesting to hear. From accounts that we have received, his growing fame seems to be richly deserved. Both as accompanist to the violin concerto and as conductor of Brahms' C minor Symphony he is said to have shown masterly qualities.

Of this powerful, wholesome, and often irritating work Sir Henry Wood gave a fine free performance next day. We were delighted at being told that Herr Bodansky and Herr Schuricht, hearing the Queen's Hall orchestra, broke into unrestricted praise of its extraordinary merit, eulogising specially the beautiful quality of tone which it commands throughout. Their judgment, coming after that of Herr Schönberg's, does but confirm what we have for some time been thinking, but it is very gratifying all the same. Brahms' first Symphony has the effect upon us of an interview with some stern, extremely capable, and seldom unbending governess. We are abashed in its presence, and are made to feel how salutary it is to have to hear such music, we who take sinful delight in the radiant temper and easy charm of Schubert and Mozart and dear old Bach. Listening to Rimsky Korsakoff's suite of "Scheherazade," we sighed deeply for the absence of Karsavina and the vulgar joys of the Ballet. Then came Brahms to snub us for liking such trivialities. When Mr. Lamond had finished his Concerto by Liszt, and his encore piece, which was Tausig's arrangement of a waltz by old Strauss, one almost expected to see Mme. Schumann and Brahms with uplifted rods ready to flog him soundly, or at least set him a thousand lines of Brahms to learn by heart. Stravinsky's "Fireworks" pleased us greatly once more. How trivial! But, at any rate, they are more lively than Brahms in his C minor mood.

The mention of Stravinsky reminds us of the stimulating lecture on Russia's Musical Awakening, recently delivered by Mr. Ernest Fowles at the Imperial Institute, a résumé of which appears to-day in THE ACADEMY. His account of the genesis of Music, that it was the inevitably born child of Romanticism, is not the view that is generally taken, the more conventional origin from men's feeling for rhythm being usually assigned to it. But his account of the sudden upspringing of the musical blaze in Russia is true. The fire had long been smouldering there among the people, but they had to wait for the fan which should kindle the spark. What Mr. Fowles has to say about the national style, about its independence of German influence, is valuable and necessary to be insisted upon, for the British public is as yet too little acquainted with the real Russian music to dissociate its character from that of the neighbouring country. Russia deserves to have the credit of having taken her own line, of having determined to express herself in her own way. She has naturally had composers who were weak enough to lend a willing ear to the whispers of French and German achievement, but these are not the products of her genius which will remain enduringly.

The Musical Awakening in Russia

A Lecture delivered by ERNEST FOWLES, A.R.A.M., at the Imperial Institute, at the February Meeting of the Anglo-Russian Literary Society, the President, Mr. E. A. Casalet, in the chair.

IT is usually accepted that peace and security are necessary for the development of the art-life of a nation. There are, however, exceptions to this law. Not infrequently the art-life has been rejuvenated by national struggles towards independence and self-expression. The intellectual quantity of a nation can be measured almost invariably by its love of and production of poetry. Poetry points the way to pure romanticism, and romanticism calls for a form of expression for which poetry is inadequate; in this way music is born. Until a still higher mode of emotional expression is discovered, music will remain the perfect medium for picturing the inner life of a people at its best and purest.

As regards the art of music, Russia has no past; consequently she lacks those classic forms which, in many other countries, provide the material for the worship of tradition. It would be naturally supposed that her want of experience would be reflected in her musical output for many decades to come. Nothing, however, could be further from the facts; she bursts upon a supercilious Europe in overwhelming suddenness. Before the middle of the nineteenth century she was, musically speaking, an unknown quantity; during the last half of that century her music was accepted by the world and appraised at its true worth by competent and critical judges. It is not difficult to perceive why this should have been so. The natural characteristics of the Russian were most favourable to the development of a national form of music. The time was ripe; the cultivation of poetry—the sister art—had spread throughout the masses. As a natural consequence, when music came, it found a people ready to receive its message.

It has been said that Russia, unable to form an independent school, went westward for inspiration, but this is an entire misapprehension. It was necessary that the Russian should become acquainted with the peculiar forms essential to the clear expression of music. But, in the act of accomplishing this, it did not follow that he should become the slavish imitator of foreign style and idiom. In one sense music is a cosmopolitan language; in another sense the mode of its expression varies with nation as with school. The pioneers of Russian music perceived this truth to the full. Russian music has been called a product of German art tintured by national folk-music and national forms of rhythm. Those who assert this must be strangely ignorant of the particular characteristics of each art. The tendency of the German, roughly speaking, is in the direction of thematic development and of polyphonic forms; that of the Russian is in the direction of atmosphere, and it was this feature which found its most ample scope in the music of the newer type of Russian composers.

During the last few years, a change, involving great

A New Series of Artistic Colour Books

BEAUTIFUL ENGLAND

Fcap 4to. Bound in Boards, with coloured panel; each volume containing 12 full-page illustrations in colour, 2s. each net; also bound in levant grained leather or smooth lambskin, 3s. 6d. each net.

1. OXFORD	F. D. How
2. THE ENGLISH LAKES	A. G. Bradley
3. CANTERBURY	Canon Danks
4. SHAKESPEARE-LAND	Walter Jerrold
5. THE THAMES	G. E. Mitton
6. WINDSOR CASTLE	Edward Thomas
7. NORWICH AND THE BROADS	Walter Jerrold
8. THE HEART OF WESSEX	Sidney Heath
9. CAMBRIDGE	Noel Barwell
10. THE CORNISH RIVIERA	Sidney Heath
11. THE PEAK DISTRICT	R. Murray Gilchrist
12. DICKENS-LAND	J. A. Nicklin
13. WINCHESTER	Sidney Heath
14. CHESTER AND THE DEE	C. Edwardes
15. ISLE OF WIGHT	Edward Thomas
16. YORK	George Benson
17. HAMPTON COURT	Walter Jerrold
18. HEREFORD	C. Edwardes
19. THE DUKERIES	R. Murray Gilchrist
20. EXETER	Sidney Heath
21. DARTMOOR	A. L. Salmon
22. WARWICK & LEAMINGTON	George Morley
23. BATH & WELLS	A. L. Salmon

Beautiful Coloured Prospectus post free on application

BLACKIE & SON, LTD.
50, OLD BAILEY, LONDON, E.C.

issues, has come over the music of Russia—a revolt against nineteenth century conceptions of the harmonic and rhythmic basis of music. That which gave pleasure to the past generation is deemed too archaic a means of expression for the composer of to-day. In almost every art we observe men striving for new forms of expression which, to many of us, probably appear to possess an over-abundance of ugliness; but we dare not condemn precipitately. The mind of man requires time to adjust itself to new thought in any direction. The Russian musician has almost invariably been loyal to the conception of art viewed from his national standpoint. Russian composers have this great advantage, that the rhythms, the colour, the melodic idioms, necessary for the making of healthy music are all to be found within the borders of their country. As we look around that vast empire, we feel instinctively that it has much yet to give us. It is probable that, at no distant date, its school of music will occupy the same commanding position that the verdict of mankind long ago assigned to a more westerly nation. And the rapid progress towards mutual understanding which now marks the intercourse between the two great empires may, in the end, bring about that perfect reign of good-will, without which national ideals lose their power to stimulate and inspire; and in this happy consummation music may have a great and glorious share.

The lecture was illustrated by a selection of music played by the lecturer from the works of Glinka, Cui, Moussorgsky, Rinsky-Karsakoff, Liadoff, Arensky, Liapounow, Rebikoff, and Scriabine.

Unbeaten Tracks

THE WEST INDIAN ISLANDS

TO the man who has wandered in the West Indian islands it is a source of surprise that, comparatively speaking, so few leisured Britons make that region a holiday haunt during the winter season. Why does not a goodly contingent of the folk who are wont to flock to the Mediterranean littoral, turn, in Viking phraseology, toward the sun's bath, to visit the chain of British possessions basking in perennial summer, forming the goal-posts to the Caribbean Sea? Money spent on such trips enriches our own kith and kin, and travellers reach veritably a New World, the memory of which is a lifelong possession. To make this El Dorado, a wide stretch of solitary ocean has to be traversed; this fact doubtless deters many. Steamship lines catering for the service are numerous, the boats well found, their inclusive charges about equal to those of a normal hotel at an English watering-place. To many good sailors a sea voyage is irksome, and thus it comes about that all members of a family party, bent on touring, will not often plump for sea travel.

Beyond a glimpse of Pico towering into mist there is, outside the ship, nothing to be seen but water, water everywhere, sea birds, flying fish, and an occasional porpoise, until the lush sugar plantations of Barbados come into sight.

The Barbadian negro is the most self-complacent of his tribe. A "Bimshire" black policeman, dressed in a little brief authority, is a sight to excite Olympian mirth. His superb air of command, his purple talk, take the stage. Throw him off his pedestal with a jest, and cyclonic merriment carries him away. The bumboat women, the diving boys, the boatmen who fight for his baggage, all grin welcome to the new-comer. Is the whiteness of the negro's teeth brought about by his habit of chewing sugar-cane, or merely due to the physiological fact that he has not evolved a jaw becoming progressively smaller, a jaw which for that reason will not properly hold its ancient armoury of teeth and thus brings with it the mixed blessings of toothache and neuralgia? From the mudlark upwards, but stopping severely short of the constable in uniform, the black population is addicted to the practice of munching the cane. Urchins perch themselves in the sun with a sugar stalk almost as long as themselves, and worry at it by the hour, as a dog worries a bone. Take them for all in all, the sons and daughters of Ham are as merry and good-humoured as any breed of humankind. Most solemn are they when in their Sunday best. To watch "bucks" in war-paint—that is, in frock-coat, white gloves, with huge bunches of flowers in the buttonhole—or ladies in hoops of monstrous size, their heads bedizened with ribbons of all the colours of the rainbow, marching in stately procession to church, is a sight which the new-comer wakes in the middle of the night to laugh over afresh.

When the ship drops her anchor in Bridgetown roads, passengers by common consent hurry to the Ice House. There the flying fish in every disguise is the great delicacy of cuisine. Eat him in the dark, and you would say the staple of your dish was herring. Barbados in population is a sort of black Belgium. The men make first-class boatmen, and excel in any occupation in which hard spells of labour and idleness alternate. The ordinary employer on a sugar usine will tell you that the black is as he was in the beginning, that he shows no progression. Those who get most out of their hands are the humorists, who know how to joke the black, and those who appeal to his sense of emulation. Tell Alexander that Pompey can load twice as much cane in an hour as he can in a week, and both will bend their backs to the task like galley slaves. The "Bim" is a queer mixture of good intent, sloth, and laughter, and his humour is a species by itself. Set him a job by the piece, and when the spirit moves him—the employer cannot—he will work like a man possessed. He is impervious to "language," his wants are few, and he is happy enough to lead "the simple life" to the end of the chapter. Give him a pair of pants, a shirt, the hottest place in the sun, and a bar of sugar-cane to gnaw, and he is happier than a king.

Barbados is the sanatorium of the West Indies. The island is chiefly a plain; sugar fields abound, and the air is dry and bracing. To the ordinary sightseer, however, Barbados does not compare with the lovely islands to the south of the chain, many of which are twisted into fantastic panorama by earthquake shock.

The Americans are looking forward with much assurance to opening the Panama Canal for traffic before long. Their policy and plans have been often criticised, but, for good or evil, the great scheme is supposed to be drawing to finality. Within the last few weeks a couple of sharp earthquake shocks have given a hint how formidable is the enemy that lies in ambush. The inner history of the enterprise has yet to be written, but probably this generation will never know the story. One thing is clear—those who have been responsible for the actual construction have shown a resolution and resource beyond praise. Whether the statesmanship behind the gun has been equally impeccable we beg leave to doubt. Nothing is easier than to carp, but every engineer must render unstinted admiration to the work of his fellow-craftsmen, carried out under colossal difficulties. Assuming that the anticipations of American pioneers are realised, it becomes obvious that the future of the West Indian islands will, in the next ten years or so, be transformed.

The British policy of late has been that of surrender to the peaceful persuasion of the United States Government. The Monroe doctrine has been given away with a pound of tea by our Foreign Office under both parties. The Governments who rule the three largest areas of American soil are as follows:—Great Britain, 3,979,000 square miles; the United States, 3,623,000 square miles; Brazil, 3,218,000 square miles. We believe that, if a statesman arose on either side of the Atlantic big enough to undertake the task, the Union Jack and the Stars and Stripes might even now be re-wedded into one world-embracing symbol, in respect of exterior policy. Such a power could call the tune to the world. The fact remains that Great Britain holds the best bits of the West Indies, and that our outposts in that part of the world will acquire an enhanced value when the new trade route via the Panama Canal passes beyond the stage of conjecture. All the more reason why official Englishmen should see these islands with their own eyes. After our experience of the cession of Heligoland to Germany, the British public will view with critical distrust the game of playing for oversea possessions of the Crown as if they were pawns on a chess-board.

Whatever his motive of travel, the Briton returning from a West Indian trip must indeed be dull of soul if he does not take back a budget of fresh ideas. Kingsley's "At Last" and Froude's "English in the West Indies" will cease to be to him mere works of reference. They will become part of his own economy.

The passage down the Grenadines between St. Vincent and Grenada is enchanting—a cloudless sky, a level keel, an awning above you, an air of delicious freshness. If companion travellers are congenial, the man or woman, who at home leads a life of frets and lets, revels in an ideal existence, in this part of the trip. Beyond the reach of the daily press and the postman's knock, it is "go as you please" in the matter of dress. To a large percentage of his Majesty's liege subjects the matters enumerated above make up the be-all and end-all—the whole of existence. Such may vote the life on a West Indian liner "slow." The too energetic man on board, who is for ever trying to get up what he is pleased to term "entertainments," will find himself taboo in this lotus-eaters' land, for the average Briton, at this stage of the journey, is content to chat, to read, to watch the unfolding panorama of new wonders, to drink in romance and beauty and forget routine.

St. Vincent has been left in the wake of our ship. Its volcanic pinnacle slumbers, save for an uneasy reminder of latent fire. The little town, girt with palm groves, lies like a toy at its base. One muses on the submergence of this ancient chain of land. When and how did it "sink like lead in the mighty waters"? Read your Robinson Crusoe over again. Defoe is an accurate historian, and you are drawing near the land he has made immortal. Some of these sandy islets are uninhabited. You remember the dyspeptic youth in "Locksley Hall," and think that his soundest idea after all was that of turning beach-comber on just such an horizon.

All too soon the steamer swings to anchor in St. George's roads, Grenada. Wandering through the neglected streets of the town and over its mouldering fort, you wonder whether, after all, Great Britain is such a superlatively successful coloniser as she is wont to tell mankind. Here is an island of infinite possibilities—beautiful, prolific. It looks as if it might be an estate in the clutch of a "progressive" County Council or of a Ministry of all the talents. Its exterior trade has been strangled to further the fetish of Free Trade, and the land is left to stagnation and neglect.

A. E. CAREY.

From BELL'S LIST

DEMOCRACY IN NEW ZEALAND.

Translated from the French of ANDRÉ SIEGFRIED. With an Introduction by DOWNIE STEWART, and a Map. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

"New Zealand in its isolation at the antipodes is probably the least known of the Dominions to the ordinary reader. For further ignorance he has now no excuse. Here is a brilliant book that will tell him—and not merely him, but the serious student as well—nearly everything. Well informed, well ordered, well documented, it is written with a Latin ease and clarity which an excellent translation does nothing to conceal."—GLASGOW HERALD.

THE CONTEMPORARY ENGLISH VIEW OF NAPOLEON.

By F. J. MACCUNN, B.A., late Scholar of Queen's College, Oxford. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

No one has hitherto set forth fully how the great Emperor appeared in his lifetime to the nation of shopkeepers who spoiled his destiny. The book is a careful piece of research, with many quotations from contemporary sources, from the remarks of Wellington and the verdict of Wordsworth to the comments of the daily press.

KING'S COLLEGE LECTURES ON COLONIAL PROBLEMS.

Edited by F. J. C. HEARNshaw, M.A., LL.D. With a Preface by the Right Hon. LEWIS HARCOURT, M.P., Secretary of State for the Colonies. 4s. 6d. net.

MYSTICS OF ISLAM.

By REYNOLDS A. NICHOLSON, M.A., Litt.D., LL.D., Lecturer in Persian, Cambridge University. 2s. 6d. net.

New Volume in the Quest Series.

QUESTS OLD AND NEW.

By G. R. S. MEAD, Editor of "The Quest." Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

SICILIANA:

SKETCHES OF NAPLES AND SICILY IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

By FERDINAND GREGOROVIVS. Translated from the German by Mrs. GUSTAVUS W. HAMILTON. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

The cheapest and most authoritative encyclopaedic Dictionary ever published.

Webster's New INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY.

400,000 Defined Vocabulary Words and Phrases. 6,000 Illustrations, 2,700 Pages. 30,000 Geographical and 12,000 Biographical Entries. Cloth, £2 net. Full Sheepskin, £2 10s. net.

THE INDIA PAPER EDITION has less than half the weight and size of the Library Edition. Size, 12½ by 9½ by 2½ inches. Weight, 6½ lb. Buckram (with Thumb Index), £3 3s. net. Full Seal Extra (with Thumb Index), £4 4s. net.

WRITE TO-DAY for a detailed prospectus with Specimen Pages, which will be sent post free. It will interest you.

LONDON: G. BELL AND SONS, LTD.,
York House, Portugal Street, Kingsway, W.C.

Some New French Plays

M. EMILE FABRE enjoys in France a very real and merited reputation. His talent, as author, is characterised by the greatest probity and sincerity; if he generalises a little too much, he does so in order to render the truths he submits to the comprehension of his public more apparent and more undeniable. He possesses, in addition, great strength, great sobriety; he is gifted with a fine theatrical instinct. His characters are all alive, and through them we discover the author's own loyal, frank, and healthy soul. He is not a cynic, though he has the irony which flagellates all and which draws blood. He is a Henri Becque with less wit, also with perhaps a less complete comprehension of theatrical necessities, but he possesses much of the strength and ironical bitterness of the author of "Les Corbeaux." But Becque could write delicious if keenly observed fantaisies such as his incomparable "Navette." M. Emile Fabre, however, is more strictly limited to depicting certain of the most burning social and psychological problems of the day.

In "Un Grand Bourgeois," at the Théâtre Antoine, M. Fabre seems to have abandoned his customary genre. The audience of the first night, though making a real triumph for the author, seemed to have been rather led astray by the manner in which M. Fabre presented his subject. It expected a "pièce à thèse" on the "classe bourgeoise"; M. Fabre gave it the portrait of one of those great industrials who govern the world. Instead of having to applaud a clear, virulent sermon, directed against the abuses of the higher middle classes, the audience was initiated in all the petty domestic troubles of a "grand bourgeois" who has been most unfortunate in his matrimonial experience. For such an author, who can manipulate successfully a vigorous and vast theme, this subject appeared exceedingly frail. Instead of pressing out of it all the substance he possibly could, M. Fabre seems to have voluntarily belittled it, so as to depict only a simple and disagreeable family drama. And further, if this is really what he wished to portray, it would have been preferable to omit the business imbroglio which disguises this character comedy as a semi "pièce à thèse."

The first act obtained a good success precisely because the public still hoped that M. Fabre was leading up to something more than a domestic drama. The second act was listened to a trifle sceptically; there is too much talk between the husband and wife, not enough action. They both appear very despicable and puerile. But the third act is a real triumph. In it, M. Fabre happily reverted to his old manner, by opposing the three generations of "grands bourgeois"—father, son, and granddaughter—in a fine scene in which they defend their conflicting interests. The success is greatly due to the acting of M. Mosnier, who personated the grandfather, Matignon, superbly. M. Gémier, in the part of the Grand Bourgeois, the son, merits all that is generally said of him. Mme. Dux is a very handsome unfaithful grande bourgeoisie; Mlle. Sylvie, in the part of the young girl, seems to have adopted a far less uneven style of acting; and M. Saillard, in the rôle of a sincere young engineer, completes very happily an excellent cast.

The Comédie Française has lately represented "La Marche Nuptiale," M. Henri Bataille's incomparable play, given, in 1905, without great success at the Vaudeville. Since the reprise at the Comédie Française, it has at last been acclaimed as it should be. It is, perhaps, the most human, the most touching and true comedy written in recent years. It is tender, simple, natural; the heroine, Grace, is just the type of pure, proud womanhood, who mistakes pity for affection, the brute instinct of nature for love. She discovers too late her irremediable error; she will soon be the mother of the child of the poor, contemptible man she only pities, and so quite naturally she escapes from a situation she has not the strength nor the desire to face by committing suicide. Grace does not kill herself in order to shirk the consequences of her foolish error; she does so, in a far more noble spirit, in order to redeem herself in her own eyes.

The play is poignantly true. M. Henri Bataille has the gift of creating in all his works the atmosphere which is particularly adapted to the subject. As soon as the curtain rises, the audience is dominated by a subtle influence which rarely dissipates itself before the end of the performance. This play is one of the author's first works; it is, perhaps, his best. The Comédie Française has staged it as it deserves. Mme. Piérat is a perfect Grace de Plessans—simple, sincere, a true, proud gentlewoman. She is also almost classically beautiful, with a delightful little touch of modernism. M. Georges Berr is a remarkably weak, poor, pitiful little music-master, who can hardly believe he has the luck of being loved by his beautiful pupil, who sacrifices her name, her family, and her position for his poor little sake. M. Grand shows us the elegant figure of a man about town, and Mme. Lara and Mlle. Faber both don some striking and beautiful gowns.

M. Paul Gavault is a favourite author of the Parisian public. His audiences are always assured of passing an amusing evening. His new play, "Le Mannequin," recently given at the Comédie Marigny, is, like his other works, a sentimental vaudeville; certain scenes might belong to the best of comedies, and the subject is agreeably symbolical, for the "Mannequin" of the title is used by the hero of the play as a moral mannequin, in order to awaken the jealousy of a society woman he desires to conquer. This intrigue is very ingeniously continued to the end; skilful scenes follow each other in unexpected succession. And if "Le Mannequin" attains rarely to the height of real comedy, it is at least a very good, diverting vaudeville. It is well acted by Mlle. Juliette Margel, whom we were accustomed to see portraying M. de Porto Riche's painfully human heroines; she has endowed the rôle of Collette with a sincerity and depth of emotion which is rarely to be found amidst the pretty mannequins of the Rue de la Paix. Mme. Gréhart is agreeably personified by Mlle. Marcelle Lender, always elegant and distinguished; M. Jean Dax played the part of Maurice de Lursange with much taste, youthfulness, and good humour, and Mlle. Marfa d'Hervilly, Mlle. Léone Devimeur, Mlle. Lauzy Bareilly, complete an agreeable ensemble.

Decidedly the fashion is very bourgeois, this year in Paris. After M. Fabre's play we were invited recently to the rehearsal of M. Brieux's new comedy, "Le Bourgeois aux Champs," at the Odéon. M. Brieux has hitherto devoted himself almost exclusively (some say even too exclusively) to the pièce à thèse. This play, however, slightly deviates from M. Brieux's customary style of writing. It is more of a comedy, although he cannot refrain in the second act from emitting some very general ideas on the future of rural workmen. He expounds them a trifle naïvely in a scene between a clever mechanic and peasant. The hero, Cocatrix, is a French bourgeois; instead of striving to acquire gentle and polite manners, he prefers to become a Socialist and an agriculturist. He accordingly obtains a property where he settles, dutifully accompanied by his wife, and by his rather mincing daughter, Fernande. M. Cocatrix is a man of great convictions. Since he has decided to go in for farming, he does so thoroughly, and he expounds to all his peasants his Socialistic ideas. He bores them by excessive care for their moral and physical welfare. He obliges them to refrain from all alcoholic drinks, and replaces their "petits verres" by boiled water. The result is that soon the Cocatrix trio is simply abhorred. Whilst her father is thus occupied in rendering himself as unpopular as possible, the pretty Fernande Cocatrix tries to captivate a young country nobleman. But, alas! her matrimonial dreams are soon shattered, and her worthy papa, disgusted by the unsuccess of his campaign, resolves to enter the political career. Once deputy, he will no doubt show his electors a thing or two. Fernande marries the able, intriguing mechanic, and, as Cocatrix père has always professed for this young man a great affection, he cannot refuse his consent, through fear of contradicting himself in the eyes of all his friends and relations.

M. Brieux has enhanced his play, according to his usual successful method, by numerous short conferences, in which he gives the general ideas of the day on certain rural questions, on certain social problems, and especially on the famous "retour aux champs" so vehemently extolled just at present. He has shown himself, as in his former works, a popular author for those who like to hear exposed all the ideas which are theirs de droit. He knows how to provoke the enthusiasm of his audiences by simply telling them a certain number of truths perfectly familiar to them, but which they are flattered to have in common with a celebrated and famous author. The rôle of Cocatrix is played by M. Vilbert, who has perhaps remembered too well that he is a music-hall artist. He has accentu-

THE ALUMINIUM BLICK TYPEWRITER.

ITS ADOPTION BY ROYALTY AND LITERARY CELEBRITIES.

YOU CAN LEARN TO OPERATE IT IN HALF AN HOUR.

FREE TRIAL AT YOUR OWN HOME.

The adoption of the new Aluminium Blick Typewriter grows apace. They have been purchased by many Royal personages and littérateurs, which is but an indication of the growing demand and importance of these Typewriters in the Home and to the traveller. Recently the Duchess of Connaught bought one of the Aluminium Blinks, which her Royal Highness took to Canada with her; but previously, many other Royal and titled personages and men of letters have purchased them for use in Boudoir, Library, and when travelling, the machine being carried in its own leather case, which contains stationery compartments.

The Aluminium Featherweight Typewriter and its Leather Case, with Stationery Compartments.

The innovation of the home typewriter, made possible by the introduction of the Aluminium Featherweight Blinks, which shine like silver and are untarnishable, was inevitable. Such a machine was badly needed, especially by literary folk and those with considerable correspondence, for already over 160,000 are in use. Amongst its users are Clergymen, Naval and Military Officers, Authors, Members of Parliament, War Correspondents, Journalists, Secretaries, Travellers—in fact, people in almost every walk of life. With an Aluminium Blick Typewriter in your Library you can accomplish prodigies of literary work. You can dispose of much pressing correspondence, and with the utmost ease.

The Blick Typewriter possesses many advantages not found in other machines, chief amongst which is the changing from one kind of type to the other, writing in almost every style of type (large or small), script type, and even Hebrew, Gujaratti, etc., employing the identical characters, using them all on the same machine, and changing from one to the other in an instant, and the machines are guaranteed just the same as any office typewriter costing double or treble the price, and weighing 20 lb. to 30 lb., instead of only 5 lb. as does the Aluminium Blick.

Of course, these Blick Typewriters have a reputation of some twenty odd years, being in use everywhere, from the business office to the battlefield. But to revert to its use in the Home, this cannot be fully realised until it is actually there. You can learn to operate it in half-an-hour, and with a little practice write on it with the speed of an expert.

Send for the free book, which tells all about the Blick, or ask for a free home trial, then, think for a moment how important the possession of one of these wonderful, practical, and portable Blick Typewriters would be to you—think of its great necessity and convenience to you when its usefulness is discovered, when you have learned to operate it after half-an-hour's practice.

The makers, The Blick Co., Ltd., of 9 and 10, Cheapside, London, E.C., and 369, Oxford Street, W., are so positive that the machine will actually captivate everyone who tries it, that they offer to send one to your home for a free trial; but in any case write for the booklet (No 47A), which tells all about the machine and how to operate it.

ated the vaudeville aspect of his personage, whilst not underliving sufficiently all the comedy possibilities the part contains. Mlle. Andrée Méry, on the contrary, remarkably interprets the character of Fernande; she really excels in throwing into relief, without any apparent effort, the innermost thought of the author. Mlle. Peujet is an excellent bourgeoise, and M. Hervé and Denis d'Inès complete a very satisfying cast.

MARC LOGÉ.

In the Learned World

PROFESSOR NORMAN COLLIE'S lecture at the Royal Institution last month was the first introduction of the experiments of himself and Mr. Patterson to a popular as distinguished from a scientific audience. As has been several times stated in THE ACADEMY, the phenomenon which they are designed to exhibit is that in a vacuum tube persistently "bombarded" by a sufficiently intense electric discharge, helium and neon in variable quantities appear, and the problem is to find out whence they come.

Professor Collie's main experiment before the audience was successful, the deep orange light of neon appearing in the upper part of the tube after the tiny quantity of hydrogen originally present had been removed by washing out with oxygen, exploding the mixture, and then absorbing the residue by charcoal cooled in liquid air. The lecturer's main theme, however, was the refutation of the Hon. Robert Strutt, who has lately stated that he has repeated Professor Collie's and Mr. Patterson's experiments without obtaining the spectrum of either helium or neon. Professor Collie thought this likely to be the case if the splash caused by the partial fusing of the electrodes were not strongly heated, so as to drive out the gases shut up within it, and showed other possible causes of error in Professor Strutt's experiments. He further said that he and Mr. Patterson had found the spectra of the gases appearing after bombardment to vary with the electrodes employed, almost pure helium coming from potassium electrodes, a good deal of helium from copper, some neon from silver, and more from aluminium and palladium. He also showed that a quartz mercury-vapour lamp which had been run for several thousand hours exhibited the same phenomena on constant sparking, even under conditions which seemed to preclude the possibility of atmospheric air or the rarer gases which it contains leaking in from outside. Generally, the lecturer was of opinion that the helium and neon were actually produced within the tube used in his experiments, and did not arrive there from the external air, although he was prepared to consider favourably the explanation that it might come from the mercury employed. This last remark is of importance, as in that case the experimenters, instead of building up helium (atomic weight 4) and neon (20) out of the lighter element, hydrogen (1), as was at first supposed, may be breaking down the much heavier—and therefore the presumably more complex—atom of mercury (200) into its lighter constituents, as Sir William Ramsay claims to have done in the parallel case of copper and lithium. In any event, the experiments are of great interest, especially in view of the vexed question of the constitution of matter.

The labour involved in these delicate experiments in high vacua and the difficulty in repeating them is well illustrated by an article which appeared in the berichte of the German Chemical Society just before Professor Collie's lecture. Professor Strutt, as is well known, claims to have discovered a new and active form of nitrogen—in its normal state the most inert of common gases—which he produces by sparking in vacuo in much the same way as in Professor Collie's experiments. His theory is that this is an allotropic form of nitrogen probably consisting of a triple atom in the same way that ozone is an allotropic form of oxygen brought about by the trebling of the oxygen atom. This seems antecedently probable and presents a curious analogy with one explanation of Professor Collie's experiment, which is that the trace of hydrogen left in the tube also trebles its atom. Herren Tiede and Domcke, who are working in Professor Fischer's laboratory at Berlin, however, say in the article in question that they have repeated Professor Strutt's experiments with every precaution and have failed to obtain any but a negative result. As Mme. Curie made the same statement with regard to Sir William Ramsay's copper and lithium experiments, it looks at present like stalemate all round. Yet those used to scientific controversies will be full of confidence that out of the shock of opinions there will, as usual, come light.

In another and less abstract branch of science, two new discoveries are announced. One of them is yet another cure for tuberculosis, M. B. Sauton having communicated to the Paris Société de Biologie that he has found different salts of bismuth to have a direct and almost instantaneous effect in inhibiting the growth of the tubercle bacillus associated with the name of Koch. He holds that their action is specific and greatly superior to that of bichloride of mercury, iodide of potassium, or the arseniate of the same metal, which have hitherto been the bactericides most generally employed. In the report presented by Dr. Marcel Labbé to the Académie de Médecine, attention was also drawn to the observation of Dr. V. Noorden on the benefit derived by patients suffering from diabetes from a diet consisting chiefly of what Dr. Labbé called "légumes secs," that is to say, of peas, haricots and other beans, lentils, and especially the soja or soy bean. The patient is allowed on this regimen to consume daily rather more than 10 ozs. of these vegetables, half that quantity of butter, from three to six eggs, and the same quantity of "diabetic" bread rolls with, if he likes, three or four glasses of claret and a small quantity of green vegetables. This cannot be considered a starvation diet.

Less trustworthy, perhaps, than the newly-discovered properties of metals given above is the account in the current number of the Revue Scientifique concerning the Divining Rod or instrument of the "dowsers." Ac-according to M. Paul Lemoine, who has before written on the subject, very experienced "dowsers" can distinguish between deposits of different metals by changing the material of which the rod is made. Thus, a rod of wood or iron will show the presence of copper, one of wood that of aluminium, while rods of wood, copper, or iron will alike reveal the neighbourhood of silver. M. Lemoine tries to show that there is a scientific reason for this to be deduced from the work of M. H. Mager already mentioned in THE ACADEMY. But it would seem to be more prudent to await the report of the German Committee formed to investigate the whole question of the Divining Rod and its real or alleged uses before deciding.

F. L.

The Theatre

"The Land of Promise" at the Duke of York's Theatre

AN accomplished dramatist has sought in this serious four-act play to spread before us many of the realities of life and to treat some of its often hidden intimacies with sincerity and candour. Thus far we are deeply indebted to Mr. W. S. Maugham, but, justly expecting so much from the author, we are, of course, not without some periods of disappointment.

The character of Norah Marsh, which Miss Irene Vanbrugh vitalises with her delicate and finished art, holds our interest almost to the end. She has been the companion of a lady at Tunbridge Wells for many years, and has reason to believe that, on her employer's death, she will be well provided for. As a matter of fact, she gains nothing but bitter disappointment, and thus takes the step which gives the story its original character.

Her brother, Edward Marsh, Mr. C. V. France, has long been settled on a farm in Manitoba, and Norah, who has lived in so sheltered and enervating an atmosphere at Tunbridge Wells, travels out to Canada in search of a future, if not of adventure; but the latter comes quickly enough. Her brother's wife, a true Canadian of the working farmer class, admirably played by Miss Ashworth, resents the "ladylike" character of Norah at once, while Norah herself does not hesitate to lay aside her gentility and allow herself many bitter phrases and sub-acid witticisms at the expense of those about her. Her most caustic and disagreeable and, as it seems, uncalled-for, ironies are addressed to one of the hired men, a kind of Canadian superman, Frank Taylor, made lifelike enough by Mr. Godfrey Tearle. Soon the jealousies and hard methods of her sister-in-law cause Norah to change her tone to Taylor and offer herself as his general servant and, incidentally, his wife, when he returns to his own small farm and hut at Prentice.

After that offer has been accepted the play deals with the gradual taming of the illogical and difficult Norah by a husband who means to have his pound of flesh and has no knowledge or belief in the sort of delicacy on which his wife sets so much store. In the hands of Miss Vanbrugh the situation is a tragedy; after the first outburst or two, a silent drama of the soul, in which Norah suffers everything and learns a good deal, goes sullenly forward.

In the end, when once more Frank Taylor's farm has been ruined and he has to become a hired man again, Norah, who has an opportunity of returning to England and receiving a good post, elects to remain with her husband.

We must own that the woman we had gathered Norah to be, and the sort of man that Taylor appeared to us, would not have acted as they did in the last scene at Prentice. Taylor, who has been a man of iron, breaks down for very little reason; Norah, who a very short time before has implied her unhappiness to her brother and hinted at her willingness to get away from her husband, now clings to him after a manner which is more conventional than convincing. However, our disagreement with the sudden changes in the characters of the two main characters does not prevent the play from being at once an engrossing, original and sterling piece of work. It is acted throughout with perfect skill. Miss Vanbrugh will convey to many a charm which is not, as it seems to us, altogether in the character of Norah. Mr. Tearle is more than usually sincere and powerful as Frank Taylor. As for the other eleven

By Appointment

FORTNUM & MASON'S CHOCOLATE TRUFFLES.

A SPECIALITY FROM FORTNUM & MASON.
MADE EVERY DAY.

2/6 and 5/- per Box.

Sent free by post on receipt of remittance.

FORTNUM & MASON, Ltd.
182, Piccadilly, London, W.

people of the play, they fit into their places with wonderful exactitude, and are so entirely the personages they represent that they give solidity and truth at every turn. It is only Norah and Frank who surprise and make us doubt a little at the end of "The Land of Promise."

Two New Plays at the Royalty Theatre

"ACID DROPS."

DURING the last two years we have seen a large number of powerful and even delightful one-act plays; but Miss Gertrude Jennings' lively study of life in a women's infirmary ward of a workhouse is by far the cleverest that we have had an opportunity of welcoming.

There is a little sentimental story about the Rev. Noel Cuthbertson and Flora Cavan, who comes to read to the old women, but the incident is only of interest in that an extremely old and beautiful patient, Mrs. Gilbert, enables them to patch some difference they have had. The true joy in Miss Jennings' play is in her method of depicting such a character as the gentle Mrs. Gilbert and the exceedingly wicked and amusing Mrs. Price and the rest. There are rare qualities here—wit, refreshing satire, delicate pathos; and there is bitter irony in the way in which we are shown the little warfare and jealousies of the ward.

Mrs. Price, Miss Beryl Mercer, is the most complete picture of a thoroughly wicked old lady of the workhouse class known to the stage. Her curious little lies and artifices, her failures and her final victory as the "hemperor of the ward," are intensely interesting and enable the actress to perform her part with wonderful effect. So convincing had she become that when at the end of the play the audience called loudly for the author, she came to the footlights on behalf of the managers and spoke in her own gentle voice—so different from that of Mrs. Price—the surprise was delightful, and would have been comic but for the sense one gained of the extreme cleverness of the actress.

Miss Betty Ward, too, as the sweet old lady who was too near her quiet end to know how happy she was making her friend, Miss Flora, gave a most admirable character-study and reached the highest level of reserved, unforced pathos. All the other parts were well played, and we must beg all visitors to the Royalty to be in time to see Miss Jennings' little comedy and the truly remarkable playing of Miss Mercer and Miss Ward.

"PEGGY AND HER HUSBAND."

There is much that is brilliant and delightful in this witty comedy by Mr. Joseph Keating, much that holds our interest and makes for gaiety and light laughter.

We are presented to a fashionable modern world in which most of the characters are rich and well pleased with themselves, and all are determined to air their views on life and the circumstances which surround them in lively phrases and acute criticism. Some may think that this sort of thing is overdone, but we do not feel that. Such characters are to be met with every day, and if liveliness be their fault, that is indeed a welcome one.

Rodney Carlish, Mr. Dennis Eadie, has been married to Peggy, Miss Gladys Cooper, for three months, and loves her truly enough. But, owing to an old affair, about which you must find out for yourself at the theatre, he is found by his wife in the arms of her particular friend, Hattie Deverill, Miss Eileen Clanford. If Peggy has proved herself remarkably affectionate, we know also that she is extremely proud and rather stupid. Thus an excellent stage situation arises out of the simple and rather unwilling kiss of friendship.

Peggy retires to a house of her own and Rodney travels to the East for six months. They want to get back to each other; everybody wants them to be happy, but Peggy's pride becomes an awful difficulty. It is the author's business to get over this affair, which he finally does in the true spirit of comedy. But before that happy ending of the third act he has shown us many amusing characters and given some excellent satire on our neighbour's modes of thought. Of course, he does not reach us personally; his whip, sharp as it is, falls upon the others, and the result is an amusing play, with some touches of deeper feeling which relieve and make doubly effective the many lighter passages of the play.

As to the acting, it is as near perfection as we are likely to see in modern comedy. Mr. Eadie has a fairly easy task in representing the agreeable Rodney Carlish; on the one or two occasions when the author gives him the chance of showing his powerful mastery of human passions he takes the fullest advantage of them. Miss Cooper, too, is not called upon for any very strong work. But at the end of the second act, when she has, as she thinks, finally dismissed the husband she loves, her expression of abject terror and weakness is admirable and sincere. The many other characters of the play, all amusing examples of modern types, are presented with great accomplishment; and, as a whole, we should think that "Peggy and Her Husband" is just the play to run successfully throughout the London season.

Saison Nijinsky at the Palace Theatre

THE welcome engagement of M. Nijinsky and his company firstly provides us with a delightful fresh setting of that familiar dream of youth and fragile beauty, "Les Sylphides." But M. Maurice Ravel has made a different arrangement from that formerly heard of Chopin's mazurkas, études and nocturnes to accompany and support the dances; a vague, translucent moonlight scene surrounds the mysteries of those delicately clad ballet figures; an air of subtle magnetism pervades the whole production. Nijinsky and Mlle. Nijinska dance to perfection; the blithe and enrapturing quality of the ballet is sustained with perfect grace, but we cannot help feeling that the Palace provides rather too small a space for the buoyant dancers. This is brought home to us especially when Nijinsky is dancing alone; the old, wild freedom is very occasionally checked, the bravery of his flights a trifle abridged. But with his accomplished sister and the exquisitely graceful ladies of the ballet the performance is a thing of beauty which all those who have seen it before will wish to watch again, and with which the rest of the world will delight to make acquaintance.

After "Les Syphides," on the first night, M. Alexandre Kotschetowsky gave us a charming Danse Orientale to the music of Sinding, orchestrated by Tanéïew. The whole of the East is comprised in this dance. One does not feel that it is intended to represent any place or people, but rather that it is freighted with all the delights and vigour of many and various Oriental peoples.

The choregraphic tableau from Gautier's poem, "Le Spectre de la Rose," is an old friend to which Mlle. B. Nijinska and her brother add new graces. "La Jeune Fille" slumbers after a ball in the wide and simple scene which Mr. Anisfeld has painted, and to her comes "La Rose"—the spirit of romance and quintessence of gay movement. To the seductive music of De Weber the two are soon united in the most thrilling and exhilarating of movements. The Rose makes love delightfully and then vanishes like a fairy; the young girl continues her sleep and nothing remains but the perfume of beautiful flowers and the fresh yet distant sound of the "Invitation à la Valse."

The entertainment has closed with this poetic fantasy. Nijinsky and his company have come and gone, and it only remains for the Palace audience to drown their retreating forms in a flood of warm applause.

EGAN MEW.

A Lecture by "Charivaria"

A CONSIDERABLE number of people assembled on Friday evening, February 27, at Stationers' Hall, on the occasion of the lecture by Mr. Walter Emanuel on "British Wit and Humour." After a few brief introductory words by the chairman, Mr. Arthur Waugh—words concise, arresting, and to the point, as a chairman's words usually are not—Mr. Emanuel read his address. This consisted of a short essay written some years previously, extended, and brought up to date. Mr. Emanuel touched lightly upon and quickly glided over wit past and present, what constitutes the comic spirit, and those who had helped to contribute to the humour of the time. From his opening sentences it was clear that Mr. Emanuel had his audience with him, and when the lecture came much too early to a close there was a clamour for "more." After a few words of thanks from Mr. John G. Wilson, editor of "The Odd Volume," and an anecdote from Mr. G. Valentine Williams, Mr. Emanuel read—with apologies to his audience—some of his own short skits on things in general, and thus brought to a close a very pleasant evening. Thanks are due to Mr. Palmer, the energetic secretary of the Booksellers' Provident Association, for his efforts in organising and arranging the meeting.

At St. Stephen's Shrine

BY A REGULAR DEVOTEE.

TO show the insincerity of the Prime Minister's tactics—James Hope asked him if he would allow the House to sit on a Friday evening for a few hours to enable the country to hear what were his new proposals. Not a bit of it! He was not going to give up his week-end to allay national anxiety. James Craig anticipated his answer by saying, in a stentorian voice: "I beg to state on behalf of the Prime Minister that the answer is 'No,'" which caused the whole House to roar, and even Mr. Asquith and the Speaker to smile. Personally, I do not understand it; all sides seem to be convinced that the Ulstermen are not bluffing, and, if that is the fact, we are drifting day by day nearer civil war. Yet nothing is done. Asquith said that, if the permanent business is concluded sooner than is anticipated, he will let us know so much the earlier! One would think he was speaking to children in a nursery, playing some childish game, rather than as a statesman to responsible persons amid a momentous crisis. How the Opposition stand it, and why the Ulstermen remain quiet, is a mystery to me.

Jack Seely repeated his last year's performance about the aeroplanes of the Army. How perfect they are; how superior in every way to the foreigner; in fact, they are better than anything other nations could produce! England had played the old game of seeing the other countries waste their money and time in experiments and then profiting by their mistakes—in fact, left them standing still in the race for superiority and efficiency. Joynson-Hicks doubted it, and Arthur Lee was very dry—he hoped that Seely and Winston, having shown their courage, would not go on risking their valuable lives. If it was really necessary for members of the Cabinet to go up in aeroplanes, there were others who could be more easily spared.

The next film was the Insurance Act. Here, again, little Wedgwood Benn, in the involuntary absence of Masterman and the voluntary absence of Lloyd George, declared it was the finest Act in the world. We pressed for an inquiry into the working of the Act. Rupert Gwynne wanted to know where the sanatoria and first-class hotels were. Worthington Evans was twitted with saying he was in favour of compulsion. He frankly admitted it, but said he was misled by the Chancellor, and added: "I believed him once, but I shall never believe him again." Lloyd George, in a ferocious speech, declared that the policy of the Unionists was "Back to the Workhouse," a phrase which will be used on posters by Radicals at forthcoming elections. Bonar Law bluntly said: "The finance of the Bill is unsound, and you know it." He denied that the Unionists were pledged to the voluntary system—they were pledged to a thorough overhaul, and the way to bring it about was by an investigation; but that did not suit the Coalition at all, so the suggestion was defeated by 84.

On Thursday, the 26th, we had a dull Irish night. Mr. Horner wanted to know why Handel Booth had been allowed to be present at a meeting of the Irish Privy Council. Birrell declared that the member had been made the victim of a hoax. Mr. Horner asked the Speaker if he might cross-examine Booth on the subject; the Speaker, however, ruled that life in this House is bad enough already, but if every member is to answer every other honourable member as to where he is on a particular occasion it would be even worse. Mr. Horner was not satisfied, and he intimated that he should pursue the subject later on.

Banbury blamed the Government for releasing Larkin. The Chairman advised him to raise the question when Birrell's salary came up for discussion; but Banbury was not to be denied—he moved to reduce the sum granted to the Irish Constabulary because the Government had failed to give instruction to the police to deal with the strike in a firmer manner at the start. It was a splendid hare, and ran for hours; but, after all, what did it amount to? We baited Birrell for all we were worth, but with the terrible question of civil war looming before us it seemed to many of us very trivial.

On Friday, the 27th, Sir Harry Verney brought in his private member's Bill to have all elections on one day, and that day to be preferably a Saturday. I remember the saying of a well-known Oxford coach to the effect that he hated to be umpire because he always leaned in favour of his opponents. This is naturally the attitude of a chivalrous gentleman; but that does not appeal to the present Government in the least. "We are in power—let us do everything we can to keep there." I hold that any Government which brings in a Reform Bill ought to act with rigid fairness to the other side; they are in the majority, and in common decency ought not to load the dice against their opponents. But no such feelings actuate the present majority. Sir Harry Verney moved his Bill in a pleasant speech—he really could not see what objection there could be to it. We soon showed him. It was a Bill designed to kill plural voting as much as possible. The Saturday poll was to prevent tradesmen voting; the police would be overworked, and the Post Office would be unable to deal with the mass of correspondence involved. Sir Frederick Banbury pointed out that, instead of shortening elections, it would lengthen them, inasmuch as mere notice of an election would be given, and the election would commence directly the word was given. The Radicals objected to the use of the motor-car. Sir Frederick Banbury said nobody cares a twopenny—(here he pulled himself up amid cheers) two straws for the Bill. But it was all to no purpose; the Bill was carried, and the Government will take care that it becomes law. Like Pearce's Bill of last year extending the hours of polling, it will help the Radical Party enormously, whilst no attempt is being made to remedy the anomalies of one man representing five or six times the electorate of another. The Government see that the sands are running out, but they are determined to entrench their position as much as possible.

On Monday, the 2nd, Bonar Law deliberately drew the fire of Lloyd George over the Insurance Act. There is a feeling growing that all is not right; fears are expressed that the actuarial calculations are wrong, and everybody knows that, when actuaries are wrong or have calculated on premises that are unsound, things are likely to go very wrong indeed. The life insurance societies that have failed during the last century are a melancholy proof of this statement.

Lloyd George denied it; when pressed, he said that the Chief Actuary of the Government had not made actual examination of the Friendly Societies at the present time—it was not the time to do so. The Act specified a time, and we are apparently to go on until that date arrives.

Winston then dealt with the Navy. He was certain that he had the Unionists with him; so that all he had to do was to sit on the Suicide Club. He explained that the large amount required on the Supplementary Estimates was due to various causes: first, the determination of the Admiralty to build up an immense reserve of oil, which had unexpectedly doubled in price. In spite of this, the Government felt that the subject was so important that they now had a supply safely housed for three years' peace consumption or one year's war consumption, and they were not through with their plans yet. Shipbuilding had been accelerated, and the shipbuilders naturally wanted to be paid. There were also further increases in wages. Then, again, our air fleet was costing a great deal of initial expense, although it would enable us to make economies elsewhere later on.

All the Little Navyites wrung their hands and deplored the extravagance and unbusinesslike methods of the Government. Price said that such miscalculations, if made in a private firm, would land it in bankruptcy. Philip Morrell remarked bitterly on the utter helplessness of the Commons over finance—which is very true. David Mason, greatly daring, moved a reduction of £100, which is not much, when you come to think of it, in £2,500,000. He was only able to persuade 33 members to vote with him, but he prevented the vote being taken the same evening, to the annoyance of Winston.

On Tuesday, the 3rd, a change came over the spirit of our dream. Asquith said that the Opposition had been so good in helping to ensure the completion of the necessary financial arrangements by the end of the financial year that he was glad to announce that on Monday next he would submit the motion for the second reading of the Home Rule Bill. This was considered to be a substantial concession, and Bonar Law appealed to Almeric Paget not to move his motion on Home Rule at 8.15.

Sir Edward Grey had to admit that the Government was powerless as far as Mr. Benton's death was concerned. The United States say that under the Monroe Doctrine no foreign country can interfere with the Republics on the North American Continent. We cannot therefore punish Mexico direct, and the United States also appear to be powerless to do so. The House seems to think that the state of affairs is very unsatisfactory.

After this a breeze arose. Bob Cecil wanted to talk about the conditions of housing under which the workmen lived at Rosyth, but Whitley rather narrowly ruled that this could not be discussed. This caused a flare-up. The Unionists think that there is a scandal being hidden here, and Stanley Wilson boldly accused the Chairman of protecting the Government. Whitley shot up like a Jack-in-the-box, and said that Wilson was grossly disorderly—which was true. Wilson apologised, and Bob Cecil, whom it is not easy to put down, said: "Very well, if I cannot discuss it, I will move the reduction."

Then Whitley allowed Leif Jones to make a rambling speech; the Unionists began to think that there was a plot on hand to keep the debate going until the Government supporters arrived in sufficient numbers. The Government, very uneasy, evidently feared a division so early in the afternoon. As a matter of fact, we had nothing on; but when Percy Illingworth left the front bench and went to the front door, somebody shouted out: "Going to see if you're safe?"

Spencer Compton, who was Speaker early in the eighteenth century, could not be called a strong Speaker, but on occasion he could administer a sharp reproof. When a member once called upon him "to make the House quiet," declaring that he had a right to be heard, Compton answered: "No, sir; you have a right to speak, but the House has a right to judge whether it will hear you." We thought the old rule still applied, but Whitley seemed to think that a Chairman of Committee had more power than a Speaker, and did all he could to get a hearing for the lachrymose Leif. He sharply rebuked the Unionists for shouting "Divide," whereupon they shouted "Agreed" and were also sternly admonished. Winston got very angry, and accused the Unionists of trying to find out how many Liberals and Unionists there were in the House instead of patriotically voting money for the navy.

This was all very well, but the Unionists felt that they had not been well treated either by the Chairman or the Government, so sulkily voted for the reduction as a protest.

As the Home Rule debate was off, I went off too.

A collection of tapestries, carpets, and furniture from Boughton House, Kettering, lent by the Earl of Dalkeith, together with three tapestries after Mantegna's "Triumph of Cæsar," lent by the Duke of Buccleuch, will be exhibited in the North Court of the Victoria and Albert Museum, during March, April, and May.

BRITISH		COLUMBIA
THE ORCHARD OF THE EMPIRE		A LAND OF FRUIT AND FLOWERS.
Climate and Soil Eminently suitable for MIXED FARMING, FRUIT GROWING, DAIRYING, HORSE, [HOG, and CATTLE RAISING, and POULTRY FARMING.
Easily accessible Markets and good prices for all classes of Agricultural produce. Production (estimated) from agriculture in 1913, $24,000,000
SPECIAL LAND CONCESSIONS TO SETTLERS.
Full particulars on application to J. H. TURNER, Agent General for B.C., Salisbury House, Finsbury Circus, London.

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

BY LANCELOT LAWTON

THE POWER OF THE PRESS FOR EVIL

FEW people, even among those who derive their livelihood from the calling of journalism, will deny that within the past few years the daily Press and the various organisations connected with it have developed the commercial spirit to an extraordinary degree. No doubt the competition introduced by the successful halfpenny paper forced the pace in this respect. It is a fact that, in spite of the many manifestations of enterprise, it cannot be said that the Press has taken full advantage of the modern facilities for its own improvement.

None the less, it is perfectly true, as we have said, that the commercial side of journalism does show remarkable development, and it is plainly evident that this development has been gained at a cost for which the status of the profession is called upon to pay. Save on public occasions, where the oratory employed by representative journalists is as stereotyped as the columns which make up their newspapers, it is never seriously contended that the Press leads the public. The exact reverse is the real state of affairs. The proprietors of the Press, like any other shopkeeper, give the public what the public wants.

Knowledge of the inside workings of a newspaper office will abundantly prove the truth of this further assertion, that in most cases those responsible for the management and policy deliberately exploit the appetite of the public for all that is unsavoury, sorrowful, and tragic. Were the Press not to claim so privileged a position in the community, but to rest content with a purely commercial status, then it would escape much of the criticism that can now reasonably be laid to its charge. The Press, however, wears a cunning mask. It pretends to serve while all the time enslaving. For this, in effect, is what surrender to the public appetite really means. That product of Western civilisation, the drunkard, demands alcohol; but no one pretends that it is good for him. In like manner, that product of Eastern civilisation, the opium-eater, calls for opium; but in his case, also, no one pretends that it is good for him. The keeper of the opium or the drinking den, however, occupies a very low status in the world's community. We are not suggesting that the proprietors of the daily Press should be placed in a similar category. Nevertheless, it is time that the services they render the public were appraised at their proper value.

The pretensions of journalism to a separate estate in the realm are insupportable. The modern newspaper is nothing more nor less than a commercial concern subsidised by advertisers. In certain instances it may promote the well-being of the community and assist the ends of justice by providing a medium of publicity accessible to all. But this publicity, let it be remembered, is in the main restricted to law-suits which, in the jargon of Fleet Street, possess a "live" interest. In some cases, also, the Press no doubt ventilates worthy causes. On the other hand, the number of causes that it wilfully suppresses because these are inimical to the interests which the newspaper itself serves, is a damaging count on the other side. It is not so much a free Press as a fair Press of which the community stands in need. In a perfectly ordered State, stringent legislation would provide the remedy. We can imagine the journalistic howls and shrieks that would be set up were anything of this sort to be proposed in England. Yet because the masses devour with avidity the printed garbage which is their daily portion, it must not be imagined that they are at heart grateful. Underlying the popularity of the Press there is a not inconsiderable amount of hostility. Here we have revealed one of those remarkable and at the same time reassuring complexities of human nature.

As things are at present, the liberty of the Press lies in its power to deal largely as it likes with movements and individuals, criticising, approving, ridiculing, or even ignoring, according to the whim and fancy of its directors. This last, the power of suppression, is quite as insidious as the power to print. The Law of Libel, open as it is to obvious objections, many, indeed, from the point of view of the newspapers themselves, merely touches the fringe of the question, and does not succeed in determining the duty of the Press towards the public. In point of fact, no remedy is permitted the community against the abuses to which it is subjected by the Press. The evil therefore resolves itself into a public evil. Without the intervention of Parliament, the public is helpless. The Press may criticise the Legislature, the Pulpit, and the Arts; but the Press never criticises itself. Nor can criticism affecting the Press ever reach the public, for in reality the public as such is without an organ of publicity.

With interests to serve and dividends to make, newspaper concerns are primarily commercial, and can legitimately lay claim to no status other than that attaching to all trade undertakings. It is, in short, the case of themselves first and the community afterwards, and any incidental service they render to the latter invariably owes its origin to self-advertising enterprise.

In some instances the Press, in the pursuit of its commercial ideals, actually becomes the ally of the forces of lawlessness and violence. Let us take the example of the militant Suffragist movement. The women complain that their meetings go unreported, but that their

ROYAL ALBION HOTEL, BRIGHTON.

THE NEWEST HOTEL.

Closer to the Sea than any other Hotel
at Brighton.

Magnificent Dining Room and Lounge with beautiful Sea Views.

The Academy and Literature says:—"We have tried all the hotels in Brighton and none can compare with the Royal Albion for beauty of position, comfort, and personal attention to visitors' wishes."

For Illustrated Brochure and
Tariff, apply to
THE MANAGER.

Telephones :
903 Post Office (2 lines).

Telegrams :
"Brilliancy, Brighton."

acts of contemplated fanaticism secure for them widespread notice on the front page of the daily journals. Every newspaper, however, protects its conscience in that it has its little pulpit—the leading article column which has no connection with the establishment next door, the front page School for Scandal. If the Press wishes sincerely to serve the public, then it should intimate to the women suffragists that it will devote adequate space to reporting serious and orderly meetings of a movement which is, after all, of great importance to the community. In that event we doubt not that house-burning would cease.

If it were not for the fine pretensions of the Press, we freely admit that our rebukes would be uncalled for. So soon as we analyse these pretensions, their utter fallacy is exposed. Already we have remarked upon the inability of the Press as business undertakings to keep pace with modern developments. Let us take the example of the treatment of foreign affairs and the small use to which the Press puts the cable. Instead of performing a public duty in keeping the world in touch with great movements affecting the welfare of peoples, news is confined to countries close at hand because the telegraph rates are cheap, and even in these instances serious information is altogether neglected. Not long ago the Press pleaded for a universal reduction of the telegraph rates, making much of its peculiar utility in the community. But although substantial concessions were granted, it is evident that no one has benefited save the shareholders in the journals themselves.

Great Britain has now become the political and business clearing house of the world. Her people who invest money abroad are deeply interested in learning accurately and impartially of the march of events in all parts of the world. But it is no exaggeration to say that not a single medium to-day satisfies the demand in this direction. The retort will be made that newspapers cannot afford to pursue a policy of altruism. If that be so, then they must not claim the status of the altruist. Nor must they complain if the public one day takes into its own hands the function of publicity, compelling by legislation fair treatment, and perhaps instituting for itself public sources of information. We make no excuse for dealing with this subject under the heading of Imperial and Foreign Affairs, for it is one deeply affecting universal peace and progress.

MOTORING

IN view of the constantly increasing volume of motor traffic on the roads, the fixing of warning signs at the points of danger becomes of greater importance day by day, and it is satisfactory to note that the Automobile Association and Motor Union is dealing with the matter with characteristic thoroughness. During 1912 and 1913 no fewer than 4,457 of these danger signs were supplied to local authorities by the Association, which has also done much to safeguard road users by obtaining the removal of existing sign-posts to more conspicuous positions, the lowering and trimming of hedges and trees at corners and cross-roads, etc. The A.A. warning signs, which consist of yellow enamelled iron plates, with conspicuous lettering in bronze blue, are supplied by the Association quite free of charge, the only responsibility of the local authorities being to erect them at places where the inspectors of the Association consider them necessary for the safeguarding against what would otherwise be unsuspected dangers. Applications for further signs wherever they may be deemed necessary are invited by the Secretary, Mr. Stenson Cooke, at Fanum House, Whitcomb Street, London, W., but it should be noted that the Association does not supply signs for private entrance drives. The chief onus of care is regarded as being always upon traffic entering a main road from a road of lesser importance, and apart from this, were the above rule not adhered to the multiplicity of warnings would diminish their value.

* * *

That most famous of all Italian racing drivers, Felice Nazzarro, will, says The Motor, run three cars in the next Grand Prix, and is devoting a good deal of his own time and the whole resource of his works at Turin to the task of producing a batch of cars worthy of his name. He made his début on a Fiat, and in later years drove Italas. He is now preparing three special Nazzarro chassis having four-cylindered engines, the cylinder

"The Champion of Six-Cylinders."—Daily Telegraph.

The NOISELESS NAPIER

The Original and Proved BEST SIX-CYLINDER.

45 H.P. Six-Cylinder Noiseless Napier Chassis, complete with Tyres, Lighting Dynamo, and R.W. Detachable Wire Wheels - - £850

LORD LONSDALE, the eminent Sportsman and owner of a large fleet of Napier Six-Cylinders, says:

"There is Nothing Better on the Market than the Napier."

Please arrange for trial run on one of these famous SIX-CYLINDERS.

D. NAPIER & SON, LTD.,
14, NEW BURLINGTON STREET, LONDON, W.
Works: ACTON, LONDON, W.

dimensions being 94 mm. bore by 200 mm. stroke. Both the inlet and the exhaust valves, which are disposed overhead, are duplicated, so that sixteen valves are in use in all. The chassis have many special features, which will create considerable interest when published.

* * *

It is announced that a new company, with a capital of £100,000, is to be launched at an early date for the purpose of pushing the Atlas Puncture Proof Tyre in the United Kingdom. As is generally known in motoring circles, this tyre is of unique construction, immunity from punctures being attained by the incorporation of several layers of overlapping, but not touching, hardened steel discs. The principle employed, in fact, is precisely the same as that of the Atlas non-puncture inner case, which has been on the market for some years, and has had an extensive sale both in this country and abroad. The tyre itself was subjected to an R.A.C. test at Brooklands about a year ago, and came out of the ordeal with complete success. There can be no doubt as to its unpuncturability under any conditions likely to be met with on even the worst roads, and we understand that the company intend to sell the tyre under a "3,500 puncture-proof mile guarantee."

* * *

The conspicuous success of Vauxhall cars in open competitions during the last twelve months has been the subject of much comment. Two more wins are reported in the January number of the Australian Motorist, copies of which have just reached this country. The event was the hill-climbing contest held at Wildwood on December 6, under the auspices of the Automobile Club of Victoria. Wildwood Hill is eight-tenths of a mile long, with a gradient varying from 1 in 4 to 1 in 6½, and there are two "elbow" turns. Seventy-two cars took part in the contest, which was divided into three sections—a closed event, an open event, and a lady-drivers' event. Two Vauxhalls were entered, one for the closed and one for the open event, and each took the first prize on formula in the class (B) for cars of 18 to 26 h.p. These wins bring the number of first prizes and special awards won by Vauxhall cars in 1913—in many different parts of the world and mostly in the hands of amateur drivers—to 80.

* * *

The open meeting at Brooklands for the 1914 season will be held, weather permitting, under the auspices of the Brooklands Automobile Racing Club on the following dates:—April 13 (Easter Monday), June 1 (Whit-Monday), June 27 (Saturday), August 3 (Bank Holiday), and September 26 (Saturday).

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THE Stock Exchange is in the depths of depression. The public is not buying anything either for investment or speculation. Brokers are idle and jobbers are reduced to gambling amongst themselves. The new issues have gone very badly indeed. The City of Riga just scraped through, but the British Empire Steam Navigation debentures were practically left with the underwriters. The Royal Mail second debentures went a little better, but here, also, the issue was a failure. It is said that the American Stores failed to get its money, and it is doubtful how far the Buenos Ayres City loan may be considered as a success.

Canada has been in the market with a big five million loan offered at 99; it is a Trustee security, but I am doubtful whether it went. Cordoba Central offered £1,250,000 4½ per cent. second debentures at 81, a somewhat speculative proposal in view of bad trade in the Argentine. Port Talbot Steel run by the Baldwins, offered £300,000 debentures. It is hardly the moment to put money into Iron and Steel. Lever Brothers have offered a million "C" preference shares. The report just issued shows a tremendous increase of net profits, and the present issue may be considered a first-class Industrial investment. The Scottish and Foreign Trust will appeal to my Scotch readers. As all Scotch Trusts are carefully managed, the issue will probably be well subscribed.

MONEY.—The Money market remains hard. Most of the gold that is offered is taken for the Continent. Lombard Street views the departure of such large parcels with equanimity. It is felt that political affairs on the Continent

EVERY time experienced motorists have their first ride in a Vauxhall, they are most profoundly impressed by its combination of good qualities. Professional critics not predisposed to favour the Vauxhall confess that its behaviour on the road singles it out as a car extraordinary.

Make a point of trying the Vauxhall on the road. Its performance will convince you that in all the essential qualities of the highly efficient machine it has no rival, and on top of this it is noted for its perfect suspension (hence its comfort) and fine bodywork.

Trial drives can be given in any part of the country.

THE BEST VALUE IN HIGH-GRADE CARS

Complete 16-20 h.p. four-seated car electrically-lighted, hood and screen, spare wheel and tyre, £485

Vauxhall

VAUXHALL MOTORS, Ltd., 174-182, Gt. Portland St., W.

are in good trim, and that the money is therefore needed to give confidence and not for the war-chest. There is no chance of any reduction in the Bank Rate, and we may expect hard money rates for the next four or five weeks.

FOREIGNERS.—The position in Paris is not good. There was some talk of Rothschilds having helped certain banking houses, and no doubt this great firm has taken care of its friends, as it always does; but there are many bankers in Paris who have been recklessly financing very dangerous propositions in Brazil, in the hope that they would be able to unload on the French public. This they have not done, and they are now in a serious position. I do not think that we have seen the worst. The French undoubtedly completely lost their heads over the Balkan war. The careful rentier refused to see eye to eye with the banks, who lent money to all the combatants. The bad debts will be enormous, for it is quite clear that Bulgaria, Servia, Greece, and Turkey are bankrupt. The banks will be unable to collect their debts, and they have been equally unable to persuade the French saving public to buy the bonds. A panic in France therefore seems quite certain; it will not be as bad as the Panama crash, but it will be very serious indeed.

HOME RAILS.—The Home Railway market is just as flat as the rest of the Stock Exchange. Everybody is pleased with the dividends that have been declared. Everyone admits that a gilt-edged Home Railway stock giving $5\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. is dirt cheap; but no one buys. There is a small "bull" account, and this seems to depress the dealers; but what really stops the Home Railway market is the bogey of labour trouble. Last week I had hoped that all questions between the directors and the agitators had been settled. The majority on all the boards is in favour of recognition, and this will give us peace. To-day, however, there is a rumour that the more militant agitators have obtained the upper hand; the whole question of peace and war therefore hangs upon a thread. Personally, I should back peace, but I admit that cautious people may just as well wait before they go into the market.

YANKEES.—The American market is very bad. The perpetual talk of reconstruction has upset everybody. The Gould lines are in for a very bad time, and Missouri Pacific and Denver should certainly be sold. The Rock Island position is not good, but a very strong crowd has the matter in hand, and after the whole of the assessment has been paid up the shares will be worth buying; no one, however, should touch them to-day. Southern Railway has been financed by J. P. Morgan and Company on short-dated bills, and may therefore be considered out of danger. The other small railway whose earnings have been tumbling rapidly, and whose position was considered dangerous is the Missouri, Kansas and Texas. I hear that this line has made a compromise with its opponents, and will possibly scrape through. The Copper position in the United States is definitely bad, and the big selling agencies have been compelled to reduce the price of electrolytic. The English figures are also unsatisfactory, and it is clear that we shall see Copper at £60 a ton before the end of the year. Therefore, Amalgamated and Anaconda should be sold. Great Northern has made an issue of fresh capital at par; this gives a splendid bonus to the holders of common stock on this well-managed line. Rights are worth about two dollars a share. There is a very small bond issue on this railway, which is one of the best investments in America.

RUBBER.—The Rubber market remains dull. The "bulls" are unable to hold their own, and prices have begun to fall away. I hoped that we should have seen a further rise and that this would have enabled my readers to get out of their rubber shares; but I am suspicious of

"ROYAL YORK" HOTEL, BRIGHTON

Supreme Comfort in a Warm and Sheltered Position. Excellent Sea Views

SOME PRESS OPINIONS.

"To the Cuisine particular attention has been paid, and no expense spared, whilst the service is absolutely perfect."

"And in the Royal York you have the perfection of an English hotel and English cooking."

AND—

Colonel NEWNHAM DAVIS says:—"The Chef makes soup like a Frenchman, grills like an Englishman, and fries like an Italian."

Telegrams: "Presto, Brighton."

Telephones: 206 Post Office, Brighton.
293 Brighton.

THE KARSINO and NEW ISLAND HOTEL HAMPTON COURT.

Propri.: Mr. FRED KARNO.

Tel.: MOLESEY 1.

*The only Residential River Hotel open
all the Year round.*

THE RIVIERA OF LONDON
THE FAVOURITE RESORT OF LONDON SOCIETY.
LUXURIOUS PALM COURT.
DANCES & ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

For Illustrated Brochure & Tariff, apply Manager.

the market, and were I a holder I should sell to-day. The Bagan Serai report is good, but the directors reduce the dividend and carry £4,500 to reserve. The shares are over-valued to-day. It is not likely that 10 per cent. can be paid for 1914.

OIL.—Oil shares are out of fashion. There is a very strong group operating in North Caucasians, and as the company is doing well, the crowd have everything in their favour, but I think the price too high, although I heard one big buyer say that he was prepared to take 10,000 shares if the figure fell to 30s. Holders of Maikop Premier should certainly take advantage of the rig and sell to-day. They cannot complain of their profits. There is very little business in Shell or Royal Dutch.

MINES.—In the Mining market a dead set has been made at Chartered, and I think that they are almost cheap enough to buy. I do not believe in all these stories about the revision of the Charter. They will come to nothing. It would be most unfair if the Government took away the land; I do not believe it has any such intention. If Sir Abe Bailey would come in and buy 60,000 shares with the call of more, I think that he might be able to put Chartered to 25s. He is about the only important gambler left in the Rhodesian market. There is no business in Kirklands, but the Russian group has been active all the week. There is very little doubt that Russia is one of the best mining countries in the world, and as the crowd that runs Russo-Asiatics is very strong, I see little chance of any fall at the moment. No one dare go a "bear," as the supply of stock is limited. Tanalyks are talked up.

MISCELLANEOUS.—Liberty's report is as usual excellent. The profits are slightly down, but the balance-sheet is so strong that there is not the slightest difficulty in maintaining the dividend. But the public are only interested in the preference, which are gilt-edged Industrial investment. Henley's figures are magnificent, mainly in consequence of the success of the "Why Not" golf ball, which has caught on, and a 5s. bonus is paid to the shareholders out of the profits on this ball. Fuller's figures are not so good, but the business is well managed and the preference shares seem an excellent investment. Swan and Edgars have again done well, and 14 per cent. dividend is paid upon both preference and ordinary. All the London shops seem to have had a good year, and I strongly advise my readers not to sell their shares. Lever Brothers' figures are splendid, but very little information is given in the report. This seems a pity, for the business is admirably managed.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

THE Sunday Times

THE LEADING SUNDAY PAPER SINCE 1822.

"CityChatter" by "Magpie"

is acknowledged by all experts to be the most interesting, instructive and accurate article on current financial matters.

of all Newsagents.

Price One Penny

Published for the Proprietor by WM. DAWSON & SONS, LIMITED, at Rolls House, Breems Buildings, London, E.C. Branches in Canada: Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg; in South Africa: Capetown, Johannesburg, and Durban. Printed by BONNER & CO., The Chancery Lane Press, 1, 2, and 3, Rolls Passage, London, E. C.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE BOARD OF EDUCATION AND TENURE CLAUSES IN SCHEMES OF SECONDARY SCHOOLS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—The Board of Education finds itself in a strange dilemma.

In 1908 was passed the Endowed Schools Masters' Act, which altered the tenure of assistants so that they could not be dismissed at 10 days' notice on the appointment of a new Head.

Accordingly most schemes have been revised in respect of their tenure clauses. The only part of the old schemes which still exists, contains an impossible provision.

This was pointed out to Mr. Runciman twice in the early months of 1909.

But no notice was taken, and recently the Board was challenged to produce a scheme which was not faulty in its tenure clauses. No member of the Board can discover one.

When Mr. Pease spoke in December last at the National Liberal Club, he desiderated a strong central authority at the Education Department, Whitehall.

After such a fiasco, it is quite time that the Board of Education was effectively reformed.

Your obedient servant,

THOMAS ALLEN.

Talbot Dene, Wimborne Road, Bournemouth.

March 3, 1914.

BOOKS RECEIVED

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Side-Slips: A Collection of Unposted Postscripts, Admissions and Asides.* By J. Griffyth Fairfax. Illustrated by Maud Klein. (Max Goschen. 4s. 6d. net.)
- Winchester.* A Sketch Book by Gordon Home. (A. and C. Black. 1s. net.)
- From Locke to Montessori: A Critical Account of the Montessori Point of View.* By William Boyd, M.A. (George G. Harrap and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)
- The Heritage of Hiroshige.* By Dora Amsden. (Paul Elder and Co., San Francisco. $2.25 net.)
- Test Papers in Elementary Algebra.* By C. V. Durell, M.A. (Macmillan and Co. 3s. 6d.)
- The Influence of Pater and Matthew Arnold in the Prose-Writings of Oscar Wilde.* By Ernest Bendz. (H. Grevel and Co. 3s. net.)
- The Yearbook of the Universities of the Empire, 1914.* Edited by W. H. Dawson, I.C.S. (Herbert Jenkins. 7s. 6d. net.)
- A German Invasion.* By Henry Sewill. (P. S. King and Son. 1s. net.)

PERIODICALS.

Hungarian Spectator; Fortnightly Review; Cambridge University Reporter; Windsor Magazine; Bookseller; Manchester Monthly; British Review; Cornhill Magazine; Publishers' Circular; Bookfellow; Educational Times; School World; Wednesday Review; Revue Bleue; Mercure de France; Cambridge Magazine; Museum of Fine Arts Bulletin, Boston, U.S.A.; The Fleet Annual and Naval Year Book, 1914; Empire Review; La Revue.

THE ACADEMY

A JOURNAL OF LITERATURE. ART, FINANCE & POLITICS

No. 2184

[Registered as a
Newspaper.]

MARCH 14, 1914

PRICE THREEPENCE

SHEFFIELD SIMPLEX

PRESS OPINION:—

*"The highest point to which motor design
has yet attained."*

The "TIMES," 8/11/13

The Connoisseur

who demands smart appearance, and the experienced motorist who desires chassis efficiency, have their ideals in the present 30 h.p. six-cylinder Sheffield-Simplex chassis.

Write for Illustrated List of complete cars, with beautiful bodies by Vauden - Plas, or better still, arrange a trial. Both are free.

Sheffield-Simplex Motor
Works, Ltd.
20, CONDUIT STREET,
LONDON, W.

Works : Tinsley, Sheffield

30 H.P. 6-CYLINDER CHASSIS. STANDARD EQUIPMENT INCLUDES U. S. L. ELECTRIC SELF-STARTER AND LIGHTER, ALL LAMPS, ELECTRIC HORN, SPEEDOMETER CLOCK, COMPLETE SCUTTLE DASH, WITH ALL INSTRUMENTS, £8 8s. TAX.

PRICE £885.

LATEST DESIGN TORPEDO — WITH CONCEALED HOOD

With this Issue of

THE ACADEMY

a Series of

LITERARY COMPETITIONS

is begun which will be found of great interest to all Readers. Full particulars will be found on page 337.

BARGAINS IN BOOKS.—

Kipling's Complete Works, 25 vols., half calf, gilt, fine set, £12 12s.; Hamilton's Parodies, 6 vols., £2 10s.; Jesse's Historical Works, 30 vols., Nimmo, 1901, £7 17s. 6d.; Thackeray's Centenary Biographical Edition, 26 vols., £6 6s.; Barrington's Graham of Claverhouse, 30s. net, for 10s. 6d.; Purchas's Voyages, 20 vols., £9 9s., Glasgow, 1905; Slaters' Engravings and their Values, 1912, 18s.; Chaffer's Marks and Monograms on Pottery and Porcelain, 1912, 42s.; Baily's Magazines of Sports and Pastimes, 64 vols., £7 10s.; Grimm's Fairy Tales, large paper, illus. by Rackham, £2 2s.; Proc. Inst. Civil Engineers, 142 vols., cloth, £16 16s.; Pinkerton's Voyages and Travels, 17 vols., 1808, £5 10s.; Porter's Knights of Malta, 1858, 2 vols., £3 3s.; Burton's Arabian Nights, 17 vols., illustrated, £17 17s.; Gould's History Freemasonry, 3 thick vols., morocco binding, £2 2s., cost £6 6s.; James' Painters and Their Works, 3 vols., £3 3s.; Habershon Records of Old London, Vanished and Vanishing, coloured plates, folio, £2 2s.; Yeats' Collected Works, 8 vols., £3 3s.; Walpole's Letters, large paper, 16 vols., £7 10s.; Oscar Wilde, by L. E. Ingleby, 12s. 6d., for 4s. 6d.; Ditchfield Vanishing England, 15s., for 6s. 6d.; Landor's Lhasa, 2 vols., new, 42s., for 14s.; Spenser's Faerie Queene, 2 vols., Cambridge University Press, £3 13s. 6d., for 32s. Will take any good books in exchange for above.—BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

£10 or offer, worth double, Beautiful Japanese Carving. Juggler with Monkey, carved by Massauowri out of a solid Ivory tusk. Apply R., c/o ACADEMY, 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

JOURNALISTIC and SECRETARIAL TRAINING FOR LADIES.—

Rapid systematic coaching. Special course in journalism. Excellent introductions given.—Telephone or write, THE TRIANGLE SECRETARIAL OFFICES, 61, South Molton Street, W.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, That the Senate is about to elect an Examiner in the following Department for the year 1914-15.

Full particulars of the remuneration of the Examinership can be obtained on application to the Principal.

FOR THE FINAL EXAMINATIONS ONLY.

FACULTY OF ARTS AND FACULTY OF SCIENCE.

One in Philosophy.

Candidates must send in their names to the Principal, with any attestation of their qualifications they may think desirable, on or before SATURDAY, MARCH 21st. (It is particularly desired by the Senate that no application of any kind be made to its individual members.)

If testimonials are submitted, three copies at least of each should be sent. Original testimonials should not be forwarded in any case.

University of London,
South Kensington, S.W.
March, 1914.

By Order of the Senate,
HENRY A. MIERS,
Principal.

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Fourteen years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE AND ART
PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION: Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free.

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Offices of
THE ACADEMY, 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

To

Please send me THE ACADEMY for the next..... months.

I enclose remittance value.....

Name

Description.....

Address.....

CONTENTS

	PAGE		PAGE
Notes of the Week	323	Literary Competition	337
Flight	324	Music	338
The Faddist	324	Some New French Books...	339
Is Death Painless?	325	At the Grafton Galleries ...	340
Unbeaten Tracks	325	The Theatre :
Reviews :		"The Two Virtues" at
Weakness and Power in		the St. James's
Poetry	327	Theatre	341
Abdiel	328	The Pioneer Players pre-
The Torii	329	sent "Daughters of
Eastern Faiths	330	Ishmael"	342
Grimaldi as Lawgiver ...	331	"And All Arabia
A Matter of Money	332	Breathes. . . ." ...	343
A Practical Pacifist	333	At St. Stephen's Shrine.....	344
The Modern Fashion in		Imperial and Foreign Affairs	346
Biography	334	Notes and News	347
Shorter Reviews	335	In the Temple of Mammon	348
Fiction	336	Correspondence	350
		Books Received	352

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of postage. Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post-free.

The EDITORIAL AND ADVERTISING OFFICE is at 63, LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, LONDON, W.C.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

Notes of the Week

THE outrage at the National Gallery, committed by a particularly notorious virago belonging to the militant section of the crazy women who wish to rob themselves of the only charms they possess, is utterly despicable. The woman who committed the outrage is a well-known criminal, who has found it quite easy to defy Mr. McKenna and his absurd Cat and Mouse Act. In January of last year we prescribed a remedy which would cure these crack-brained and disappointed women of their tendency to crime. Our prescription was a perfectly simple one. Hitherto these malefactors have been brought before the tribunals of the country, laughing up their sleeves in the vulgar manner peculiar to them, or sneering at the futile processes of law to which they are liable. One cannot seriously blame these criminal women for the disrespect which they show to current forms of law. Having no regard for decency themselves, they naturally condemn the processes by which decency is intended to be secured in civilised countries. We do not recede one inch, or one sixteenth of an inch, from the attitude which we took up fifteen months ago. Decent and respectable women are entitled to demand and we trust will always be accorded all the privileges which belong to their sex, but hooligan and disreputable women, who commit acts which would be revolting to any normal member of their community, should be dealt with accordingly —namely, as common and very despicable criminals. They should be given this option: they can serve the sentences passed upon them, which they so richly deserve; or in the alternative, if they try by some device to avoid undergoing the punishment meted out to them, they should be allowed to do so on terms. The terms we offered in January of last year were that they could escape undergoing the period of imprisonment which the Courts assign to them—but which a foolish Home Secretary and a cowardly Government have refused to enforce—by electing to receive a sufficient number of strokes with the birch rod to prevent them from committing crimes against society in the future. We do not think they will want a second application of this remedy, but if they do, they can have a second, third, and fourth, and so on ad infinitum. The wretched criminal—whose record is blacker than those which even magistrates are accustomed to deal with—who committed a wanton outrage on the Rokeby Venus, should be the first to receive the corrective discipline which we advocate, and she would know what to expect in future. Of course, a short Act of Parliament would be necessary to exterminate these vicious semi-lunatics, by the method which we recommend. Unhappily, courage is scarce in these days, and perhaps we must despair of the Commonwealth. Our attitude, however is this: we may have been too previous in our diagnosis and the necessary remedy in January, 1913; are we so to-day?

C. C.

The reduction of the price of the Times to a penny emphasises our opinion that a half-way house is of no avail in this prevalent appeal to popularity. The Observer, which was formerly an excellent paper, and still is in some respects, directly it left the fourpenny stage knew no intermediate hesitations in its descent to the penny platform; the Times, with less wisdom, but possibly with more appreciation of the dignity of its present owners, did not like to take the plunge at once, and tried by quite unworthy commercialism to avoid the step which the noble family of Harmsworth, whether on the Conservative or Liberal side, felt might injure their dignity, since they severed their connection with Tit-Bits—not as owners, but as useful manipulators of the scissors. The inevitable has happened. We, who were saturated with the tradition of the Times as it used to be, feel no compunction in stating our views of it as it is to-day. Foreign Governments are not quite so sure as they once were that the Times leads opinion in this country. We cordially wish the paper success in its new form; but would it not have been better to "go the whole hog" at once and reduce the price to a halfpenny, when it might become a sort of competitor to the Daily Mail?

The presentation of the portrait of Sir William Ramsay, K.C.B., F.R.S., to University College, and of the replica to Lady Ramsay, will be made on Wednesday, March 18, at 4.30 p.m., in the Botanical Theatre.

Flight

THE silence lay in the trees
 As in a cup last even;
 Each tree stood like an emerald flame
 Striving up to heaven.

Out of sight in the sky
 The gay lark soared and sang,
 And rode upon the crest of the breeze;
 It seemed a spark that sprang

From a fire of music. And lo,
 As I listened and stood,
 Something fled from my heart with a cry
 And glistened through the wood,

And hung in silence, until,
 Like the trees and the lark,
 It too soared up through the pale green glow
 On the breeze, and left me dark.

It rose above the trees,
 Above the wind and the moon;
 It will come back to me brighter still,
 Soon soon.

EVA M. MARTIN.

The Faddist

CERTAIN ladies whose desire for fame is inspired and impelled by an originality that comes near to genius have recently, we understand, expressed their opinion of Nature's limitations by wearing wigs of blue and of green; and in Paris other ladies, weary of the face of beauty unadorned, have given their countenance—literally—to the ingenuities of the scenic artist, who, for a consideration, will paint upon velvety cheeks a representation of bird, beast, flower, or fish in vivid colours. Two eyes, two ears, a nose, a mouth, and hair—how unutterably monotonous, they seem to say, is humanity! Let us remedy as far as we can this universal pattern; let us, who have time and money to spend as we will, touch up the crude outfit, give evolution a few hints, set the common people talking!

To such a length as this will faddists go when driven to distraction by the boredom of unoccupied days. As a rule, their freaks are harmless, and we may note in passing that often the perpetrators are moved to take their strange courses by real convictions. It is when these convictions are thrust upon normal human beings who desire to pass through life pleasantly and busily, untroubled by specialists in art and dress and food, that the faddist becomes a nuisance. We do not all see the prudence or beauty of wearing sandals and flowing robes in the streets of London; we cannot all feel that lemonade or sour milk suffice as beverages on every occasion. The average Englishman, when he is hungry, makes no shame of regarding a beefsteak as an admirable thing, a factor in the progress of the nation, an asset against liabilities incurred by hard work; he objects to having the attractions of a dish of cunningly disguised nuts set before him as a worthy and beneficial substitute. If the nuts are so good, why not eat them as nuts? he ingenuously asks. To mould them into "walnut chops" and serve them with suspicious sauces is a pathetic confession of subdued longings. He wants simply to go on his way unvexed by the vegetarian, the "teetotaller," and the "rational" dress faddist; he tolerates them with an amused smile—but let them keep to their own chosen paths.

We all have preferences; poor, spiritless, invertebrate things we should be if we had none, if we could not in addition back them up energetically on occasion. A faddist is a person who carries his particular preferences to excess, and when the heat of his excitement melts his notion into the mould of a delusion, there to become chilled and set by the discouraging breath of other people's common sense, he is liable to be dangerous. He—or she—will commit the most extraordinary acts under the influence of this fatal possession, this malignant myopia which cannot be cured—will burn houses, damage property, assault policemen, and in general behave as one demented. The curious aspect of this class of faddist is the invariable appeal of its members to that "common sense" of which we have spoken. They regard it, to the amazement of other folk, as the rock on which their devastations are logically based, not as the rock on which they ought to be shipwrecked; they invoke it as a reason for their subversive passions, call upon it to support all kinds of unstable hypotheses. Sometimes a smile or a shrug is the only possible comment; but when that stage is passed and they become intolerable we take them in hand and detain them "during his Majesty's pleasure"—or we ought to do so.

It may be said that faddists have accomplished much good in the world; that Franklin, drawing electricity from his kite in the clouds; James Watt, Newcomen, George Stephenson, experimenting with the power of steam; Mendel, the monk, patiently crossing flower with flower; and a thousand others, were all once regarded as wasters of time, of no account. But the argument will hardly hold good. A discovery is not a fad; it is a genuine item added to human knowledge, a result of close brain-work and prolonged investigation, in which first impressions of contempt are speedily changed into recognition. A fad is a pretext for attention, an excuse for spurious originality, and, from the painted ladies to the vegetarians, from the futurist to the simplified speller—earnest though some of them may be—we question whether the faddist ever leaves the world happier or better than he found it.

W. L. R.

Is Death Painless?

IN your esteemed journal of February 28, you are doing me the honour of inviting my opinion on the fascinating problem whether the approach of death is painful. It is a problem in which naturally all of us are interested, since it must some day be our own. Unfortunately—or shall I say, fortunately—I have never seen a person die; but I have been twice near death to the point of unconsciousness, once by drowning and once by suffocation. I had no knowledge that I was near death, and can only assume that in both cases—when falling from a great height into the water, and awakening in a room filled with coal gas fumes—I must have become unconscious very quickly, so that I could not have felt any more had death supervened.

Although never having witnessed actual death scenes, I have seen many persons near death, who like myself have subsequently recovered, and can offer some observations and opinions thereon.

First of all we must distinguish whether the person dying is young or one advanced in years, when death is more or less natural and both power and sensation of the brain and body are at its lowest minimum, so that the passage from life to death is imperceptible, consciousness and unconsciousness being almost indistinguishable. For such a person, dying naturally of old age, the process can only be similar to that of going to sleep, and few are likely to know when it is their last and eternal rest.

Similarly, the young person when exhausted from any cause, as for instance after a severe operation, when all his vital forces are lowered, has his consciousness so clouded, or if clear so restricted, and the nervous forces so weakened, that pain is not felt. It is a kind providence that causes us to become unconscious before death supervenes, and that really answers the question: Is death painful?

Again, in case of an accident to a strong man, the injury may be so severe that all sensibility is lost, for when pain is above a certain point, numbness supervenes. Thus I saw a man brought to the hospital whose legs had been caught in a revolving machine and were torn off. The man was as calm and collected when I saw him, almost as if nothing had occurred. He gave directions to his wife in a perfectly matter-of-fact way, telling her where to find his papers and keys, and so on—a scene which I shall never forget, so astonished was I at the time. He did not give one the impression of a sick man. He was anæsthetised to have amputation performed and died under the operation.

Is death really painless, then? Death itself, in all probability. But let us think of the man in the full vigour of life who experiences some pain in one or other part of his body and is told by his doctor that he is suffering from an inoperable cancerous growth and must die in two months, six months, or later. Can anything be more horrible to contemplate? Even the criminal sentenced to death by hanging is better off. He knew what might be the consequences when he committed the deed and after all his hours of trial are short and his death is sudden. The cancer patient, on the other hand, is dying inch by inch, and the process is a painful one.

It is my opinion that when death is slow, and the person is in full possession of his powers, the agony must be great, though many people are either so religious or so philosophical that they resign themselves to their fate and meet death with equanimity.

Love of life is an inherent quality of human nature. Fortunately while we are young we give no thought to death; it is only when our health or bodily and mental vigour are declining that we begin to think of it. At first we dread it, but the nearer we come to it, whether by age or prematurely by exhaustion, the thought of death loses its terror. That the mental attitude with which we welcome or dread death or are indifferent to it is important, I have had occasion to witness. As a psycho-therapist I have often practised "suggestion" treatment on patients who suffered from pain and insomnia. As a rule, they are merely nervous patients, but a few months ago I was fetched by a surgeon to a lady dying of cancer, who was suffering from such agonising pain that she could not sleep, and on whom morphia had no longer any effect. I had never been consulted in a similar case and feared very much that my visit would be of no benefit to the poor woman. Strange to say, however, either by my soothing words, or soothing touches—I cannot tell what it was—the patient was quieted, slept peacefully that night, and the succeeding nights, apparently free from pain, until she died.

BERNARD HOLLANDER, M.D.

Unbeaten Tracks

LA GUAIRA

AT Port of Spain the traveller for La Guaira joins a coasting steamer, plying to the northern ports of South America. We were in a Royal Mail boat, with no passengers other than our own party. Our skipper elected to pass through Boca Grande, and the conditions were ideal. Of the Five Islands, which form the gateway of the Gulf of Paria, three are mainly pleasure resorts. There the tropical sea temperature renders bathing luxurious, the only drawback being the possibility of encountering some vagrant shark.

Does Kingsley's "Westward Ho!" wield the spell over schoolboys of to-day which it exercised on those of the 'seventies? At the time of writing the book, Kingsley had not even visited the West Indies, and, except in imagination, he was never at La Guaira. Nevertheless, the accuracy of detail of his narrative is surprising. Steaming to the west from Trinidad, the vast sea wall of mountains of Venezuela towers up on the port hand in grand nakedness of outline. For nine or ten months of the year the North-East Trades blow, and this coast-line is bombarded by perpetual rollers. Kingsley's graphic story of the forlorn-hope landing on that storm-tossed coast is immortal. I was going officially as the engineer responsible for the construction of the breakwater by which the roadstead at La Guaira is protected.

The little steamer, throbbing under bluffs of the Cordilleras, is dwarfed into a mere toy on the waste of waters. The chain of heights rises 7,000 feet above a turbulent plain of fairy blue. That rocky barrier is well-nigh treeless, for the Spanish conquerors felled the forests which once clothed it, with the intent of destroying the Indians' cover. It is a ghastly story. The land is now plagued with locusts and scourged by torrential rains. "The evil that men do lives after them." True, the people are freed from the oppression of their ancient tyrants, but they have only changed masters, for the country is now in the clutches of hordes of adventurers. Revolution and anarchy are its chronic arbiters. Many of the States of Central and Southern America get up a revolution with the light-heartedness with which a football match is arranged in the Old Country; revolution may almost be called the prevalent form of national sport. The inhabitants suffer from a surfeit of despotism tempered with rhetoric. Then a master man comes to the top. He clutches the keys of State and beats down all opposition with a ruthless hand. Such a man was Guzman Blanco, whom it was part of the mission, of which I was one, to interview. For twenty-five years he wielded a rod of iron. According to the constitution of the country, the term of presidency was a period of three years. "Nice customs curt'sy to great kings." A dummy President was set up, and the real dictator spent three years of splendour in Europe as "Plenipotentiary Extraordinary." Another spell as President followed, and so it ran on da capo. On his return to the Fatherland there was wont to be a fluttering of the doves. The gentlemen who had been busy purloining funds from the national till suddenly discovered that the state of their health demanded foreign travel. Those who put off their departure too long were apt to experience the unpleasant shock of being required to refund peculations which had already been spent, or, as an alternative, to languish indefinitely in an insanitary prison. This was a cruel alternative for many a "poor patriot" who had for three years been calling the world to witness his civic virtue. Blanco's mother was, I believe, of Scotch extraction—her name White—his father Spanish. Physically he was a splendid figure of a man, but he and his place on our canvas belong rather to Caracas than La Guaira.

Midway along the coast lies the island of Margarita, once the famous Pearl Island. Greed has done its work there, too. The pearl oysters, which the buccaneers once tracked across the seas, have now been pretty well exterminated, and the place is left to primæval solitude. Why do beach-combers haunt the Pacific and neglect the Caribbean Sea? A hundred futile conundrums seek solution as, in a delightful atmosphere, under awnings, we pulse onward. As the traveller speeds to his goal, he realises what a petty fragment of the earth's surface is subdued by man.

It is a weird sensation to traverse half the globe in order to reach a spot where one is about to be responsible for a national undertaking destined to change the fortunes of a race of men. The lawmaker repeals a shelf full of obsolete statutes and substitutes some sweeping enactment in their stead. Perhaps twenty or thirty years hence, when the legislator is forgotten, a harvest of slow social change or a crop of new political troubles will be his bequest to a contemporary world. But the field of the engineer is to beat Nature with her own weapons. Instead of a roadstead, where fugitive ships strain at their peril, his legacy is a sheltered anchorage, in which ships may lie at ease. He finds a deadly swamp, and leaves an ordered river and leagues of fat pasturage. Like all artificers, he is apt to magnify his office; but, after all, the engineer's craft can never be in danger, so long as civilised society exists.

The President sent an agent, an American colloquially designated "H.R.H.," to receive us. His first duty in welcoming us to the country was to see that our belongings were exempted from examination and consequent pillage at the Customs. During our stay we were guests at a house in situation and description correspondent with that at which Amyas and Frank Leigh secured their mad interview with the Rose of Torridge. Its big living room was bare of hangings and carpets, to afford no cover for mosquitos and scorpions, and in its corner was a nest of Jack Spaniards—wasps which came and went unmolested.

The town is built round the circuit of a bay, and flanked by a spur of the Cordilleras. A conspicuous landmark on the high level is the bull ring. A tramway runs to Macuto, a little watering-place a mile or two to the east, where the public bath is in the open sea within a protecting cage, outside which the sharks are wont to "rage furiously together." One of the most elusive objects in these waters is the "Portuguese Man-of-War," a resplendent object. In the flashing sunlight he appears to sail on the surface of the rollers. Catch him if you can. He is a relic of incredibly ancient life. Approach him never so cautiously, and he will disappear in the twinkling of an eye.

La Guaira is about ten degrees north of the Line, and its mornings, when the sun wavers on the borderland of day, are divinely refreshing. Along the coast, as night draws on, the mountain heights cool rapidly, and suck up from the ocean a delicious breeze, which in turn brings sound sleep. The most exhausting condition of tropical heat is that of small variation by day and night. When the sun assumes his full panoply at midday, he is a tyrant and a bully, before whom the pale face cowers. Nevertheless, the new-comer has usually many kindly advisers, who, if he will but listen, help him to avoid risks. A chill, which at home would produce a cold in the head, in the tropics means "fever." The Briton is, however, as his forbears were, so largely a human exotic that he quickly learns to fend for himself, and he adapts himself to the climatic conditions of La Guaira.

A. E. CAREY.

REVIEWS

Weakness and Power in Poetry

The Collected Poems of Margaret L. Woods. With Portrait Frontispiece. (John Lane. 5s. net.)

Songs of Aphrodite, and Other Poems. By MARGARET SACKVILLE. (Elkin Mathews. 4s. 6d. net.)

Collected Poems. By NEWMAN HOWARD. (Macmillan and Co. 7s. 6d.)

The Wild Harp. A Selection from Irish Poetry. By KATHARINE TYNAN. (Sidgwick and Jackson. 7s. 6d. net.)

The Poets' Symphony. Arranged by G. H. WOLLASTON. (J. W. Arrowsmith, Bristol. 5s. net.)

TO find oneself in disagreement with the considered judgment of sound critics may be disconcerting if we are young enough to suffer from modesty, but to have an opinion of one's own and to be able to maintain it with reason, is to keep one's soul alive. In the excerpts from press notices at the end of Mrs. Margaret L. Wood's Collected Poems we find that her poetry has delighted numbers of anonymous reviewers and such varied celebrities as Thomas Hardy, Professor Mackail, Dean Beeching, Mr. Frederic Harrison and Mrs. Humphry Ward. Mrs. Woods is, of course, an artist with great gifts. Poems like "Genius Loci," "The Passing Bell," "Oxford Bells," and "To the Forgotten Dead," are now well known to all who have any interest in contemporary verse; but, sound and able as is all the writing in this book, one looks in vain for that compelling power which brings an emotion, as it were, out of the canvas and makes it live in the high relief of the imagination. "Effective" is the rather damning adjective we are inclined to apply to almost all these finely wrought poems. Their craft is undeniable, their taste impeccable; nevertheless, the reader looks at them as patterned tapestries of life, instead of looking through them, as "through widening chambers of surprise," on visions of truth and beauty. In the genial mood that anticipates pleasure he would be a very unsympathetic reader who could not yield himself to the refined influence of their charm, but only a small percentage of these verses contains the element of surprise, or conviction, or vision which compels the imagination to stand at attention.

Most of the poems have already been published. Of the new ones, "Under the Lamp," an impressionist picture of a London harlot, is very dull and commonplace in sentiment. "Marlborough Fair," a series of dramatic episodes, shows Mrs. Woods' cleverness and powers of observation; but our quest for "the real right thing" was ended when we came to "The Answer." Here is Mrs. Woods at her best:

Wandering the way of sleep, the timeless shore,
I gathered roses in a wintry place,
And suddenly I saw him face to face
Who in this waking world is seen no more.

I marvelled not the frozen branches bore,
Nor that I saw him, yet—"You never come,
Dearest," I said. "Why do you not come home?"
He nothing spoke, but smiled even as of yore.

And now I often meet him in that land,
And still I ask him why he stays away.
He will not answer me, he will not say,
But smiles as though I needs must understand.
I cry aloud and waking hear my cry—
And then the Eternal Silence makes reply.

If we had space to analyse this beautiful sonnet we should find that nine-tenths of its appeal lay in its reticence. Great power has no need to parade itself. Take for example Blake's "Thel." It is perhaps one of the most powerful poems ever written, but it seems to hover before the eyes like gossamer, so exquisite is its tenderness, so perfect its balance between reticence and display. When poetry seems impressionistic we may be sure that the poet has never reached the heart of his theme, for the belief that poetry can be made of fleeting fancies held together and persuasively arranged is false. All true art proceeds from a single impassioned idea. It is a cup that brims over, not a collection of concrete particles thrown into a bowl and then pounded together, as impressionists and post-impressionists would seem to think.

Vapourishness, an almost hoydenish waving of words, a self-conscious afflatus pleased with its own vague emotions, an effort after external effectiveness rendering the picture meaningless at any but a definite distance from the canvas—these are the faults of Lady Margaret Sackville's verses. In "The Ship of Dreams" the desire for new rhythms has been altogether too much for the original emotion, and the poet labours, flounders and ejaculates:

Some god unknown
Wakes in the silence, wakes and hears Monotonously
Dripping on the white stone,
Like water falling the slow years
And the long crying of the sea.

The imagery is not integral: it leads nowhere, and instead of making the senses glow with satisfaction, as fine romantic poetry always does, such vagueness simply worries the fancy. The "Ode, 1913" is better. "Morn's inextinguishable red" is the kind of absurdity into which helpless fancy leads a poet.

Mr. Newman Howard has a good deal in common with Mrs. Woods. His poems move evenly along accepted lines. He has feeling for nature, though his sympathy does not seem to be much deeper than the ordinary delight in spring and flowers and birds. This is vulgarly accepted as the poet's province, above all others, but something deeper than this obvious pleasure must always go to the making of great poetry. In an ill-advised preface Mr. Howard shows that he is angry with modern philosophers. Surely the only satisfactory way for a poet to combat heresies is for him to reveal the adequacy of orthodoxy in his poetry. Mr. Howard fails at this test, hence perhaps his preface. His conception of art apparently neglects what Mr. George Bourne has called "the ascending effort," and he quickly falls back on that bane of poetry, triteness, as in the lines concluding "The Wreck of the Stella":

We Britons make boast we are great, but not by the lands we control,
Though they be the third of the Earth; but for this:
that no ocean or clime
But has witnessed us calm in a wreck, self-effacing and fearless, and whole,
First succouring women and young: yea in this is the Briton sublime;
For great is the empire of Earth, more great the command of the soul.

Mrs. Katharine Tynan probably knows modern Ireland better than anyone else. Her collection is made for those who would understand the character of modern Celtic poetry. It is, of course, a book of travellers' samples. Among the lovely things new to us was Mr. James Stephens's "Tinker's Brat." We quote the first and third stanzas of a poem that bears comparison with Wordsworth at his best:

I saw a beggar woman bare
Her bosom to the winter air;
And into the tender nest
Of her famished mother-breast
She laid her child
And him beguiled,
With crooning song unto his rest. . .

And hearing this I could not see
That she was clad in misery;
For in her heart there was a glow
Warmed her bare feet in the snow:
In her heart was hid a sun
Would warm the world for everyone.

A generous number of poems referring to music makes up "The Poets' Symphony." We do not specially recommend the book either to poets or musicians: they would find its insistence wearisome; but it might prove a very handy book of reference for quotations to ministers of religion and other public speakers.

Abdiel

The Romance of Bible Chronology. Vols. I and II.
By the Rev. MARTIN ANSTEY, M.A. (Marshall Bros. 7s. 6d. net.)

MR. ANSTEY'S book, possibly the last of its kind, represents a very manful attempt, backed by wide reading and, with certain limitations hereafter to be mentioned, much learning, to rehabilitate the chronological statements contained in the Massoretic text of the Old Testament, not in isolated cases, but in respect of the whole of the Hebrew Bible. This, in view of modern criticism, is an undertaking indeed.

We hold no brief for the Higher Criticism, or for any of the multifarious opinions, often contradictory, which shelter themselves under the name, but we must point out that scholars are nowadays universally of opinion that the chronology of the lives of the antediluvian patriarchs is artificial to the last degree, whether based on some system of mystic numbers, as the author of "Palmoni" fancied, or on mere caprice. Mr. Anstey assures us in his preface that he relies on "the testimony of honest, capable, and contemporary witnesses." But where are the contemporary witnesses as to the lives of Peleg and Arphaxad? So far from relying on contemporary witness, Mr. Anstey brushes aside with some contempt the figures of the Samaritan Pentateuch, which have long been recognised as at least more worthy of respect than those of the far later Massoretic text. Again, the Septuagint now claims more and more attention as a translation of a book which the Massoretes afterwards manipulated almost at their will. Mr. Anstey is no doubt right when he says that the LXX "are notorious for their Hellenising or their modernising tendencies, their desire to simplify and to clear up difficulties, their practice of altering the text in order to remove what they regarded as apparent contradictions, and generally their endeavour to adapt their version to the prevailing notions of the age" (p. 15), but this does not alter the fact that that version represents a Hebrew text which no longer exists. He goes on to say (p. 16) that "many scholars look upon it (the LXX version) as a translation of a Hebrew text different from that preserved in our Hebrew Bibles, but the variations are all easily accounted for as adaptations of the original Hebrew to meet the views of the Hellenised Jews of Alexandria," which is simply overstatement.

Still more astonishing is his way of dealing with the contemporary inscriptions which bear upon the history of the Jewish monarchy. Many of these inscriptions were public records of events which every reader could convict of falsehood if they were incorrect. Making all allowances for Oriental exaggeration as to numbers of captives and the like, the inscriptions must be regarded as documentary evidence of the highest value with regard to the main course of events. Still less are their few chronological data to be discounted. Yet Mr. Anstey treats them as far inferior as authorities to the records of at least hundreds of years later, and quite impervious to correction, contained in a many times manipulated and edited Hebrew book or series of books. His way of dealing with the Ptolemaic chronology, against which he wages an unrelenting war, is marred by a similar bias. He forgets that Ptolemy had access to myriad documents which afterwards heated the baths of Alexandria, and treats his conclusions as he might those of an Ussher or a Hales, for whom, indeed, he cherishes a far greater respect, because, in lack of the materials which supply modern chronologers with their data, they relied simply and solely on the text of the Hebrew Bible—as they had it. But perhaps the extremist statement which Mr. Anstey permits himself is on p. 129 where, criticising Kent's explanation of certain contradictions in Exodus as due to various writers whose work is embodied in the same book, he declares that "there is no basis in fact for this discrimination between the supposed different sources."

So much by way of blame, which every candid reader of Mr. Anstey's book will confess to be deserved. When we come to his attempts to reconcile the contradictory dates attaching to the Hebrew monarchy we cannot but admire the laborious efforts which he makes to that end. What the difficulties are may be gathered from one quotation from John Lightfoot, of Horae Hebraicae fame.

"Divers such passages as these you will find in this story of the Kings. Ahaziah two years older than his father, II Chr., xxii, 2; Baasha fighting nine years after he is dead, II Chr., xvi, 1; Jotham reigning four years after he is buried, II Kings, xiv, 30; Joram crowned king in the 17th year of Jehoshaphat, II Kings, i, 17, with I Kings, xxii, 51, and in the 22nd year of Jehoshaphat, II Kings, viii, 16, and after Jehoshaphat's death, II Chr., xxi, 1."

With such difficulties Mr. Anstey does his best to wrestle, employing every method known to the old chronologers to whom he pins his faith, including lavish use of the "Go-rex" theory. But his bias in favour of the literal interpretation of the Massoretic text does him disservice at every turn; and when he comes to post-exilic times he falls into the usual snare set in the form of the seventy weeks of "Daniel"; and thenceforward his calculations become chaotic. Has he forgotten that it was these same seventy weeks which half-crazed a greater chronologer—Lloyd of St. Asaph—to whom, though few people know it, we in great measure owe the marginal dates attached to the reigns of the Kings in the Old Testament?

Before reaching this Slough of Despond, however, Mr. Anstey makes very valiant attempts to rehabilitate the chronology of the regal period. His beginning is not promising; on the strength of a casual word of St. Paul, as reported in Acts, he assigns forty years to the reign of Saul—a statement entirely without support, and suspect as representing the very number of years assigned also to David and Solomon. One more instance may suffice: he makes Ahab's reign end in 905, whereas, according to the untainted authority of Assyrian inscriptions, that chieftain fought at the Battle of Karkar in 854. As a matter of fact, the date given in the books of Kings are twofold; we have the length of each reign, but only approximately; and at the accession of each king the corresponding year of the king of the other kingdom is given. This latter source of information must of necessity be late—in all probability no earlier than the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. It is useless to refer to such records as "contemporary."

Mr. Anstey's proof-readers have not served him well. To find "Cyaxeres" thrice on the same page is disheartening. "Nabopollasar" and "Hipparcus" appear to be solitary instances, and such mistakes do not occur in the later sheets.

Mr. H. W. C. Newte's new novel, "The Cuckoo Lamb," will be published this week by Messrs. Chatto and Windus; it is a story of life in art, literary, and faddist circles.

The Torii

Through the Torii. By YONE NOGUCHI. (Elkin Mathews. 5s. net.)

WHAT is it exactly we should expect from a man who, coming to us from another and distant country, writes a book for us in our own speech? It is well that we should ask ourselves some such fundamental question. It may save us from many confusions, and indisputably from much attitudinising and weak sentimentalism. We have heard such men praised because of their faulty grammar. It is conceivable—let us say it is very necessary—that we should see that a man's deliverance is so much more than his grammar that it may strain and break that desirable outer elegance. We do not judge a man by the cut of his coat, although it remains true that if the coat be fitly cut, it will the better display the body's shape. To praise a writer because his faulty use of our tongue is his best proof that he is a stranger among us is quite another matter. Yet that very sentimentalism is an indication. For we do expect of a man that he add to our vision of things. If he be of us he does that best by intensity, by an inwardness that is absolved from the petty considerations of an outer rectitude; if he be not of us, in the smaller national sense, by simply putting before us his own idea of beauty and wisdom, in a body of thought, or the colours and music of his phrasing. Certainly he will not do it by aping our effete civilisation, or by tricking himself in our outworn modes of thought and literary judgment.

Therefore it is not to Yone Noguchi's opinions on Western artists and poets that we look for the excellence of this book. It is true that he can at times handle such subjects and make us see his own vision. The essay on Whistler is his best proof of that power. It is admirably done because it is temperamentally done—and strenuous or delicate personalities are the chief interest of an absorbingly interesting world. In this essay there are two personalities at work, and in the play between them we get such a sentence as this in exposition of Whistler: "While it does not look like the reality you and I think we see perhaps in Nature, it shows a sweeping ghostliness, ageless and eternal." Something of affinity between the two temperaments has enabled the writer to make of his essay on Whistler what he fails to make of the essays on other writers. That on Yeats, for example, is chiefly gossip round and about the subject; so with the others.

It is the best proof of this volume's worth that its wisdom always goes hand in hand with its beauty. There are unhappy moments when the author remembers that the Westerns are requiring of him that he be an Eastern; when he, in his ugly Western clothes, remembers that he is an Eastern, remembers it rather than passes instinctively into its realisation. Then he becomes conventionally Eastern, even as in some of his literary criticisms he is conventionally Western. Neither of these things has anything to do with the man whose authenticity we can always recognise. We hear that authenticity, for example, when he tells us, in a balance of phrasing that is exquisite:

We do not call you a real tea-drinker when you think you only drink the tea; you must really taste the fragrance and spirits of tender leaves of a living tea-tree, which grew by accident and fortune under a particular sunlight and rain. And, of course, more than that, you must learn how to sip the tea philosophically; I mean that you must taste, through the medium of a teacup, the general atmosphere, grey and silent.

"The general atmosphere, grey and silent": over and over again, in these essays, we are passed into that atmosphere; and it is one to be enjoyed in perfect quietness and ease of spirit. So with the "particular sunlight and rain." Some of these essays are beautifully full of rain; of rain when it is full of colour, of atmosphere, of peace, of a sadness and desolation that, as Synge said, is mixed everywhere with the supreme beauty of the world. "The beauty of Death," Yone Noguchi says in another essay, "is in its utter rejection of profusion"; and there is a real faith in Buddha when we find a land reflected in these essays, complete with the delicacy and austerity of that rejection. He tells us of Sanyo Rai, who wrote an invitation to a friend to come "at the time when the mountain grows purple and the water clear"; and this preoccupation with the simple, stern beauty of the face of Earth gives their truest beauty to some of the essays in this book. In fact, our chief complaint with it is that it too often lets us see the double ugliness of a people who have a beautiful civilisation of their own turning to mimic the blatant mock-civilisation of the money-grabbing West.

The essays of atmosphere are not, however, the only virtue of the book. There are moments of a wisdom purely intellectual. It is not, to its infinite gain, merely thinking, a purely irresponsible function, but a manner of seeing with the mind—instead of seeing with the soul, as in the other essays. Thus, in the essay on Whistler of which we have spoken, he says that: ". . . 'yes' and 'no' are, after all, the same thing. Whistler, for instance. His art of 'curious carving of nature and life' had been recognised from the beginning in England by the stronger word of flat denial; Ruskin was the greatest of his admirers." That is very true; and it is—what true things are not always—very wise also. And, since with a book of this kind it is best to give examples of its virtues, let us quote another instance of its intellectual insight:

. . . My attention is most keen when my power of inattention fully sways. You have to learn that most difficult art how to be inattentive. It is perfectly arbitrary to say that one gets his poetry at the unexpected moment. All of my practice is spent in that very inattention. When my inattention is all well developed I can keep my unswerving eye perfectly upon poetry. I say again that when I forget poetry it is the time when I am wholly with poetry. I always fail to write poetry when I think I will write it.

That is philosophy, because there is always more philosophy in experience than there is in the systems put into books and labelled by that title. There are many other such things that we might quote. The book is unequal, of course; all books are; it is the adventure of books that they should be so. If books were uniformly good they would be uniformly bad. It is a graver fault that Yone Noguchi should, as an Eastern, be caught at times in Western affectations. Yet the work leaves one advanced in a conception of beauty, and enlarged in understanding; and that is not altogether a familiar experience in bookreading.

Eastern Faiths

Buddhist Ideals. By K. J. SAUNDERS. (Christian Literature Society for India. 1s. 6d. net.)

Life of Muhammad. By the Rev. CANON SELL, D.D. (Christian Literature Society. 3s. net.)

The Rig-Veda and Vedic Religion, with readings from the Vedas. By the Rev. A. C. CLAYTON. (Christian Literature Society. 1s. 6d. net.)

BUDDHISM affords inexhaustible material for study. The Bibliography attached to "Buddhist Ideals" shows from how many points of view it may be regarded, and how variously examined. "Buddhism," the author writes, "is essentially introspective; it is a system of ethics upon a basis of psychology." This little volume is mainly a comparison of Christianity and Buddhism as systems of ethics. A number of the tenets and ideals of the religion are stated and examined. Buddhism is deliberately agnostic, ignoring the idea of a Creator: it is stoical in its ethics. It teaches that "faith in an impersonal dharma, the hope of an impersonal hereafter, and love which is benevolence to all and attachment to none." Among its ideals are the excellence of the contemplative life, mind-culture, concentrated meditation, serenity, self-control, patience and fortitude, kindness again, piety to parents and harmlessness to all sentient life. The Buddhist ideal is a negative goodness; it seeks to convert by common sense, reasonableness, convincing the intellect, not by winning the heart; it is too cold to kindle any enthusiasm, or to satisfy the human soul.

Among the principal doctrines are those of Karma and Nirvana. The former is the doctrine "which teaches that our present is the offspring of our past, and the parent of our future, and that through innumerable existences the work of expiation and reward goes on." The truest happiness for the Buddhist is the happiness of a good character in this world, and hereafter Nirvana, to which this goodness leads: the ultimate ideal is escape from phenomenal existence. Nirvana, by which the sorrow and pain of the world are to be escaped, is to be attained by extinction of desire: it is to be known "by its freedom from want and pain, by its serenity, its peace, its purity." All this leaves the nature of Nirvana a little obscure. Possibly a Buddhist might object to the writer's presentation of his religion. But it is evident that Mr. Saunders has sought authoritative sources for his information on the main principles, the noble eightfold Path, the four noble truths, the Buddhist beatitudes, and apparently his whole work also. It will be valuable chiefly to the Christian missionary as a manual in his relations with Buddhists; it does not pretend to cover the whole subject. Though many books have been produced on Buddhism, there was room for this "study in comparative religion" which all students of Buddhism may read with advantage.

We have read various lives of Muhammad, and numerous works on Islam, but never one that gives a better account than Dr. Sell presents of the Prophet's life, his rise to politico-religious domination, his conquest of Arabia, and character. The book is written especially for students of Islam, and embodies the results of the most recent research. As the editor of "The Islam Series," Dr. Sell, of Madras, is a past-master of his subject. His statement of fact is based upon original authorities, and he claims to be fair and impartial in his deductions. Though not too technical, he assumes some knowledge on the part of his reader. For instance, he suddenly mentions the city Yathrib, without explaining its identity with Medina. For Muhammad's biography Canon Sell has used the better authenticated Traditions, on which Muhammadans rely so largely.

The Koran is not an autobiography, but Dr. Sell shows how often the revelations embodied therein were timed opportunely to meet the exigencies of the varying social and political situations, as the policy of the Prophet changed. "At the outset of his career his aspirations were lofty, but it is difficult for any one but a Muslim to believe that he never used the medium of revelation for personal ends."

That Muhammad was a personality of extraordinary power no one can deny. To break down the idolatry of the Kaaba, and change the pagan pilgrimage of polytheism into the Muslim Hajj of the religion of one God was an enormous work in itself. Whether he established his position as a divinely-commissioned Prophet of a new and superior religion is the whole contention between Islam and Christianity, on which Dr. Sell throws much light. But this is too large a question to be discussed in this brief notice of his useful book.

Ancient Indian literature can never be a popular subject, but the historical interest of the Vedas can, as Max Muller said, hardly be exaggerated, though numbers of the hymns are childish in the extreme, tedious or commonplace. The Four Vedas, of which the Rig-Veda is the chief, describe the life of the Aryans who, starting from Central Asia, invaded Northern India, possibly between 1500 and 1000 B.C. The hymns of the Rig-Veda covered, it is estimated, a period of seven hundred years. Some of them belong to the childhood of the race; others magnify the power and rights of the priestly class. The Brahmanas, the portion of the Vedas containing directories for the priests, may date from 800 to 600 B.C. Mr. Clayton has relied largely on other writers, and used, in his readings from the hymns, translations made by a competent scholar. In describing the religion of the Aryans, which was a worship of the wonderful powers and phenomena of Nature, he has classified their gods, inferior deities, and spirits, so that the numerous names are no longer confusing.

Although Mr. Clayton admits it to be impossible to construct a theology out of the materials found in the Vedas, he manages to trace with some fullness the legacy which the religion of Vedic times transmitted to the succeeding ages; the differences between the Vedic gods and later Hinduism are made quite clear. It is noteworthy how greatly modern Hindus differ from their Aryan ancestors. The ancient Aryans occasionally ate meat, even beef, and they delighted in drinking the intoxicating juice of the soma plant. Aryan widows did not commit suttee. A text was deliberately falsified in later times to justify the burning of widows. The merit of Mr. Clayton's work is that he has produced an eminently readable account of these ancient Aryans and their records. It is ample enough to satisfy, without wearying, the general reader; deeper students will find it an excellent introduction to the whole subject.

Grimaldi as Lawgiver

The Land Problem: Notes Suggested by the Report of the Land Inquiry Committee. (Wyman and Sons. 6d.)

IT is the bane of Mr. Lloyd George's legislation that it is conceived and moulded for the purposes of the party game. Like shoes made for show and not for wear, it galls more upon whom it is palmed off with salesman's flourishes. The country has had complete experience of the electioneering system of law-making in the conditions and maladjustment of the Insurance Act, and now the Chancellor of the Exchequer is trying to divert general attention from disagreeable memories and an awkward present situation by an immense bustle and clamour about "Land Reform."

People whose interest in the great industry of agriculture is more serious than that of electioneering campaigners are naturally much concerned by Mr. Lloyd George's raid into their province, and many of them have been examining the "land-bursting" proposals in the light of the actual conditions and prospects of agriculture. In a sense this is a work of supererogation, for the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposals have been contrived with a single-minded regard for the ballot-box, and are completely misunderstood when they are considered as a project for a practical system of land tenure and cultivation; they have no consistent relation to the facts of the case. But the Land Taxes of the "People's Budget" prove that Mr. Lloyd George is quite capable of utilising the prejudices and misconceptions which he can create or augment as a force enabling him to impose on large classes of his fellow-countrymen the dictates of Grimaldi as law-giver.

No more effective examination of the Government's new nostrum has been made than that which was conducted by the Land Conference. This body consists of delegates from the Surveyors' Institution, the Auctioneers' and Estate Agents' Institute, the Central Chamber of Agriculture, the Farmers' Club, the National Farmers' Union, the Central Land Association, the Land Agents' Society, the Rating Surveyors' Association, the Central Association of Agricultural and Tenant Right Valuers, and the 1894 Club. The Conference is not a party organisation, and normally takes no part in current political controversy, but it has for good and sufficient reason given exhaustive consideration to the proposals for land legislation contained in recent speeches of Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Asquith, and other members of the Cabinet, and as a result has authorised the publication of a criticism in the form of "Notes on the Land Problem." These are described as "suggested by the Report of the Land Inquiry Committee," but as a fact they apply to the entire Ministerial policy, and are not limited to the discoveries and opinions of the famous Mr. Shore and his wholly suitable employers.

It would be difficult to find in the country men more capable of justly appraising the value of Mr. Lloyd George's prescription for agriculture than the delegates of the Land Conference, and the condition of the proposed "reforms," when they have been reviewed by these rigorously practical critics, can only be compared to that of the jackdaw of Rheims before the Cardinal Lord Archbishop's comprehensive curse had been withdrawn. That the quack remedies which Mr. Asquith has now been compelled to cry up in the market-place will (1) cut off from the land the supply of capital which Mr. Lloyd George himself admits to be necessary to it; (2) make tenant farmers the bailiffs and accountants of the Land Courts, and in many cases raise their rent and increase their income tax; (3) reduce the cereal product of the country; and (4) very seriously diminish the amount of employment available for rural labourers, cause the most grievous distress in the villages, and completely fail to augment the yearly total of the farm-hand's income by means of the minimum wage. These points are fully substantiated in the "Notes" of the Land Conference. They are not presented in an abstruse or technical form, but in the style of a business adviser's terse and temperate comments on a project submitted to his inspection. The book should be read by every agriculturist.

Sir Herbert Tree has made the announcement that his next production will be a new play in five acts by G. Bernard Shaw, which might be described as a modern version of the ancient legend of Pygmalion and Galatea. We hear that Sir Herbert is to impersonate the modern Pygmalion himself, whilst Mrs. Patrick Campbell appears as a twentieth century Galatea.

A Matter of Money

Chats on Old Coins. By F. W. BURGESS. Illustrated. (T. Fisher Unwin. 5s. net.)

THIS, the latest of the popular "Chats" series of handbooks for collectors, is a light volume of 400 pages and 50 autotype plates, which illustrate more than 250 coins.

As will be expected from its title, the character of the work is comprehensive rather than technical; for it would be impossible within its scope to do more than chat casually through the many and varied chapters it contains. These comprise a preface, the collector's aim, the story of coinage, coins of ancient Greece, coins of ancient Rome, coins of the Twelve Cæsars, Roman currency under the later emperors, the early British and Romano-British, the Saxon, the Norman and Plantagenet periods, coins of the Lancastrian and Yorkist kings, the Tudor period, the Stuarts, the Commonwealth and after the Restoration, the House of Hanover, Victoria, Edward VII and George V, regal copper coins, British Colonial currency, Ireland and the Isle of Man, coins of Scotland, American coinage, seventeenth-century tokens, eighteenth-century tokens, nineteenth-century tokens, and, finally, a bibliography.

Although in his preface the author tells us that he has at different times specialised on nearly all the branches of numismatic research referred to, it is, of course, impossible for a single plough to till so vast a field of technical knowledge, a fact which should ever be before the student when reading a handbook of this order. The chats are written in a clear and pleasant style which carries the reader onward, from one subject to another, without any feeling of tediousness; and the chapters on the Greek, Roman, British and Anglo-Saxon currency are excellent reading, useful even to the advanced student. The author is on sure ground, too, when he discusses the comparatively modern British, Colonial, American and token coinages; but it is in the Norman and Plantagenet periods that he fails. The reason for this is disclosed by his bibliography, which does not contain reference to a single work upon English regal money published during the last fifteen years.

The many volumes of the Numismatic Chronicle and the British Numismatic Journal are ignored, with the result that time-exploded fallacies of a past generation are prevalent in these pages. We are told that William II, who issued five distinct and successive coinages, "struck comparatively few coins," and that "the greater part of those issued were from dies used in the previous reign." Henry I is credited with "upwards of thirty mints," whereas there are silver pennies of his in existence to-day which bear the names of fifty different cities and towns in England and Wales. In the reign of Stephen, coins which are now known to have been issued by the Empress Maud, during the few months for which she held the crown, are still attributed to Roger, Earl of Warwick; and a similar pitfall assigns others to Robert, Earl of Gloucester, and William Fitz-Stephen. In 1180, Henry II remodelled the coinage, and the new type was reissued from time to time throughout the reigns of Richard I, John, and Henry III, until 1248, the original title, Henricus Rex, being retained upon it. There are, however, well-defined variations in the designs of the successive re-coinages which enable numismatists to differentiate the issues of the four kings. As these silver pennies are the most plentiful of our mediæval coins—so plentiful that they may be purchased at a shilling apiece—they should not have been passed over by the author with the vague remark that “there are no English coins with the name of Richard I on them; apparently those struck during Richard’s reign were from dies used by his father. . . . During the reign of John no English pennies were issued under his own name.” The classification of the money of Edwards I, II, and III similarly follows lines of demarcation now quite abandoned; and the introduction by Edward I of the round silver halfpenny is passed over in silence.

It is a pity that this section of the work was not submitted to the revision of a modern expert, for it is disappointing to find so weak a chapter in a book really well written and replete with carefully selected and beautifully executed illustrations.

A Practical Pacifist

The Foundations of International Polity. By NORMAN ANGELL. (Wm. Heinemann. 3s. 6d. net.)

THE new school of thought initiated by Mr. Norman Angell is now widely recognised as one of the most important movements of our own times. Any enlargement of the view that he originally presented in his memorable work, “The Great Illusion,” is therefore of exceptional interest. Briefly stated, Mr. Angell boldly attacks the political ideas to which we have accustomed ourselves, and which, in spite of the complete transformation of conditions that rendered them admissible in the remote past, still continue to regulate the attitude of the world’s communities towards each other. He argues that the interdependence which necessarily comes of the division of labour involves a progressive decline in the effectiveness of physical coercion. In other words, he demonstrates the futility of force. “The one great thing,” he declares, “that modern conditions have done is to enable us to say that war is irrelevant to the end it has in view.”

An attempt such as is demanded by the limitation of space to put in a few words the political philosophy of Mr. Angell, can only be attended by most unsatisfactory results. Doubtless the author has suffered again and again from the presentation of his case in summary form. The impression that has gained ground in certain directions that he is a man keen in the pursuit of an impossible ideal is altogether far from the truth. First and foremost, Mr. Angell stands revealed as a profound thinker. He does not shirk living issues, nor depend upon theories in the abstract. In point of fact, despite the contrary assertion of his critics, he is eminently practical, and relies upon forceful reasoning for the enunciation of his principles. If he is read with an open mind, it is difficult to see how his conclusions can possibly be resisted. The abrupt reply of the militarists that force has always ruled and that it will continue to do so until the end of time is mere assertion without any sustaining thought. Up to the present Mr. Angell has succeeded in completely confusing his opponents; and indeed it is no exaggeration to say that no answer such as would withstand the test which he applies to his own case, that of reason, has been forthcoming. Yet the task upon which he has embarked is a stupendous one. For Mr. Angell and those individuals whom he has enlisted frankly avow that their aim is to change the foundation of political thought throughout the world. It is not pretended that their ideas are altogether new, but it is urged that the elaboration and extension of the credit system over the universe has created a condition of interdependence between the nations never before known. Thus the doctrine espoused has removed from the region of academic to that of practical discussion, and, its truth becoming visible for the first time, there was a possibility that it would exercise an effect upon public policy.

The great industrial nations, Mr. Angell goes on to explain, are not economic units. International trade is not exchanged between corporations known as “Britain,” “Germany,” etc., but is a process of complex operations divided between individuals. A Birmingham ironmaster sells his engines to a Brazilian coffee-planter, who is able to buy them because he sells his coffee to a merchant in Havre, who sells it to a Westphalian town manufacturing rails for Siberia, which buys them because peasants are growing wheat as a result of the demand in Lancashire, which is manufacturing cotton for Indian coolies growing tea for sheep-farmers in Australia, who are able to buy it because they sell wool to a Bradford merchant, who manufactures it because he is able to sell cloth to a petroleum-refiner in Baku, who is able to buy good clothing because he is selling petrol to the users of automobiles in Paris.

There we have a typical illustration of the author’s doctrine of the interdependence of nations. He then proceeds to argue that it is impossible at this day, as a result of war, to transfer the wealth of one country to another. For the damage would react upon the confiscator by virtue of the economic forces which banking embodies, and by virtue of the fact, again owing to banking, that the immense bulk of wealth consists, not in chattels which can be carried off—transferred by force from one party to another—but in multifarious activities of the community, which must imply freedom not only to produce but to enjoy and consume.

As we have already said, Mr. Angell presents a powerful case. To term him an idealist, as some critics have done, suggests mere impatience with his reasoning. To us he appears as the first pacifist with practical warrant. It is in point of fact the militarists who are visionary, for they take no notice of the truism that material changes in the world, such as the introduction of rapid communication, affect the fundamental basis of human thought. Mr. Angell has no concern with orthodox ethics. His appeal to us is made solely on the ground that force no longer fulfils the purpose with which it is popularly associated. He proves the futility of force. Moreover, he vigorously defends the morality of his cause. What is best in the interests of the community of the world, he says in effect, is right. And war he regards as a commercial failure which, so soon as it is recognised as such, will cease. His reasoning, then—and he does not deny the object in view—goes direct to the common human instinct, self-interest in the communal sense; and it is the self-interest that he relies upon to stifle another and lesser human instinct, faith in force. But Mr. Angell, practical to the end, does not expect England to lead the way in scrapping Dreadnoughts. His appeal is to the universe, and he relies upon reason.

L. L.

The Modern Fashion in Biography

The House of Cecil. By C. RAVENSCROFT DENNIS.
Constable and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

ONE would naturally suppose that a volume with the high-sounding title of "The House of Cecil," dealing with the careers of celebrated men, would reveal in its construction a design of profound research and supreme interest. We regret to say that the volume under review cannot lay claim to either distinction. As regards research, it is perfectly true that memoirs and collections of letters have been consulted, and, above all, the Hatfield MSS. have evidently been at the disposal of the author. Nihil tetigit nisi ornavit is clearly not the aim which Mr. Dennis has placed before him; or, if he has placed it before him, he has curiously missed his mark. Eminent as some of the earlier members of the Cecil family were, if their lives are correctly portrayed in the book before us, they were singularly uninteresting and lifeless individuals so far as their personal characteristics went. Their public careers could not be otherwise than deeply interesting, because they reflect the history of epochs in the national evolution. The life of Burghley enshrines, as it were, the reign of Elizabeth up to the period when his son, Sir Robert Cecil, took the reins of administration from his father's hands. If there is one period of history which demands eloquent handling it is that commencing with the Reformation, and continuing with the Spanish plots, the Armada, and the union under one sovereign of the crowns of England and Scotland. The author who fails to make events which occurred in that age live, entrance, stimulate, and rouse to enthusiasm, has indeed achieved a task which we believed to be impossible, until we essayed to read through "The House of Cecil." As a primer for the use of the tyro, in general and constitutional history, the book has a certain value, inasmuch as it will stimulate the inquiry whether there are not many much more valuable volumes in existence dealing with the same period and the events which occurred in it.

A large part of the book has no value whatever, because it deals with the lives of insignificant members of the famous family of Cecil. Burghley and the third Marquess of Salisbury are surely figures which might have been expected to have elicited enthusiastic treatment, albeit coupled with historical accuracy. The expectation is in the present volume doomed to disillusionment. For those who want dry bones, the volume under review is ideal, although it has a tendency to dwell upon small though useful bones and leave those which constitute the building up of the figure erect in mist. The life of Burghley is fairly well done, but it has been done much better before. The life of the late Lord Salisbury is negligible to those who lived intelligently in his world and followed the history of his time. There is either too much or too little of it, and the story is told in a lifeless and dreary fashion. The life of Sir Robert Cecil, first Earl of Salisbury, is better done, which is perhaps accounted for by the author's admission that personal data are scarce, inducing the impression that when data are plentiful he finds them difficult to handle. We think the description of the measures which Cecil took to ensure the succession of James to the English throne is one of the best touches in the book; it is one, at all events, which had most interest for us. The volume is nicely got up, and the illustrations are fairly good, with the exception of the portrait of the third Marquess of Salisbury, which may be an excellent likeness of Shylock, but which bears no resemblance to the late Prime Minister of England.

C. C.

An interesting announcement is made by the Bazaar, Exchange, and Mart to the effect that from February 21 it is issuing one of its three weekly editions, the Saturday, at a penny, to meet the demand for a cheap paper of that character. The Bazaar has been a public favourite for the past 46 years, and its new development should increase its popularity. The Wednesday and Friday editions will remain at 2d.

THE Libraries, Museums and Art Galleries Year Book 1914 is the Manual of Professional Practice. But it is more than this. It tells every Bookman; every educationist; every student where special collections of Books on his particular subject are to be found throughout the country, and how to borrow from them. It also tells him where Special Museum collections are to be found, although these cannot be borrowed.

It is a key to unlock the collected knowledge of the country.

Get the Book: get it somehow. You want it. Buy or borrow the Book: but do not beg for it, nor steal it.

470 p. crn. 8vo. 8/6 net.

Stanley Paul & Co., 31, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

Shorter Reviews

A Short Account of Great Malvern Priory Church.

By the Rev. A. C. DEANE, M.A. Illustrated.
(G. Bell and Sons. 1s. 6d. net.)

THE Priory Church at Great Malvern is an ancient fabric dating from 1460, the year of its completion. It was erected on the site of a former church built by Aldwin, a monk, who is said to have founded the Priory in the year 1085. At the time of the Dissolution this religious house was "surrendered and dissolved," and its church was in danger of being pulled down. It had already been partly dismantled, when the inhabitants of Great Malvern stepped in and purchased it for £20, in order that it should replace the Church of St. Thomas as their parish church. Since then the venerable pile has encountered many vicissitudes, chiefly at the hands of self-styled "restorers" early in the last century. Ivy had been allowed to grow within the building, and one vicar even had a pigeon-loft in it. As late as 1887 some vandals actually proposed to melt down the fourteenth-century Virgin Mary bell! The volume forms one of the well-known "Cathedral Series." It is well printed and profusely illustrated, and altogether a credit to the publishers. The author was at one time vicar of Malvern, and every page of the work bears evidence that to him the writing of it was a labour of love; he has dealt with his subject as exhaustively as could be wished.

The Governance of England. By SIDNEY LOW. (T. Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d. net.)

MR. LOW'S book was first published in 1904, since when it has become so well known as to need no fresh introduction. We agree with the opening words of the introduction to the present edition: "A retouched portrait is seldom a satisfactory production," but we have strong reasons for believing that the perception of the original lineaments of the portrait now in question is of considerable value at a time when our Constitution is undergoing a complete though silent revolution, a time when from the purely constitutional point of view our political affairs are in a condition of chaos.

The vast majority of peaceable citizens are no doubt still under the impression that government is carried on by the House of Commons. They are probably still under the even more erroneous impression that the individual member of Parliament is possessed of definite and tangible powers. They would doubtless be astonished and shocked to learn this:

New laws are made by the Ministry, with the acquiescence of the majority, and the vehement dissent of the minority in the House of Commons. The Crown has nothing to do with the matter, the House of Lords very little, except that it has a limited power—seldom exercised in cases of real importance—to delay the operation of the proposed measure; the Opposition party protest against it, energetically but powerlessly at every stage; and the non-official ministerialists are able to do no more than affect the treatment of details. Every member of the House, with the exception of a score or so who sit on the front benches to the right of the Speaker's chair, would admit, if he spoke the truth, that his influence over legislation was little greater than that of a private individual outside.

Mr. Low carries the inquiry a stage further, and shows how within the Cabinet itself there has grown up an inner coterie of a few individuals who hold the only effective moving forces of government. The Cabinet itself has become unwieldy. It is a tempting hypothesis, not of Mr. Low, but of ourselves, that this modern inner ring will itself crystallise into a dictatorship so soon as circumstances provide a suitable occupant of the post. Mr. Low discusses with his customary acumen and impartiality such burning questions as the Parliament Act and Home Rule. As a question of principle he is in favour of devolution. "The separation of imperial from purely local functions seems the obvious method of relief," he says, and he foresees an increasing application of it to the problems of government. He has constantly before his eyes the silently growing power of the masses, and he makes many interesting conjectures as to the effect of such power when from its present latent condition it becomes active. We recommend the book as an almost indispensable adjunct to the more academic treatises of Dicey and Anson.

The audience which attended the revival of "Kismet" on Tuesday, March 10, found themselves in a theatre, to all intents and purposes, entirely new. The interior of the Globe has been practically gutted, and it is now one of the most comfortable and artistically furnished of the London playhouses. Of the ten principal parts in Mr. Knoblauch's drama, five are played by the actors and actresses who created them, and five by newcomers.

Everyone wants the BEST

in Everything, so why not have the
BEST LIFE POLICY
by effecting one with

The Legal and General Life Assurance
Society,

10 FLEET ST., LONDON, E.C.

Bonus for over 20 years • 38/- per cent. compound

Fiction

Salad Days. ANONYMOUS. (John Long. 6s.)

THE twins, at the age of sixteen, were about the most embarrassing couple of boys one could find; they stole a pig, they leagued with Judy, a delightfully fascinating young lady, in all manner of pranks—we wish only that both Judy and the twins had retained their final “gs” in conversation, for such expressions as “anythin’,” and “thin’” (Anglice thing), are depressing, as well as being very old-fashioned indeed.

This, however, is only a small defect in a very cleverly written and extremely funny book. Some of its epigrams are very good. “I suppose a chap quite likes his wife—as long as she’s new?” one of the twins inquired of Dick when congratulating the latter on his engagement to Judy, and, in all innocence and seriousness, this bright pair offered Dick a revolver as a wedding present, but substituted for it a christening mug, which came cheaper. They are irresponsible and irrepressible, and one embarrassing habit of theirs is to ask of people they meet whether marriage between first cousins is not a failure, since they, as the offspring of such a marriage, are visible proof of one such failure.

These things are not done suggestively, for the naïve innocence of these scamps keeps the book as clean as spring water. Among other characters, Dick, poseur, is noteworthy—but then, not a single figure introduced is devoid of interest, and we congratulate the author on the production of a very witty book.

An Unfinished Song. By MRS. GHOSAL. With Portrait. (T. Werner Laurie. 3s. 6d.)

MRS. GHOSAL has given us a breezy type of novel, showing the life and ideas of Indian ladies of the present time—a time which may be described as an age of emancipation. Many of the men are sent to England to be educated, and are astonished beyond measure at the energy of the people with whom they stay. The climate of India tends to debilitate its inhabitants, and to render them moribund; had the climate of this country been similar to that of India, our history would require to be rewritten. The men, and in less degree the women, of India are awakening, and longing for greater freedom. But it will take more than this generation, and probably the next, to rouse India from its lethargy, and enable it to cast off the fetters of its traditions. The story of Moni is charmingly and practically told; her love and the love for her was great. The following quotation might aptly be applied to her case:—

Smiles would not be so precious, if they had not known tears;

Happiness would not know itself, if it were not born of suffering.

Small Souls. By LOUIS COOPERUS. (Wm. Heinemann. 6s.)

AN essential difference between this work and the majority of translations of the fiction of Continental authors is, to use a photographic phrase, the presence of high lights. The depressing effect produced by the Russian school—that school’s ever-present cloud of tragic gloom—is absent here; the work is a serious, clever, thoughtful novel, yet its author dares to be witty, braves the Continental convention of fiction by the introduction of such light comedy characters as Karel and Cateau, the latter of whom, with her drawls and words squeakily emphasised—we can almost hear her squeak, so well has the translator preserved her idiosyncrasies—provides a fund of relief against the more poignant scenes.

The story is that of Constance van de Welcke, whose husband married her by order of his parents when, through his intrigue with Constance, she had been divorced by her first husband, de Staffelaer, a high dignitary of the Dutch diplomatic service in Rome. The incident and Rome, however, only come into the book in retrospect, for we are introduced to Constance fifteen years later, when, aged forty-two, she returns with her husband and son to the Hague, hoping to renew family ties. The character of Addie, the thirteen-year-old son, is one of the best pieces of drawing the book contains. Here, at least, is no small soul. Nor, for that matter, is Constance small.

The family to which she returns, however, is mean and petty, as the rest of the Hague society; though her scandal is fifteen years old, it is raked up and discussed, the woman is talked at and harrowed, and, living and unanæsthetised, dissected by relatives and friends; the study is inimitably poignant and intense, yet broad and human in its meaning and quality. Here is a book that will live, by reason of its breadth, humanity, and power.

Ten-Minute Stories. By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD. (John Murray. 6s.)

MR. ALGERNON BLACKWOOD reveals himself in this book in a variety of moods. The stories range from the eerie to the merely comic. Humour and fantasy, tragedy and terror, mystery and pathos—all are here. On the whole, it is what may perhaps be called the mystic note that predominates. No living writer is more skilful in creating an atmosphere in which the accustomed objects of life assume an unfamiliar perspective. The world itself becomes alive. Trees have their dark and dreadful secrets. (No one who has once read it is ever likely to forget “The Man whom the Trees Loved.”) Those dim, unexplored regions of the mind of which, in normal moments, we are but half-consciously aware, become suddenly illumined, as if a powerful searchlight were flashed upon them. The “terror that walketh by night,” that mysterious thing, is seen as a vivid, palpable reality. In the first of these stories—"Accessory before the Fact"—we see a man sharing in anticipation the fate of another. For a time he loses his own individuality: he becomes that other man. The theme is one which in the hands of any other writer would probably have provoked the just laughter of the scoffer. As treated by Mr. Blackwood, it not only satisfies, it actually convinces. Equally admirable are such stories as "The Prayer," "Strange Disappearance of a Baronet," "You may telephone from here," and "The Whisperers." "Let not the Sun—" is a tale the moving pathos of which no reader could fail to miss. In lighter vein are the four stories which recount the adventures of an absent-minded gentleman with false eyebrows, whom to have met is to have loved. The book represents Mr. Blackwood at his best. And the best of Mr. Blackwood belongs to the best of modern fiction.

The Twin Soul of O'Také San. By the BARONESS ALBERT D'ANETHAN. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

THE little story of this book—for it is little—has been told many times before. A heroic, handsome young Englishman, determined, on account of his wife's persistent bad temper, to fall in with her wishes and leave her for ever, went to Japan, where he very promptly met and fell in love with O'Také San; and, mindful of his repentant wife's wish that some other woman should give him the happiness he had never had with her, he proceeded to get that happiness with O'Také San's help, fully sharing her conviction that he and she were twin souls. Having a desire for the Russo-Japanese "front," he leaves O'Také San in a little house down by a shining shore, and in the reader's mind it is a toss-up who shall be slaughtered to meet the requirements of the story—is it the repentant wife, the two-wived husband, or the Japanese girl who is far more sinned against than sinning? We will not detract from the interest of the story by giving away the solution to this problem, but will content ourselves by remarking that Shearing, the faithful retainer, is not a bit humorous, nor even funny, as "low comedy lead."

We expected better than this from Rider Haggard's sister, and own that the book is a disappointment after her reminiscences of diplomatic life in Japan. It is against custom, by the way, to begin five and six paragraphs in succession with "and"; it is also irritating to the reader. The best point of the book is its writer's familiarity with Japanese customs, with which she is thoroughly able to deal in convincing style.

A collection of photographs which may fairly be described as representing a British School is now on view, free to the public daily, from 11 a.m. till 5 p.m., until March 20, at 35, Russell Square, W.C., the home of the Royal Photographic Society of Great Britain. The photographs are by members of British Societies affiliated to the parent body, and claim to represent the high-water mark of home, as distinguished from international, work.

Literary Competition

FROM the present issue (March 14) to June 6 THE ACADEMY will print each week a passage from some more or less well-known author whose work is generally easily accessible, either on the bookshelves at home or in the popular libraries published to-day—such libraries as Dent's Everyman's or Macmillan's Eversley Series or the Popular Editions of Standard Works issued by Messrs. G. Bell and Sons, or a series such as Jack's Popular Books. Perhaps here and there an excerpt may be taken from a volume not quite so readily to hand, but for the most part the source will be wholly popular, if classic. We shall, to adapt Kipling's familiar line, take our quotation where we find it—we may even take it from a book just out. All we promise is that nothing will appear which cannot be traced by inquiry among reading friends or a little research such as delights the true book-lover.

The idea of the Competition is to encourage the study of good books and to reward the assiduous and successful student.

Thirteen quotations will appear, and to those of our readers who send in the most correct list of names of authors and titles of works, and the two next best lists, we offer a First Prize of £5, a Second Prize of £3, and a Third Prize of £2.

All competitors have to do is to fill in the Coupon given below, and after the completion of the series forward the thirteen Coupons to the Competition Editor, THE ACADEMY, 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C. Results must reach us by first post on June 15, and the awards will be announced, we hope, in our issue of June 20.

It must be understood that the Editor's decision is final, and that he claims the right, in the event of a tie, to divide the prizes as he thinks proper.

QUOTATION I.

Woman is not undeveloped man,
But diverse: could we make her as the man,
Sweet Love were slain: his dearest bond is this,
Not like to like, but like in difference.
Yet in the long years liker must they grow;
The man be more of woman, she of man;
He gain in sweetness and in moral height,
Nor lose the wrestling thews that throw the world;
She mental breadth, nor fail in childward care,
Nor lose the childlike in the larger mind;
Till at the last she set herself to man,
Like perfect music unto noble words;
And so these twain, upon the skirts of Time,
Sit side by side, full-summ'd in all their powers,
Dispensing harvest, sowing the To-be,
Self-reverent each and reverencing each,
Distinct in individualities,
But like each other ev'n as those who love.
Then comes the statelier Eden back to men:
Then reign the world's great bridals, chaste and calm:
Then springs the crowning race of human-kind.

"THE ACADEMY" COMPETITION.

Author's name.....

Quotation taken from.....

Competitor's name.....

Address

Coupon 1. March 14, 1914.

Music

"PARSIFAL" has been so successful at Covent Garden, from the point of view of the box-office, that the management has arranged for two more performances. One hears it said that this is a sure test of London's taste for Wagner's "sacred" music-drama, and that we shall find "Parsifal" repeated in the season, and maintained in the regular repertory as are "Tristan" and "Die Walküre." But it must not be forgotten that, though great numbers have come away from "Parsifal" profoundly impressed, and ready to go again, there have probably been as many others who went to satisfy their curiosity, and who will consider that "once is enough." It was difficult, at first, to obtain tickets for "Salomé" and "Elektra," but their position as established favourites is by no means secure. It may be the same with "Parsifal," though no doubt its simpler but more deeply felt music will, for a long time to come, be more intelligible to the ordinary lover of music than the intricacy and the passion of Richard Strauss. We are to have plenty of operas this spring and summer. London is large enough to send full houses both to Covent Garden and Drury Lane—at least it would be so were the prices more reasonable. It would be interesting to compare the respective attractions of "Parsifal" at the one house and "Boris Godounov," with Chaliapine, at the other, if both were given on the same evening. But it would be vexing also, for, though the houses are so near that one could easily run from one to the other, an entertainment made up of alternate half-hours of Wagner and Moussorgsky would be unsatisfactory and bewildering.

The other day it was possible to hear a Quartet of Haydn by the Brussels Quartet in Bechstein Hall, and yet be in time for a good deal of the "Meistersinger" at Covent Garden, and the one did not "swear" with the other at all. Rather did we feel Wagner to be a delightful complement to old Haydn. But the Brussels Quartet were playing so finely that one was rather reluctant to leave the quiet scene of the chamber-music for the opera-house. They have such a lively, smooth tone for their slow movements, and such a bright one for the quick, and their finish can hardly be exceeded by that of any other group of quartet-players. But it was very good to hear Herr Bender as Sachs, and Herr Sembach as Walther, in a much more distinguished performance of the "Meistersinger" than the earlier one. Mme. Dux, too, was in very good voice, and Mr. Coates conducted with great spirit. It was the kind of performance which sends people away cheerful and contented, and surely that is some test of success.

On Wednesday, the 4th inst, the first of the Classical Concert Society's four additional concerts made a soothing preparation for the visit upon which we had settled to the Palace Theatre for the sake of the new

"Sylphides." As to this we may perhaps be allowed a word of "personal explanation." The old "Sylphides" was our introduction to the exquisite art of the Russian Ballet. We saw it at Monte Carlo, and by means of it the Russians made us their slaves for ever. Nothing of all the wonderful things we have seen them do since that "Sylphides" was ever able to alter our opinion that this was the most perfect gem of their repertory. Not "Carneval," not "Petruska," could rival it in our affection, delicious and thrilling as each of them was. How could we bear a new "Sylphides" which should only resemble the old in having Nijinsky and a bevy of white maidens and Chopin's music? But now we have gone through the ordeal, and must confess that the new "Sylphides" is a most remarkable and enthralling performance. Beautiful as is the new scene, with its large blue lake and its glittering whiteness, we prefer the cool green of the old, and are old-fashioned enough to prefer also the pure grace of the old dances to the more angular attitudinising of the new. Still, M. Nijinsky has conceived several striking tableaux, and Mlle. Nijinska floats about like a white tuft of shining thistledown. It seems that there is more conscious art about the new ballet, but it is interesting and beautiful in a very high degree.

Then, much as we loved the old music, we cannot doubt for a moment that the new is better. Instead of the bits of Chopin, which all of us would strum and hum since we were in our cradles, we have three Mazurkas, not familiar ones, two studies which, being too difficult for ordinary fingers, are only known to the general public through M. de Pachmann's playing or Busoni's, a Prelude to which the same remark applies (it is called an Etude in the programme, but is, in fact, the Prelude in E flat, No. 19), and two of the Nocturnes that everybody does not play, the very lovely and sprightly No. 3 in B major, and the (rather curiously chosen) No. 7 in C sharp minor. This last seemed less perfectly suited for dancing, and also less suitable for orchestral arrangement. But the first Nocturne, the Studies, and the Mazurkas have been chosen for marriage with Nijinsky's dances, with delightfully happy success, and their orchestration by M. Ravel is so exquisitely done that praise of it would be an impertinence. An ardent connoisseur of the modern French music had said to us that he supposed Chopin was the last composer whose music Ravel would wish to orchestrate or find himself in sympathy with. This speech reminded us of the attitude of an advanced Cubist painter who once said to me that his school would find itself much more capable of sympathising with "an Old Master" than with the work of Mr. John, Mr. Sickert, or Mr. Spencer Gore.

Ravel has found Chopin an Old Master, and treated him with perfect understanding and a skill which passes our poor understanding. The dear old pieces in the first "Sylphides" were beautifully set for the orchestra by various first-rate Russians, but the result of Ravel's genius applied to these specimens of Chopin's rarer gifts is something much more exquisite.

That the band of a music-hall which must constantly play indifferent and bad music should be able to rise to the requirements of Ravel's Chopin as the Palace Band did was a fine testimony to the advance which music-halls have made. It is not necessary that such a band should play with the perfection of the Queen's Hall orchestra, and we do not expect them to do so. But we venture to say that Mr. Finck's performance of Ravel's Chopin was remarkable for its delicacy and right feeling. To play the Mazurkas well is given to very few musicians, and if, in these, the Palace Band was open to criticism, their shortcomings are very pardonable.

Before the dancing, a singer, Mlle. Anka Layewa, introduced three pleasant specimens from her repertory of Serbo-Croatian Folk Songs, arranged by an Austrian musician, Egon Willfort. The lady has a very good and very high voice, and is an extremely capable vocalist, her staccato and coloration in the last song being excellent. This "turn" seemed to be a little over the heads of the audience, and Mlle. Layewa deserved much warmer appreciation than she received. But perhaps the spectators were impatient for the Ballets, and could not give their minds to mere music, however good and novel. It is rather a severe blow to see Russian dancing at the Palace without the peerless Mme. Pavlova, but, if we cannot have her, Mlle. Nijinska is a very gifted substitute, and, of course, her brother is a genius.

The Classical Concert has been most pleasantly satisfying with such good musicians as Miss Fanny Davies, Mr. Maurice Sons, and Mr. Warwick-Evans. Mr. Henschel sang and brought the note of sadness in, for this was to be his last appearance at these concerts. Schubert's Fantaisie in C for violin and piano is not very often heard nowadays. Lady Hallé liked playing it, and she was right, for it has long moments of great beauty.

Mr. Plunkett Greene's recital, given to a very large and perpetually encoring audience, was less admirable than usual. He carried his whispering to the point of inaudibility, and his speech to that of a turbine, so that his songs suffered loss.

On March 31, Messrs. Stanley Paul and Co. will publish a study of "Napoleon in Exile at Elba, 1814-1815," by Norwood Young, whose book "The Growth of Napoleon" attracted much attention some years ago. During the last four years Mr. Young has prepared this book and that which will succeed it, "Napoleon in Exile at St. Helena, 1815-1821," visiting Elba and afterwards St. Helena, where he remains at the present moment. In illustrating both volumes, which between them will contain over 150 cartoons, paintings, and photographs, he has had the valuable assistance of Mr. A. M. Broadley, who also contributes a chapter on other sidelights on Napoleon's career.

Some New French Books

M. GAYET, an eminent Egyptologist, has explored, during sixteen years, at the cost of innumerable difficulties and personal sacrifices, the city of Antinopolis. The antiquities he discovered during his excavations were subsequently exhibited in Paris. Though of the greatest interest, they are little in comparison to what surely still remains to be brought to light.

M. Gayet's discoveries could already have filled a museum which would have revealed the Greek civilisation of the East, and, thanks to him, we now possess a perfect ensemble. The dead themselves, dressed in the costumes they wore, surrounded by the objects they cared for in days gone by, appear as fantastic phantoms escaped from their sepulchres, just as they used to lie, in the past. Not a wrinkle of their faces, not a pleat of their clothes, have budged; dresses have been sent in half, so that different provincial museums might possess specimens of the bygone civilisation. And the sepulchres themselves were not treated with more respect.

A book written by so erudite a scholar as M. Gayet could not fail to be very interesting. In "Ce que Racontent les Momies d'Antinoë: Le Roman de Claude d'Antioche," which has just been published by Plon-Nourrit (3 frs. 50), we have the result of his sixteen years of labour amidst the tombs of Antinopolis; and in truth the mummies of the Egyptian city tell wonderful tales.

In the introduction which prefaces this work, M. Gayet retraces the legend of the founding of the city. He tells us of the passionate friendship which united the Emperor Hadrian and the beautiful shepherd, Antinous, who voluntarily drowned himself as a propitiatory sacrifice to Fate, who, by the oracle, had decreed the death of the Emperor. Hadrian was so pained by the loss of his friend that he caused solemn rites to be celebrated for him, and rendered him the honours which were reserved only for Osiris. He desired, moreover, to erect an imperishable memorial to his glory, and founded the city of Antinopolis.

Through the many ways of this marvellous city M. Gayet traces Claude of Antioch, once a favourite of the Emperor Diocletian, who, becoming converted to paganism, exiled his faithful servant to Egypt in the hope that he would follow this example. But Claude is far too fervent a Christian to renounce that faith; the rites, the celebrations, the diabolical incantations which he witnesses, horrify him; the luxury which surrounds him only strengthens him in his belief. He tries to convert the embalmers among whom he lives, with many other Christian comrades; but after enjoying a nearly complete liberty for some months, Claude is at last decapitated by order of Arian, governor of the city, who tires of his religious stubbornness.

The story of Claude of Antioch has well served M. Gayet. It has permitted him to present to us the daily life of the inhabitants; fantastic phantoms seem to dance a ghastly measure around us while we read the descriptions of the adoration of Osiris, of Isis, and the apotheosis of Isis—Aphrodite. Then suddenly all those strange and bewildering apparitions vanish, to be replaced by the ascetic figures of the Christians hiding in the Quarter of the Sepulchres, and the saintly hermits or people of the mountains.

The book reveals a care of detail quite remarkable. It is exceedingly interesting as being the work of a specialist, written with the evident desire of being read by all, even by the most frivolous and least scientific; but it would have gained greatly if M. Gayet had taken care to write in a really simple style, with less display of "literary" effects.

Egyptology seems to be quite the fashion in France this year. "L'Histoire de la Civilisation Egyptienne des Origines à la Conquête d'Alexandre," by M. Jequier, has the merit of condensing into three hundred pages the principal facts of Egyptian history, and is very sensibly divided into seven chapters, which are again subdivided into three parts—History, Tradition, and Monuments. It thus becomes a very clear work of reference, illustrated by a series of excellent photographs of the best specimens of antique Egyptian art, of the most sympathetic mummies, and of some famous sites which seem quite like old friends.

Jean Dolent is a curious figure; though son and grandson of workmen, he was himself an aristocrat to the tip of his fingers. He was one of the most interesting personalities of the Parisian literary world of the latter half of the last century. He possessed an infinite charm, an indomitable pride, biting wit, the love of fine expression, of beauty, of art; and occasionally he did not disdain paradoxes. Yet this essentially cultivated man left school at thirteen, and earned his living in an atelier! In some of his works it is apparent that his style would perhaps have gained by a more intimate knowledge of Latin and Greek authors. Nevertheless, he possesses a personality "composed especially of that same finesse which others have perhaps borrowed from the Ancients, but which he re-discovered precisely where the Ancients had discovered it—in the living sense of beauty, and in the desire of attaining to beauty by words, by the analogical means which unite written Art to lyrical and plastic Art."

M. Charles Morin, from whom we borrow this quotation, has prefaced the recent work published by Messien, entitled "Pages Choies de Jean Dolent" (3 fr. 50). Though an artist, Dolent was obliged to earn his living by undertaking the law correspondence of an important commercial house. He did this for fifty-three years, devoting his leisure hours to writing those critical studies which reveal such qualities of tenderness, of understanding, and of wit. He used to escape from the monotony of his daily task by accomplishing it as well as possible. He had many friends, who would gather with pleasure in his little drawing-room at Belleville. Among the most noticeable figures is that of Eugène Carrière. A great friendship sprung up between the great painter and Dolent, which grew firmer as time went on. Aurel also frequented the little circle.

Dolent's works deal in general with art criticism; most of them are now out of print. The best known are "Une Volée de Merles," "Le Roman de la Chair," relating the adventure of two young provincials in Paris; "L'Insoumis," a continuation of the preceding work: "Petit Manuel d'Art à l'Usage des Ignorants," a sort of general review of the contemporary artistic world; and "Le Livre d'Art des Femmes," in which the author exposes pitilessly the foolishness and hardness of the Parisian society woman.

During his life-time, Dolent did not enjoy the reputation which was rightfully his. It is surprising, if one pauses to reflect how essentially French his talent was. But if he was not better known, it is because he was always just himself. He never made any effort to appear other than he really was. He was proud, and fond of liberty; so he kept voluntarily apart. "Pour le trouver," says M. Morin, at the close of his fine introduction, "il fallait le chercher. Mais quand on l'avait découvert on ne pouvait plus se passer de lui. L'Avenir ne se passera pas de Dolent. C'est un classique de l'Art Vivant."

This last phrase definitely places Dolent, and, thanks to the extracts published in "Pages Choies," under M. Morin's careful supervision, one can obtain an aperçu of a most curious, witty, paradoxical, and sympathetic figure.

MARC LOGÉ.

At the Grafton Galleries

THE Women's International Art Club is holding its fifteenth annual Exhibition. The collection is a curiously miscellaneous one, consisting of not a little poor work and a fair proportion that is exceedingly good. With more sternness on the part of the Hanging Committee, the show might have been good all round. As it is, the contrasts in quality strike the beholder sharply.

Upon the staircase the visitor is greeted with some rather weird Futurist, or quasi-Futurist, works—three "Fashion Pictures" by a German lady, and a remarkable large-scale nude bust in lurid colours by Miss Tora Holmstrom, entitled "Strangers." The tout ensemble suggests a Brobdingnagian female, seen, as Swift suggests, at close quarters in all the nastiness of highly magnified detail, and the effect is not pleasant. In the Octagonal Gallery there are two noticeable pictures by Miss Mary Creighton, in one of which, "The Big Sofa," the manipulation of the lights is distinctly clever. There is all the charm of restfulness and quiet colour in Miss M. E. Atkins' "By the River," a study of an old town and church-tower by the waterside, rendered in broad and easy touches and with great feeling. Miss Atkins figures with some good work also in the Large Gallery; her view of Ryde is one of the good things in the Exhibition; and we like exceedingly, too, her pictures of "Laiguelia, Italy," and "The Old Windmill." Her work is marked by a truthfulness and sanity of outlook and a sureness of handling which are very pleasing and compel respect. Rich colour and clear light characterise Miss Beatrice Bland's "Road through the Wood"; and quiet appreciation of one of Nature's most delicate moods appears in Miss Evelyn Robinson's "New Moon." Miss Isobelle Dods-Withers contributes a delightful sketch of Montepulciano, and a more finished picture of "The Rocks of Ste. Marie," both eminently skilful and sympathetic studies of romantic landscapes.

One of the features of the Exhibition is the careless and unfinished character of much of the work sent; some of it suggests that a very little more time and attention would have improved the results greatly, and would have been well worth the trouble involved—which should surely have been a labour of love. Of such, among others, is Miss Ethel Walker's ambitious "Decoration for Spring," in which plenty of clever drawing and skilful grouping is marred by hasty carelessness of execution and want of elementary consideration of accessories.

In agreeable contrast is the admirable work of Miss Anna Boberg, as bold and vigorous in handling as it well could be, but infinite delicate and lucent in the result, sensitive alike to form, colour and atmosphere in a series of far from easy subjects. Miss Boberg's pictures are taken, we suppose, from her native Sweden; there are five of them showing its rugged and rock-bound shores in all sorts of aspects. Of these "Winter Splendour," a fairy vision of snow peaks and shimmering lights, is perhaps the most striking, though another fairy vision upon a more ambitious scale is offered in "At the Sunset"—a wonderful cloudland of royal redness and the mysterious world which it envelops, that never degenerates into crudeness or hardness of line or tint. If only to see Miss Boberg's works these Galleries are worth a visit. A strong study of a fine head is that by Miss Mollie Faustman, another Swedish artist, of "Rolf Trolle"; and Miss Trotzig, from the same country, contributes a fine atmospheric study in "After Rain."

Perhaps the best figure-study in the Exhibition is Miss Defries' "By the Sea," the full length of a woman bending beneath a burden of straw or seaweed, which she carries along the beach against a dull seascape beyond. The figure is beautifully poised, and expresses toil and weariness in every line—a pathetic as well as a powerful achievement. Close by hangs another clever large-scale group of figures in Miss E. A. Hope's "Procession," a group of Breton peasants and children approaching with banners and other paraphernalia of a religious function; the draughtsmanship is excellent, and the grave earnestness of the pious Breton folk is well caught. A very finished piece of work, and one of the best in the Exhibition, is Miss Bethia Clarke's "Making Carpets, Wilton," which is admirable alike in realism, in characterisation, and in technique. These pretty nearly exhaust the interest of the show. Mention is due, perhaps, to Miss Evelyn Howard's "Fire on the Moor"; Miss Beatrice Bland's "Weed Burning"; and to the same artist's "View from Richboro' Castle." Two of Miss M. V. Wheelhouse's admirably delicate and graceful figure illustrations are those to "Wives and Daughters" (Nos. 122 and 134); her work is in its own way well-nigh unapproachable. Her two Italian sketches, though good, are upon a more mundane level. Some beautiful specimens of handicrafts are also shown.

The Theatre

"The Two Virtues" at the St. James's

NO profound problems are presented to the patient playgoer in the new comedy at the St. James's Theatre. Mr. Alfred Sutro aimed obviously at amusement; he devised a neat little situation, gave it the sauce of a pretty wit, and his actor-vassals serve it with the utmost art of which they are capable. No critic need grumble at the result; to protest that Mr. Sutro has not gone into the depths of the questions raised is about as sensible as to complain of an omelette because it is not a round of beef. He entertained us well, and we left the theatre with a feeling of satisfaction—a feeling that our laughter had not been on a false note, and that the attention which we had been compelled to pay was not wasted either on trivialities or on morbidities.

In "The Attack," which we noticed a couple of months ago, Sir George Alexander appeared in a style of part new to him—that of the sharp business man and politician; in "The Two Virtues" he assumes a character precisely the opposite of this. Jeffery Panton is an historian, steeped in the literature of history, bewildered by anything pertaining to the world of business; he imagines himself in love with the memory of a lady whom he has not seen for years, and whose photograph he sets up as a shrine for occasional worship—when his thoughts turn that way. This lady's husband, Claude Jervoise, is a poet of heroic moods and soaring ambitions, with a sublime belief in his message for the world; he has a friend, a certain lonely, harmless, but of course beautiful Mrs. Guildford, whom he visits and bores terribly with his lengthy recitals of his own verses. Mrs. Jervoise persuades Jeffery—who finds his old infatuation for her was but a sorry affair—to call on Mrs. Guildford and to try to break the spell which she supposes is cast over her husband; Jeffery, finding the lovely, mysterious, lonely lady to be as keen on history as he is himself, promptly installs her as his collaborator, without a thought of harm; and there, in his study, the two are discovered by Jeffery's sister, Lady Milligan, and Mrs. Jervoise—who enter with a complete record of Mrs. Guildford's "past"—comfortably working together. The end can be foreseen; but the dialogue, the amusing "rows" between the three women, between the two women, and between Jeffery and his amazed and shocked sister, who desires him to marry a lady of title, are pure comedy. We have seen few things more witty and exhilarating than the contest between Lady Milligan—magnificently acted by Miss Henrietta Watson—and Mrs. Jervoise; the only stage episode comparable with it that occurs to us is the famous wordy duel in "The Importance of Being Earnest."

Sir George Alexander proved himself quite at home in a new vein; distracted, worried, sometimes even dishevelled—imagine it!—he took the part of the literary man immersed in research to perfection; and when forced by events to come into the open he was as shy, awkward, and as bashful as a boy. It was quite delightful to watch him, and his proposal to Mrs. Guildford in the last act was very pretty indeed. We praised Miss Martha Hedman for her performance in "The Attack"; unhappily, in the present play, she was sadly lacking. She has no variety of facial expression; she stays always on the same calm level; even her voice scarcely changes. She puts no life, no energy, no vivacity into the part. On the other hand, it was almost impossible to look away from Miss Watson when she was on the stage; her play of feature was excellent—by a quiet gesture, a glance, she expressed volumes of surprise, contempt, dismay, and her contest with her brother, where from pleading she gradually rose by stages to recrimination and indignation, was a superb piece of acting. As the pompous poet Mr. Herbert Waring showed himself fully capable; the supreme conceit of the egoist, his supercilious disdain of the conventions, were most amusingly portrayed; and Miss Athène Seyler took the part of the frivolous Mrs. Jervoise with just the right effect. Miss Rhoda Symons talked too fast and seemed weak as Alice Exern, Mrs. Guildford's companion; but the minor parts were in the good hands of Mr. George Bishop and Miss Mary Lane.

There are two or three "thin" pieces in the play. The scene between Alice Exern and Mrs. Guildford might with advantage be cut or altered; it leads nowhere and becomes tedious; and now and then the dialogue flags from its usual sprightliness. On the whole, however, Mr. Sutro has scored a decided success, and "The Two Virtues" should have a lengthy run.

W. L. R.

The Pioneer Players present "Daughters of Ishmael"

THIS long, sometimes stupid, and in some parts powerful American play was recently produced by Miss Edith Craig at King's Hall, Covent Garden. We believe that this remarkably convenient theatre is generally used by pugilists; on this occasion we had a play that was intended to fight a social evil. A neighbour of ours, a witty and rather wicked writer of comedies—with memories of Mr. Shaw's early work—thought that "Mrs. Warren's Profession" was taking the place of that of Cashel Byron. This adaptation of Mr. Kauffman's sociological novel is an effort to demonstrate the danger which young girls suffer of being lured from home and kidnapped for the profit of the person who is called the owner of "The House" kept for the pleasure of its visitors.

In America, perhaps more than in England, a great effort is being made at the present time to arouse a sincere interest in this sort of danger. The Medical Review of Reviews of New York has forwarded us an original play in four acts, dealing very fully with the same subject.* In reading this work one sees the earnestness of the author and the value of the point of view which is so clearly and boldly set forth. We do not know if "Peach Bloom," like "Daughters of Ishmael," has been played upon the stage, but it would, we think, show many of the same valuable qualities and sad defects as D'Este-Scott's adaptation of Kauffman's novel.

Plays with so strong a purpose must generally show many failures in technique. Even M. Brioux is not at his best when forcing the pace for an especial and difficult end. "Daughters of Ishmael" opens effectively enough, and ends on a tragic and awful note. The first episode shows the extremely unpleasant home of an Irish-American, Owen Denbigh, played with an air of brutality by Mr. Charles Coleman. Miss Cathleen Nesbitt as a prematurely old woman is his wife and the mother of two daughters. The eldest is a grown-up schoolgirl, Mary, very realistically given by Miss Marjorie Patterson. It seems to us a mistake that the Denbigh home should be made so hopelessly unhappy for Mary. In this case her troubles with her father predispose her to listen to the lover's perjuries of Max Crossman, Mr. Raymond Lauzerte, who shows himself as clever here, in a different way, as he was in "Fanny's First Play."

Crossman soon lures Mary from home and takes her to "The House" which is run by Rose Legere, Miss Janette Steer. The next episode tells of the Rovington Settlement, an unconvincing affair which appears to be carried on by incompetent people for the benefit of girls who have met with such misfortunes as those of Mary. The Settlement, however, fails in being of the slightest value.

The later phases of the play recount the tragedy of Mary's attempt to gain her living honestly. We are inclined to think her miseries are over-stated, and that from the protagonist point of view such exaggerations are of little value.

Like other plays of the kind, "Daughters of Ishmael" became the medium for some admirable acting. Miss Nesbitt, Miss Patterson, Miss Steer, and Mr. Lauzerte were at their best, and there was a very successful new-comer in Mr. Geoffrey Goodhart, who gave considerable significance to a small part. It was the very good people of the Settlement who appeared so detached from humanity as we know it. We doubt if the general public are likely to see this play, or if it would interest them; for, apart from the first two scenes, there are many long and rather tedious episodes.

* Peach Bloom: an original play in four acts. By NORTHROP MORSE. ("Medical Review of Reviews," New York. $1.)

"And all Arabia Breathes . . ."

THE strong revival of interest in all the magnificence and beauty and all the treachery and passion which come with—

Sabeian odours from the spicy shore
Of Arabie the blest . . .

owes no small part of its origin to the loving care with which Mr. Edward Knoblauch composed his now classic play, "Kismet." He wrought it from the heart and soul of Eastern things which, to a great extent, he found enshrined in "The Thousand and One Nights." The present printed edition now before us is inscribed to the memory of Richard Burton, "without whom," the author says, "this play never could have been written." This strikes us as the pleasing hyperbole of a devoted student. On reading the play in book form, it seems as if the author has himself drunk deeply of the spirit of the East, and that many of the incidents, characters, and turns of phrase, although perfectly in the picture and the period, owe much to his own quick imagination. It is true, on the other hand, that hardly a speech in the play is without some allusion to Arab customs or thoughts, and occasionally the actual wording is that of the characters in the "Nights."

The Story-Teller in the prologue, for instance, practically speaks the opening lines of the famous "Entertainments," much as the Caliph makes use, later on, of the words with which all the important tales end. "In the name of Allah" is the conventional beginning of any story which a pious Mussulman tells; for without this form it would not be considered fortunate. Then Hajj's begging sing-song shows the entire Oriental attitude towards charity, and is carefully compounded of some thirty proverbs on the subject—ever popular in Eastern cities. We note, too, some quaint pieces of knowledge on almost every page: "La Yayhá! La Yayhá!" calls out Hajj to his beautiful daughter when he wants her to dance. This is the wild cry of a desert tribe during their gayest entertainments. Then there is a phrase of the Wazir Manzur, about his enemy, which is compact of various local ideas. Manzur calls him a "big-turban'd, bean-fed son of a sow": the first because such people pretend to be learned; the second because those who eat beans are supposed to be dull-witted; the last because it is the grossest insult the Orient can supply. Of course, the expression, "slice of the moon," which makes the audience laugh, is the regular term for a young Eastern maiden, and should be familiar to all through the agency of the now well-worn "Omar."

These are but a very few of the thousand and one adaptations of Oriental phrases which Mr. Knoblauch uses throughout his play, the very dramatic character of which has to some extent withdrawn attention from its remarkable literary merits. To have made malleable for stage purposes the curious language of "The Arabian Nights" must, one sees on reading the printed play, have been no light task; but it is evidently one which the author enjoyed. We apprehend, too, that many readers will enjoy "Kismet" in this form as thoroughly as on the stage; for the scenery almost paints itself as one reads the vivid, rapid, and often sincerely poetic dialogue.

Scene iii of Act i, "The Courtyard of a Poor House," is the most effective and stylistic piece of writing in the drama. Here is a brief and complete play within the play. The love scene is full of beauty, and the episode in which the famous beggar Hajj revels in the great future which awaits his beautiful daughter Marsinah, and then suddenly falls into despair on his arrest, is filled with the spirit of a hundred old Eastern stories such as that of the man with the basket full of earthenware who counts his gains ahead of his business and then has the misfortune to smash his entire stock.

Such memories are recalled again and again by Mr. Knoblauch's work; but each incident bears the imprint of his own mind and the characteristics of his own curious knowledge. With cunning art he tells his often exciting story until at last the Caliph and the beggar's daughter are united and the musicians sing:

Seat high the maid and bridal throne,
To rule this night of nights alone;
Whilst kneels to her divinity,
The mightiest of monarchs prone.
Then draw the curtain sweet with spice,
On Lord of Lords and Pearl of Price—
He crowned by her virginity,
She by his manhood's Paradise.
And Allah the Uniter bless
Their love with joyance limitless!

But the great Hajj, the most inspired beggar of all time, is not forgotten. As the day of great events closes in, he murmurs: "Mine enemies dead—Marsinah wed—Meccah to-morrow. . ."

We know of no other thoroughly romantic play, written within the last fifty years, that possesses the charm, excitement, and beauty and elemental quality of "Kismet." It is a delightful and fantastic piece of literary drama which Mr. Knoblauch has so deftly salvaged from the shores of old romance.

EGAN MEW.

The Sir Alfred East Memorial Exhibition at the Leicester Galleries will be succeeded to-day (Saturday) by an exhibition of the recent work in oils of one of the most distinguished landscape painters of the day, Mr. Oliver Hall. Four years have elapsed since a collection of this artist's works in this medium has been seen in London.

* Kismet. By EDWARD KNOBLAUCH. An "Arabian Night" in three acts. 3rd edition. (Methuen and Co. 2s. net.)

At St. Stephen's Shrine

BY A REGULAR DEVOTEE

I HAVE known Pretymen a good many years, but I never saw him so pleased as I did on Wednesday last, the 4th instant, at question time. Mr. Justice Scrutton recently decided that the basis of valuation in regard to agricultural land and undeveloped land used for agricultural purposes was all wrong. This is a very serious thing, as thousands of valuations under the Finance Act of 1910 have already been made at huge expense, and if they are based on false premises, where are we now? Where is the Government and where are the owners?

Evelyn Cecil started the ball rolling by asking whether the Government intended to appeal. Lloyd George was not in the House, and Montagu, the Secretary for the Treasury, seemed rather gravelled. He was not in a position to make any statement on the subject.

"That's all very well," said Pretymen, in effect, "but are the Government proposing to levy duty on the same basis—making, in fact, valuations on assessments which have been legally proved to be inaccurate?"

"It only happened on Saturday," pleaded Montagu, "and it requires very careful consideration."

"In that case," said Fitzroy, "at the conclusion of questions, I shall ask leave to move the adjournment of the House."

As the question came within the rule that it was a matter of definite urgent public importance, it was felt that the Speaker could not refuse to grant the motion to adjourn. Here was a pretty kettle of fish, and the Unionists rubbed their hands in glee and waited to see what would happen. There must have been a hurried consultation in the Government room behind the Speaker's chair, for at a quarter to four Ponsonby was put up as a "bonnet" to formally ask the Attorney-General whether he intended to appeal.

The careful consideration mentioned by Montagu disappeared like a sea-mist in the sun, for Simon promptly said "Yes," and that in the meantime no valuation would be made inconsistent with Scrutton's decision.

This was a distinct score, and the appeal will be watched with interest. If the decision is upheld, we shall want to know what is going to be done with all the valuations which have already been made.

There is an air of unrest in the House. "It smells like dissolution," said one man in the smoking-room. "Yes," said another ghoulishly, "of corruption and decay."

Estimates were run through at a surprising rate. We did the business of the country, for which we are paid £400 a year, disgracefully. In a slipshod manner we passed thirteen Votes for the Navy, the Army, and the Civil Service in ninety-five seconds. We shall be up directly, everybody said, although it was only half-past six.

A Bill for Defective Children appeared, and it was criticised as grandmotherly by such opposite characters as Bob Cecil and Handel Booth, but it was forced through. Gulland, a Government Whip, moved the adjournment, but Ronald McNeill wanted to know why the National Insurance money should be paid over to the Erin Lodge of the Ancient Order of Hibernians—a friendly society whose oath of initiation, he declared, included disloyalty. "We cannot inquire into that," said Wedgwood Benn airily. Then John Ward raised again the awkward subject of the housing of the workmen at Rosyth which caused the storm yesterday. The talk went on, and, to the sorrow of the homing birds and the diners-out, lasted until 8.15, when all hope of a night off disappeared, for a private motion in favour of redistribution of seats came on. It was moved by little Edgar Jones, a Welsh Radical, and it let in two specialists on the subject—Morrison-Bell, who invented the pencil diagram which stood in the Strand, showing the inequalities of different constituencies, and Mackinder, who is a "dab" at proportional representation. Herbert Samuel accepted the motion, and handsomely admitted what is a patent fact, that Ireland is over-represented. As a remedy he advised the House to pass Home Rule, and then the Irish would only have forty-two members. He also suggested a Committee. Walter Long accepted the idea, but had little hope that it would do any good. Those who had basely fled and left us to do the work consoled themselves that there was no division, but the House did not rise until eleven after all.

Asquith during the Parliament Act had in my hearing pledged himself that not more than one Bill of first-class importance could be passed in one session. On Thursday a first reading was given to three—viz., the Home Rule Bill, the Welsh Disestablishment Bill, and the Plural Voting Bill.

We then went back to Supply, and "Worthy" Evans attacked the Chancellor for the shortcomings of his Insurance Act. There was no enthusiasm; the House was nearly empty, and Lloyd George found it difficult to answer Worthington Evans' searching questions. As Pretymen is to the Finance Act so is "W. E." to the Insurance Act; both are thoroughly up in their subjects. Bonar Law came on later, and in a sledge-hammer speech made Lloyd George writhe. He said, I believe, that the Act had broken down, and taunted the Government with trying to keep it secret until after the General Election. The Chancellor had tried to put the blame on the friendly societies. What about those which are admittedly well managed, and yet foresee that they will have to reduce the benefits?

"There may be a change of Government before long, and I want the country to understand that, if and when the Act is found to be bankrupt, they must not put the blame on the Unionists."

Handel Booth and Jonathan Samuel blamed the Opposition for slandering the societies and the Act. It would cause people to desert the friendly societies.

Clynes, the Labour man, thought that there was far too much spent in administration, which we prophesied all along. Markham unexpectedly came to the rescue of the Government, and suggested that the State and employers should divide the burden between them. Where would the Opposition be then? The Ministerialists cheered, but many a Radical, thinking of the General Election, said in his heart: "This Act is a beastly nuisance." The Vote was carried by 68.

"You need not come down on Friday if you do not want to," said the Whips. It was a private members' day, and the pièce de resistance was a very slight dish: a small Bill to amend the Agricultural Holdings Bill by providing that, when a landlord gives notice to a tenant to quit, he shall give the tenant compensation for any improvements he has made on the land. Both sides were in favour of it. It protected tenants from bad landlords, and everybody agreed that bad landlords were a curse to the soil; so the Bill got its second reading quite early in the afternoon.

After that we had a Public Rights-of-Way Bill. Under the present law, where land is settled, the tenant for life, however willing, cannot dedicate a right-of-way to the public, although it may have been used for many years. The Bill enabled him to do this, and that the public should be entitled to a right-of-way over land, even under settlement, when forty years of uninterrupted use was proved. Everybody felt this was fair; Simon explained that it would prevent undoubted rights being defeated by a technicality.

Banbury was not convinced; there was no need for the Bill, and he moved its rejection, but all to no purpose. An ill-advised attempt was made to talk it out, but the closure was applied, and the Bill passed its second reading by 199 to 7.

There were over a hundred questions on the paper on Monday, but no one attempted to listen to the replies, for it was obviously futile to do so. The Ministers galloped through the answers, which were not heard above the low hum of excited conversation that went on all round; nobody cared.

When Asquith rose he was cheered by some of his own party, but I noticed that the Nationalists remained obstinately silent. Few men have been placed in a more difficult position, but he faced it with characteristic coolness and aplomb. I will not go into the details of the debate, because by the time this is in print the whole thing will have been discussed in all its bearings. The general feeling was that we had "got a move on." Asquith admitted the principle of exclusion, and that is a great advance on anything that has happened before. His safeguards were a referendum by the counties interested and a six years' exclusion.

I do not think Bonar Law was quite as effective as usual. In a prepared speech few can touch him, but at a sudden reply he is not at his best. He made it quite clear that the Unionist position is not altered; we are opposed to Home Rule altogether, and the only real solution is an appeal to the country. Ulster was now admitted to be strong; the Nationalists hoped to disarm her, and at the end of six years have her once again at their mercy.

Redmond said this was the limit of concession, and if it was not accepted—the Home Rule Bill must—he emphasised the word must, as if he were dictating to the Government—be pushed through.

Carson—evidently in acute physical pain—made a strong appeal. The Ulstermen loathed Home Rule, and we do not want a sentence of death with a stay of execution for six years. "Abolish the time limit and leave the matter to the decision of Parliament and I will consult my friends." When William O'Brien got up, everybody went into the lobby and the smoking-room to talk it over. The whole thing, when it came to be analysed, was rather misty; Asquith had cleverly left out the financial part, and promised to put it in a white paper the next day.

Some people rejoiced that the door was not yet closed, and applauded the moderate speech of Arnold Ward, one of our back-bench men; others, of all parties, said, "Home Rule is dead." You cannot amend the Bill. Take out one piece, and the whole jig-saw drops to pieces; and if it goes, of course the Parliament Bill is dead too. It is a curious fact that, if there had been no Parliament Act, Home Rule might have passed. Now and then the speakers in the House assumed that the last word had been said, but each time the remark was made I noticed a low hum of dissent. There was a feeling that the auctioneer was still waiting for a further bid. He had said, "Going—going," but was not prepared even now to let the hammer fall. The common sense of the British people, now face to face with realities, was beginning to reassert itself on both sides.

The debate was adjourned.

Macaulay tells us how Warren Hastings, after his terrible struggle with the Council and after he had hanged Newcomen, sat down and wrote a letter to Dr. Johnson on some literary question. It is characteristic of the House that, after its feelings had been so deeply stirred, it was able to devote the rest of the evening to a little Bill to protect wild birds. Edwin Cornwall made a strong protest against this being taken up as a Government measure at short notice; it would ruin the trade and throw thousands out of work; but the cruel story of how the aigrette is obtained had taken forcible possession of members, and the Bill was read a second time. If the Bill could be made international by agreement, a good night's work would have been done, but, as it is, it is one more hastily made handicap to British trade.

It is not considered good manners to call a man a liar anywhere, and it is distinctly out of order in the House, but Sir John Randle's motion went as near to it as anything I have known. Lloyd George had only himself to thank for the situation in which he found himself. Owing to his repeated and unwarrantable attacks on individuals and his appalling inaccuracies, several Unionists had determined, if they were successful in the ballot, to raise a question with regard to the Chancellor's methods, and on Tuesday night it came out in a crowded house.

Yesterday I was proud of the House of Commons and the lofty tone of the speeches that were made. To-night the spectacle was a shameful one, and yet few people seemed to see it. The very fact that the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the United Kingdom was able to be attacked in this way was, in itself, a degradation.

He defended himself fiercely; few of us have ever seen him on the platform, but to-night he gave us a representation of his Limehouse style. With his back to the wall, he defended himself with all his might, and I am bound to say that he did it very skilfully. He attacked his opponents; he denied this; he asserted that; and did as much damage as he could amid the jeers of his foes and the cheers of his friends.

F. E. Smith wound up the debate in a speech that was almost too clever. It was brimful of sarcasm, and to a hide less pachydermatous than the Chancellor's would have made any man writhe—in fact, two or three shafts did get home, especially when he contended sarcastically that "the Chancellor never ran away, either in this House or in Birmingham."

He pointed out that, even in Mr. Lloyd George's closing sentence, he had been guilty of a gross inaccuracy, and that his recklessness was such that at one of his own meetings he had called a man a forger without the slightest warrant or excuse.

Cassel's was not such a good speech, but it was more serious in tone. However, the House was very pleased with the entertainment, and the result was a strict party division; 304 members decided that Lloyd George was not a liar, and 240 were convinced that he was.

Imperial and Foreign Affairs

BY LANCELOT LAWTON

THE RELATIONS BETWEEN RUSSIA AND GERMANY

INTEREST and to some extent alarm have been stimulated throughout Europe by reason of the virulent attacks upon Russia contained in the German and Austrian press. The agitation first manifested itself in journals that make no pretensions to moderation, but was quickly taken up by others known to be officially inspired, as, for example, The Cologne Gazette, The Lokalanzeiger, and, in Austria, newspapers of similar standing. This outcry followed upon an article appearing in one of Berlin's popular journals, which occupied several columns in presentation of the startling idea that the moment had arrived when Germany must seize upon any pretext to wage war against the forces of the Triple Entente. We are now told that it is Russia who is the arch-fiend of European diplomacy, that she is making ready for a campaign against Germany, that the Slav policy in the Near East proved triumphant, and that now, in all parts of the world, this policy is developing along lines that are dishonest and menacing. Were it not for the fact that Russia is the firm friend of both countries, England and France might perhaps welcome the diversion of a form of criticism which is usually levelled at themselves by the Germans. It is deplorable that such an exhibition of ill-feeling against a nation with whom we are on terms of exceptional friendship should have manifested itself just at the time when England and Germany were approaching a mutual understanding. The dictum of Sir Edward Grey that, while making new friends, we will sacrifice no old ones, cannot have been taken into sufficient account in Berlin. It is not reasonable to expect us to entertain warm feelings towards a country engaged in promoting a campaign of calumny against our ally. The evil consequence here implied would certainly attend the incidents we are discussing, were it not for our intimate knowledge of the peculiar ways of German diplomacy, which has not yet freed itself from the trammels of Bismarckian tradition.

Here let us say at once that the official denials of complicity which have been forthcoming are unacceptable. In the circumstances no other course than that of polite repudiation was open to the Wilhelmstrasse. The mere fact that nobody believes the denial, and that everybody is convinced that the German press, in matters of foreign policy, is officially directed, serves the purpose of German diplomacy. In this rather clumsy way the world is afforded an insight, and a very valuable one, into the trend of Germany's foreign policy. In other words, the attempt to obscure defeats its object and elucidates. Russia, no doubt, is actively engaged in the task of army reform. Her military establishment is being increased by something like half a million men, her artillery re-armed, and her facilities for mobilisation vastly improved. The defects to be remedied are serious and of long standing. The increase in numbers was decided upon some time ago, and at this stage cannot have taken Germany by surprise. Thus we are led to the conclusion, more especially when we reflect upon the measures already taken by Germany to meet developments along her eastern frontier, that the panic now raised has some new and definite objects in view. It need not be imagined that we are at last on the eve of the great European war. So cynical a policy as that which the German press advocates will not be followed by the responsible statesmen of the country. Sabre-rattling is merely a political ruse. So soon as the sabre be drawn, ignoring ethical warrant, finance enters into the question, and here Germany is confronted with her gravest problem. It is, indeed, this last that is seriously embarrassing her at present, and, if due regard be paid to such circumstance, the agitation of her press will be looked upon with tolerance rather than with active resentment. For this agitation is believed to have a twofold aim: in the first place, so to alarm the German people that they will pay not unwillingly for military expansion already agreed upon, as well as for further developments of a similar nature; and in the second place, as the date for the conclusion of the new commercial treaty with Russia draws near, to create an atmosphere of menace.

Other factors also have contributed to this somewhat artificial demonstration of German ire. King George is shortly to visit Paris, and President Poincaré is due to undertake a like mission to St. Petersburg. All the signs go to show that the Triple Entente, far from weakening, is gathering strength and solidity. Then the Near Eastern situation has taken a turn unfavourable to the interests of the Triple Alliance, and Austria and Italy are showing a disposition to break away from the European Concert. Albania to-day presents a greater danger to the world's peace than was ever the case with Macedonia. The relations between Austria and Russia, though correct on the surface, are characterised by constant irritation. Again and again of late regrettable incidents between these two Powers, due to the detection of espionage, have arisen, and the prosecution instituted in Austria of Little Russians, or Ruthenes, on charges of high treason, adds fuel to the flame. Altogether, it will be seen, there is more than sufficient material available for the clever manipulation of German public opinion in the direction of Chauvinism. The success of this campaign may be judged from the statement of the Times correspondent in Berlin that "there are now in the field the gun-makers, the Army, to some extent the Navy, the Clericals, together with all those Germans whose sympathies are more Austrian than Prussian, and the Semitic business interests. There is little more to be desired, unless it be the adhesion of the Socialists, who hate Russia and all her works." The comprehensive nature of the agitation reflects an interesting forecast upon the future. It would seem that the forces of the Pan-Germanic movement are gathering shape against those of the Pan-Slavonic movement.

Notes and News

Mr. W. Russell Flint has just been made an associate of the Royal Water-Colour Society. Mr. Flint's illustrations to "The Canterbury Tales" have lately appeared, and he has recently returned from Sicily, where he has been at work upon a set of illustrations for "Theocritus, Bion, and Moschus." These drawings will appear in the Riccardi Press Edition of the "Idylls," translated by Andrew Lang, which will be published in the autumn.

Mr. Charles Pears, well known for his humorous drawings in Punch and other journals, has written and illustrated another book in the style of his previous work, "From the Thames to the Seine." The new volume, describing the author's own yachting experiences, and including accounts of more than one adventurous exploit, is entitled "From the Thames to the Netherlands." It will be published immediately by Messrs. Chatto and Windus.

Mr. Bernard Quaritch announces for publication, on March 28, the first two volumes of Mrs. Perrin's and

"ROYAL YORK" HOTEL, BRIGHTON

Supreme Comfort in a Warm and Sheltered Position. Excellent Sea Views

SOME PRESS OPINIONS.

"To the Cuisine particular attention has been paid, and no expense spared, whilst the service is absolutely perfect."

"And in the Royal York you have the perfection of an English hotel and English cooking."

AND—

Colonel NEWNHAM DAVIS says:—"The Chef makes soup like a Frenchman, grills like an Englishman, and fries like an Italian."

Telegrams:

"Presto, Brighton."

Telephones: 206 Post Office, Brighton.

293 Brighton.

THE KARSINO and NEW ISLAND HOTEL HAMPTON COURT.

Propr.: Mr. FRED KARNO.

Tel.: MOLESEY 1.

*The only Residential River Hotel open
all the Year round.*

THE RIVIERA OF LONDON
THE FAVOURITE RESORT OF LONDON SOCIETY.
LUXURIOUS PALM COURT.
DANCES & ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

For Illustrated Brochure & Tariff, apply Manager.

Professor Boulger's new book on the British Flowering Plants. It will be the most important work on the subject published since Sowerby's English Botany, and will contain 300 beautiful coloured plates from drawings by Mrs. Perrin. Her Majesty the Queen has expressed her intention to accept a copy when published, and H.R.H. the Princess Louise has given permission for the work to be dedicated to her. An exhibition of the original drawings of the book and other drawings by Mrs. Perrin will be held at the Dudley Gallery, Piccadilly, from March 13 to March 27.

A general plan for the establishment of a laboratory or bureau to study the criminal, defective, and pauper classes has been formulated by Mr. Arthur MacDonald, of the Congressional, Washington, D.C., and is being brought to the notice of the Secretary of State for the Home Department in London. In a leaflet issued by Mr. MacDonald many interesting facts and conclusions are given in a lucid manner, and the project has the support of a large number of scientific, medical, legal, and religious societies. The author has written a great number of works on the subject of criminology, which can be obtained by writing to the Superintendent of Documents, Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C.

The office of President to the Children's Country Holidays Fund, held by its founder, Canon Barnett, for thirty years, and rendered vacant by his death last year, has been graciously accepted by H.S.H. Prince Alexander of Teck. The death of the Hon. Alfred Lyttelton made it necessary for another trustee to be appointed, and this post has been accepted by Lord Loreburn. Mrs. S. A. Barnett has become a Vice-President. The work of the Fund is conducted by voluntary helpers, who are making arrangements for the coming season. Last year 47,000 children were provided with a fortnight's country holiday. The Earl of Arran is Treasurer, and 10s. sent to him at 18, Buckingham Street, Strand, will give a boy or a girl a holiday away from London's mean streets.

Forthcoming meetings at the Royal Society of Arts are as follows:—Mondays, March 16, 23, and 30, at 8 p.m., Professor W. A. Bone, D.Sc., F.R.S., "Surface Combustion"; Wednesday, March 18, at 8 p.m., E. H. Ross, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P., "House Flies and Disease," Sir James Crichton-Browne, F.R.S., presiding; Thursday, March 19, at 4.30 p.m., Mrs. Patrick Villiers-Stuart, "Indian Water Gardens"; Wednesday, March 25, at 4.30 p.m., Sir Charles Waldstein, Litt.D., Ph.D., "Fashion in Art"; Tuesday, March 31, at 4.30 p.m., D. F. Mollwo Perkin, F.I.C., F.C.S., "The Oil Resources of the Empire"; Wednesday, April 1, at 8 p.m., Her Highness The Ranee of Sarawak, "Sarawak."

Goodrich House, Hatfield, the property of Mr. F. W. Speaight, whose own residence immediately adjoins, has just been acquired by the Court of Governors of the Hatfield Gallery of Antiques, and they purpose opening the house in April with an exhibition of early English furniture. The property acquires its name from Thomas Goodrich, Bishop of Ely, Lord Chancellor, the last Bishop of Ely to reside in the Old Hatfield Palace, previous to its surrender to Henry VIII, and Goodrich's Arms, quartered with those of the diocese of Ely, are carved on the east wall. The earliest reference to the residence that can be found is in 1483, and in 1605 the owner was Sir John Leake. The work-people, during the recent reconstruction of the property, found a number of coins, also the remainder of a timber building that formerly stood on the site. This fine example of English domestic architecture is in itself well worth a visit.

In the Temple of Mammon

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

LAST week ended in almost a panic; indeed, Saturday was one of the most depressing days I remember. The rain came down steadily and prices fell faster than the rain. The fall was not altogether due to "bears"; nor can we blame the weather. The news from everywhere was really bad. Brazil reported a serious revolution in Ceara, and martial law in Rio. Mexico seemed to be going from bad to worse, and we were told that American citizens had been tortured. Paris sent the gloomiest tales of banking troubles. Ulster was stated to be armed to the teeth and spoiling for a fight. A universal strike was promised in England, and from the United States came the disquieting story of a collapse in Milwaukee. Altogether, the week ended in a most depressing manner, but on Monday people began to look more cheerful. As a matter of fact, this was a necessity; they could not long remain panic-stricken. As I have often said, there is nothing in the position of Great Britain to warrant pessimism, but as we are the money market of the world, disturbances in any other centre instantly react upon us. Here we are as sound as a bell. In most other countries over-trade and over-speculation have left dangerous marks which will take a long time to obliterate. The new issues show signs of falling away. I am not surprised, for such offers as we have had have gone badly. However, a few prospectuses have made their appearance, one of the most important being the British American Tobacco, which, through the International Financial Society, offered £1,400,000 5 per cent. preference. As the profits cover the preference interest nearly ten times over the shares are all right, but I should call them dear. Pacific Phosphate asked for £100,000 6 per cent. second preference. This is an extraordinary company, which makes large profits out of its islands in the Pacific, but the shares are held by a small group, and the public is not interested. Vancouver offered £425,700 4½ per cent. debentures through Brown, Shipley and Co., and the issue is sound and good. Budapest is also in the market, and London is asked to find a million 4½ per cent. bonds at 98. Thus the yield is over 5 per cent., and I think that we shall hardly get a better security, as there will be a market all over the Continent, and the capital of Hungary is hardly likely to default. Tough Oakes has at last made its appearance, but my Canadian friends warn me very strongly to have nothing whatever to do with the mine, and the report of Mr. Johnson only shows that enough ore has been developed to keep the mill running for six months. Therefore, those who follow the local advice will probably save money. People on the spot are much more likely to know about the value of the mine than we in London, who have only Mr. Johnson's rather optimistic statements.

MONEY.—Money is fairly steady, and the Stock Exchange had to pay 3 per cent. for the small sum that it needed at the settlement. There is not much chance of a rise, as trade is getting worse all over the world. Undoubtedly, we are in for a long period of cheap money, and a gradual appreciation in the value of gilt-edged securities. Consols are, however, held now by some very ragged speculators, and I am afraid that until these gentlemen have been shaken out no rise is possible.

FOREIGNERS.—The Foreign market has been in a most depressed condition. Brazil, as I have often pointed out, is divided against itself. The North is preparing to proclaim one of the Braganza family its king and the South is determined to remain Republican. The proclamation of martial law has a much more serious import than people imagine. It is to the interest of all London financiers to allay the disquietude and keep up the price of Brazilian stocks; but we must not be deluded by the optimism of the Stock Exchange, and holders should certainly sell. The position in Paris does not grow any better, and the big banks are now in a worse state than they were some months ago. Whether an immediate issue of the national loan would help matters, no one seems to know; it was postponed to help the bankers, but its postponement destroyed public confidence and this reacted upon the banks, so that the policy is now proved wrong. I am afraid that until we have had a panic, the air will not clear.

HOME RAILS.—The Home Railway market slumped badly. Prices are now at a very tempting level, and I have no hesitation in advising the investor to buy Great Western, London and North Western, and Great Central 1891. All these stocks yield 5 per cent., and are reasonably good markets. I see little or no chance of any further fall. We must not forget that with a long period of cheap money gilt-edged securities are bound to rise. There is no fear of any reduction in the yield. It is true that dividends for 1914 may not be as good as they were in 1913; but the loss in traffics will be offset by the reduced cost of coal and other materials, and even if the dividends drop $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., there is still sufficient margin to maintain the stocks on a 5 per cent. basis, which is really all that an investor can expect to get on a good security.

YANKEES.—The American market was hopelessly upset over the Inter-State Commerce Commission criticism of the Chicago, Milwaukee Railway. Of course, this is all ancient history as far as the railway itself is concerned; but people naturally ask whether other railways have not also over-stated their profits. We must hear what explanation the directors have to make. Chesapeake tumbled badly when the terms of the note issue were made public. The bankers have insisted upon very large sums being paid off each year; consequently, it seems almost impossible that Chesapeake can pay any dividend at all on its common stock. Rocks, Denvers and Missouris remain almost unsaleable. The Copper figures are said to be good, but how anyone can maintain this seems to me incredible considering that the exports do not in any way tally with the imports registered on this side. Clearly, the Copper magnates in New York are hiding away copper with the idea of making an apparent shortage in the metal; but so many people have seen through the manoeuvre that it has lost its efficacy.

RUBBER.—The Batu Caves report shows a decrease in the dividend, but the plantation is carefully managed and large sums have been placed to reserve. It is unlikely that the current year will give more than 50 per cent., at which price the shares yield 10 per cent. The Nordanal is another plantation that has placed big amounts to reserve, but this concern is very much over-capitalised and it does not seem probable that the dividend for 1914 can

HARRODS (BUENOS AIRES) LIMITED.

(Incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1904 and 1913.)

Notice is hereby given that the above-named Company is issuing a Prospectus, dated 9th March, 1914, inviting Subscriptions for 300,000 10 per Cent. Ordinary Shares of £1 each at par. The said Prospectus states amongst other things:—

The Subscription List will open on Thursday, the 12th March, and will close on or before Saturday, the 14th March, 1914.

A Copy of the Prospectus has been filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies.

CAPITAL - - £1,512,000,

DIVIDED INTO

600,000 6½ per Cent. Cumulative Preference Shares of £1 each.
900,000 10 per Cent. Ordinary Shares of £1 each,
240,000 Deferred Shares of 1s. each.

The first issue of Shares, consisting of 600,000 Preference Shares, 600,000 of the Ordinary Shares and 240,000 Deferred Shares, was offered for subscription at par in September, 1913, and subsequently allotted. The Deferred Shares have been fully paid up, and 10s. per Share has been paid on the said Preference and Ordinary Shares.

There are no Debentures.

DIRECTORS.

SIR ALFRED J. NEWTON, BART., Chairman of Harrod's Stores, Ltd. (Chairman), 17, Cumberland Terrace, London, N.W.
RICHARD BURBIDGE, Managing Director of Harrod's Stores, Ltd., 51, Hans
Mansions, London, S.W.
HERBERT BENNETT, Director of Harrod's Stores, Ltd., Queen Anne's Mansions, London, S.W.
EDGAR COHEN, Director of Harrod's Stores, Ltd., 8, Clarges Street, London, W.
WILLIAM MENDEL, Director of Harrod's Stores, Ltd., Basilton House, Moorgate Street, E.C.
H. K. NEWTON, M.P., Director of Harrod's Stores, Ltd., Cheshunts, Boxted, Essex.
R. WOODMAN BURBIDGE, General Manager of Harrod's Stores, Ltd., 26, Hans Mansions, London, S.W.

BANKERS.

BARCLAY & CO. LTD., 54, Lombard Street, London, E.C.
LONDON & RIVER PLATE BANK, LTD., 7, Princes Street, London, E.C.

SOLICITORS.

McKENNA & CO., 31-34, Basinghall Street, London, E.C.

BROKERS.

COHEN, LAMING, GOSCHEN & CO., 14, Austin Friars, London, E.C.

AUDITORS.

GEORGE A. FOUCHE & CO., Basilton House, Moorgate Street, London, E.C.

SECRETARY AND REGISTERED OFFICES.

RICHARD H. GRIFFITH, 87-135, Brompton Road, London, S.W.

ISSUE AT PAR OF THE REMAINING

300,000 10 per cent. Ordinary Shares of £1 each.

Payable—1s. 6d. per Share on application.

4s. 6d. " " on allotment,

5s. 6d. " " one month after allotment, and the balance as and when required in calls not exceeding 5s. per Share, and at intervals of not less than two months. The present issue of Shares will rank for dividend in respect of profits for the current financial year proportionately as from the 1st March, 1914, on the full amount of 10s. per Share.

Shareholders in this Company, Harrod's Stores, Limited, and in Harrod's Stores Founders' Shares Company, Limited, will have preferential allotment, provided application is made on special forms sent to them.

The Company was formed in September last for the purposes mentioned in its Memorandum of Association, and principally for the purpose of carrying on under the auspices of Harrod's Stores, Limited, the business of General Stores in Buenos Aires.

Since the formation of the Company the opportunity presented itself for the acquisition of a large plot of land facing Calle San Martin and also of acquiring other adjacent plots, which will enable the Company to add a considerable number of departments to those contemplated in first instance without curtailing their space. The plan issued with the said Prospectus shews:—

- the freehold land—about 24,000 square feet—being the original site on which the building facing Calle Florida is being erected by the Company (coloured Pink).
- the large plot of land above referred to and the adjacent plots—containing in all about 38,000 square feet—costing about £161,000 (coloured Red).
- the property occupied by Thompson Muebles, Limitada (shaded Black).

It will be seen that the new area forms not only a most important addition in size (considerably more than doubling the original area), but, what is also of great value, it provides an important frontage for the receipt and delivery of goods on the Company's own land without interfering with the traffic on the main frontage.

The average price for the new area is about $390 m/n per square vara, and, having regard to the fact that it connects with the valuable Calle Florida site, it is considered by the Board a cheap and most valuable acquisition.

In order to provide the purchase price already paid and to be paid of the new area, and towards the requirements of the extended scope of the Company's enterprise generally, the 300,000 Ordinary Shares, originally reserved in view of this contingency, are now offered for public subscription.

Good progress has been made with the building facing Calle Florida, in spite of the very heavy rainfalls experienced in September and October last, and according to the latest cables the ground floor and first floor will be ready for trade about the end of this month in accordance with the original programme.

The whole of this issue has been underwritten at a commission of 5 per cent., and an over-riding commission of 1 per cent. payable by the Company.

The Company will pay a brokerage of 3d. per Share on all allotments made in respect of applications, other than those made in direct relief of underwriting, bearing the stamp of a broker or other recognised agent.

The Directors of this Company, in addition to the interest of Mr. W. Mendel and of Mr. R. W. Burbidge in the Contracts made with them as stated in the Prospectus, are interested by having sub-underwritten Shares of the present issue as follows:—

Sir Alfred J. Newton, Bart.	has sub-underwritten	5,000	Shares	for a com	of 5 p.c.
Mr. Richard Burbidge	"	5,000	"	"	"
" William Mendel	"	10,000	"	"	"
" Edgar Cohen	"	4,000	"	"	"
" R. Woodman Burbidge	"	3,000	"	"	"
" Herbert Bennett	"	1,000	"	"	"

Copies of the Prospectus and Application Forms can be obtained from the Bankers and Brokers of the Company, and from Harrod's Stores, Limited (Banking Department), Brompton Road, S.W.

This announcement is not an invitation to the public to subscribe for Shares, and applications for Shares must be made on the form issued with the said Prospectus.

exceed 7½ per cent; therefore the shares are over-valued to-day. The Rubber market looks weak.

OIL.—When will the Premier Oil and Pipe directors call the meeting of the ordinary shareholders? Everybody is asking this. The committee will insist upon the meeting being called and will then propose Mr. Miller, Mr. Norfolk, Mr. Kohler and the barrister who proposed the resolution at the last meeting and is conversant with Austrian law. These gentlemen are to replace Mr. Jackson, who has resigned, Mr. Perkins, and probably Mr. Max Byng, together with one of the Van den Berghs. The Oil market generally is dull, but North Caucasians keep hard, and the "bulls" of Maikop Premier are talking very big.

MINES.—The Mysore report shows slightly decreased profits, but the dividend of 125 per cent. is easily maintained. There is enough ore to keep the mill going nearly five years, and the directors are determined to go down nearly 5,000 feet. At present price, Mysore seems fully valued, as the yield is falling away at depth. The East Rand report was frankly bad, and the shares have fallen. Great Cobar seems to be getting into the hands of the debenture holders. They will certainly foreclose unless the reconstruction scheme is brought out immediately.

MISCELLANEOUS.—The Electric Light companies have practically decided to have nothing to do with the proposed combine. This does not mean that they will not form a combine of their own, but only that they do not see why they should pay the promoters of the scheme a huge profit for doing what they might very well do themselves. I do not think anyone will blame them. John Dewar's report is magnificent, and White Label whisky is evidently as profitable as it is palatable. C. and E. Morton's figures show further increase, and the preference shares are a gilt-edged investment.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

DICTIONARIES AS HELPERS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—In one of the last issues of THE ACADEMY, you made some relevant remarks in connection with the helplessness of Dictionaries, when these guides are most urgently needed. To my mind, the best definition that can be given of a dictionary as it has hitherto been conceived by lexicographers—so far as unaided students are concerned, is exactly that which Doctor Johnson gives of a patron, viz.: "One who looks with unconcern upon a man struggling for life in the water, and, when he has reached ground, encumbers him with help."

Your remarks, sir, brought me back at once to the time when, after having acquired at school a thorough knowledge of English grammar, after having done countless translations from French into English, under an English master, and from English into French, under a French master, well read in English, I made up my mind to push my fortune in the world of English journalism. I may say that, although I had at the time within my reach the best dictionaries that could be had in England and in France, my first attempts at earning my bread through the medium of English were a complete failure.* From that moment, till I came to England, in 1907, I may as well say that I never held converse with an Englishman, as the time spent in this respect was, on an average, about one hour every ten years. In order, therefore, that I might not lose the good accent which my English master said I had acquired, I had to read aloud, over and over again, by myself, once a week, the books that I had studied under him. So far as the written language is concerned, I read during forty years as few foreigners have ever done. I used to examine every sentence of a good author's work, for instance, with that scrupulous attention with which a jeweller would examine the gems and precious stones that were offered for sale to him. I may say that, with the practical knowledge of English, which I have acquired here, since 1907, I might perhaps improve a little upon the English essay submitted to my readers further on;† but my object is to let them have some idea of the resources that one, scarcely acquainted with a foreign language, as actually spoken, can derive from a Phraseological Dictionary compiled on the same lines as the one I did compile for my own private use.

We will suppose a tourist to have lost his way on a wet evening in the country, to have had to put up at the first inn he could find, and to have afterwards to give a minute description of the persons and things that he met and saw at that inn.

The first thing that the young writer has to do is to find out the different points that are to be treated. In the following narrative, they come under three heads only: First, the wet evening and the kind of welcome that the tourist receives at the inn; secondly, his general impression of the persons and things he sees in the dining-room, into which he is ushered; thirdly, the description of the different objects that caught his eye.

For the first head, he has only to consult his phraseological dictionary—supposing one to have been published—under the letters Wea (weather); he will find all kinds of descriptions of Nature, in the morning, in the middle of the day and at night, throughout the different seasons. As he has to speak, here, only of a dark and very wet evening, in November, he will find a few dozen appropriate descriptions to choose from.

Under the second head, under the letters Hou (House),

* Some details in connection with my ordeals appeared in THE ACADEMY of July 3, 1907.

† That essay is but a kind of mental free translation of "Les Aventures d'un Touriste," which I read when I was a boy. I made it before 1907, in order to test the efficiency of the Phraseological Dictionary, which I have been compiling for my own private use, that is to say, for the use of a student of English who lived far away from an English-speaking community.

the book will also give him a good many descriptions of exteriors as well as interiors of houses, from the "stately palace" to the humblest peasant's cottage.

The third head refers to smokers and their habits and gestures. In the dictionary, under the letters Smo (smokers), he will find what he requires; but as he has to give portraits and gestures of the persons as well, he turns over the pages of the book and finds, under the letters Por (portraits), a gallery of portraits penned by the most skilful artists in the literary line. Regarding their gestures, under the letters Ges, he will have at his command a special chapter of gestures of persons of both sexes, from the gestures of old people to those of infants.

But I notice that there are two onomatopœias in the narrative—the tinkling of glasses, and the fizzling of the cigarette that has come into contact with some beer on the table. As the young writer might feel puzzled there, he is advised, under the circumstances, to look up his Phraseological Dictionary for the letters Ono (onomatopœia). The English language being one of the richest in respect of onomatopœias, the student is sure to find, in alphabetical order, what he requires, from the quacking of ducks, the gobbling of the turkey-cock, the mooring of the cow, etc., to the scrooping of a rope—when, for instance, a boat is lowered into the sea from a ship.

A TOURIST'S ADVENTURE.†

